The circle of friends gathered together by the poet, Agathon, want to undertake the praise of erôs, and are astonished that 'while other gods have hymns and psalms indited in their honour by the poets, Erôs, the god of love, so ancient and so great, has had no song of praise composed for him by a single one of all the many poets that ever have been'.[244] Phaedrus, as the first, has an easy task to praise him in myth and to draw examples of his power from Homer and Hesiod, from tragedy (Alcestis, Achilles dying out of love), and even from Parmenides.[245] As second, Pausanias depicts heavenly erôs, distinguishing it from the lower, earthly love, and gives moral rules for proper love of boys.[246] The doctor, Eryximachus, finds erôs in nature as a whole, even in sub-human nature, and defines it as the striving after a more beautiful ordering, after harmony, but this is consonance and agreement;[247] thus musical art infuses love into beings who exist, to begin with, in 'non-unity', in 'opposition'.[248] Aristophanes underlines how it is a situation of tragic potentialities, when he tells the myth of the originally androgynous men, who 'were of surprising strength and vigour and so lofty in their notions that they even conspired against the gods'[249] and therefore Zeus sliced them into two halves so that now, all over the earth, they go in search of one another, and when one of them has 'found his real half', then there develops a bond between them of 'such affection, intimacy and love, that they are hardly to be induced to leave each other's side for a single moment', even though 'they could not say what they would have of one another', for it is not simple enjoyment of love, nor could they out of two become one. If we 'for our sins were dispersed by God', then must we henceforth follow a 'pious observance of the gods',[250] for 'if we make friends with the god and are reconciled, we shall have the fortune . . . of discovering our proper favourite', and with him 'revert to our primal state' and find eudaimonia.[251] Agathon wants to depict the essence of the god, Eros, instead of his effects, and adorns him with rhetorical crowns: he is most blessed in himself and makes everyone blessed; he is tender and soft; he possesses the art of making all serve him and pay him homage freely; he himself reconciles the gods with one another and frees men from alienation (ἀλλοιότης).[252] Socrates criticizes this commendation, which has met with general applause: if erôs is essentially yearning desire (ἐπιθυμία), then it strives after something that it lacks; if it strives after beauty, then it is itself not beautiful, indeed perhaps it is not even good, if the beautiful and the good are one.[253] To elucidate this, he repeats a discourse he heard from Diotima, which made him understand that Eros is neither God nor man but 'something in between' (μεταξύ), 'a great daimon' therefore, 'for the whole of the daimonic is between divine and mortal'; he has the task of 'interpreting and transporting human things to the gods and divine things to men'.[254] Entreaties and sacrifices rise up, ordinances and requitals descend, 'so that the whole is combined in one.' He mediates everything religious—sacrifice and ritual and incantations, priestcraft and sorcery—for God does not mingle immediately with men: all communication goes through him, both in sleep and in waking consciousness.[255] So he is the son of Plenty and Poverty equally, and if he is in this in-between position a 'famous hunter, always weaving some stratagem . . . a sorcerer, a poisoner and a sophist', then he is also a 'philosopher'—for neither the gods nor those without understanding philosophise but only one who is on fire with love for the true and the beautiful; the beloved is the perfect, the lover is only on the way.[256] And now arises the question (the model question put by the Greeks about the love of boys): what does he really want as he burns with longing for the beautiful? Certainly it is not just to 'behold' the divine (as later an intellectualised Christian theology will describe the essence of eternal eudaimonia) but 'to beget in the beautiful',[257] for it is impossible in the ugly. This happens at a sexual level between man and woman: it is a matter of procreation, pregnancy and birth. But in the foreground lies 'the eternal and the immortal, in so far as it can be achieved by the mortal', namely the perpetuation of the species of mortal beings who are therefore ready to die for their posterity.[258] Men too want to be immortal: whence the use of memory, whence the overpowering love of posthumous fame, whence all poetry and artistic creation, whence, above all, the raising of spiritual children in paid-agogia.[259] If then Diotima can lead one to the highest stage of initiation into the mysteries of love, can portray the progression of love from one particular beautiful body to all such, then to the spiritual beauty of souls ('even if the body's charm is slight'), of endeavours, customs and laws, and can finally, launching into the 'main ocean of the beautiful', suddenly (ἐξαίφνης) reveal the glory of the wondrous vision of the eternal and immutable Beautiful-in-itself: then it cannot be simply a matter, after all these preliminary steps dictated by the nature of erôs, of a mere beholding, θεᾶσθαι, but of a being with and in the presence of, συνεῖναι,[260] still more of a 'begetting in the Truth', not in the mere shadowy reflection of correct being (ἀρετή) but in its very reality, so that the lover attains to becoming 'a divine favourite' and therefore 'immortal'.[261] The sexual model, which in the earlier speeches formed the leading image for the cosmic, the heavenly, the tragic Eros's struggle after union, is here finally transcended and becomes a copy of an original image, which sees a hint of the wonder of a fruitfulness of the finite in the Absolute.

---

[243] Phaedrus 250E–257B.
[244] Symp. 177A.
[245] Ibid. 178A–180B.
[246] Ibid. 180C–185C.
[247] Ibid. 187B.
[248] Ibid. 187A.
[249] Ibid. 190B.

---

[250] Ibid. 192B–E.

[251] Ibid. 193AC. The question, what erôs between human beings really wants, is raised again in Laws VIII.837BC.

[252] Ibid. 194E–197E.

[253] Ibid. 200A, 201B, 201E.

[254] Ibid. 202A.

---

[255] Ibid. 202E–203A.

[256] Ibid. 203D, 204AC.

[257] Ibid. 206C.

[258] Ibid. 206E–207B. On the relationship between procreation and the will of the species for immortality: Laws IV.721B et seq.; VI.773E.

[259] Ibid. 207C–209E.

If now the drunken Alcibiades breaks in riotously and makes his speech to Socrates, if he compares him to the status of Silenus which can be opened to reveal inside secret, hidden images of the gods, if he confesses that this man can make his heart beat wildly, as if he were in the grip of a corybantic frenzy, if he even tells how a well-intentioned attempt at seduction rebounded with such a 'man truly inspired by a daemon' and 'his accustomed irony', so that he slept with him 'as with a father or an elder brother', if he finally depicts him as one completely incomparable,[262] while Socrates, who himself is never drunk and has drunk all the rest under the table, is still arguing in the morning (about the unity of tragedy and comedy), then indeed the thesis about erôs as μεταξύ seems to be confirmed once more: this more-than-human, less-than-divine, this 'demonic' man has the last word. The wonderful speech of Diotima's was itself only drawn out from the little treasure-chest of gods of the opened Silenus, it was simply the overflow of his irony. That he has experienced it—ἐγὼ εἶδον[263]—is the witness of Alcibiades/Plato. A radiance from within has broken forth from Socrates, demonically, but so that he himself explains his relationship, at the level of thought, to the divine, the beloved, the sought-after by means of the analogy of love between the sexes, which is itself understood not only as transcending pederasty but as fulfilment in another through begetting. And that the horizontal relationship between the sexes may be raised to the vertical, of this the Symposium provides the preparatory steps and the transitions: the myth (Phaedrus), the physiology (Eryximachus), the doctrine of the fall through sin and the homecoming to safety (Aristophanes). Already the Lysis, a preliminary sketch for the Symposium, emphatically poses the question as to whether the passionate relationship to wisdom could not become reciprocal (ἀν μή ἡ σοφία αὐτοὺς [scil. φιλοσόφους] ἀντιφιλῇ)[264] and even the Republic speaks of the 'approach to and mingling' of the highest capacity of the soul with 'true being' to such an extent as to give birth to 'intelligence' (νοῦς) and truth (ἀλήθεια) and therein to grow and finally to be 'at rest from his travail'.[265]

---

[260] Ibid. 211D, 212A.
[261] Ibid. 212AB.
[262] Ibid. 213–222B.
[263] Ibid. 216E.

The unheard-of opening, through which the philosophy of erôs breaks, when it dares to use the analogy of reciprocal love for the relationship to the Absolute, remains mysterium and is always both softened and excused by the play of irony. Its assertion in the Symposium remains indirect, at three removes: the report of a report of a report. Only the demonic 'between' stands out clearly in its dangerous position between the divine and the earthly: a bridge thrown across, before even the opposition of the two banks is seriously seen and secured. For that Jewry would be needed. And so the sublimity of the Symposium opens wide the doors for the blending in of Hellenistic piety.

Nevertheless there is still the daimonion of Socrates, about which so much is at least clear: that he in no ways understood this mysterious voice within himself, which from time to time broke out, always to warn him negatively, as his 'conscience' or as the psychological or transcendental depths of his self. Nor did he want to call it a god, he to whom the thoughtless use of this name was so repugnant,[266] who from the meaning of the names of the gods would deduce nothing as to their natures, but only as to the 'conceptions, in accordance with which men bestow such names',[267] and who was accused of not accepting the traditional gods of the state but 'something new, something demonic'.[268] But this accusation stemmed from the fact, as Euthyphro told him, that he himself maintained that he had experienced the demonic.[269] He himself called it 'something divine and demonic',[270] 'the accustomed demonic sign',[271] 'the daimonion and the accustomed sign . . . like a voice';[272] but he can also speak to be 'reviled' in conversation,[273] something that clearly belongs to the 'demonic that is accustomed to come to me'.[274] This voice is something particular, which cannot be universalised, even if in a broader sense each soul may be said to have its own proper god[275] and to be led by its daimonion to its own fated life.[276] The personal 'sign from God', which only intervenes where a warning, or prohibition, is called for, has not hindered him on his way to death but rather opened it up to him;[277] here a relationship of deep and simple obedience holds sway, where irony has no place. Plato takes his master simply at his own word. Posterity, represented especially by Plutarch in his treatise On the daemon of Socrates, undertakes the inevitable, if unwelcome, clarifications which moreover presuppose religious syncretism and do more to confuse than clarify. According to Plutarch the daimon is the point of contact between God and man (without mediation of the external senses: the immediate contact of spirit and spirit);[278] 'the thoughts of daimons have a certain radiance, whereby they illuminate those who are capable of it without needing names, or words, or any other symbols'.[279] But then again the daimons are themselves seen in a vision and reveal themselves as that in each soul which is not immersed in the ocean of the corporeal, but which remains sovereign, the νοῦς or the ἡγεμονικόν.[280] Yet again in contradiction to that, Plutarch can speak of a particular choice by which individual men who are invested with a divine seal[281] become God's friends, as also of a process, by which men who have lived virtuously accustom themselves thereby to the upper realm and can after death themselves become daimons.[282] Over against such chatter the Platonic Socrates remains in a sober obligation towards what is higher; he 'obeys the laws as his tutors', he hears them speaking to him as a man who has them 'ringing in his ears'.[283] But Socrtes did not reflect philosophically on his 'voice': in that Hegel is right,[284] as indeed Kierkegaard,[285] who echoes him here; though whether they are right when they both interpret it as the emergence of a new stage of spiritual self-consciousness, of the freedom of subjectivity, is more than questionable; for what Socrates himself describes contradicts the course laid down by Plato, like a rock in the midst of a stream. It is not to be resolved in the doctrine of harmony, with which Plato connects it; it belongs to those incalculable 'suddennesses', which (and this, interestingly, is also how Goethe understands the demonic) break through the nicely-rounded world of beauty.[286] It is not possible in reality to transcend the 'in between' of erôs, nor therefore effectively to guard against the misunderstandings of Plutarch.

---

[264] Lysis 212E.

[265] Rep. VI.490B.

[266] Philebus 12C: 'My awe, O Protarchus, in respect to the names of the gods is not of the usual human sort, but transcends the greatest fear.'

[267] Cratylus 401A, 425BC. Cf. the mockery of the tragedians' gods on machines: 425D.

---

[268] Apol. 24BC; Euthyphro 2D.

[269] Euthyphro 3B. Hippias calls him the 'demonic Socrates': Hipp. Maj. 293D, as does Alcibiades in the Symposium: 219BC.

[270] Apol. 31C.

[271] Euthydemus 272C.

[272] Phaedrus 242B.

[273] Hipp. Maj. 304C.

[274] Theaet. 151A.

[275] Phaedrus 248A, 249C, 250B, 252CD.

[276] Rep. X.620D.

[277] Apol. 40B.

[278] Plutarch, Über den Dämon des Sokrates, in Vermischte Schriften, übertragen von Kaltwasser (G. Müller 1911) Vol. 2, 188. Other explanations: Maximus of Tyre, Dialex. 14, Apuleius, De deo Socratis, where cap.16 says that each man has his daimon as guardian, but Socrates had seen his protective spirit. Lit. in Praechter (1926) 59.—

---

[279] Ibid. 189.

[280] Ibid. 195–196.

[281] Ibid. 198.

[282] Ibid. 200.

[283] Crito 54B,D.

[284] Geschichte der Philosophie II (1833), 94f.

[285] The Concept of Irony, with constant reference to Socrates (E.T. 1966), 190.

[286] Ἐξαίφνης: Gorg. 523E; Symp. 210E; Theaet. 162C; Cratyl. 391A, 396B; Rep. V. 453C; Parm. 156D.

3. 'Myth', for Plato, is to be found, and belongs, where the lines drawn by philosophical reflection stretch beyond its grasp. An individual may and can discover 'myths', even if in so doing he keeps (or pretends to keep) more or less to traditional themes; the time of myth itself is in the past; its form of expression will be poetic but for this reason—precisely because it forms the upper boundary of philosophical reflection—in no sense optional. The mythical utterance remains bracketed off like an island round which the waves of irony play: none of this however precludes speaking within such limits with the greatest earnest and truly poetical and prophetic inspiration—in the allegory of the Cave, for example, or in the great eschatological myth at the end of the Republic. Here and in the other myths of judgment things are clarified and exemplified which, even philosophically, are only seen to be true when made concrete in some way in the realm of the transcendent, even if in this process the manner in which it is depicted (without which the poet can say nothing) is not itself materially important. The poetical is here the unavoidable substitute for the concretion of a revelation; only together with this form of expression can philosophy express what it must, and it cannot entrench itself in a (finally impracticable) immanent ethic. This concretion could not be replaced by illustration from historical situations: not even by the kairos of philosophy, which lay for Plato and Aristotle in the objective, historical situation between Heraclitus and Empedocles; not even in the totality of history, as Hegel will understand it, may the necessary conversio ad phantasma be found, which would make the platonic myths philosophically superfluous; rather the way forward from here leads only through the Christian revelation, which is uniquely able to accomplish the otherwise unattainable synthesis between poetry (myth) and philosophy. Until then philosophy remains in that situation where it must at once create myth as its own limit and yet critically take it back again: at the same time it must place things in the overflowing radiance of the inspiration of erôs, which it cannot justify by rational consideration. The implications of this become palpable in the Timaeus-myth, where in response to mythical imagination a personal God is set above the gods of the cosmos and yet in accordance with philosophical considerations must be subordinated to the Idea of the Good. This ambiguity affects man's self-consciousness both theoretically and practically right to the end. Personal prayer or pure theoria as contemplation? Created being or necessary emanation and participation in the primordially divine? Piety rationally clarified into virtue or virtue finding its perfection in piety? The proofs of God's existence are only philosophically necessary proofs of the divine (theion), of that 'which all men call God' (as Thomas will say);[287] its complement, which transcends the capacity of pure reason but is demanded in the name of practical reason, that is, the perfectibility of man as he exists,[288] can only be satisfactorily discovered as a 'postulate': that is, for the Greek, through bringing the myth of an epiphany of the God to life again for oneself; or, for the Christian, through the anticipation of the revelation. This explains why according to Plato myth can possess different grades of existential seriousness. At its lowest it is almost an optional, poetic outline, which clarifies in a picture one side of the all-embracing truth—so, for example, the myth in the Statesman of the cosmos as a sphere, revolving first this way then that[289]—here the point is that one can only speak with probability of heavenly and divine things, while exactness reaches only to human things.[290] At a higher level of its optional clothing: as in the eschatological myth of the Phaedo with its bizarre details,[291] in the powerful closing myth of the Republic,[292] up to those sublime stories, in which the inexactness of the narrative points precisely to what is described, with the result that it appears paler, less real, without a picture than with one: in the Phaedrus-myth and the allegory of the Cave. Here the clothed bodies say more about man than they would naked. Here therefore philosophy falls into a strange crisis: it is as if it cannot yield total human knowledge, as if its standing as the queen of the sciences is undermined precisely when one views it in the context of human totality.

---

[287] Gustav Siewerth, Das Schicksal der Metaphysik von Thomas zu Heidegger (1959). Therein: 'Die Gottesbeweise bei Thomas' 52–62; 'Wie kommt Gott in die Philosophie?' 463–508.

[288] Cf. my book Man in History (E.T. of Das Ganze im Fragment): 'The perfectibility of man'.

[289] Statesman 268E–274E.

[290] Critias 107D.

[291] Phaedo 110B–114C.

[292] Rep. X. 614B–621B.

4. Which brings us to the alarming question, where Plato is going to lead the transcendence of knowledge. The implication for knowledge in general is first worked out clearly in the Theatetus: it is not perception, as Protagoras, and before him Heraclitus, had held: pure subjectivity leads to pure transformation and thus undermines any truth. It is therefore not an act linked with any particular organ, but an act of judgment on the part of the spirit-soul, which beyond all changing things knows about being and not-being, identity and difference.[293] Do we pass over then into the realm of pure being, which Parmenides had contemplated? Here Socrates breaks off. 'Parmenides seems to me to be, in Homer's words, "one to be venerated" and also "awful". For I met him when I was very young and he was very old'—this meeting is depicted in the dialogue Parmenides in which Socrates is outplayed—'and he appeared to me to possess an absolutely noble depth of mind.'[294] There can be no doubt: while Plato had considered with interest Heraclitus' closed philosophical system of pure becoming, but had definitely rejected it,[295] he had been drawn towards Parmenides' closed philosophical system of pure being with ever-increasing fascination, until it appeared to him absolutely necessary to appropriate it from within and to take up his abode, together with his distinction of being and becoming (not-being), idea and appearance, within the Parmenidean totality. That is the task, introduced by the Parmenides, of the late, and

---

[293] Theaet. 185CD.

[294] Theaet. 193E–184A.

[295] On Heraclitus: Cratyl. (rejection of sayings on doctrine of panta rhei:) 401E, 413Dff., (criticism and opposing teaching:) 437–438. Hipp. Maj. 289B. Various criticisms: Symp. 187Aff.; Theaet. 152E, 179E, 183A. Positive aspects: Symp. 207Cff.; Theaet. 152Eff.

uncompleted, trilogy of the Sophist, the Statesman and the Philosopher, which summarise the anti-Sophist dialogues of his youth, transcend the Republic and could have and would have brought to its most universal and all-embracing form even the Symposium's ascent of erôs: now no longer under the sign of erôs but of that knowledge which is the philosopher's final concern and to which the awesome name of 'Parmenides the Great'[296] attaches. But how? If erôs was found to be a daimon, what else then could philosophical knowledge be as its twin brother, its reverse side? The gods indeed do not philosophise,[297] nor do the sophists (they belong ultimately to the realm of non-being and delusion); statesmen are to be held in the highest reverence and are indeed indispensable, but at their level they can at best achieve 'correct opinion': 'they have nothing more to do with wisdom than soothsayers and diviners'.[298] The Statesman indicates once more that, if they wish to rule with ἐπιστήμη,[299] they must already participate in the state of being a philosopher. The philosopher philosophises above the politeia, beneath God: his art is daimonic. It is not simply a matter of the vision of the beginning (otherwise thinking would be superfluous); this vision only bursts forth 'on a sudden', and only then, when he is sufficiently practised in his own art, that of dialectic.[300] He therefore has his own skill, that of integrating in itself the specialised objective knowledge of the individual sciences in a strange suspended way, different from the inimical dilettantism of the poets.[301] This integration, a matter for philosophy alone, can happen only within the horizon and in the consideration of being as being; therefore Plato breaks through Parmenides' prohibition against concerning himself with the manifold and the non-existent, and rather deals with being precisely in its difference, rest and movement, thus establishing his ontology, that is to say, giving an answer, on the basis of a deeper understanding of Parmenides, to Aristotle's ontology. The inner movedness of being itself is thought out by the dialectician[302] and thus its basic constituents are discovered which in their complementary relations of both connected and opposing kinds have to be analogous among themselves, which again means that the existent must be shot through in its innermost being with the non-existent.[303] Thus the crude and constricted dialectic of the dialogue Parmenides (in which neither the position of the One nor that of the not-one could be followed through in its consequences) softens, but in such a way that the origins of Neoplatonism become visible: 'the existent too is not itself, in so far as the rest is.'[304] What Plato means here is not that the 'Good' holds sway beyond being but that the existent is negated in so far as it is opposed to itself in its parts.[305] Or in the Seventh Letter: the true philosopher must thoroughly examine the realm of becoming at the same time as the realm of being, 'both the false and the true of all being', τὸ ψεῦδος ἅμα καὶ ἀληθὲς τῆς ὅλης οὐσίας.[306] At the end there stands a Parmenides, purged of his negation; the 'well-rounded sphere, evenly balanced from the midst in every direction'[307] [296] Sophist 237A. Cf. the exception made of Parmenides: Theaet. 152C.

---

[297] Symp. 204A.

[298] Meno 99BD.

[299] Statesman 292B, 293C.

[300] Ep. VII. 341C.

[301] The problem of this integration becomes clear first in the Charmides, where individual insights are to be gathered together into a universal knowledge as 'knowledge of itself and of all other knowledge' (Aristotle's νόησις νοήσεως (167BC), leaving open the question whether such a thing really exists (169A), but then it is required that this act includes within itself the individual, objectively justified forms of knowledge, that it may be knowledge in general. The way leads further through the Republic and reaches a conclusion in the Statesman, where the royal art is determined as the συμπλοκή, the all-embracing weaving-together of all true objective knowledge and true possession (306A, 309B, 310E). The weal and woe of the whole human world is again decisive, as the passionate excursus by Socrates in the Theaetetus on the position of the philosopher indicates (172B–177C). On this see Wilamowitz, Platon I (1920²), 524f.

---

[302] Sophist 253D et seq.

[303] The whole dialectic of the Sophist is concerned with the nature of potentiality, esp. 256ff.; mê-on is 'not opposed to the existent, but simply distinct' (257B).

[304] Sophist 257A; cf. Parm. 139C.

[305] Sophist 258E.

[306] Ep. VII. 344B.

[307] Cited in Sophist 244E.

need no longer be ashamed of its parts and the resultant non-identity and movement. But even this totality, which contains within itself each non-totality, will be called in the Philebus the 'fairest and most perfect according to its nature'[308] and here be thought with the medium of Pythagorean thinking to consist of the determined and undetermined.[309] But that leads in the direction of the theory of numbers as the final way of philosophy: being as proportion and harmony. That is Pythagorean esotericism.

Here there emerges the transcendental movement of knowledge as knowledge, of philosophy as a 'great daimon' of the 'in between'. The sovereign ascent of Parmenides is not denied, it only becomes more demanding, since now it must take becoming with it up into being, the half into the whole. This whole is the soundest, κάλλιστον, the most honourable, τιμιώτατον;[310] inspiration, erôs, myth can point to nothing higher. And yet this totality contains in itself not only the 'divine' but just as much which is less than divine, just as erôs, which man prizes as a god, proves not to be such. Already the Lysis had raised the question as to what love really wanted. If only the good is friend of the good,[311] what then can the similar receive from the similar that it has not itself already?[312] Is it not precisely the opposite that attracts and provides mutual nourishment?[313] For the beautiful and the good to appear as friends, is it necessary to be deprived of both? Hunger and thirst are therefore necessary, but if the beautiful and the good are desired not for the sake of some purpose but for their own sake, then must it not be a hunger and thirst without any admixture of disadvantage?[314] But then does not this striving of privation for something that already belongs to it find rest beyond deprivation and possession?[315] With the question still open the Lysis breaks off. The Gorgias leads into the same problem of neediness as the ever new presupposition of any bliss of fulfilment,[316] the Phaedo develops the doctrine of the reciprocity of the pleasant and the unpleasant,[317] and the Theaetetus even takes us into the doctrine of the eternal necessity to the good of an opposed evil.[318] All fulfilling-fulfilled rests on a final 'between', and that goes too for knowledge which, as philo-sophia, is only on the way towards wisdom.[319] Should just this structure—well known from the erôs of the Symposium onwards—illuminate the 'beautiful'? Is it not precisely the mysterious fulfilment of the unfulfilled? So finally we have to deal with the predicate of the kalon which for the Greek Plato is, together with the agathon, the ultimate expression of the existent and the all.

---

[308] Philebus 30B.

[309] Phileb. 17E, 23C et seq., 26C.

[310] Phileb. 30B; Tim. 30A.

[311] Lysis 214D.

[312] Ibid. 215A.

[313] Ibid. 215C–216A.

[314] Ibid. 221AB.

[315] Ibid. 221D to the end.

c. The Breadth of the Kalon

Kalon from the very beginning embraces in itself much more than what is implied for us in the word 'beautiful': it is the right, the fitting, the good, that which is appropriate to a being, that in virtue of which it possesses its integrity, its health, its security; only in so far as it embraces all this, is kalon also, by way of confirmation and proof, the beautiful. This final predicate can indeed emerge in its distinctness and so raise the question as to whether the beauty which appears is also good, and how deeply into the roots of being such beauty reaches: whether it is not simply something superficial and phenomenal but perhaps really something essential. But the kalon is in any case coextensive with being: it is a transcendental. This is seen in the ascent of the Symposium from beautiful bodies, to beautiful souls, to beauty itself. If the Laws being, that in virtue of which it possesses its integrity, its health, its security; only in so far as it embraces all this, is

---

[316] Gorg. 493ff., 496C.

[317] Phaedo 60BC.

[318] Theaet. 176A.

[319] Lysis 218A: the wise, be they gods or men, do not philosophize. Cf. what is said in the Euthydemus about learning (277E et seq.) and the corresponding teaching of the Meno and the Symposium.

kalon also, by way of confirmation and proof, the beautiful. This final predicate can indeed emerge in its distinctness and so raise the question as to whether the beauty which appears is also good, and how deeply into the roots of being such beauty reaches: whether it is not simply something superficial and phenomenal but perhaps really something essential. But the kalon is in any case coextensive with being: it is a transcendental. This is seen in the ascent of the Symposium from beautiful bodies, to beautiful souls, to beauty itself. If the Laws speak of the possibility that someone might 'prefer the virtue of beauty',[320] then it is said with a backward glance to this schema of ascent and deepening. Similarly when Alcibiades compares Socrates to a statue of Silenus, beautiful within, filled with 'hidden images of the gods', he adds; 'I have seen them and thought them so divine and golden, so perfectly fair and wondrous.'[321] The opposition of outer and inner beauty begins indeed with Socrates but is immediately harmonised hierarchically by Plato in his philosophy of the All-Beautiful.

The obviously transcendental character of the kalon is also the background of that early investigation of the nature of the 'beautiful', the Hippias Major, whose unsuccessful search for a definition still makes known one aspect of the kalon in its meanderings. Asked by Socrates whether he knows what beauty is, Hippias replies with examples: 1. Beautiful girls are beautiful (but are they beautiful as such or only in the view of beings of a similar nature?); 2. glittering gold is beautiful (but yet only when properly used in a statue: Pheidias did not make Athene's eyes out of gold); 3. the fitting (τὸ πρέπον) is beautiful (but then only in its relationship to some other beautiful thing, not in itself; only in appearance, not in its essential being[322]); Hippias indeed maintains that the fitting can at the same time both be and appear to be beautiful, but Socrates will have nothing of it, otherwise it would be impossible for things, beautiful in themselves, not also to ap-

---

[320] Laws V. 727A.

[321] Symp. 216DE.

[322] Hipp. maj. 293E–294A.

[322] Hipp. maj. 293E–294A.

pear to be beautiful.[323] The beautiful is the useful (χρήσιμον, aptum), which corresponds to an everyday use of the Greek word: 'The body is kalon for running or wrestling', 'all vessels, vehicles, instruments, laws', 'everything that is effective accomplishes something'. Socrates has made this proposal but must at the same time add: effective and useful for the good, so that the sixth attempt yields the result that the beautiful is equated with the serviceable, ὠφέλιμον[324] (but then the good produces the beautiful and the good and the beautiful are thus separated, something which 'by Zeus does not please me', because it endangers the transcendentality of the beautiful and allows one to conceive of a good which might not be beautiful). The seventh attempt, to determine the beautiful as that which delights the highest senses, the eye and the ear (pulchra sunt quae visa et audita placent), leads to the difficulty that here the beautiful is subordinated to a general concept of pleasure, quite apart from the problem as to what this characteristic of the beautiful, which is common to what pleases the eye and what pleases the ear, really amounts to. Plato does not in any way deny that aspects of the beautiful are to be found in all these definitions: the graceful, the radiant, the fitting and that which corresponds, the enhancing and the delightful: clear sides of a transcendent reality, facets which are throughout affirmed and to which he returns.[325] So we find this sentence in Republic X: 'the excellence or beauty or rightness of any implement or living creature or action has reference to the use for which it is made or designed by nature',[326] wherein once more the basic principle of service, by way of objective definition, emerges.

But then the kalon approaches the good, ἀγαθόν, most markedly. The two concepts had long been joined together in the term kalokagathia (avoided by Plato because of its political overtones),[327] which indicated a superior refinement—haute volée—over against the artisan class (the banausics); Xenophon had sought to justify it philosophically by reference to Socrates by stressing the primacy of the ethical, while allowing that this was the reflected in men's outward demeanour.[328] Aristotle will seek to naturalise it philosophically: it is for him at once natural and moral perfection, which contains within itself its own blessedness, ἀρετὴ τέλειος.[329] For Plato that harmony, which he upholds as the ultimate in meaning, can even on occasion be clothed in the old word;[330] but he gives it a new philosophical coinage when he causes Theaetetus, who was ugly in appearance, to be praised with the words: 'You are beautiful, Theaetetus, and certainly not, as Theodorus says, ugly; for he who speaks so beautifully, is kalos kai agathos.'[331] In the end he is convinced of the perfect equality of both realms: the good as such is beautiful.[332] He who really reaches the beautiful has attained the good;[333] if Socrates 'dreamt' of the Idea, then it was 'of the beautiful and the good in Itself'.[334]

---

[323] Ibid. 294C.

[324] Ibid. 296E.

[325] So in Rep. X. 457B, where as 'the most beautiful speech' is cited: τὸ ὠφέλιμον καλόν.

[326] Rep. X.601D.

[327] But Rep. VIII. 569A: 'the so-called beautiful and good' in a passionately polemical context. As an utterance of Gorgias: Gorg. 518A.

How then is the beautiful to be distinguished within its unity with the good? The Timaeus gives the key-word: 'All that is good is beautiful, but there is nothing beautiful without inner measure.'[335] This measuredness is for Plato above all objective and exists at every level of reality: gracefulness in the body, virtue in the soul and grandeur in the cosmos and the divine. The three concepts, also taken up in the biblical book of Wisdom and fundamental for Augustine, inform his doctrine of the beautiful: 'measure, number and power'.[336] In order to succeed in this, the battle against the principle of pleasure (ἡδονή) as the standard of the natural and the moral life must first be won and also a final overthrow of subjective standards (the beautiful is what pleases, satisfies, entertains) in favour of objective ones must be accomplished. This battle, one of the greatest that Plato fought, begins early on in the Protagoras,[337] will be continued in the Republic and reach its peak in the Philebus. It is difficult because the good as such possesses its 'reward' in itself: satisfaction with its inner rightness, joy—finally ἐυδαιμονία, μακαριότης (as a state of objective and subjective well-being, 'blessedness'). This unity is already advocated in the Gorgias,[338] the Symposium[339] and in the Republic,[340] where in particular the doctrine is developed that pleasure can only be a kind of supplement to the good and to virtue and that therefore the nature of the latter can be developed without reference to the moment of pleasure.[341] The Philebus finally opposes pleasure to joy: the joys of pleasure are many but the joy of the good, for the sake of which the intellect renounces pleasure, is one only; the good as such stands beyond both pleasure and insight but the latter strives after it unconditionally, indeed 'belongs'[342] to it in its searching for the grounds of things and is the 'divinest life of all'.[343] Pleasure, on the contrary, (we know the doctrine already) always refers to something opposed to it—satisfaction to hunger, filling to emptiness—and so can be no comprehensive, synthetic state. The measure of the pleasures can therefore not lie in themselves but only in the superior realm of the intellectual soul, which is itself the source of measure; and this on its side only rejoices in the [328] Memor. 3.8.5; Memor. 3.10.5; Symp. 3.4; Econom. 6.11f.

---

[329] Details in Julius Jüthner, 'Kalokagathia', in Charistereia: Festschrift für Alois Rzach (1930), 107. According to the author the origin of the concept is not to be found in the 'noble man' in body and soul but in a picture of man, certainly of a united form, which puts character in the foreground, similar to the picture of the 'gentleman'; physical beauty was therefore not intended or required, or only secondarily.

[330] Rep. III. 401E–402A; Lysis 206E; Prot. 315D.

[331] Theaet. 185E.

[332] Symp. 201C.

[333] Ibid. 204DE.

[334] Cratyl. 439C.

[335] Tim. 87C.

---

[336] Laws VI. 757B.

[337] Protag. 351Cff.; 354BC; 355Dff.

[338] Gorg. 507C.

[339] Symp. 204D–205A.

[340] Rep. I. 354A.

[341] Rep. X.611A–613C. So, but only at the end, can it be said, that 'the life of bodily or mental excellence is pleasanter than that of depravity': Laws V. 734D. Also II. 663D.

[342] Phileb. 30DE, 31A (συγγενής).

[343] Ibid. 33B.

Good, which, as the Republic shows, is enthroned above the intellectual soul as the sun, illuminating and giving warmth to everything.

That which gives measure takes rank over that to which it gives measure: this is the ordering of soul and body. The principal question of the Platonic aesthetic is now this: does the divine rank higher than the soul as giving it measure (as will be the case in the Augustinian hierarchy), or is the measure between God and the world the same, only transposed on to a larger scale, as that between soul and body (which will be the final solution for Plato, as becomes increasingly clear)? The works of the middle period know of a mystery of the beautiful which cannot be reduced to any system of harmony. 'Are not all beautiful things beautiful through the beautiful? Tell me then, O Stranger, what is this beautiful?'[344] The Symposium looks longingly upwards to it as the 'highest grade of initiation';[345] the Phaedo resigns itself to the 'simple' statement: 'that nothing else makes a thing beautiful but the presence or communion (call it which you please) of absolute beauty';[346] the Phaedrus describes the turmoil of the soul when it becomes aware, half-guessing, half-remembering, of beauty itself in the manifestation of beauty;[347] the Republic finally depicts in the parable of the sun the upward glance to that which is blinding and dazzling.[348] Thus, the mystery of an unspeakably illuminating presence is made known in order: world-order, political order, human order. And this is accessible both to knowledge and to action. To seek it out offers such satisfaction that finally the mystery is forgotten. It is absorbed in a radiant mathematics, by means of which the 'sage' (of the Epinomis) can read off the divinity of being immediately and contemplate it.[349] The great steps that lead up to the Epinomis are found in the relationship between the Republic, the Timaeus and the Laws.

---

[344] Hipp maj. 287CD.
[345] Symp. 210A.
[346] Phaedo 100D.
[347] Phaedrus 250DE.
[348] Rep. VI. 505ff.; VII. 517ff.
[349] Epinom. 978AB; 982A–E.

The Republic sets forth that relationship of the aspects of the soul to one another that is 'according to nature'(κατὰ φύσιν),[350] both in man, who is a miniture state, and in the state, which is a man writ large. The 'irascible' part (the warrior class) and the 'desiring' part (the artisan and business class) are the soul in so far as it is in the body; the 'rational' part (the rulers of the state and the philosophers), in so far as it is in itself. The virtue (ἀρετή) of the rulers is wisdom, that of the warriors is courage, that of the businessmen etc. is moderation (temperance, self-control, σωφροσύνη), which immediately proclaims its character as measure, in that it establishes the right relationship, the agreement (συμφωνία), the harmony (ἁρμονία),[351] the order (κόσμος) between 'wisdom' and 'sobriety'. Temperance from this point of view 'extends throughout the whole gamut of the state, producing a consonance of all its elements from the weakest to the strongest as measured by any standard you like to take—wisdom, bodily strength, numbers or wealth. So we are entirely justified in identifying with temperance this unanimity or harmonious agreement (ὁμόνοια).'[352] But beyond this harmony order derives from the virtue of 'justice' (as total rightness, δικαιοσύνη), which 'renders to each his own', instead of busying itself subjectively in other matters which it does not understand and which do not concern it (πολυπραγμονεῖν),[353] and which therefore arranges everything with respect to both the being and the reality of all the aspects of the all-embracing whole: the harmony of harmony. Virtue is therefore fourfold and is essentially a matter of the right relation: in this the ethical and the aesthetic are at one. 'Virtue is as it were the health and comeliness and well-being of the soul.'[354] Up-bringing (or education, Bildung, παιδεία) is the drawing of each young man into the ethical and aesthetic harmony, essentially through the predominantly physical (but not for that reason

[350] Rep. IV. 444D.
[351] Rep. IV. 430E.
[352] Ibid. IV. 432A.
[353] Ibid. IV. 433A.
[354] Ibid. IV. 444D.

any less ethical) art of gymnastics and the predominantly spiritual art of the Muses,[355] both of which should be cultivated at the same time so that 'a right relationship is set up between them'[356] the musical arts, especially the art of tunes, with song and dancing, is to be so structured that its melos and rhythmos penetrate the whole harmony of man, giving it ethical tone from within.[357] Conversely this means that the whole art as such depends on its ethos:[358] what is aesthetically right is only discoverable in the context of what is ethically right. The 'most lovable' man, who 'displays the fairest appearance', must then be the one 'in whose soul there is noble character with an outward form answering thereto and bearing the same stamp of beauty';[359] and from this point of view something can be said about the place of the sexual in this whole ethos:[360] to overstep the limits laid down here is 'musical insensitivity' (ἀμουσία) and 'lack of receptivity towards the beautiful', 'tastelessness' (ἀπειροκαλία). Through gymnastics and the musical arts therefore the whole man is made musical through and through;[361] the higher understanding of these both is reserved for those selected to govern the state, so that there may be formed in them a reflexive and scientific insight into true proportions and harmonies: 1. Calculation and arithmetic as the presupposition of abstraction and the comprehension of unity; 2. geometry 'for bringing about an easier conceptual grasp of the Idea of the Good'; 3. astronomy, which provides examples for the discernment of the highest manifestations of order in the cosmos so that we may 'study eternally true beauties thereby' (here it is Plato's intention decisively to transcend the level of the Pythagoreans); 4. dialectic as imageless thinking of pure being and pure truth.[362]

---

[355] Ibid. II. 376E.

[356] Ibid. III. 410B, 410E.

[357] Ibid. III. 401D. Therefore the artists of the state are to be supervised and those sought out 'whose instinct guides them to whatsoever is lovely and gracious', and whose works 'like a breeze bearing health from happy regions' draw men 'imperceptibly, from childhood upward, into sympathy and harmony with beauty'. Ibid. 401B–D.

[358] Ibid. III. 400DE.

[359] Ibid. 402D.

[360] Ibid. 403C.

[361] Ibid. 411E–412A.

The interpretation of the kalon by the dikaion (as comprehending all virtue or aretê) is the justification for the further critique of the poets at the end of the Republic; it demands the highest of mankind: that he also suffer for the true, indeed the 'perfect Beauty', even to the point where all other beauty vanishes.[363] The ethical doctrine of harmony in the Republic convincingly draws together the many related preliminary efforts of the early dialogues: of the Protagoras (education in virtue through poetry, the musical arts and gymnastics;[364] in man there is aptitude for art as well as virtue, yet both require education);[365] of the Cratylus with its theory of the original affinity of sound and thing and with its Heraclitan explanation of Δίκαιον as Διά (that which holds sway through all, or the one who holds sway as Δία (= Deus);[366] of the Laches with its demand for harmony between speech and life as the true musical art and for the 'only true Hellenic harmony';[367] the demand in the Gorgias to stand in harmony with oneself[368] the discussions there of skill as harmony (that is, as the art of order and system),[369] whence order and measure are decided on as the virtue and health of the soul;[370] the man without inner harmony can be loved neither by man nor by God, he is not capable of fellowship. 'Wise men tell us that heaven and earth and gods and men are held together by communion and friendship, by orderliness, temperance and justice; and that is the reason why they call the whole of this world by the name of order (κόσμος), not of disorder or dissoluteness . . . Geometrical equality (ἰσότης γεωμετρική) has great power amongst both gods and men.'[371] Sins in the soul are at the same time both aesthetic asymmetry and ethical shamefulness.[372] It is no wonder that the doctor in the Symposium develops a detailed ethical doctrine of harmony.[373] The imprisoned Socrates in the Phaedo is inspired in a dream to pursue musical arts, and indeed he himself even regards 'philosophy as the foremost form of music',[374] which is why as a philosopher he can permit himself to return to poetry and to write verses (just as Plato in the Menexenos uses the ancient rhetorical style).

---

[362] Ibid. VII. 522–534.

[363] Laws IX. 859D–860A.

[364] Prot. 325ff.

[365] Ibid. 327.

[366] Cratyl. 412C et seq.

[367] Laches 188CD.

[368] Gorg. 482C.

[369] Ibid. 503E–504A.

[370] Ibid. 504BCD.

The Timaeus goes beyond the Republic, in so far as in the myth of creation it sets forth the proportion and analogy not simply between cosmic things and orders but between the Idea of the good and the world fashioned in accordance with it, a world which cannot be sufficiently praised as 'necessarily arranged excellently in all its parts',[375] 'beautiful and outstanding',[376] 'best and most perfect',[377] 'similar' to the Archetype 'so far as is possible',[378] and, finally, as in its glory 'self-sufficient',[379] indeed 'a blessed god'.[380] That means that the universe is no longer the manifestation of true being which negates such being, the 'limitless place of unlikeness',[381] but is God sufficient to itself so that therefore the difference between the Idea and the universe or the All is found within the identically divine. There is then no longer any reason why the reason of the universal soul—not essentially to be distinguished from the human soul—should not 'partake in the reasoning (λογισμός) and harmony (ἁρμονία) of intelligent and eternal realities, having been set forth as the best of all generated things by the one who is best (the

---

[371] Ibid. 507E–508A.

[372] Ibid. 525A.

[373] Symp. 187A et seq.

[374] Phaedo 60E–61B.

[375] Tim. 28A.

[376] Ibid. 29A.

[377] Ibid.

[378] Ibid. 29D.

[379] Ibid. 33D.

[380] Ibid. 34B.

[381] Statesman 273D.

Creator).'[382] This first relationship, which makes the world not only an image (εἰκών) of an archetype[383] but rather a quasi-sacramental representation of the gods (ἄγαλμα τῶν ἀϊδίων θεῶν)[384] becomes the basis for both the following: world-soul is related to world-body as an individual soul to an individual body, so that the individual soul needs only to look up to the cosmos in order to restore between itself and the body or within itself any disturbance in balance (ἰσορρόπω[385]), in order to take that which is the permanently full divine balance as a model.[386] The world is in itself perfect proportion (ἀναλογία[387]) and symmetry (συμμετρία[388]); in so far however as the individual reason in its 'highest part' (κυριώτατον) is on an equality with the world-soul (in mythical terms: is immediately created by the same demiurge[389]), it can equally hold sway over the whole man as his own 'indwelling protective spirit' (δαίμων)[390] and lend to it 'immortal and divine thoughts' which 'in so far as it is possible for human nature to partake of immortality, will fall short thereof in no degree.'[391] 'For intellectual motions and revolutions of the universe are related to this divine element within us'; where therefore human thought is disturbed, order must be re-introduced 'by learning the harmonies and revolutions of the universe, thereby making the part that thinks like unto the object of its thought, in accordance with its original nature.'[392]

[382] Tim. 36E.
[383] Ibid. 51C.
[384] Ibid. 37C.
[385] Ibid. 88B.
[386] Ibid. 88C.
[387] Ibid. 31C, 32C, 56C. If this use of the word is compared with that in Rep. VI: 511D (τάξον αὐτὰ ἀνὰ λόγον, namely the four realms of knowledge: reason, understanding, faith and mere opinion), a difference emerges: in the Republic proportion develops through participation in the transcendental Idea, in the Timaeus it is an inner cosmic proportion.
[388] Ibid. 69B, 87CD. For other places see Ast.
[389] Ibid. 41C.
[390] Ibid. 90A, 90C.
[391] Ibid. 90C.
[392] Ibid. 90D.

The Laws simply build on this. The pedagogical way leads through the beautiful to the good, through 'rhythm and harmony', which is given us by the gods together with our delight in them—choros (song and dance) and chara (joy) go together and the gods themselves rejoice together with us—to produce the true balance of the whole man.[393] By this means man has to accommodate his taste and therefore his joy too to objective beauty,[394] which for Plato, the older he becomes, means an eternal, immutable canon, permitting of no artistic search for novelty (the Egyptians are the model here),[395] which must be established and protected through the means of laws and indeed of the police. As in the Republic, tragedy is rejected because it upsets the harmonious tone of the soul and its serenity through extreme feelings and thus estranges man from himself: the fateful route to the philosophising of drama (Seneca!) is thereby opened up.[396] The highest art appears to Plato to be that apolline eurhythmia which links together gymnastics and the musical arts and 'casts the spell'[397] of the one harmony of soul and body over the whole man, while for the aged he defends in detail the inflammatory, rejuvenating infusion of the dionysian in measured drinking bouts.[398] Cheerfulness, above all, sets the tone,[399] that which spreads joy is the best.[400] If the artist masters three things—objectivity, correctness (ὀρθότης) and beauty in word, melody and rhythm—then he can be allowed to do as he likes.[401] Symphonia and symmetria, the metrion, the symmetron and epieikēs circumscribe again and again the human ideal. The passions are not evil so long as they are kept in balance: 'high-spirited every man should be but likewise gentle in eminent degree';[402] no-one should foster overweening self-love, but each should hope that God will lead him from distress into something better. The 'greatest ignorance' (and that means for Plato the most serious sin) is 'that of a man who hates, not loves, what his judgment pronounces to be noble and good', when therefore there is 'dissonance between pleasure and pain and reasoned judgment'.[403] By contrast the 'fairest and greatest of consonances', the 'perfectly rational life' is recognised as 'wisdom' (σοφία).[404] Here it is no longer a matter of 'erôs yearning for wisdom' (philosophia) but of wisdom itself, which is one with the cosmic-human consonance.

---

[393] Laws II. 653C–654A.
[394] Ibid. 655D–656A.
[395] 656–663.
[396] Rep. X. 603D–606B; cf. Laws V. 733CD.
[397] Laws II. 664CD.
[398] Ibid. 665B–674B.
[399] Ibid. VII. 792B–E.
[400] Ibid. II. 657E.
[401] Ibid. II. 669AB.

This rounds off an aesthetic ethic immanent in the world, in which the divine as well as the human appears in a final identity as a harmony of balance; the last glimmer of a revelation from above—some features of which in the middle period were left to the (transcendent) Sun of the Good—fades, or rather passes over into the macrocosmic harmony which is accessible to philosophical enquiry. Now is born that philosophical aesthetic of the grand style, to which even Plotinus will be able to make no significant alteration and which will lay down the pattern for all Western humanism of Antiquity, the Middle Ages, and right into modern times. An aesthetic which seeks to draw out the glory of God which breaks in upon the human scene in the direction of a human, or what for the moment is the same, cosmic 'sublime'. And all the time there will be discernible powerful counter-currents—classical as well as Christian.

The Epinomis, whether it makes use of the Platonic Nachlass or is simply a witness to the earliest Academy, provides the final touches by logically dropping the distinction between [402] Ibid. V. 731B et seq. As virtue presupposes drive, which it orders: VI: 782D–783C.

---

[403] Ibid. III.689A.

[404] Ibid. 689D. On the social level quite similar: the control of the whole community by the right (lawful) determination: 863E–864A.

Idea and cosmos (which had been maintained and mediated by the 'demiurge') and equating the cosmos with God,[405] and thus also at least attempting to equate the transcendent Ideas with the immanent numbers: 'As for the right, the good, the noble and the like, no man without knowledge of number will be able to form an accurate picture of them, to distinguish and define them in such a way as to bring conviction to himself and to others.'[406] To the gods belong the heavenly bodies; the Absolute will be contemplated in the perfected astronomical mathematics of the heavens, the stars 'offer not only the fairest of all sights to the eyes, but the fairest and most glorious of marches and dances',[407] whether they are now gods themselves or their sacred images (in which they dwell—ἀγάλματα).[408] The daimons have now become cosmic intermediary beings between the gods and men, already (as later in Neoplatonism) subject to passions and suffering:[409] such a mediation is only seriously possible, if it is thought out within a (pantheistic) identity. The total mathematics (the later mathesis universalis) is now finally called wisdom, sophia; the primordial astonishment, the first philosophical act, is evoked not by being as such (and here lies a deep forgetfulness of being) but by the glory of the astral order.[410] Hellas, it is expressly emphasized, has accomplished what other people, the Babylonians and Egyptians, had begun.[411] Exoterically one can continue in Hellas to believe in the ancient gods, in fact 'everything is full of gods', and he who knows no better may as before call on the gods for help.[412] But he who is able to see all figures, all relationships of numbers, the whole system of harmony as a single great unity and can hold this before his eyes in all his intellectual endeavours, is beyond that and has reached true philosophy and true happiness, because he 'has become simple and has received revelation of a single bond of natural inter-connection between all being.'[413]

---

[405] Epinomis 976E–977A. Cf. 894B, where it is the world-soul that generates and discharges the world-elements.

[406] Ibid. 978B.

[407] Ibid. 982E.

[408] Ibid. 983E.

[409] Ibid. 984ff.

[410] Ibid. 986D.

[411] Ibid. 987D et seq.

[412] Ibid. 991D.

---

[413] Ibid. 991E–992B.

C. RELIGION

1. THE BRIDGE NEVER BUILT

After the first breakthrough into philosophy in Socrates and Plato—for the purposes of our present theme, nothing distinctively new is added by its consummation in Aristotle—there follows a long period whose main concern can most conveniently be summarised by the key-word, 'religion'—using this word in the historically and pragmatically limited sense of the search for a synthesis between philosophy and myth. For myth retains its vigour in the form of a popular belief, as a civic and domestic cultus and also as primordial historical saga, as poetry. However, belief in it, in the naive sense, will diminish continually; for to be recognised as a valid form of religious observance and spiritual life it requires, not least for the cultured and enlightened, the transposition of meaning provided by philosophy. Yet it is evident that philosophy itself, in its transcending of its own capacity, consistently shows a tendency to express itself at its frontiers in mythical terms. The continuing mythical cultus dovetailed with this tendency most effectively, just as philosophy for its part dovetailed with the cultus in providing it with a rational basis. It is in this mutual tendency of philosophy and myth that the uniqueness of religion, formally speaking, is to be found—both in Antiquity and, indeed, perennially. It manifests itself as a bridge which is being thrown out from two piers on opposite shores and which seems all the time to be approaching the point where both constructions meet, yet always remains intrinsically incapable of being completed. The piers grow towards each other, their behaviour is literally 'syn-cretistic': the essence of any religion (in so far as it is distinct from true myth and authentic philosophy), not only of religion in the Hellenistic age, is 'syncretism'.

When Varro in the seventy-six books of his Loghistorikôn, provides philosophical statements of problems (logoi) which are in each instance backed up with examples from myth or history (historia)—the titles themselves show this: Orestes, de insania, Marius, de fortuna, etc.—it is quite clear that the 'image' is there for the sake of the 'concept'. The same is true for Varro's well known threefold subdivision of religion into 'mythical', 'physical' and 'civil' aspects (a categorisation penetratingly analysed by Augustine): the first, the level of the 'fabulous', is the proper mode of poetry and drama, the second is the province of philosophers, the third is the public cultus. This last 'is that which the citizens of our towns, and above all the priests, should be competent in and know how to conduct; its province is knowing which gods it is proper to honour publicly with liturgy and sacrifice'. 'Who cannot see', comments Augustine, 'to which kind of religion he gives the prize? It is obviously the second'.[1] And he reproaches Varro for lacking the intellectual force of the later Seneca in assimilating the civic and the mythical forms of religion to each other, and rejecting both together.[2] But there is no such thing as purely philosophical religion. Neither then nor in any age has it succeeded in producing a cultic form of its own and so has instinctively come to depend on existing kinds of cultus. Religion is always something more than pure philosophy and in order to secure this 'something more' it makes its own borrowings from myth. The mediating concept of 'tradition' seems to offer some hope for the enterprise of bridge-building; and this comes out especially clearly in Book 2 of Cicero's de natura deorum. The views of philosophers about the divine, its existence and its nature, are displayed in all their multiplicity; yet, because of their contradictoriness, they appear as less than wholly convincing and the residual element of doubt is removed only through the 'wisdom' that is to be found in tradition (nam et majorum instituta tueri sacris caeremoniisque retinendis sapientis est),[3] i.e.

---

[1] De civitate Dei VI.4.3; PL 41. 182.

[2] Ibid. VI.10.1–2; PL 41. 190–191.

[3] De divinatione II.72. 'For it is the part of wisdom to preserve the institutions of our ancestors by retaining their sacred rites and ceremonies.'

through the consensus of mankind—but also through the epiphanies of the divine which reveal the presence and power of the gods, and through prophecies of the future.[4] On the other hand, the gods of the nations are all reduced to natural phenomena and indeed the plurality of gods is explained in terms of diverse aspects of a single, all-pervading godhead which can be called Neptune in so far as it indwells the ocean and Ceres in so far as it indwells the earth.[5] The more Rome had to unite the various particular religions of revelation under its overall lordship, the more the concept of '(mythical) revelation' itself became a generic notion, accepted as a diffuse totality without any verification from particular instances, a notion which, unsurprisingly, accommodated philosophical abstraction by presenting itself as a corresponding form of mythical abstraction.

But abstraction is itself a philosophical process which, when it has engaged with a mythical object, necessarily evacuates it of its original content and subdues it to its own categories. In the co-ordination of religions of revelation resulting from Hellenistic philosophy and (still more markedly) from the political demands of Rome, Varro's 'civic' religion comes to be tied to 'physical' religion and opposed to the 'mythical'. Hegel's inexorable analysis holds good:[6] in the Roman pantheon, the gods cancel each other out; their 'glorious free individuality' turns into a 'uniform grey', dominated by an all-powerful Fate, in which the philosophical hegemony of men or the political hegemony of Rome manifests itself—and ultimately deifies and absolutises itself in the climax and summit, the representation of the imperial office. So it is an inescapable conclusion that (in Hegel's words), 'the form which properly belongs to art is lost'.[7] Normative ('canonical') beauty in art stems from the sphere and epoch of mythical revelation: this alone is surrounded by glory.

---

[4] De natura deorum II.2–4.

[5] Ibid. 24–28.

[6] Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion II (tr. from the second German edition by E. B. Speirs and J. B. Sanderson, London, 1895), 298–323.

[7] Ibid. 309 ('The outward form which belongs to art is lost').

Hellenistic-Roman art, even as the expression of an official religion, can do no more than copy, accurately or (most of the time) inaccurately, the prototypes of a lost Greek world; but the copies, infected with the spirit of abstraction, no longer possess the archetypal radiance and the mythical glory. So the structures built outwards from the philosophical 'pier' consistently subdue the constructions attempted from the opposite 'pier' to their own structural laws and so neutralise their independent force.

But these constructions from the mythical side will always come too late in the age of 'religion'. Without the opposite pier, which dominates the world in the form of rational power, philosophico-ethical and political, they will remain in the realm of fantasy only. They can attempt to win a hearing only in the form of 'enthusiasm'-dominated gnostic and mystical sects; as soon as they come to depend on the constructions of the opposite side, they evacuate themselves of their proper content and dig their own graves. The claims once laid to some access to 'glory' remain phantasmagorical; and, in an age of due order and proportion in all things, many will be seduced and imprisoned by such fantasies, which have no way of establishing their own foundations. Since philosophical religion is imageless, mythical religion comes up with a tidal wave of images in every possible combination, a filmstrip of hypnotic religious enchantments which can be forgotten and left behind as soon as people step out into the street again. Nowhere is the bridge quite finished in the building. Our task now is to demonstrate this as concisely as possible. In this connection, there are two figures who tower above the general mark of ambiguity, however much they have their roots there: Rome's great poet, Vergil, with his firm grasp on the vision of a primordial and an eschatological wholeness; and Plotinus, living in Rome but most probably of Egyptian origin, the man who brings to full and final articulation the philosophical claim to wholeness of scope and vision, a claim so inimical to Biblical faith. The voices of both men echo endlessly throughout the story of the Christian West.

2. PHILOSOPHY: ONE PIECE OF THE BRIDGE

a. Projection on to myth

The religion which develops out of philosophy rests on two basic dogmas: the idea of the divine as the all-encompassing (in the Aristotelean tradition) or the all-pervading (in the Stoic tradition), and the idea of syngeneia (agnatio) as the relationship of human with divine spirit. Both these dogmas transcend the divisions between particular philosophical schools and make possible the emergence of a philosophical lingua franca. To make them into axioms of philosophy proper the transition from Plato to Aristotle was necessary—the transmutation of what, in Plato, could at first be expressed only in terms of transphilosophical myth into the language of a scientific discipline capable of being at once a religious metaphysic, an ethic and an aesthetic (and, later on, a mystical discipline). In Aristotle's work, just as the individual fields of study and the different areas and levels of the cosmos all have their particular scientific form, so too that field of study which is 'being qua being' (associated with that supreme and normative level of the cosmos which is the 'divine', theion) is encompassed in an ultimate scientific discipline—metaphysics and 'theio-logy'. In his philosophical manifesto, the dialogue 'On Philosophy' (Περὶ φιλοσοφίας),[8] the thirty-seven year old master outlines the advance of wisdom, sophia, from the technical level to the organisation of the polis to reflection on material bodies and nature, and finally to 'the divine, supramundane and entirely immutable realities' in the ultimate form of science.[9] It is an advance which seems slow and toilsome in the cosmic cycle in which we live (there have been infinitely many such cycles before us, destroyed in the floods of sinfulness); but it has become a rapid historical process since the time of Socrates. Just as in the poetic realm, tragedy had swiftly developed into its full and mature form, so Aristotle was conscious[10] that philosophy was approaching its consummation in him.[11] He worked for a direct extension and broadening of the final form of Platonic thought—the Timaeus, the Laws, the Epinomis—and took up its theme of religious 'pathos': God is manifest in the world, above all in the world of the heavenly bodies with its eternal and unchangeable laws, for the reflective and contemplative spirit. 'The concept of the divine among human beings springs from two primordial sources: from events and encounters in the sphere of the soul (perhaps through inspirations received in sleep or through an oracle or in the hour of death when the soul recovers its true nature and beholds the future)—but also from the phenomenon of the heavens whose harmonious order reveals an everlasting spirit.'[12] Astonished wonder in the face of this dazzling splendour of the heavens is what makes it possible for the whole cosmos to appear as a 'temple of the divine', a 'final and perfect initiation into the Mysteries'; and if we conduct ourselves with reverence as we come to the threshold of a temple, 'how much more are we bound so to behave when we have to do with the stars, the heavenly bodies, the gods.' It is even possible that the comparison between the Eleusinian Mysteries and those of the cosmos itself derives from the same text.[13] Aristotle sees the divine directly revealing itself in the order of the heavens and for this he has no need of myth; indeed, the deeper science leads him into the understanding of the ruling law of the cosmos, the clearer this vision becomes for him, the vision that reveals to him the eternity along with the divinity of the world. It is because of this vision that Philo calls him 'truly devout and holy', and goes along with him in charging the defenders of the opposing point of view with a 'terrible form of atheism'.[14] But there can be no doubt that the scientific spirit of Aristotle sees into the realm of eternal being with an essentially Greek eye, schooled in myth—the same vision that, from the Timaeus and the Epinomis up to the very end of classical Antiquity, continues to behold the divine in the heavens; the same vision, too, that Paul had, the vision presupposed when he says, 'What can be known about God is plain (φανερόν) to them, because God has shown it to them. Ever since the creation of the world his invisible nature, namely, his eternal power and deity, has been clearly perceived (νοούμενα καθορᾶται) in the things that have been made' (Rom 1.19–20). It was on the basis of this vision that Aristotle thought of the heavens (which encompassed and transcended all the four elements in the world) in terms of a 'quintessence' of which the stars and the divine intelligences were constituted[15]—and the soul as well, which shared in the eternal motion of the heavens and as such could be called an endelecheia (relating to ἐνδελεχής, δολιχός, [d]longus, long), a perpetuum mobile.[16] And so the second major dogma, directly derived from Plato,[17] is deployed: the world in its eternal aspect is divine and this is the source and homeland of the soul.

---

[8] W. Jaeger, Aristoteles: Grundlegung einer Geschichte seiner Entwicklung, 1923, 125–170; J. Bidez, Un singulier naufrage littéraire dans l'antiquité: A la recherche des épaves de l'Aristote perdu, 1943; A. J. Festugière, Le Dieu cosmique (= vol. II of La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste), 1949.

[9] Ap. Philoponus, Commentary on the Eisagoge of Nicomachus of Gerasa, ed. Hoche, 1864, 1–2.

---

[10] Poetics 4.

[11] Frg. 1, Rose (Akademische Ausgabe V; in the second volume of the 1960 reprint); on the text, see Bywater, Journal of Philology, 1877, 64f.

[12] On this and comparable texts, cf. Festugière, op. cit. 229–232.

[13] Ibid. 233–238.

[14] Philo, De aeternitate mundi 3.10 (Colson IX.190).

The period that followed (up to the first century B.C.) knew only this Aristotle, the Aristotle of the dialogue—one who, identifying with the later Plato, criticised and refuted the dualistic doctrine of Ideas of Plato's middle period and (again like the later Plato) opened the way towards the Stoa which would have little that was new to contribute in this area. The vision of the starry heavens remains wide open, generating (in contrast to the now unbelievable myths of older times) a higher kind of religious consciousness—higher, because both more committedly devout and more scientific.[18] This vision, this contemplation (θεωρία),[19] turning towards a stable and tranquil ecstasy, leads directly from the frozen fixity of astonishment to the relaxed calm of understanding wonder: what is made manifest to it is glory and order together or rather, if one examines the texts more closely, glory as order, as mathematical order, as meaning and purposiveness. It is quite clearly expressed in these terms in Cicero (and his source Poseidonius), where the radiant beauty of the world displays itself as unity in multiplicity, organic law and regularity;[20] and likewise in the pseudo-Aristotelean de mundo (probably from the first century B.C.),[21] where the cosmos appears as 'the most radiant glory' (λαμπρότητι εὐαυγέστατος),[22] above all because it is the perfect, God-given equilibrium of all its opposite and complementary parts.[23] So it is also—and pre-eminently—for the Stoics, where aesthetic wonderment is always channelled at once into the ethical: since the vision of God as father of all carries with it the revelation of the human person's citizenship in the 'kosmopolis', the human person is thus a spark from the central fire (Zeno)[24] and, as the child of the universal Father, 'a citizen at least by nature, even if not yet by the actual exercise of his citizenship'.[25] Since the human person is able to know the law of God, which holds sway both throughout the world and his or her own existence, such a one must acknowledge it, on the basis of their own divine-human dignity, and submit themselves to it.

---

[15] Cicero, Acad. I.7.26.

[16] Cicero, Tuscul. I.10.22.

[17] Phaedrus 111b, Timaeus 90ab.

[18] Programmatically set out for the first time in the Epinomis, which in this respect sees itself as 'an epiphany, a gospel'; see Festugière, op. cit. 209. On the theme as a whole, see F. Cumont, Le mysticisme astral dans l'antiquité, 1909, and F. Boll, Vita Contemplativa, 1922.

[19] Festugière, Contemplation et vie contemplative selon Platon, 1950².

Aristotle in his turn also opens the way to this religious perspective. Through his resolute engagement and interest in the particular sciences, he had more and more been able to discern the astonishing 'divine' order of the heavens—the sphere of the theion—even in the sub-celestial world. In the late introduction to his treatise On the Parts of Animals, he cautions the Platonists against keeping their gaze fixed on the heavens (in astronomy and mathematics) and their consequent neglect of the earth. Nature is glorious in its entirety, even in the realm of the apparently 'less noble creatures' (ἀτιμότερα ζῷα).[26] Thus the project of sensing and tracing the presence of the divine and of the logos of the world in the entirety of things corresponds to the mythical experience of the world and that of the first philosopher, Heraclitus. The Stoics were saying nothing new when they passed beyond a 'regionalised theio-logy' to the theology of a total and all-pervading, all-directing divinity and proposed their great identifications—between the laws of the natural world and divine order, Ananke and Zeus, between the progressively advancing insight of human beings into the wholeness of things and the deliberate and free proleptic acceptance of the wholeness of things (i.e. between science and ethics), between the person as individual logos and God as global logos. This is the direction in which Plato's doctrine of harmony is internally tending: a more and more explicitly presupposed and acknowledged commitment to a substantial identity between soul and God that has come to define completely the foundation of human existence. Love as 'erôs for something' (philosophia) is refined and clarified into the identity of being-in-general as love (pure sophia and aretê). Everything stands or falls with this Yes to the totality of things, in which the human person recognises and affirms both God and him- or herself; instead of the subtle hierarchy of virtues in Plato and Aristotle, this drastically levelling reduction advances to the point where there is only one: recognition, acceptance, the penetration of particular, deficient individual reason by universal and divine reason. In this one act, the individual's resignation to the order of existence coincides with the exalted joy of having scaled some supreme and unsurpassable peak: the individual's humility, humility to the point of self-obliteration, coincides with a high and generous spirit (magnanimitas), and thereby makes contact with, indeed, once again comes to coincide with, the self-determining Absolute. Thus virtue (honestas) is self-sufficient (ἀυτάρκης); its sole reward is the divine glory which it already is and whose light radiates through it. Aristotle had already celebrated 'the virgin goddess Arete' in impassioned and exalted lines, while his friend Hermias had endured martyrdom, like the Greek heroes of old, for the sake of her 'beloved and beautiful form' (σᾶς δ' ἕνεκεν φιλίου μορφᾶς).[27] But if the mythical view still echoes and resonates here, the Stoics engaged in purposeful and thorough demythologising: the gods are only aspects, powers, elements of the one self-identical cosmic reason.[28] Where Hermias dies a martyr for the greater glory [20] Cicero, De natura deorum II.39–60.

---

[21] Ed. Lorimer, 1933.
[22] Ibid. 397a15.
[23] Ibid. 397a28f.; 397b4; 400b28 (νόμος ἡμῖν ἰσοκλινής ὁ Θεός).
[24] SVF I.114.
[25] Dion of Prusa, Or. 36.23 (quoted in Festugière, op. cit., 276).

---

[26] De parte animalium I.5.

---

[27] Jaeger, Aristoteles, 118.

[28] The 'philosophical' interpretation of Homer and Hesiod begins early on; in Theagenes of Regium, Anaxagoras, and his followers from Metrodorus of Lampsace onwards, the battle of the gods (Iliad XX) is interpreted as the struggle between the elements of the cosmos (cf. Heinemann, 'Die wissenschaftliche Allegorese der Griechen', Mnemosyne 1949, 5ff.). Parmenides and Empodocles took what purported to be hymns to the gods in this sense (Diels 28A.20). Antisthenes and the early Cynics read ethical principles out of Homer and Hesiod: poets depict the correct behaviour of human beings in images, which are more readily comprehended of the people than pure concepts. This reconciliation between myth and philosophy is of formative importance for the transition to Stoicism, which is particularly concerned with the elucidation of myth in its dynamic pantheism, as in Crates of Mallos (literature in Praechter, 128), Pseudo-Plutarch, On the Life and Poetry of Homer (ibid. 535). See also, in the middle of the first century A.D., Chaeremon, Cornutus' Handbook of Greek Theology, an allegorical and physicalist reading of the myths, in which Zeus is the World-Soul or the Aether, Athena is the intellect of Zeus, and so forth. Cornutus himself claims to have taken this from the earlier work of Apollodorus, 'On the Gods.' On this subject, see Paul Decharme, La critique des traditions religieuses chez les Grecs . . ., 1904; S. Weinstock, 'Die platonische Homerkritik und ihre Nachwirkungen', Philologus 1, 1926; C. Müller, Allegorische Dichtererklärung, RE Suppl. 4; Geffken, 'Allegory', etc., in Hastings' Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics; Joosen-Waszink, 'Allegorese' in RAC; H. G. Gadamer, Plato und die Dichter, 1934.

The Neoplatonists (e.g. Porphyry in The Cave of the Nymphs) will be involved in the same movement, following it through to the end and so providing a point of contact with Christian allegorizing and the 'spiritual' interpretation of Scripture. Henri de Lubac has frequently directed attention to the profound differences between the two methods, despite their abundant similarities: while myth is the pictorial garb of natural and timeless order (and of no particular significance qua picture in itself), the spiritual interpretation of Scripture brings to light the deep and eternal meaning of the historical events of revelation and has its place in the internal dialectic of the beloved goddess, the Stoic virtue in its victory over death is a mutual glorification of God and oneself. Renown and disgrace alike, δόξα and ἀδοξία in the eyes of one's fellow human beings, cease in the light of this identity to be of any importance[29] except in so far as the other is (in God) the ἄλλος ἐγώ '"I" once again'.[30] Here, if anywhere, the arrogance of a philosophy that sets itself over against myth reaches its consummation: it conceives all differentiation in terms of the ultimate and ungraspable unity, even the difference between God and the human; as it conceives the dialogical element in their relation in terms of their indentity. Religion is the straining (πόνος) to subordinate one's individual reason to cosmic reason, in the perpetual ascent of human littleness to the level of divine-human greatness: Pascal's categories of misère and grandeur owe no small debt to Epictetus, whom Pascal so admired. In the dialectic of arrogant humility, Epictetus represents a point of equilibrium; Marcus Aurelius inclines to the pole of arrogance, Cleanthes to that of humility. In the latter's Hymn to Zeus,[31] perhaps the finest prayer of Antiquity, the element of dialogue breaks through even within the encompassing framework of identity: Zeus, to whose absolute and all-wise will the petitioner entrusts himself in prayer, is apostrophised in the opening word of the hymn as 'most glorious' (κύδιστος), that the one who prays may freely (ἑκών) respond to him who restores all that is monstrous or excessive to orderly proportion. The wicked, acting for the sake of their own individual renown, fail to meet him and thus achieve the opposite of what they most truly desire; but he will redeem human beings from their melancholy ignorance and grants them the grace to have a right judgment in all things, that judgment he himself possesses in his providential disposition of the cosmos:

> While we, thus honoured, in turn will honour thee, between the two Testaments. See H. de Lubac, Histoire et Esprit, 1950, 20–38 and passim, 'A propos de l'allégorie chrétienne', RSR 1959, 5–40.

---

[29] SVF I.190.

[30] Zeno, ap. Diogenes Laertius VII.23.

[31] SVF I.537; discussion in Festugière, Dieu cosmique, 310–332.

Hymning thy works forever, as is meet for mortals,
While no greater right belongs even to the gods
Than evermore justly (δίκη) to praise the universal law (νόμος).

The exchange of mutual honour is in no way conceived as some kind of barter but rather as an interior participation in God's self-glorification—in Christian terms, as a prayer for the gracious gift of the divine Spirit who alone can give a response worthy of God. The Stoic advance towards identity with God here takes on the form of a humble Yes, an unconditional assent to everything—unknown occasions of challenge and difficulty or of blessing—that may be encountered in the absolute order of the world. This act is the essence of wisdom (since it is directed entirely towards truth), ethics (since it submits itself to the norm of all goodness) and aesthetics (since the order of the cosmos triumphantly turns all disproportion back towards the glory of its proper measure).

Just as Aristotle, the scientist, sees his vision of the stars with the eyes of myth and as a moralist makes ardent supplication to the goddess, so does Cleanthes, the Stoic pantheist, pray with mythically-formulated devotion to the cosmic spirit. The philosophy of identification is bound to project itself into the realm of myth in order to become religion; and only in this act do the aridities of ethics and the smugness of self-regard win back something of the primordial vision of the radiance of being. Neo-Platonism was to be the final attempt to secure directly and systematically the character of reality as glory, the vision that was becoming more and more attenuated in a philosophy of identity, in that it resolves being as a whole into a ray coming forth from the Superessential, the Good. But even this effort is still conceived within the terms of a final, all-encompassing unity and lacks the capacity to unveil the glory of an absolute personal other, a 'Thou'.

b. Dialectic

Thus the dialectic of philosophical religion is already thrown into sharp relief: conceived in terms sketched out in a philosophy of identity, the least shift of tone at any moment can tilt godfearing pantheism over into godless atheism, as was to happen later, between Hegel and Marx. What human beings project beyond themselves on to the glory that exists in the supreme God is precisely nothing other than a projection and as such the innate power of the human subject. What they are continually discovering, in their scientific searching-out of the universe, in amazement and wonder, as a divinely ordered regularity, is also what they are progressively mastering; and the religious aura slowly gives way to the prosaic sobriety of the exact sciences. If the religious consciousness is turned into a modality of ethics by the Stoics, it is turned by the neo-Platonists into a modality of mysticism, even less able than ethics to escape from the dialetic of identity.

For mysticism, like Stoic ethics, is a bursting through the limits of individuality, an extension of the soul to embrace the dimensions of the universe. Already in Xenophon, if not earlier still, the soul is quodammodo omnia, capable of travelling in an instant to any place.[32] In the Eleventh Hermetic Tractate this is further developed: the soul can change itself into anything; it needs no wings to lift itself up to heaven—or, indeed, beyond, should there by anything beyond heaven.[33] In the 'Asclepius' Tractate, the human being is extolled as animal adorandum, 'since he can transform himself even into the nature of God, as if he were God himself', for this reason, that he is naturally 'related to the gods, connected with divinity'.[34] In God the human being is also related to all other beings in the world, an essential affinity (οἰκείωσις) prevails between them: Stoic philanthropy is ontologically grounded on an identity of essence.[35] In mysticism this identity in the depths of things is experientially realised and portrayed in the numerous accounts of ecstasy in which the soul, in dreaming or in waking, in this life or after death, lifts itself up to heaven, to the stars, to the vision of universal order, to God. The best-known of these accounts is the Somnium Scipionis (the concluding 'transformation episode' of Cicero's Res publica), where the soul of the great statesman beholds in a rapture the manifestation of the glory of the divine 'megalopolis'; the most consistent depictions of such experience—as far as they relate to identification—can be found in the Hermetic writings.

---

[32] Memorabilia I.4.17.

[33] Hermes Trismegistus XI.19, ed. Belles Lettres I.154–155.

[34] Asclepius 6 (ibid. II.301–302). Even in Plotinus' earliest work, the soul is urged on towards the goal of boundless self-expression (Enneads I.6.9).

[35] Cf. the great text in Stobaeus' Anthologion which he ascribes to Aristotle (Stob. II.7.13). See S. Lorenz, De progressu rationis φιλανθηωπίας. Diss. Leipzig 1917.

In this connection, it matters less whether the identification of God and the soul is thought of and 'experienced' as happening through ecstasy (the expansion of the soul to the dimensions of divinity) or 'enstasy' (the indwelling of the godhead in the soul to the point of absorption). Both forms lie close to the point of tilting over into atheism or at least radical scepticism. Cicero himself had no atheistic intentions; indeed, entangled in the problem of contradictory representations of the divine and disillusioned by philosophical theology, he fell back upon traditional mythology; yet he lives entirely on a knife-edge in this respect. Sextus Empiricus lists the manifold sources of belief in God: invention by legislators, the divinising of human beings after death, powers of nature that are friendly to humanity, dreams and oracles, the sight of the stars, terrifying natural phenomena or other spectacles, tradition handed down from the infancy of the race.[36] In every case it is human beings who devise all this. Why was Sextus unable to retain an attitude of 'letting be' towards the gods, as Epicurus had done, four centuries earlier? Epicurus' 'pious reserve in respect of the gods' is celebrated;[37] but he allowed them existence only in the unlocalisable interstices of his world of atoms ('Metakosmoi'). The gods are as free from concern about human beings as human beings are free from the need for the gods to guarantee them felicity. For anyone who succeeds in overcoming the fear of fate and death by their own proud spiritual superiority, and thereby takes the future into their own control, 'will live like a god among men, since a human being who enjoys an imperishable inheritance of life is in no way to be compared with a mortal creature'.[38] A god interferes with no other being, either by wrath or by benevolence,[39] and human beings should seek to imitate the gods in this. Infinite duration holds no more true joy than does finite; the former can enrich only the flesh, but reason transcends its limitations and enjoys the fulness of bliss quite independently of the duration of fleshly being.[40] Thus it is 'meaningless to demand from the gods what human beings can do for themselves'.[41] This self-referential trend reaches its consummation in the renunciation of the beautiful, which is always accompanied by a yearning for self-transcendence: 'I gladly spurn the beautiful, which brings no joy, and scorn its foolish devotees.'[42] Epicurus' impact across the centuries resulted in his doctrine being directly presented—in the shape of the powerful cosmic epic of Lucretius, edited by Cicero—to the eyes of Vergil and Horace, who construct their own oeuvre in face-to-face confrontation with it.

---

[36] Adv. dogm. III.14–29.

[37] Diogenes Laertius X.10.

A final attempt to reinstate religion, based on the idea of an atheistic doctrine of projection, is represented by Egyptian magic and theurgy: the power to create gods is, in all seriousness, attributed to human beings. According to the tractate 'Asclepius', the human subject is 'the creator of the gods that dwell in the temples, those gods who dwell in the neighbourhood of men; he not only receives the light of life but himself radiates that light'. While the gods in themselves are only spirit, only the 'head', it is the images of the gods, which through theurgy contain divine powers, that are at the same time also materialised forms, 'head and flesh'; and so 'man moulds his own gods in the image and likeness of his own countenance.'[43] Thus the vicious circle is finally closed: out of the idea of identity, which can emphasize now its pantheistic and now its 'pan-anthropic' tendency, there finally arises a pseudo-dialogue, which allows one pole to be seen as the creator of the other.

---

[38] The conclusion of the letter to Menoikeus, Diogenes Laertius X.135.

[39] Dogmata 1, ibid. X.139.

[40] Dogmata 19–20, ibid. 145.

[41] Gnomologion Vaticanum (ed. P. von der Mühll) 65.

[42] Epicurea (ed. H. Usener) 512.

---

[43] Asclepius VIII.23–24.

3. THE SECOND PIER: MYTH

a. Projection on the basis of philosophy

Aristotle had offered a philosophical and scientific reconstruction of the Platonic myth of the world-creator; but was it not possible for religion to follow a quite contrasting path? to read the Platonic myths 'in reverse' so that the quintessence of the mythical consciousness could be discerned lying hidden in it, salvaged and transmitted to a new age? Two paths seem to open up at this point. The first takes literally the picture of the demiurge looking up at the world of ideas and so posits a hierarchy and a tension within God, whether between God as creator and the unnameable superdivinity above him or between the Godhead as source of all good and its 'powers' and 'effects' as they reach the world. Here there are links with Pindar and Aeschylus and Hesiod, and the way forward lies open to the divine dramas and divine tragedies of gnosis. The other path stays closer to philosophy and builds it into its concept of revelation: the absolute divine being 'unfolds' and 'uncovers' itself (only) in so far as, at the same time, it conceals and encloses itself; it shares itself in so far as, at the same time, it preserves itself intact. The concept of revelation becomes a fundamental category for ontology in general which remains intrinsically a question of philosophy and theology (i.e. theio-logy) right up to the point at which non-Christian classical thought ceases to exist. This second path is the one pursued by neo-Platonism, though not without continuing admixtures and transpirations between it and the first.

There are two basic dogmas of a mythology that has developed into a philosophy. The first is that revelation exists as an inbreaking of light from above: this presupposes an hierarchical ordering of being; and indeed it is what actualises such an order, since this descent from above is a mode of being itself—i.e. the outflowing divine 'powers' are themselves substantive realities which extend down to the human level in an unbroken chain starting from the radiant source of light in God himself. The more mythically inclined variety of neo-Platonism claims sufficient knowledge to be able to name them: the hierarchy runs from the Beyond-God to God to the gods, the daimons, heroes, human beings and the rest of the cosmos. Through the medium of gnosis and neo-Platonism, early Christianity is thus touched by an echo of genuine ancient Greek mythology: it will have to struggle with gnosticism over the concept of authentic revelation and also, to still more enduring and far-reaching effect, with neo-Platonism and its philosophical language about revelation. The encounters between Valentinus and Irenaeus, between Proclus and Denys were considered in the second volume of this work. Plotinus, however, the most powerful thinker of non-Christian late Antiquity, transcends the existing dialectical opposition and demands portrayal in his own distinctive terms.

In an age in which philosophy already exists, a religion that has developed in mythical form cannot dispense with it. From Homer to the time of the great tragedians, it was possible to gain some vision of the wholeness of being from a particular aspect of the world or of history, just as much as by means of a sacral or 'sacramental' image, Pindar, for example, assembled the entire world of divine and human beings around the focal point of a festal triumph: the cosmic glory of all being thunders forth in the splendour of this one occasion. But Plato (surpassing Heraclitus and Parmenides) taught philosophers to focus attention on the totality of the world itself and related this to the outflowing radiance of the Form of the good: this is the truth and to this the integrity of the kalon, the beautiful, belongs. Anyone after Plato who wanted to introduce any dramatic tension into absolute being would have to demonstrate that only in this way could the idea of a universal good be preserved. There are mythical forms of religion that bring into the divine sphere a dualism of two or more mutually antagonistic cosmic principles, and so necessarily introduce a principle of ignorance into this sphere—the ignorance of the demiurge who does not possess the whole truth or the ignorance of an aeon, 'Sophia', who has the capacity to fall away from the fulness (πλήρωμα) of the divine and to unleash the material process of the present world order; such mythologies do not survive the encounter with philosophy. If such cosmic principles are supposed to be 'divine' and responsible for a world that is shaped and formed by them, then the 'ultimate' being of which they are part cannot as such be either good or true and possesses no sort of illumination from the divine glory. Thus these mystical developments, even when they appeal to insight or illumination (gnôsis), remain thoroughly sub-spiritual and non-rational and can only be consigned to the realms of imaginative fancy. If they are, nevertheless, to be justified at the bar of philosophical reasoning, they must produce something more than a pure appeal to the revelation of a god or a prophetic sectarian leader; they must produce the proof that it is uniquely these constructions of fantasy that satisfy the postulates of transcendental reason. Thus, where such systems possess any real self-understanding, they build up towards philosophy from their ground in myth, yet are always unable to reach that goal. For their starting-point is revelation conceived as a particularised gnôsis and such a perspective is bound always to be transcended by the universal gnôsis of philosophy.

However, since mythical thought is grounded essentially in the particular, while gnosis makes essentially universal claims, gnostic sectarianism can offer no resistance to the process of decline into a kind of hubris that is in the highest degree intolerable because it is in the highest degree riddled with contradiction. For its adherents, the highest truth, the truth of the god who saves, is revealed; but this is not the truth of being as a whole, because other areas of reality are governed by other, hostile divinities (the demiurge, Heimarmene, fallen Sophia) and thus are, as such 'untrue' and evil. The faithful are thus elect, predestined, and they cannot in any way be in communication with the non-elect. But this means that in fact their truth-claim cannot be universally valid, although that claim must be personally maintained by the believer. But if, as in many gnostic systems attempting to secure a foundation for their universality, the intra-divine struggle, whose theatre the world is, is given an eschatological happy ending, then that struggle must either have been less than serious (in which case the myth dissolves into a pure play of appearances in the face of philosophy) or else, if it had been serious, less than divine (in which case, once again, the philosophy of being as the absolutely true and good is still victorious over myth). Gnosis, then, cannot be understood except as the manifold form of the objectification of existential experiences, circumstances and longings in the human sensibility.[44]

This is not the place to go into the details of the mystery cults; precisely because of their cultic form, they are rooted even more deeply in myth than is gnosis. And although they too cannot renounce some kind of universal claim without renouncing their identity, they do not set themseslves solidly in opposition to the official state religion. In practical terms they acknowledge that they are tolerated by the state religion and are content with fostering a sectarian consciousness. Although much in demand and in that sense 'modern', they indulge themselves in an archaizing and timeless mode of consciousness. The God whom they portray in their cultus makes no claim to any mode of presence in history and the contemporary world but this.

Nowhere is the fundamentally syncretistic structure of religiosity more clearly visible than in these last and most developed forms of ancient thought—a structure that can be seen as an everlasting kaleidescopic play of thematic colours between myth and philosophy, the one disguised as the other, each in the last analysis pushing the burden of proof on to the other. So on occasion revelation appears more as a cloak of disguise, promising mysteries within, a purely literary genre for the presentation of straightforward philosophy. Festugière has given a thorough delineation of the 'fictions littéraires du Logos de révélation':[45] knowledge acquired through dream or ecstasy, through the discovery of a book or inscription, through signs from heaven, through the revelation of a sage to a king, through the letter to someone or other of a prophet, through secret tradition passed on from father to son, or more generally by oral transmission. In the hermetic writings such forms are often no more than makeshift disguises for entirely orthodox philosophical instruction.[46] The god who gives instruction speaks like a professor in the lecture-room and the purely speculative content contradicts the theological form. Not only this kind of literature, however, with its reverential genuflections to fashionable half-knowledge, but even serious thinkers as well build into their schemes of things some sort of knowledge through revelation and attempt to give it a proper justification. Whereas Hesiod still operates in a mythical frame of reference that can mark out certain days as good or bad for a farming people, the next generation undergirds this doctrine of 'signs' in a 'scientific' manner, through astronomy and astrology (not yet distinct from each other); the Aristotelean treatise 'On Signs' serves as a basis for the stoicizing poet Aratos (quoted by Paul on the Areopagus), the first to give—in his Phainomena—a description of the constellations which is charged with intense religious feeling and to offer advice on how the divine signs manifest by them to human beings should be read. In this way the Platonic Aristotelean ecstasy in encounter with the mathematical order of the starry heavens[47] unites with the Stoic and religious sense that 'all things are full of Zeus . . . and we ourselves are of his kindred and he, like the best of fathers, gives to human beings propitious signs, spurs us on to work and does not let us forget our concern to gain our daily bread . . . Hail to you, Father, supreme miracle (μέγα θαῦμα).[48] It is he (or else the gods who are his powers) who reveals himself through the heavenly constellations, shows himself to human beings as worthy of service and presses himself upon them, as Manilius says: 'seque ipsum inculcat et offert'[49]—not indeed so as to make known his own interior life but rather to assist human beings in the pursuit of their earthly purposes.

---

[44] In the gnostic perspective, all attempts to find deliverance invariably follow this path. See, e.g., Leisegang, Die Gnosis, 4th edn, 1955, and, most influentially, H. Jonas, Gnosis und spätantiker Geist I, 1934, II.1, 1954.

[45] Festugière, L'astrologie et les sciences occultes (= La révélation d'Hermès Trismégiste I, 1950), 309–354.

---

[46] Idem, 'Le logos herméneutique d'enseignement' (vol. II, 28–50).

[47] Phainomena (ed. Maass 1893), W. 469ff.

[48] Ibid. Prolog. V.1–18.

[49] Astromomica IV.916f., quoted from E. Norden, Agnostos Theos, 1954^{4}, 16.

It is only a short step from astrology to oracles; it is clear enough how reluctant someone like Cicero was to abandon the traditional Roman patterns of public and private religion on this point, but it is the neo-Platonists who first provide it with the required philosophical undergirding. Plotinus' pupils, Porphyry and Iamblichus, despite their vigorous disagreements on these matters, are at one in their concern for a philosophical justification of late antique superstition. Porphyry no longer possesses his master's freedom and distance from oracular religion, soothsaying and magic; in the struggle for human purification and liberation pure philosophy does not suffice him and he calls on positive religion for help, writing one book On Philosophy from Oracles[50] and another On Divine Images,[51] which he commends as symbolic representations of the essence of the gods. He expects as much benefit from unravelling oracles for philosophy as for those whose questions have to do with how they lead their personal lives.[52] And although in his 'Letter to Anebo', the Egyptian priest,[53] he put a long line of question marks against Egyptian religion, particularly its theurgical practices, he has no intention of rejecting it, no intention, above all, of rejecting prayer to the gods, which must be performed more spiritually or else in closer connection with material practices depending upon the rank and station of the divine being concerned.[54] He recommends theurgy in regard to the inferior daimons, distinguishing such practices from conventional magic.[55]

---

[50] Ed. G. Wolff, Berlin, 1856.

[51] Περὶ ἀγαλμάτων ed. Bidez, Vie de Porphyre, 1913, 1ff.

[52] Eusebius, h.e. IV.7.

[53] Reconstructed by Thomas Gale in his edition of Iamblichus' De mysteriis, 1678, and reprinted in Parthey's edition of the same work, 1857, xxix–xlv.

[54] Ap. Proclus, in Timaeum 64a f. (ed. Diehl); cf. De abstinentia II.34,37 (ed. Nauck, 1886). Prayer and theurgy are treated by Proclus himself in a closely similar way at a later date; see in Timaeum 65a, De theologia platonica I.26 and 29. 'Faith' is what Proclus calls the highest kind of union with God. Prophecy is for him a divine gift of inestimable value (De theologia platonica I.26). On the magical and cultic power and significance of divine names, divine images, theophanies and miracles, and on the allegorical

The reply of Iamblichus (or one of Iamblichus' pupils) to Porphyry's question is contained in the De Mysteriis,[56] a definitive classic of this form of religion, which is at once in the closest proximity to and at the furthest distance from the Christian religion. The fundamental idea is (I.3) that knowledge of God 'is exalted above all criticism and any kind of judgment and transcends all rational demonstrations'; 'rather are we entirely compassed about by that union with the divine and filled by it: we are conscious of our own existence only in our consciousness of God'. Thus this knowledge is exalted beyond any kind of subject-object opposition: ἀντιθέσεως τε πάσης κεχώρισται.[57] Within this a priori framework, however, gods, demons and heroes are now all bound up together, so that they can be understood only in the sense established earlier of a dynamic radiating-out from the primal One. The entire mythical realm of the gods is now absorbed into the all-encompassing act of philosophical coming to awareness; the religious relation of I to Thou, as posited in prayer, grace, sacrifice and so forth, can be justified only within a more comprehensive frame of reference based on pantheistic identity. Religious consciousness is both human self-awareness and the revelation of the divine world: it is identical with both[58] and yet is also two-sided.[59] In its two-sided aspect it is at odds with any attempt at a psychological reading of Homer and Hesiod, as well as the Platonic myths, cf. the examples in Zeller, Die Philosophie der Griechen III.2, 884–887; on lost works relating to this, ibid. 840.

---

[55] Testified to in Augustine, De civitate Dei x.9.23, 27.

[56] Ed. Gustav Parthey (cf. n. 53). On the whole question, cf. E. R. Dodds, 'Theurgy and its relationship of Neoplatonism', Journal of Roman Studies, 1947, 55f., and E. Pax, ΕΠΙΦΑΝΕΙΑ. Ein religionsgeschichtlicher Beitrag zur biblischen Theologie, 1955, 65–76.

[57] Ibid. I.3 (Parthey 10).

[58] In prayer and invocation, there is no calling of one upon another (ἕτερον), there is 'no confrontation, no distinction'—IV.3 (Parthey 185).

[59] Thus it cannot be assumed, as the (Stoic) philosophers assume, that the individual's daimon is no more than the reasoning power of a human being, the best and highest in him or her: this would do away with all religion (IX.8).

reduction of the religious a priori: ecstasy, for example, is not to be reduced to its concomitant psychological conditions, nor is the apparition of some higher being;[60] such visitations come 'from outside us, from the free will and determination of the gods alone'.[61] Nature provides only the basic dispositions that then allow themselves to be activated in a wholly supernatural fashion (ὑπερ φύσιν) by God.[62] What the gods 'show us out of the plenitude of their goodness' (χαρίζεσθαι) is grace, bestowed in love'.[63] From this perspective, then, all religious activity (prayer, sacrifice, theurgy) is an opus operatum, i.e. a symbolic action, whose full meaning is grasped, not by human beings but by God alone (which is why philosophical speculation will not suffice)—an action in which 'the symbols effect of themselves what is appropriate to them' and 'the mysterious energy of the gods, towards whom these symbols reach up, is perceived through the symbolic image proper to it, working in and of itself'.[64]

However, these dialogic, magical and sacramental aspects rest unconditionally upon a monistic foundation, which, in the last analysis, is the late Platonic perspective of the Timaeus: from the point of view of the gods, there is a perfect appropriateness in the relations between their essence and their manifestation. In them, 'what is unutterable in itself becomes utterable and they permit what is without form to shine through in their formal mode of existence.'[65] Thus their epiphanies are neither phantom appearances[66] nor 'pale imitations'[67] but—if the theurgical activity has been fully successful—'authentic revelatory images',[68] 'true phantasmata of the true'.[69] Over against the Middle Platonic mysticism of ascent, human imagination is here also given its rightful religious place.[70] But this rests on the idea (already found in the Timaeus) that the visible cosmos as a whole is a full and perfect incarnation of divinity, while it is primarily in the individual soul that there enters in an inappropriateness and tension between essence and appearance.[71] From the perspective of the totality of the cosmos, the All, the perspective of the gods, this incarnational appropriateness includes any and every world, even our sublunary sphere, and thus the All 'is the visible icon of the gods'. In virtue of this, everything depends ultimately on a 'harmony' of identity, a 'symmetry' and 'essential kinship' between God and the world, 'since mutual coinherence and influence can exist only in things that are similar in being and activity, or in some way similar in essence or deriving from the same source'.[72] All oracular religion depends on a pre-established harmony and is indeed its consummation; the means required for it find their concord only in the music of the spheres.[73] This principle also allows significance to even the most questionable proceedings in temple-magic: obscenity can be treated as a purely symbolic matter;[74] the threats discharged against the daimons in the invocatory formulae are always overtaken in advance by the gracious spontaneity of their will to manifest themselves; and so forth. Delusory visitations are possible only if inferior daimons intrude themselves in place of higher spirits as a result of some imperfection in the magical ritual.[75] But a 'true showing' (αὐτοψία) of the divine

---

[60] Ibid. III.9 (Parthey 117–118).

[61] Ibid. III.14 (134, 12).

[62] Ibid. III.25 (159, 2–3), III.27 (164f.).

[63] Ibid. IV.1 (181, 9–12).

[64] Ibid. II.11 (96f., esp. 96, 19; 97, 5–7).

[65] Ibid. I.5 (16–17).

[66] Ibid. II.12 (93).

[67] Ibid. II.12.

[68] Ibid. III.28 (167, 12). II.10 traces the authenticity of appearances back to the trustworthiness of the gods (Parthey 90).

[69] Ibid. 167, 16–17; cf. II.10 (94, 16f.). God 'does not transform himself into a phantasm, nor does he decieve a man in any other way, but allows his true appearance to shine forth in that which can impart truth to our souls'.

[70] Ibid. III.14 (133–134). There is a precise distinction between the imaginative forces as they rise up out of our own diseased nature, and their condition when touched and shaped by the gods: III.25 (160).

[71] Ibid. V.2 (200).

[72] Ibid. I.9 (32–33): the visible gods (the stars) are the sacred images of the intelligible ideas, and their mutual union is 'indissoluble' (I.19, Parthey 57–61).

[73] Ibid. III.9, VII.1.

[74] Ibid. I.11 (38–39). It is also possible that the idea can be allowed to shine out, in a kind of shock-effect, through an opposite image—an idea taken up by Origen and Denys.

[75] Ibid. IV.3 (184), VI.5 (245–246).

in its 'glory', its appropriate form of manifestation is also possible: the higher the rank of a divinity, the clearer and more beautiful and free from illusion is its appearance.[76] One thing remains quite impossible in this system of identity: that the divine should humble itself to serve human beings. Here Porphyry, who does speak of a 'service' rendered by the gods, is sharply repudiated by Iamblichus: if the divine grants some participation in itself, it is never changed by this, 'it does not move beyond itself, or become less than itself, it does not enter into any servile relation with what stands over against it and participates in it, but, on the contrary, makes use of all who serve it'.[77]

No doubt biblical motifs have already been built in to the system at this point, so as to provide a pagan 'neutralizing' of them, and conversely, pagan worship appears here in Christian dress; and it is precisely here that we can clearly see for the last time how impossible it is to complete the construction of the religious bridge. The mythical opposition between the giver and the receiver of revelation is maintained to the bitter end but only because the system is mortgaged in advance to a philosophy of identity. The De mysteriis is in this respect the most extreme example of a straight identification of myth and philosophy, in this sense of an Hegelian 'identity of the non-identical and the identical'. In fact, Hegel undertakes the same quest once more, at a far higher level of reflection, and seeks to integrate all forms of 'dialogic' faith into the monological knowledge of reason.

b. Openness

Nevertheless the last word of the pre-Christian world is not this self-subverting dialectic, which scintillates demonically between pantheism and atheism and in which all the glory of true humility is hedged in by the presumption and arrogance of pure knowledge or visionary concupiscence. If nothing more than this had preceded it, Christianity would not have had so protracted a struggle with the ancient world over the meaning of glory. It would have been able to set the false understanding aside and to put its own in its place, able to insert into the incomplete bridge the missing central section which would give final solidity to the projections of myth and philosophy, solidity in themselves and in relation to each other. But Christianity well understood that in the essentially unfinishable nature of the world's constructions it was confronted by something unsurpassably authentic, a definitive expression of the humanum of the world; such understanding was at least achieved at the point where the incomplete, torso-like character of ancient thought was not denied and glossed over at all costs but was subjectively experienced and admitted; and this authentic perception could not simply be argued away, overcome and discarded in the light of the new Christian vision of the glory radiating from God.

---

[76] Ibid. I.3 (73), II.4 (76, 13ff.).

[77] Ibid. III.17 (139–140).

The varieties of hubristic dialectic (even in their humblest disguises) were relatively quickly seen through. But the struggle with those conceptual images that were able to make positive sense of the incompleteness, as the sole standard, the window, through which the everlasting light breaks through, lasted for millennia. Indeed Christians may well delude themselves if they imagine that in the present age they have put myth completely behind them, ancient religion half and philosophy almost completely behind them, so as to lay out its unique absolute fare on this tabula rasa. Certainly, Vergil vanishes unobserved at the peak of the mountain of Purgatory, where he delivers his pupil into the keeping of Beatrice, the manifestation of the eternal love. But could Dante have been led through the Inferno and Purgatorio by anyone except this anima cortese,[78] who imparts to him the most sensitive insight he possesses: amor e il cor gentil son una cosa?[79] An antechamber—but how indispensable, because it is only as either Jews or Gentiles that we can become Christians. And, more importantly, because it is into this antechamber-world of either Jewish or Gentile understanding that we must go out again and again bearing the good news of salvation, to live there and proclaim the gospel there.

---

[78] Inferno 2.58.

[79] Vita Nuova 20.

We may indeed do so announcing with Karl Barth in tones of loud conviction that Christianity is not a religion, or, with Kierkegaard, that it is not a philosophy, or, with Bultmann, that is it not a mythology. But God would not have become human if he had not come into positive inner contact with these three forms of thought and experience. The evidence for this contact and this contamination is provided by the Bible itself, which attains its final and (for the Christian) binding form precisely in the great age of religion and syncretism. Those who want to 'purify' the Bible of religion, philosophy and myth want to be more biblical than the Bible, more Christian than Christ. What is invariably left after these supposed exorcisms is a pitifully abstract affair, that seeks to hide its wretchedness by exalting the slogan of 'holy poverty', the 'absolute seriousness' of its own impoverishment, as the unum necessarium, latching on to 'the Word' in one way or another, as if this Word, ascending to the Father, had not sent forth the Holy Spirit upon Church and world.

The 'syncretism' of the Bible is a fact denied by no-one. It begins in the Old Testament, where the last books to be written not only speak in a generally Hellenistic style (Maccabees), but in Stoic and (neo-) Platonic ways (Wisdom and, even, Ecclesiasticus).[80] Philosophical 'logos' enters into the service of Jewish thinking about God; Hellenistic universalism becomes the medium for the absolute claim of the Bible. The Epistle to the Hebrews, taking up from this tradition, will express the dialectic of Old and New Covenants in the garments of Platonic language and thought,[81] in close connection with Philo, who had already, as an irreproachably devout Jew, donned these garments.[82] Paul quotes Aratos, John speaks of the Logos, the Epistle of James uses the conventions of Stoic diatribe, the Deutero-Pauline letters take over the terminology of contemporary religious, cultic and political conceptions of parousia and epiphaneia without a trace of apprehension[83]—to take only a few instances; and all this points clearly to the fact that human thinking does not happen without concepts (philosophy) and images (myth), and the relation between 'religion' and 'revelation' is thus bound to be an intimate interior penetration of just this intense kind. This must hold as much for the most ancient parts of the Bible as for the latest; anyone who takes offence at this and wants to expunge anthropomorphisms from the Bible must either replace these ancient forms with the still more crude and naive mythologoumena of our 'scientific' era or else succumb to an irrationalist existentialism, which is simply neither able nor willing to give an account of anything over and above its own thought-processes.

---

[80] Raymond Pautrel, 'Ben-Sira et le Stoïcisme', RSR 1963, 535–549.

[81] F. J. Schierse, Verheissung und Heilsvollendung. Zur theologischen Grundfragen des Hebräerbriefes, 1955.

[82] C. Spicq, L'Épitre aux Hébreux, 2 vols., 1952–3.

However, it is enough for now to allude to these facts and to put them in their historical and systematic place relative to us; the formal and methodological problem has already been dealt with in the first volume of this work. What is now of decisive importance is the question of content: in what way did the last days of the ancient world come to provide Christianity with a meaning for 'glory' which it could not ignore or bypass, as classical culture drew together its vision of existence and, as far as was possible, transcended it in definitive, classical form?

The antique world in its decline saw with as much clarity as any preceding age just how precarious, ambiguous and risky such a characterisation of existence was bound to be in any circumstances—more than ever at the end of an era. It had, after all, sought to keep before its eyes the dark, shadowy, even terrible aspects of reality, but also to find a locus standi from which, without closing one's eyes to anything, it would be possible to say a bold and decisive Yes to the whole of experience. Homer did not avert his gaze from suffering and death any more than did Archilochus, nor did Heraclitus any more than Plato and Aristotle, Epictetus and the inventors of the great cosmic romances of Gnosticism.

---

[83] E. Pax, ΕΠΙΦΑΝΕΙΑ (above, n. 56).

Even where whole areas of the world are rejected because they appear too ambiguous for a wholehearted affirmation we still find the search to arrive at an overarching perspective, to attain the point of view of a higher divine mind or of the supreme God himself, the point of view of a being who need take no responsibility for the catastrophes of the sublunary world or the whole material order. Dualistic, Manichaean systems were often no more than well-meant, if also awkward and ill-thought-out, attempts to vindicate the true God, the radiance of whose glory, so it seemed, could not penetrate the total darkness of this world. And on the other hand, many forms of philosophical and religious pantheism were only too ready and facile in dealing with this darkness, in explaining it as pure non-being, or pure appearance and no more, or as a more or less necessary ingredient woven into a comprehensive cosmic harmony. Yet even here we can recognise the ethical will and the struggle, often astonishingly strong, to make it possible for the whole of reality to be recognised as good and beautiful, no matter how much the individual may be devalued, ignored, or indeed expunged from the comprehensive picture of order.

It cannot be said that in the human longing to succeed in saying an unconditional 'Yes' there is concealed the kind of arrogance that cannot put up with a defective world, or that is confident in its own power to perfect it. Even for the philosophers the contemplation of 'the starry heavens above', which is primary for the classical mind, is not connected with the secondary sense of 'the moral law within' in such a way that the individual as such is allowed to claim, in Promethean style, any sort of identity, internal or external, with the order of the cosmos, although there is a marked gradation in the levels of religious awe expressed, ranging from pure humble worship to a proud consciousness of possessing a share in the highest degrees of reality and logos. It is well-known that the Hellenistic and later Roman cult of the ruler cannot simply be read in terms of human self-divinisation: when, in advanced civilizations (where the state apparatus is adequately developed) the royal office appears as the visible representation of divine power and order, permeated with the light of eternal glory, when there is a confluence of manifold forms of mythical thought and ritual, especially in the Greek world (the cults of certain dead heroes, semi-divine or clan ancestors, historical heroes with their particular shrines and festivals, etc.), when, finally, Alexander the Great is greeted by the oracle of Ammon as Son of God (and thus successor of the Pharaohs) and Hellenistic and Roman monarchs from then on begin to receive divine honours, all this occurs in the intermediate sphere of the theion as conceived in classical thought, the realm of divine brightness lying over this world, especially its most exalted parts. No-one seriously suggests that the royal personage possesses the unmediated essence of God. Any seriousness about this comes in the first instance from outside, when Christians reject the whole picture and abandon all these intermediate levels of reality that obscure the ultimate truth, on the basis of a completely new understanding of the Godness of God.[84]

It is certainly true that in Rome a hard-headed sense of raison d'état increasingly pervaded such 'advents', 'epiphanies' and 'apotheoses' of the monarch, events which left the individual all the more religiously unsatisfied the more he or she felt unable to identify harmoniously with the state—a sharp contrast to how things were in the republican era. Once the cultivated poets and artists of Alexandria had retreated into a private sphere of dazzling and playful conceits in their art-forms, the Roman imitators of a Callimachus or a Euphorion went on to put a bitter, sarcastic, brutal and intermittently obscene content into these technically flawless vessels. The process can be traced from Catullus to Martial by way of Ovid; and in their way, such writers sought to show their personal independence over against the pressure of the public sphere. Horace himself, the most gifted artist among them, a writer who achieved a perfect formal poise and transparency, represents no more of an advance than that of Stoicism over Epicureanism. Not for nothing is the long-dead Archilochus brought back into prominence at just this moment.

---

[84] E. Lohmeyer, Christuskult und Kaiserkult, 1919; K. Prümm, Religionsgeschichtliches Handbuch (Herder) 1943, 54ff.; Otto Immisch, Zum antiken Herrscherkult (Aus Roms Zeitwende. Erbe der Alten, 2nd series XX, 1931); C. Habicht, Gottmenschentum und griechische Städte (Zetemata 4), 1956.

However, there are two phenomena that rise above this turmoil and, in their completely different ways, point to paths lying open that lead out of the enclosed labyrinth of the pre-Christian world. Both renew the attempt to see, to affirm and to point to the universal. Both shed a light upon it that continues to shine across the centuries and has up to the present day made their work an integral part of any attempt at poetry with a global dimension (Vergil) or religious philosophy (Plotinus). Vergil, 'Father of the West', laden with all the spoils of Orient, spoliis Orientis onustum,[85] is the consummation of culture's turning westwards. Almost three hundred years later, Plotinus once again embodies in and for this Western world the wisdom of the Orient and Greece; and Vergil, instantly perceived and acknowledged as the poet of Rome, continues to play the same role throughout the Middle Ages. Without him the great national epics of the Western world—Tasso, Camõens, Milton—would never have been composed. Only in the age of Winckelmann, Herder and Goethe does he yield his pre-eminence to Homer; and this frequently happens because of a more or less conscious undervaluing of his unique worth. As for Plotinus, it is through his eyes that the Cappadocian Fathers and Augustine read their Plato; he is the generative, fructifying power for Boethius and again for Scotus Erigena; through a work written in the spirit of Plotinus, the liber de causis, Thomas Aquinas learns to read and interpret Aristotle; he has a formative influence on the world-pictures of Dante and Nicholas of Cusa; and his translator Ficino inspires the whole Renaissance through the medium of his thought. Paracelsus and Copernicus are under his spell; England is full of imitators of him, from the Cambridge Platonists to Shaftesbury; up to the time of Rossetti, the Italians remain loyal to him; and Goethe's sonnenhaftes Auge, his all-seeing eye, recognises its like in Plotinus.[86] Vergil and Plotinus alike are the crown and summit of their age, in that they so signally open themselves to wider perspectives. But both are also—as sources and inspirations, for the most part—far greater than their followers, apart from Dante. They clear a space for their disciples to furnish. The question cannot be avoided of why exactly Rome turned to the Christian faith, if it was indeed, as Augustine depicted it, the counter-image of the heavenly city. How did it come about that Rome, harsh, warlike and calculating, immediately recognised Vergil as its own particular genius, the tender, utopian Vergil, preoccupied with nothing but peace, and celebrated him as only emperors had hitherto been celebrated? In Vergil, the subterranean stream flowing from myth into revelation becomes visible for a brief instant.

---

[85] Aeneid I, 289.

[86] Franz Koch, Goethe und Plotin, 1925. More fully, Grunach, Goethe und die Antike (1949). For a brief sketch of the influence and legacy of Plotinus, see Richard Harder's last work, the introduction to his selection of readings from Plotinus (Fischerbücherei, 1958).

---

4 VERGIL

a. The Glory of the World

All previously prevailing categories—myth, philosophy, religion—are mysteriously shattered in Vergil:[87] he shares something with all of them, yet transcends them. As he makes his way step by step backwards from his final goal, he finds, at the sources of things, something like a path out into an open space, a place where the springs rise, a place of healing and of holiness: sanctos ausus recludere fontes[88] Such work of spiritual 'breakthrough' is possible only for a poet whose inspiration is primordial, uninfected by Plato's critical doubts—a poeta vates.[89] This achievement ascends through its three main stages with a dreamlike certainty—each stage marked by an unmistakable necessity of vision, a reposeful universality that nonetheless points beyond itself: these stages are stations on the road to the poet's attainment of real freedom—the Bucolics (c. 37 B.C.), the Georgics (29 B.C.), and the Aeneid (posthumous and incomplete, 19 B.C.). He begins, as is fitting, in his youthful Catalepton ('Allegretto') by learning a set of skills which he masters superbly, in admiring imitation of the finely-chased miniatures of the so-called 'Neoterics', Gallus and Catullus especially. Then he is shaken by the impact of the powerful materialistic epic of the unhappy Epicurean, Lucretius; it leaves its mark, in that it is this above all that spurs him on to imitate it in a wholly different, fundamentally opposed way. The contemporary historical scene is appalling; the Civil Wars are still raging and it is possible[90] that the expropriations of 50 B.C. affected Vergil's own patrimony. The flight of the aesthetes of the day into the idyllic pastoral world of Theocritus could not be an answer to the questions of that age and that world. There is an early, melancholy farewell to the poetic Muse, when Vergil goes off to join the philosopher Siro at Naples;[91] but later, in the Georgics, we find a still more decisive farewell to philosophy, whose devotees (he is thinking particularly of the Epicureans) are able to search out the nature of things and conquer fear and fate.[92] His way does not lie with them. He is a Roman, not a Greek, concerned neither with myths nor ideas but with reality, the res as it surrounds human beings in its harsh and uncompromising historical insistence. It is because of this that he is a poet, whose calling is to praise and to illumine—not by flight, like the Alexandrians retreating into pastoral life from the city, but through faithful perseverance in the limited, recalcitrant, unilluminated reality of the present, until it reveals its hidden face to the person who waits in patient trust. This is hard: hic labor,

---

[87] Vergil's works are cited following Hirtzel's Oxford Classical Texts edition. B = Bucolica, G = Georgics, A = Aeneid, C = Catalepton [Translated quotations in the text are rendered directly from the Latin. Tr.]. See also M. N. Wetmore, Index verborum Vergilianus, Yale 1911.

[88] G 2.175. Friedrich Klingner, Vergils Georgica (1963), 87–89, shows that this formula is modelled on Ennius and Lucretius, and is imitated in Ovid and Statius.

[89] A 7.41.

> Well do I know how hard it is to tame the world >   with words,
> To lend the poverty of things such splendid vesture.[93]

Such a programme may still appear to have links with the Alexandrians, who love to show off their art in the most perfect possible treatment of trivial or obscure objects: but the spirit of Vergil is entirely antipathetic to this. From his journey's end, the Aeneid, we can trace the route back upstream through the Georgics to its source in the spirit and resolve which already shaped the Bucolics. These still make play with the outward forms of Theocritean idyll but already they have the whole of historical reality in view, in the dreamy sure-footedness of a young sleep-walker. This 'dreamlike' character is a moral, not an aesthetic, matter: it is the will not to be held back by any premature narrowing of boundaries, any fixed theory or conceptuality. The Bucolics are a vision of the whole seen from the earth, analogous to the way the soul in Plato sees the totality of things in its pre-existent heavenly condition. They move along as if in a trance, feeling their way from place to place, grasping with clairvoyant certainty the scale of distances and relations, the deeper strata of things, and bringing them into a rare order and poise in the course of ten poems.[94]

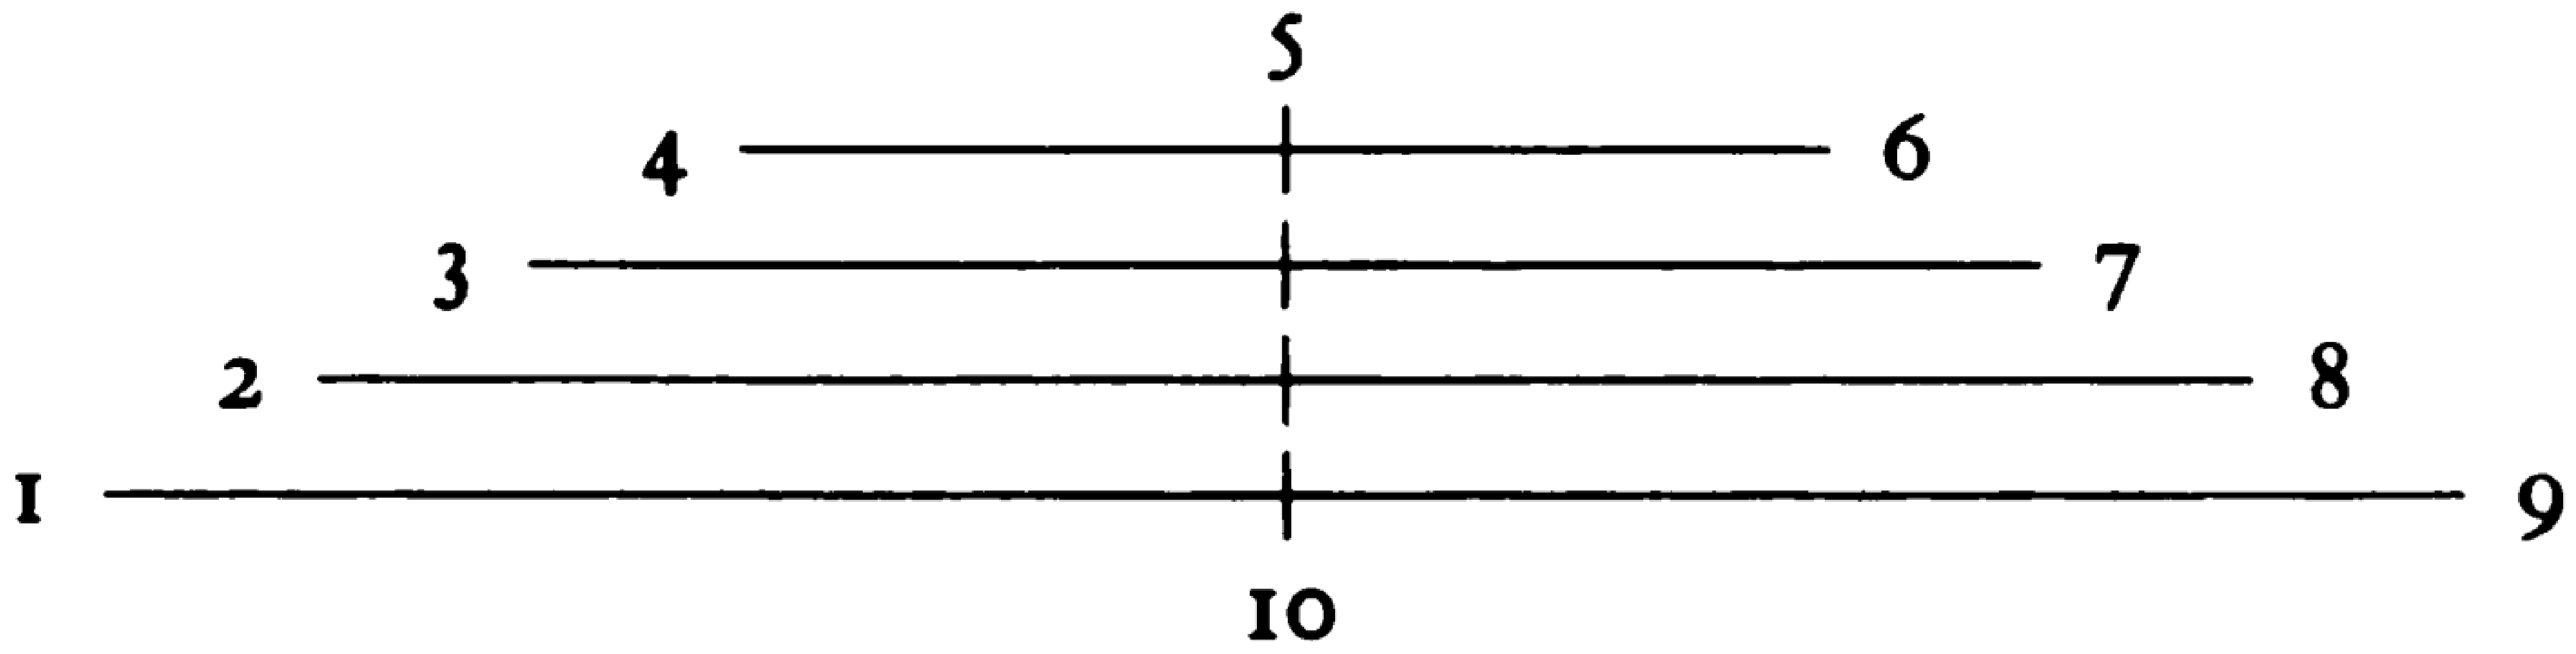
---

[90] 'L'episode peut avoir été . . . inventé de toutes pièces'; J. Perret, Vergile (Écrivains de toujours, 1959), 10.

[91] C 5.

[92] G 2.490–491.

[93] G 3.289–290.



The 1–9 stratum represents the naked conflict between the brutality of contemporary history and the timeless peace of rural existence: a man exiled from house and home speaks with someone still in possession of his own land and both wander together, singing under a night sky heavy with rain. The second stratum, 2–8, transfers the conflict to the interior life of human beings: the tragedy and drama of Eros, the lament of the rejected Corydon, with its insight into the disproportionate[95] and violent[96] character of all erotic passion, the lament of the deserted Damon as he perceives the alien and inhuman nature of Eros,[97] the unearthly magical incantation of Alphesiboeus. The third layer, 3–7, is the untroubled world of pastoral poetry and song, the world of Theocritus and baroque pastoral; but in Vergil it is no more than a narrow zone between quite different worlds. In the fourth stratum, the yearning gaze towards a wholly transfigured and redeemed earth broadens out both forwards and backwards, forwards to the eschatological expectation of the return of a Golden Age and, in the fourth Eclogue, of a world redeemer and backwards to the 'protology' of a cosmogony and a mythical, primordial age in the sixth Eclogue. The fifth Eclogue stands on a lovely eminence, framed by the others, with its narration of the mystery of Daphnis' death and 'resurrection', Daphnis, for whose death the whole of nature mourns and in whose transfiguration and assumption to Olympus as 'a god, a god', all nature joins again in celebration and rejoicing. For 'the gentle Daphnis' gives peace to the natural order, the wolf no longer lies in wait for the sheep and the snare is no longer laid for the deer.[98] But immediately below this supreme vision (in the scheme of the whole as shown above), for the sake of poetic and cosmic equity, there lies the coda of the last Eclogue, a kind of ballast for the whole—the elegy for the poet's friend Gallus, who 'perished for a worthless love', indigni amore peribat.[99] Once more, and now for the last time, the question is posed: 'Is there no measure, then, no limit? For all this, Eros still remains unmoved, he has not drunk his fill of tears—no more than will the meadows have their fill of streams, the bees of clover or the goats of leaves.'[100] This is Eros as madness and disease, insanus amor,[101] burgeoning like nature itself and pitiless to human pain: of such Eros it is said, Omnia vincit amor: et nos cedamus amori.[102] But the poet takes his leave of Eros' victim, assuring him of his own hourly increasing love in helplessly youthful and vulnerable gestures; this is a tender-hearted concern, a love that is not erotic, yet bears the same name—amor. He bids farewell in this way, so as to urge a swift and resolute departure, because 'the shadows . . . the shadows . . . the shadows', thrice mentioned, are threatening to swallow up everything. And in the final verse of all, there is only the evening star and the flock driven home.

---

[94] What follows is based on the researches of P. Maury, Le secret de Virgile et l'architecture des Bucoliques (Lettres d'Humanité III, 1944), 71–147, summarised in Jacques Perret, Virgile, l'homme et l'oeuvre (Connaissance des lettres 33), 1952, 14–22.

[95] Quis enim modús adsit amori? B 2.68.

[96] Trahit sua quemque voluptas, B 2.65.

[97] B 8.43–45.

[98] B 5.60–61.
[99] B 10.10.
[100] B 10.28–29.
[101] B 10.44.
[102] B 10.69.

It is certainly true that in Vergil's Arcadia a pure poetic-aesthetic world of symbols is created, surpassing any comparable Greek achievement.[103] But this is achieved in such a way that the framework of this ideal landscape is penetrated on all sides from beyond, to be only a cipher for the heights and depths of actual reality. The flight into the aesthetic is from the first presented as futile; the poet will only rediscover there all the dimensions of reality in heightened and more naked shape. He must triumph not by formal achievement but by the life of the heart; he must admit the powerlessness of song amidst the clash of weapons;[104] and so there is nothing for him to do but sing this song in the face of destruction and violence. All poetry ends in shadows,[105] and Eros, the lord of Arcadia, is shown forth in all his incomprehensible ambiguity: the untroubled mid-point of this work, the level of the third and seventh Eclogues, is simply a serendipitous moment that cannot be clung to, between the 'wondering entry over the threshold of Olympus'[106] and the precipitous drop into the all-devouring abyss. Amor is really the keyword of this poetry,[107] an amor that goes back past the changes and chances of time, beyond even Euripides (though Vergil lingers here for a good while: without him there would be no Dido), to Illiupersis, into the realm of the cosmic and daimonic: for Helen's sake half the world is destroyed totally and most of the other half as well. This god, this Eros, who alone ignores the bolt of Jupiter,[108] is here for the first time brought into the bloodstream of the West, which will repeatedly match him against that Christian caritas to which he cannot but be related—from Dante on through Racine, to Claudel. But even as he is being celebrated at the start of his career by Lucretius, as universal and omnipotent,[109] the power that consummates the sacred marriage between heaven and earth,[110] this daimon is being dressed in other garments by Vergil, in the tenderness of the poet's heart which shares in all delight and ecstasy as in all grief and devastation, dressed in the garments of a paradoxically restrained and chaste love. Vergil, mockingly called parthenios in the streets of Naples, never married. He is dominated by a selfless, even apparently useless love that never once counts on being loved in return: [103] Bruno Snell, 'Arkadien, die Entdeckung einer geistigen Landschaft', in Die Entdeckung des Geistes, 1946, 233–258.

---

[104] B 9.11–13.

[105] See the last line of the Aeneid.

[106] Candidus insuetum miratur limen Olympi, B 5.56.

[107] As Theodor Haecker rightly says in his little book Vergil. Vater des Abendlandes, 1935, 46ff—a work which is a simple declaration of love.

[108] A 1.665.

Enough, then, if you do no more than let me love
Whence might return of love come too for me?[111]

Nor is this the heroic love of friends, which Vergil exalts elsewhere (nimium dilexit)[112]; it is a whole-hearted reverence before all the forms of nature and fate, bound up with a willingness to share in all suffering, that is very different from Buddhist (let alone Stoic) compassion: 'a kind of courage and seriousness, a calm resolution and nobility pervades even the expression of compassion—something that in the Middle Ages would be called chivalry.[113] It is to this withdrawn, self-effacing presence that the things of the world become visible in their proper worth; and in this new visibility, they become for the first time capable of being truly celebrated by the poet. 'Vergil is always consistently a poet—which means a revealer of the radiance and glory of things: not simply a revealer of things without their radiance and their glory but, equally, not a revealer of an empty radiance and an insubstantial glory independent of real objects, which would make one an idle chatterer, an 'idealist'.[114] The Roman pietas that Vergil is later to praise in Aeneas flows into this gentle letting-be, that pietas which is a form of loving reverence—the son's for the father, above all, then the human reverence for the divine Father, then reverence for all families and all the ties that bind human beings together—quite distinct again from erôs, because it is the persisting and controlling element that underlies the aggressive urge of the god. It is not pure duty but, even as one adapts oneself to another and obeys, it is, at a deeper level, an act of reverencing. And again it is to this attitude of reverence that the graciousness and loveliness of things themselves is revealed. Nothing more clearly characterises pius Aeneas than the mysterious expansion in him of a childlike willingness to please the father, the authority that is also the object of love, in an attitude of reconciled acceptance before all of reality: cede Deo,[115] 'yield to God', becomes the basic postulate of all human virtue. If there is one element that remains thoroughly alien to Vergil's ethos, it is the Dionysiac; where this comes to the surface, it is mostly associated with destructive and inimical forces.[116] Nonetheless, the different forms of love are not all that sharply marked off from one another. It suited Vergil's purposes well—and he was to strike the chord of this motif frequently and firmly—that Venus was the mother of Aeneas, and so of Rome; Cupid, Amor, is even called Aeneas' 'brother'.[117] If Athena is the divine patroness and protector of the Greeks, for Vergil the wordplay Roma—Amor has real validity. To be sure, death appears, as always, standing across the path of love: Hades is the mid-point of the Aeneid (while in Dante it moves to the beginning of his journey). The hero meets Dido there, a suicide in the Euripidean tragic mould: 'her face averted, . . . unmoved as the hard granite or the marble of Paros',[118] just as Ajax's face is turned away from Odysseus in Homer. There is no question of Dido even remotely assuming the role of Beatrice; a convergence of human and divine love is still inconceivable and the visions of transfiguration in the third and fourth Eclogues remain no more than eschatological dreams. Nonetheless, they are not dispensable; they constitute the ultimate horizon of the poetic world-picture, something which is portrayed, though only sporadically and inadequately, in the Greek myth of the 'cosmic year', the cyclic movement of the universe, the ever-circling years that bring round again the ages of gold. For in fact the Aeneid's conception of time is in flat contradiction to this notion of a time in the natural order that runs a circular course. The 'ever-circling years' of the myth of Saturn's return, the return over and over again of the Golden Age, thus remain a part of Vergil's symbolic vocabulary. Even the fourth Eclogue, with its expectation of a coming redeemer—an already born redeemer—and the return of a Golden Age (no doubt composed on the first and most obvious level at the birth of the son of Asinius Pollio, who smiled at his mother as soon as he was born,[119] and referring at a deeper level to Octavian)[120]—even this work draws its ultimate meaning not from oriental or Hellenistic or Etruscan myth, though these may have provided some inspiration, but from the interpretation of temporal and historical existence at the end of the Aeneid.

---

[109] De rerum natura 1.10–20.
[110] Cf. the fragment of Aeschylus' Danaids referred to earlier.
[111] C 4.
[112] A 9.430.
[113] Perret, op. cit. 160.
[114] Haecker, op. cit. 34.

---

[115] A 5.467.

[116] Thus it is the Fury Allecto who stirs up the Laurentine women into Dionysiac frenzy (A 7.341f), in which they rush headlong into war and destruction. In sharp contrast, the Bacchic motifs in the Georgics are very subdued.

[117] A 1.667.

[118] A 6.469, 471. That Dido subsequently turns back again to the memory of the tender love of Sychaeus, her first husband, is one of those inconsistencies of which the Vergilian Nekyia is full (E. Norden, P. Vergilius Maro, Aeneid VI, 1916²); but this is largely to be explained as a sign of Vergil's care for an open vision of the totality of things, instead of a closed pattern of consistency.

The agricultural poems, the Georgics, are the next stage—provisional and temporary in the poet's own eyes[121]—in the journey back to the ultimate origins, back behind lyric poetry to Hesiod. The final step will take Vergil into the presence of Homer, to start all over again from this point and to do it all differently. Hesiod, the peasant from Askra: now it is Vergil who sings 'the song of Askra'[122] his Arcadian shepherd has become a down-to-earth Italian peasant. The lyrical mists of this peasant's earlier youthful incarnation are dispelled, leaving the view clear: a view of real life, in its harshness and its beauty.

---

[119] H. Hommel, 'Vergils "messianisches" Gedicht', Theologia Viatorum 1950, 182–202 (included in H. Oppermann (ed.), Wege zu Vergil, 1963, 368–425) once again defends this thesis with much display of learning, in opposition primarily to E. Norden, Die Geburt des Kindes, 1924. On the instant smiling of the saviour, see Hommel, 383, 410.

[120] Macrobius, Sat. III.7.1: Cum loqueretur [Vergilius] de filio Pollionis, id quod ad principem suum [Octavianum] spectaret adjecit. K. Prümm follows this 'Formula of Concofd' in essentials ('Die Heilserwartung der 4. Eclogue', Schol. 1931, 539f, 1932, 239f.

[121] interea, G 3.40.

Beyond both realism and idealism, beyond both practical commonsense advice about farming (precedents for this can be found in Cato and Varro) and a more refined and exquisite poetry which only toys with such motifs (Nicander, Aratus), there is a quite different path that might be traced, as Klingner has shown: the path that leads from Lucretius to Empedocles and Parmenides and the ancient cosmogonies that preceded them, the path at whose beginning stands Hesiod.[123] Vergil combines both traditions in an inseparable unity in his own distinctive style, rooted in the soil of Italy: the serious and the playful which illuminates the serious—both are equally real. There are four books: on the soil, on trees, on livestock and on bee-keeping, four levels: the earth itself, vegetable life, sentient life and finally that glimpse of the divine spirit that hovers around us in the life of the bees—the sexless producers of sweet honey, inconceivably intelligent and courageous. Tilling the soil is arduous, the cattle are dull: in the first and third books, the tones that predominate are grave, often tragic. But the vegetable world is still as it was in Paradise: a joy to cultivate, it gives its gifts freely for the most part. In the second and fourth books, the books on plants and on bees, happiness and brightness predominate. Yet both lines of thought are blended together. The first book deals with labour improbus, the sweat of the brow that comes from the pressure of sheer necessity and only so produces nourishment for human need. Here Vergil distances himself from Hesiod: it is not because Prometheus stole fire from heaven that Zeus brought the Golden Age to an end and enjoined labour and drudgery on the human race as a punishment. Rather Jupiter himself concealed the spark of fire out of fatherly love:

---

[122] Already in B 6.70, but more emphatically in G 2.176.

[123] Klingner, Vergils Georgica (1963), 11–14.

> The Father willed himself
> The tilling of the soil should be no easy task. First > then, he caused
> The field to stir to life by human skill, sharpening the > wits of men by anxious care,
> Not suffering his realm to lie asleep in lumpish > idleness.[124]

God's grace is to be found concealed within cura, anxious care. Here the glory of the 'divine country'[125] hides itself: the countryman is involved in an unending struggle against the greater power of natural forces and this struggle broadens out, in the poet's treatment, to include the whole of our existential situation:

> And so by fate all things > Run down towards the worst, and slip away, and are > dragged back,
> As if a man who scarcely manages to hold his course, > Rowing his skiff against the stream, should let his > arms
> Relax, perhaps only an instant, and the current > suddenly
> Sweeps him away down-stream.[126]

The peasant calendar of Hesiod and Aratus, marked by the courses of the stars, seems to salvage something from this vertiginous glimpse into the abyss of futility, to orient human beings towards what does not pass away. But then suddenly, at the end of the first book, the signs in the heavens turn into signs of the times: Caesar has been murdered and the Civil War unleashed, nature is out of joint and full of prodigia, apocalyptic intimations of some frightful thing to come. The gods of the fatherland are implored not to stand in the way of 'this youth' (Octavian): he is the last hope and if he fails then the chariot of history will run out of all control and 'the driver, vainly tightening the reins, is carried along by the horses, and the chariot will not respond to his steering'.[127]

---

[124] G 1.121–124.
[125] G 1.168.
[126] G 1.199–203.

Yet the world of the trees and bushes and vines remains intact. Italy, the glorious land in the middle-earth, is praised and its soil, in which the age of Saturn still lives, is extolled as equal to or greater than all the dreamlands of the Orient.[128] Once the right soil had been chosen, and after the human labour of grafting and fertilizing, how richly and freely the fruit gives of itself! Nature, swelling in springtime, makes itself fertile. Harvest-time becomes a festival of thanksgiving: in spite of their durus labor[129] the country folk are fortunate, for the 'most equitable earth', justissima terra[130] has preserved the clearest marks of original righteousness.[131] The philosopher may be blessed, 'but happy too is he who knows the gods of the countryside.'[132]

The book dealing with cattle is dark in timbre, although it is involved in the fantasy planned for the future of writing a poetic 'Triumph' for Augustus on a vast scale (a plan that gives way to the still greater and more adequately designed Aeneid). Melancholy surrounds animal life, especially that of the noblest beasts, horse and bull, because mating implies mortality; when the furor of Eros lays hold on man and beast (Leander in the waves of the Hellespont appears in company with rutting animals), they suffer, they are driven madly to their own destruction. Domesticated animals may be depicted in ordinary bucolic terms but the temperate climes in which they thrive are surrounded by heat on one side and ice on the other: the habitable world is narrow. And then there are the plagues that threaten them: the book concludes with a terrible depiction of a danse macabre, where demonic flames must finally consume the heaps of pest-ridden carcasses.

---

[127] G 1.513–514.

[128] G 2.136–176.

[129] G 2.412.

[130] G 2.460.

[131] G 2.474.

[132] G 2.493.

The bees of the fourth book represent spiritual life.[133] They are a kind of elevation of dumb Nature beyond itself into a realm of purity and radiance. They are diligent, 'great-souled' (magnanimus) [134] in their actions, in their self-sacrifice for the sake of the city, in the struggle against enemy tribes of bees. Their life is love and celebration or glorification—both words occur in the same line, where their voluntary death beneath an excessive load of the pollen they have gathered is extolled:

tantus amor florum et generandi gloria melli.[135]

We have no more than a faint hint that Vergil reinforces this idea of the participation of bees in the divine life by associating with it the Stoic philosophical conception of a general presence and immanence of the godhead in the natural order:[136] a faint hint, not even particularly apt for Vergil's purposes, and, in any case, nothing that is determinative for his perspective. It is more important, that the word 'immortal' occurs in connection with bees as a species:[137] this means that they participate in heavenly life in a distinct way; it is these small and insignificant creatures who earn such glory: in tenui labor, at tenuis non gloria.[138] So it is that they become a kind of pledge of immortality within the natural order. The conclusion of the whole work points, in mythical code, to this mystery, skillfully weaving together two distinct myths so that they cast light on each other.

There is the tale of Aristaeus who is inconsolable at the death of his bees and who is directed by his mother, the nymph Cyrene, to Proteus, whom he has hold on to by cunning (as does Menelaus in Homer) until he gives up the secret: Aristaeus must humbly placate Orpheus by sacrifice, since he is unwittingly guilty of the death of Eurydice, the eternally loved and eternally lost Eurydice, all but brought back from death and so mourned in a double measure of desolation. When this is done, new swarms of resurrected bees will take flight from the carcasses of the sacrificed animals. The tale of Aristaeus is an ancient one and the method of regeneration from animal corpses (known as bugonia) is sometimes commended and sometimes rejected in bee-keepers' manuals; but Vergil is the first to link this legend with that of Orpheus. Two aspects of nature, of Dasein: the tragic dimension of love that can never be consummated, the beloved gone beyond recall into the realm of the dead, and the cry of lament echoing through the world, the cry that cannnot be quieted. The human self unwittingly shares the guilt of provoking this lament and must humbly sacrifice to this weeping god. Who knows whether Protean Nature will not after all show us the right path to a magical resurrection beyond hope or conceiving?[139] Rilke's Sonette an Orpheus are the nearest thing to this mysterious finale to the Georgics. All Vergil's skill can be seen here in this reticence and refusal of resolution; the two conflicting myths are only loosely plaited together (in far too external a fashion, so the philologists say), like fingertips resting against each other. The legend that deals with death, the legend that deals with eternal life: but this suffices to let that radiant glow that lies over the entire work suffuse the end of the poem, a glow that arises from the poet's Yes to life in all its dimensions, the harsh and the beautiful. That Yes, however, can only be consciously uttered when it is a response to an ultimate, barely audible Yes on the part of being itself.

---

[133] The theme is a traditional one, found in Aristotle, Pliny and Varro (honey is a secretion of the heavens, the residue of nectar. Bees have received—at most—spirit and skill from nature): examples in Klingner, op. cit. 163.

[134] G 4.4. Only Jupiter and Aeneas share this designation.

[135] G 4.205.

[136] G 4.221–227.

[137] G 4.208.

[138] G 4.6.

b. The Glory of Mission

The Bucolica had sought a full transfiguration of the world in the timeless realm of the beautiful, looking to lost origins and hoped-for consummations, but also in the expectant gaze towards Olympian heavens and apotheoses, and, tentatively, the expectation of finding in the world as it actually is an

---

[139] Cf. the interpretation by Klingner, op. cit. 193–239—beautiful, reticent, yet full of genuinely profound illumination.

Arcadia beyond spatial location, a utopia, a 'no-place'. The Georgics are resolutely settled in this world, in the landscape of contemporary Italy, in the accustomed paths of human destiny, its ennoblement through hardship and its experience of the gracious gifts of nature in unremitting toil. Yet it is no isolated, sealed off here-and-now that is depicted but vigilant struggle against a menacing environment, conflict and war above all, conflict inside and outside the human spirit—and, on the wider canvas, sickness and death. There is still a trace, even here, of nostalgia for a lost primordial age, for the final establishment of a peacable kingdom, and, transparently, for the overcoming of death, for transfiguration and resurrection.

In both works, the historical world, the world of Roman reality, is viewed and conceived from outside. In the Aeneid the poet enters into it and so exposes himself to experiencing the essence, the heart, of the real world. The will had long been present for a celebration of the peaceable world empire to be established by his friend Octavian, the predestined ruler; but form and matter alike had so far eluded him. As far as material was concerned, two halves that failed to make a formal whole lay before him: the present, with its endeavours and successes in unifying the world, and the distant past of Rome, as it had already been celebrated in song by Ennius and Naevius—it descends from Aeneas and from Troy. This led back to the realm of Homer's primordial poetry but seemed also to lead all the further away from the present. In some most profoundly secret hour of creative inspiration the form for this enterprise revealed itself to the poet: as perhaps never before or again in the spiritual history of Europe, this was a moment in which the ethical and the aesthetic coincided.

The inspiration that came was to engage with Rome not in its being but in its becoming, not in possession but in longing, not in power but in obedient preparation for its destiny and so, most profoundly, in renunciation—even in the defeat and catastrophe that stands at the beginning of it all, the point at which it is no more than a grain of mustardseed, yet possessed of the destiny of growing higher than all other plants, growing into a mighty oak, as the first two books of the Georgics loved to depict it. What a tribute to Homer—and what a triumph over him!—to leave him to say all that is to be said about the victory and to choose as a starting-point instead all the wretchedness of defeat and flight! And what an opportunity too for the glorification of Rome: there are no long-drawn-out annals stretching back into the past to be written—the poet is indeed not an historian, the task is rather to let all the bright rays of the future penetrate the utter obscurity of the beginning. Two things that will affect the form of the poem are needed to make this possible. First, in the static dimension, a symbolic relationship between the two levels of beginnings and endings is required: the former is image and foretype, the latter reality and antitype. The skill must lie in the portrayal of the truth (the peaceable kingdom of the present or the near future) Solely in terms of the standpoint and mode of existence of the foretype. Then, in the dynamic dimension, the foretype must understand itself as such, as restlessly transcending itself, foreshadowing something beyond itself, conceived, chosen, called, sent, understood in terms of responsive obedience, in relation to something wholly other; in precisely this way is it the primal image of what is to come, the Roman ethos, Roman virtue. Such is the proverbial fortuna of Vergil, which puts him at a single stroke in a central position, from which, as from Rome, the roads lead off over the horizon and to which they return.

So the human being is a temporal and historical creature, an anticipation of what is to come; and when we are able to understand this path before us as the one meaningful road to follow (the sens unique), it is a task and a mission[140] and becomes something that serves the construction of a greater reality, into whose foundations it enters as a sacrificial offering and which will grow out from this sacrifice. But human beings can do this only in community: Homer's heroes were individuals, standing side by side, finished and self-sufficient entities like the statues of the Greek gods, unrelated to each other. The Roman hero personifies service to his people, his essential life is from and for his people; he is an ethical function of the people. More than this, he is pius in the sense in which the son looks up reverently to his father, ready to be at his disposal—to the father who represents for him kindred and lineage, Volk, divinity. The God who directs this temporally unfolding destiny can have no definitive form; his epiphanies in this or that particular form are provisional; they are themselves 'functions'. He is the Lord who lays on the hero the mission that will lead back to himself through the darkness and that continues to support him even when it threatens to become meaningless. What Vergil uncovers here is a strangely novel kind of heroism: in contrast to the Homeric heroes, there is a renunciation here of the 'high-profile', three-dimensional style of representation. There is something faceless and colourless about Aeneas, his doings and his gods. And it is this kind of heroism that is presented as an ideal to the level-headed calculating Romans. Vergil is educating his people, his emperor, to self-transcendence.

---

[140] This has been most clearly developed by Hans Oppermann, Vergil (1938, included also in the symposium referred to in n. 33 above).

The parallels with Abraham, indeed with the whole style of existence of the Old Testament, are inescapable. The father of believers and pious Aeneas both understand themselves in terms of faith, hope and obedience; their meaning lies in an ungraspable and distant future. They themselves are only types and likenesses; that is what they are at the ethical level; but the correspondence between type and archetype, humility and glory, 'old' and 'new' covenant is what holds at the aesthetic level. What is clear from the perspective of Abraham and Aeneas is the distance between the two levels: I am only mission and service, the 'other' who (or which) is to come will be power and glory. Nonetheless it is possible from even this worm's-eye-view to have some share in the bird's-eye-view, for the one who serves in total dedication to his mission is an image of what is to come precisely as such: Abraham is the father of all believers, even—and especially—Christians; Aeneas is the foretype of all Romans, even—and especially—the present-day Romans who, in the person of Augustus, rule the world. The standpoint of a narrative permeated by anticipation and foreshadowing gives Vergil his ultimate opportunity. He brings into play the time of fulfilment, whose celebration is his final concern[141] as something describable only in terms of prophetic vision, and so as something as indeterminate and open as the predictions of the Old Testament prophets. At just those points where he allows the glimpse of a specific outline, where individual names and deeds (which the reader can locate historically in full detail) flash before the eyes of Aeneas, everything still remains wonderfully open from the hero's point of view: these shafts of information are for him more an assurance and confirmation of his overall hope than an advance determination of events. The great revelation from Jupiter at the beginning of the work is given not to Aeneas but to his divine mother and protector.[142] And after she has given him the golden shield on whose surface the whole future history of Rome, shines forth, up to the battle of Actium, to Octavian, Agrippa, Antony and Cleopatra, Vergil ends his eighth book with the incomparable lines:

His mother's gift
He gazes on with wonder, what it shows unknown to him:
Yet he is glad, lifting the fame and destiny of his seed upon his shoulders.[143]

The one point at which the father of the race has a direct visionary encounter with the future is in Hades, whither his departed father Anchises has summoned him for the sake of this confrontation with his descendants, as yet unbegotten but already existing as souls.[144] In theological terms, this is the mystical privilege of a founding father, comparable to the visions of Adam in Christian legend, Abraham's vision of his people in the stars of the sky, Moses' vision on the mountain (following Philo and Gregory of Nyssa), Paul's rapture into the third heaven (and according to legend and to Dante, his vision of Hell also), the experiences of John on Patmos,

---

[141] As clearly emerges from G 3.10–39.

[142] A 1.257–296.

[143] A 8.729–731.

[144] A 6.724–739.

Benedict, Ignatius and Teresa. It is the vision that turns hope into certainty by its light, without destroying its nature as hope, a 'commissioning' vision that is given more for the sake of the children still in the loins[145] than for the father himself. This perspective of hope releases Vergil from the obligation to depict the Augustan present as an unsurpassable eschaton and so to narrow down the vista opened up in the two earlier works. Rather the hero's perspective derives from some elusive final point, from which only individual fragments of the whole form flesh into view, transitory moments of promise. National definitions and frontiers remain intact, just as, in the Old Testament, the Jerusalem of the last days still has its national identity; yet both still have a mysterious openness. Vergil recognises and desires for his Rome just this openness towards the indefinite; so runs Jupiter's pronouncement (fatum):

> His ego nec metas rerum, nec tempora pono:
> Imperium sine fine dedi[146]

The form whose depiction Vergil makes possible, the form in which Rome recognised herself, a form which puts him beyond all that had thus far been achieved in myth, philosophy and religion, creates an analogy to Scripture in the ethical-aesthetic sphere, without this simply licensing an evaluation of the Vergilian form as no more than a 'trial run' or a sideshow in relation to the Christian revelation. The content of this revelation will stand over against Vergil, no less incomparably different and fresh than Vergil's own achievement is when set against Homer and Plato. Nonetheless, what is happening here is a pivotal moment in the mysterious preparations made by providence for the birth of the promised child. This child would not be human without its historical 'horoscope', its kairos, which determines its fortune no less that that of any other child. This is the hour in the heavens where Judaism is in conjuction with classical paganism and Rome is made ready as the raw material, the vehicle, for the new moment. But matter and form are relative concepts: all matter is form for some further matter, all form is matter for some higher form. So 'Rome' as matter itself has a form which is relevant to that higher form whose matter it is. And that is the kairos and the fortuna of Vergil.

---

[145] Hebr. 7.9–10.

[146] A 1.278–279. To them no bounds, no end of empire, I Affix; e'erlasting power I've given them!'

This can be dealt with more closely at three levels: mission as Lebensform of obedience, mission as fatum, mission as glory in humility.

1. The mission that takes Aeneas from Troy to Latium is laid upon him: the fundamental order (ordo rerum)[147] is an act of ordering—is vertitur ordo[148] Had it been left to Aeneas, he would have rebuilt Troy;[149] but this he cannot do. Still less can he be satisfied with a lesser Troy,[150] like that built by Helenus and Andromache in Epirus, which Aeneas passes by. This means only that he does not struggle on towards Italy sponte sua, on his own initiative (though this must not be translated 'against his will').[151] Through trackless paths, via invia,[152] he will and he must travel yet further, 'summoned by fate to other shores', while others may remain behind in peace.[153] Diversa auguria[154] and auspicia drive[155] the wanderers away and further still; they must seek and not find, interpret oracles and misunderstand them;[156] when Italy is in sight, they cannot land there[157] but must pass it by, for new and more perilous trials, like those at Dido's court. And there, where Aeneas seems to forget his vocation, he is harshly recalled to it by the divine father: the god had not saved him

---

[147] A 7.44.
[148] A 3.376.
[149] A 4.340–344.
[150] parva Troja, A 3.349.
[151] A 4.361, rightly interpreted by H. Oppermann, op. cit. 162–163.
[152] A 3.383.
[153] A 3.494.
[154] A 3.4–5.
[155] A 3.375.
[156] A 3.102f.
[157] A 3.521f.

twice from the weapons of the Greeks for him to lie at peace in Dido's arms.

> Ev'n if so high a calling could not kindle him,
> If he could not endure such toilsome labour for the > glory, promised him,
> Will then the father grudge his sons the citadels of > Rome?[158]

Iulus, Anchises and all the gods continually remonstrate with him and urge him away. Aeneas has no option but the obedience to which his mother Venus has aleady exhorted him in the midst of burning Ilium ('Do not fear, my son, to follow what your mother enjoins or to obey her word!'),[159] the obedience to which he is driven in Carthage ('Yet again, a god spurs us on . . . We follow you, holy divinity, whoever you may be, and in reverence obey your behest').[160] Here and here alone Aeneas needs that Roman and Stoic indifference which makes it possible to sacrifice even what is most beloved for the sake of the mission ('In spirit, he sighs and falters from unbounded love, yet for all this he obeys the god's command').[161] Mens immota manet, lacrimae volvuntur inanes.[162] When the tempest rages as they near Italy and all the rudders are useless, the destiny that shadows him is embodied in the fury of the gales:

> . . . so let us follow commanding Fate,
> And turn our course where it calls . . . Give the sails > to the wind.[163]

Once again, as for Odysseus, though in a new and different way, patient endurance appears as the fundamental human virtue:

---

[158] A 4.232–234.

[159] A 2.605–606.

[160] A 4.574–576.

[161] A 4.395–396.

[162] A 4.449. 'His mind remains unmoved; yet unavailing tears run down his cheeks.'

[163] A 5.22–23, 28.

However Fate shall drive or hem us in, we must comply!
Whatever Fate may be, all grief is patiently to be endured.[164]

However, since this command is not an external burden but something that demands assent from the heart, Aeneas battles on towards Italy out of a love that is truly his own, as if to a home that is truly his own: hic amor, haec patria est.[165] What must be established there is the urbs fatalis[166] and the founder himself who journeys manifesto numine is Aeneas fatalis.[167] He comes with his people; but when they revolt in Sicily, he is obliged to leave the greater part behind and go on to the beloved land with only a remnant, a tiny number.[168] The chain of losses and disasters runs through the whole journey (for far deeper reasons than the corresponding pattern in the Odyssey). It runs from Aeneas' native city, where as well as everything else he has to leave behind even his wife Creusa, to the Lesser Troy of his kinsfolk, to Dido's love and her beautiful new kingdom, to Anchises his father and Mises and Palinurus his friends (the latter expressly marked out by the gods as a sacrifice to secure a safe landfall), Cajeta his nurse and, most grievously of all perhaps, Pallas, the slain son of his ally Evander. The hero may indeed be for his son a model of courage and endurance but hardly of good fortune.[169] As father of the race, he suffers in a mysterious fashion the entire future fate of his people and can set his calm acceptance against the ominous sayings of the Sybil:

Not one of these afflictions,
Lady, comes new and unexpected to my eyes.
I have foreseen it all, my heart has read and pondered it.[170]

---

[164] A 5.709–710.

[165] A 4.347. The motif that the Trojans themselves in some unimaginable primordial time had originated in Italy and are, with Aeneas, returning to the rock whence they were hewn is an incidental and subordinate bit of aetiology, more political in character. See A 3.96, 166f.; 7.119f., 206f.

[166] A 11.130.

[167] A 11.232.

[168] A 5.729f., 754.

[169] A 12.435–436.

[170] A 6.105.

These losses and disasters are bearable only in virtue of the unswerving faithfulness of hope, only in virtue, indeed, of the grace-given knowledge that there is a final consummation: o passi graviora, dabit deus his quoque finem.[171] 'You find your path in the midst of the fire',[172] and he who follows to its end is certus.[173] This security in the following of a given destiny (data fata secutus)[174] is what entitles Aeneas to be called pius, magnanimus,[175] and at last ingens[176] (because of his mission). So deeply anchored is this man in the all-pervading, all-supporting will of God that the Homeric 'council of the gods' which precedes the decisive conflict appears a pallid and long-outdated convention.[177]

2. Fatum is both the divine act of sending and the mission itself that accompanies it, conceived in advance; everything else said about it has only symbolic force, deriving from this basic definition. It cannot be understood unambiguously in terms either of Homeric myth, the hierarchical world of the Olympian gods with Zeus at the summit, or of Stoic philosophy, with its divine spirit immanent in the world. Our eyes are lifted away from both equally, towards a mysterium. At its most obvious, this appears in the vast number of oracular utterances, partial, more or less obscure, more or less clear prophecies, heavenly signs to strengthen or admonish: everything that goes to make up the picture of a strangely dismembered yet consistent alphabet in which the sense of the divine mission expresses itself. Jussa deum cogunt,[178] Iovis imperium,[179] fata deum imperiis suis,[180] jussis ingentibus urget

---

[171] A 1.198–199 'My men, who have endured still greater dangers, God will grant an end to these as well.'

[172] A 7.296–297.

[173] A 5.2.

[174] A 1.382.

[175] A 1.260.

[176] A 6.411; 8.367.

[177] See the opening of Book 10.

[178] A 6.461 'the gods' commands compel'.

[179] A 5.747 'Jove's commands'.

[180] A 7.239–240 'fate's decree and the orders of the gods'.

Apollo,[181] praecepta jubent,[182] coelestum vis magna jubet.[183] The subject recurs, numina magna deum[184] or often just fatum, fors, fortuna. However, destiny itself is divided into distinct levels and senses: it may be a force that draws and spurs on, or one that restricts and delays, so much so that we find an echo in the diction (fatum comes from fari, to speak) of 'contradiction', fatis contraria nostris fata.[185] The polytheistic perspective that opens up here again derives from the very experience of the mission, not only from the old-fashioned requirements of the ancient epic style, not only to challenge comparison with Homer, but out of the same open and humble experience as always, which is able to shape the individual divine powers in a kind of hierarchy (with Jove at the head), so making sense of them. The power of opposition is called Juno—the 'spouse' of the supreme will! She follows through her own counter-plan, with its focus in Carthage:[186] and Rome's subsequent history will provide sufficient proof of the existence of this opposing power. What is remarkable in Vergil is that Aeneas is constantly enjoined to venerate Juno as well, to sacrifice to her, to win her over by piety (not magic);[187] that it is in and through this that final success is promised him and that, after the ultimate delays and restraints,[188] he does indeed win her to his side. The Romans will worship Juno better than any other nation.[189] What she has represented is positively integrated into the will of Jupiter.[190] 'Her fate',[191] which is only one partial aspect of the divine will, 'is conquered by Aeneas',[192] i.e. by Aeneas' missionary destiny as decreed by the father of the gods. Jupiter's ordinance is the highest and most sacrosanct, he cannot be outmanoeuvred by any other god. Sic placitum,[193] 'so it is in my resolve and my eternal pleasure', thus the 'father of gods and men' proclaims 'in mercy, with that look by which the skies and storms are quieted'.[194] The trembling Venus is reassured: 'My purpose has not changed'.[195] We may speak indifferently of 'God or Fate',[196] the options are open. As Lord of all destiny, Jupiter is pater omnipotens,[197] who 'rules the fortunes of gods and men with his eternal power'.[198] He may make requests of Juno, at the same time as he imposes an ultimate veto.[199] Miraculously, when she finally gives way, he can grant her prayer and willingly declare himself vanquished.[200] All this is fully worthy of a conception of God and goes far deeper that the abstractions of philosophy.[201] Vergil's idea of the heavenly abode of the gods has this in common with Homer's that here too both sincere and worthless prayers ascend to it, and here too it is more often recorded that a prayer is heard, wholly or partially.[202] There is sorrow too in this heaven.[203] Between God and humanity there is a relation of love that cannot be articulated but can only be revered in silence, which makes itself manifest perhaps most beautifully in that the gods (as so frequently in Homer) make themselves known only as they pass from our sight, and the human beings to whom they have appeared stretch out their arms after them in longing.[204] Pietas is also a quality of God.[205] Venus is the most anxious of mothers and she pours out something of her own distinctive essential character over all the divine-human relationships in the Aeneid.

---

[181] A 7.241 'by his dread commands Apollo urges us'.

[182] A 6.632 'our instructions decree'.

[183] A 7.432 'the mighty majesty of heaven commands'.

[184] A 2.623.

[185] A 7.293–294 'fates, to our fates still opposed'.

[186] A 1.11f.

[187] A 12.841; 3.435–440, 545–547; 8.60–61, 84f.; 12.178.

[188] A 7.315; 10.622f.; 12.135f.

[189] A 12.840.

[190] A 12.819–828.

[191] A 7.293. So says even Turnus, who is under Juno's protection: 'For me too a destiny of my own is decreed', A 9.136–137.

[192] A 7.310.

---

[193] A 1.283.

[194] A 1.254–255.

[195] A 1.260.

[196] A 2.779; 8.398, 9.211, 214; 12.321, 677.

[197] A 1.60; 3.251; 4.25; 6.592 etc.

[198] A 1.229–230.

[199] A 12.800, 806.

[200] A 12.833.

[201] On this, see the fine and accurate remarks of Perret, op. cit. 157–159. This is not contradicted by the fact that the ancient image of Zeus' scales of justice reappears at the supreme moment of historical decision, and that the decision seems to go to the very heart of the father of the gods, so that he is almost indistinguishable from the precarious indeterminacy of the kairos itself. Even this is the poetic expression of something that need not be unworthy of the concept of God. See A 10.104–113; 12.725–727. There is no description of how Turnus sinks in the scales; rather the whole situation is resolved in the dialogue between Jupiter and Juno.

[202] A 9.630 (Iulus' prayer). Arruns' prayer is only half heard (A 11.794–795).

[203] A 10.465.

It is true that something of the ancient Italian peasant religion survives in the lack of definition in his depictions of the gods;[206] but at least it is not the case with him that these gods are 'grey' and abstract, 'spiritless machines'.[207] At best one can say that even here the visage of the gods reflects something of that light which is to be discerned in the faithfulness of the obedient human hero. The only thing portrayed in full light and three-dimensional form is the mission itself: for its sake not only the gods but even the hero as well recede into the shadows. It is this that is exalted at the expense of the human agent, though that exaltation refers to a glory manifest only in the future. This mission is to a great extent already familiar to the poet and his readers: it is the past and present history of Rome. In the tragic episode between Aeneas and Dido, historical truth is presented to view in a parable—the history of the struggle between Rome and Carthage, and, still more, the contemporary triumph over Cleopatra, who had wholly seduced Antony and almost succeeded in doing the same with Caesar, and who, after Actium, took her life as Dido had done. And yet more again: we see the whole struggle between the charms of the eternally seductive Hellenistic East and the Western missionary energy of Rome. In the second part of the epic, the Italian episodes, we have not an account of individual military struggles, portrayed with insignificant romantic elaborations, but a parable, once again, of the particular historic mandate of Rome to unite the tribes of Italy and integrate them under the aegis of her own particular qualities.[208] The commissions laid upon Rome are displayed and conceived in their historical and geopolitical dimensions. Only one later work attempts as much, Claudel's Soulier de Satin, but this remains itself only a parable, for all the real history incorporated in it, whereas history is the central matter of the Aeneid. To be sure, it is a history which manifests itself in symbol and in embryo, so that it may be fully understood and so may be carried forward and perfected in the right way on the basis of this understanding. Here, though, the glory of imperial Rome is further transcended in another order of glory, still unknown to Rome itself.

---

[204] A 1.402–410, and the whole preceding episode (cf. A 2.620–621). Apollo is likewise recognised by the Greek princes at the moment of his disappearance (A 9.457–460) and Anchises' fading manifestation leaves a sense of yearning in its wake (A 5.740f.).

[205] A 5.688.

[206] Walter Wili, Vergil (1930), 118.

[207] Hegel, Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion, II (tr. by E. S. Haldane and F. H. Simson, London 1894), 302–303.

3. The self-effacement of Vergil's hero before the task laid upon him intensifies and fixes in stable classical form a Greek motif which runs from the endurance of Odysseus through to the humiliations of the heroes of Sophocles and Euripides. But while these last are starkly outlined in their incomprehensible doom against a lightless heaven, and the Homeric variety of endurance is never more than the trial of one man's great heart, Vergilian humiliation contains within itself a meaning, a hidden radiance, in that it occurs in the context of obedience to God. It certainly borders close on meaninglessness in the sense spelled out by Hegel in connection with the casual sacrifice of the person for the purposes of the state, typified by the mass slaughter of the dramas of national history. But it is not so with Vergil. The Georgics provide an earthly and healthy dose of ancient Italy: the human person is, qua human being, humilis, lowly, close to the soil[209] and thus unobtrusive, unsung, inglorius: 'I long

---

[208] This constitutes the 'condition' stipulated by Juno for her consent to be given (A 12.820–828).

[209] Cf. the use of humilis in B 4.2; 2.434; 5.17; G 3.108; A 3.522 (humilis Italia); 4.255 (humilis volat); 7.157; 8.455 (humile tectum Euandri, both lowly and simple, modest) Cf. B 2.29.

to be at pleasure, obscure among the streams and woods'.[210] This attribute passes imperceptibly into another, which belongs to the poet himself, living his hidden and secluded life in Naples: ignobilis, unheard of.[211] This may well be prompted by Epicurus' λάθε βιώσας, but in Vergil it is bound up with the lowliness of the earth, more deeply with the humbling that is involved in the life of the person with a mission.

Once again, we must recall Aeneas' situation in its entirety: in the background is the fall of Troy and (worse still) the divine prohibition against rebuilding it. Driven by the gods, he must appear with his people before the Italians as desertor Asiae,[212] the Asian fugitive, as a beggar[213]—just as he had stood already before Dido;[214] his people are abused as Trojan cowards,[215] womanish Phrygians.[216] Only with difficulty do we realise the demands Vergil is making of his Roman audience, when he sets the beginnings of their fate in the most shattering defeat of the history of the ancient world. In the two first books, the word victus echoes many times: the 'conquered Penates' are carried from Troy[217] to appear, battered and humbled, before Dido.[218] Thinking back to the Bucolica, we can see that they too begin and (apart from the envoi) end with a forced exile from the house and home.

Nos patriae finis et dulcia linquimus arva.
Nos patriam fugimus . . .[219]

What a position for a poet to be in—carmina nulla canam![220]

[210] G 2.486.
[211] G 4.564.
[212] A 12.15.
[213] A 7.229, 237.
[214] A 1.519f.
[215] A 9.598f.
[216] A 9.617.
[217] A 1.68.
[218] A 1.529; cf. A 2.354, 367, 452, 668.
[219] B 1.3–4 'We our country's bounds are leaving and its sweet fields,/ We fly our native land'.
[220] B 1.77.

Songs fade away helplessly in the noise of war.[221] The shepherd can respond only with a 'rough and artless',[222] 'naive'[223] song. And Aeneas is not overcome by shame at what has brought him low but spends a whole book recounting it in every detail. The gods have fled their shrines and abandoned their altars: fate has decreed against Troy.[224] Yet suicide is no more acceptable than rebuilding the ruins. Odysseus—an Old Testament figure in this, at least—is allowed to return to his own after long wanderings in exile; Aeneas must go to the most foreign of places, there to 'raise Troy to heaven by his deeds'.[225] But even the great affair with Dido ends in inglorious humiliation: destiny compels him to make a dishonourable departure and his masculine arguments are subdued and flat over against the perennial justice of the betrayed woman's cause. He pleads his excuses but his guilt lies deeper and further back than his denials reach: he has chosen this involvement and the pathetic suicide of the wretched Dido must be laid at his door.

The hero, then, is a tree stripped of its foliage. He must become accustomed to the poverty of Italy.[226] He comes to 'poor Evander's house[227] and they wander through what will one day be the Roman forum, where the lowing herds now graze all around and the king 'leads great (ingens) Aeneas in under the roof of his cramped dwelling', into the very cottage once entered by Hercules, and implores him: 'Guest of this house, be bold enough to look on riches with contempt; make yourself worthy of the god, make yourself like him [who entered under this roof, i.e. Hercules], and do not come scorning our poverty!'[228] Even the haughty Turnus must at last find himself in the guise of a lowly suppliant, humilis supplex,[229] so that the epic may end with Aeneas' sword in his heart, sending his enemy's 'bitter' or 'disgraced' (indignata) spirit to the shades below.[230]

---

[221] B 9.10–12.

[222] B 2.4.

[223] B 6.5.

[224] A 2.350–352.

[225] A 3.462.

[226] On this theme, see W. Meyer, Laudes inopiae, Diss. Göttingen 1915.

[227] A 8.359f.

[228] A 8.360–368.

[229] A 12.930.

There can be no doubt that this characteristic belongs to the inmost essence of Vergil who, with all his good fortune, was himself constantly placed in a lowly position: Homer and his absolute poetic capacity must have hovered above his head, an ever-present judgment, just as Goethe was constantly aware of Shakespeare towering above him. Even though Vergil's conception was wholly new, it needed to clothe itself in antique garments, many of them outmoded and faded, many by that time transformed into decorative conventions and no more (the Cyclops, Scylla, the eternally recurring shipwreck scenes, the games, etc.). The gods could no longer preserve their ancient splendour. And the narrative of the second part of the poem is thin stuff compared with the Iliad on which it is modelled. One can well understand why the dying Vergil ordered the burning of the Aeneid, which was preserved for us only by the express command of the emperor. Hermann Broch, in The Death of Vergil, broadens out this situation of futility and disillusion to archetypal dimensions, the situation that finally overtook, the labours of Rome's greatest poet. A work full of the most felicitous inner balance still has to endure the sorrow of coming up against its limits. Where then is its point of balance? In Vergil's devotion to Augustus, on whom falls the full, overflowing light of his regard. From the first Eclogue onwards he is the eschatological bringer of salvation, the child for whom the world has hoped and waited; at the beginning of the Georgics it is to him that prayer is addressed in a flood of mysterious words that abandon all measure and proportion; to him is addressed a eulogy in which all the spiritual riches of the world are gathered together. It is towards him that the Abrahamic hope of the first ancestor Aeneas moves. Thus the whole oeuvre is a work of limitless, apotheosising love. The prophetic hope is spes and vaticinium ex eventu. A whole world and, at the same time, a whole state ideology is laid at the emperor's feet. The gods do not dazzle the reader: they are a function of Rome's mission. Aeneas does not dazzle us, he is only a pointer, a longing hope directed towards the imperial superman. But Augustus is succeeded by Tiberius; Tiberius by others; and Vergil was 'only a fool, only a poet'. The knowledge that his work and his world are poised over the depths of his own selfhood gives him a strange quality of stillness and quietness, even vulnerability, a humbling that comes from within not from without. The aura that lies over his shrinking, ungainly, always sickly form (perhaps he was tubercular) is no imperial endowment, but radiates from within. It is precisely thus that Vergil is the father of the West, the object of universal love, of whom all those with understanding hearts have spoken only in terms of the highest veneration. Thus 'he is at the centre of European civilisation, in a position which no other poet can share or usurp' (T. S. Eliot).[231] 'He is, across the millennia, the supreme spiritual genius of the West. In him is the pure nectar of Antiquity, yet only Plato rivals him in transcending that Antiquity' (E. R. Curtius).[232] 'That Latin name in which the spiritual direction of Europe is bound up as though in a knot that cannot be touched or unravelled . . . There truly exists a spiritual concept of Europe, stronger than races and peoples, events, epochs and history, and it is either inseparable from the name of Vergil or else sees him as representing a boundary marker over against some corresponding understanding of the continent. It would be hard to find another name in history of whom the same could be said without presumption' (R. Borchardt).[233] The testimony is unanimous.

---

[230] A 12.952.

But it was Christianity that threw its mantle over Vergil's poverty, in that it saw him as the poet par excellence and allotted him in the Middle Ages a place second only to Scripture. It took as self-evident the interpretation of his love for the bringer of salvation, the divine child, the one who will establish the reign of peace, in terms of the Child who was to come into the world ten years after his death. The emperor Constantine opened the Council of Nicaea with the reading of his fourth 'messianic' [231] 'What is a Classic?' (On Poetry and Poets, 1957, 53–71), 68.

---

[232] Zweitausend Jahre Vergil. Kritische Essays zur europäischen Literatur, 1963^3, 26–27.

[233] 'Vergil', Corona I.3, 1930, 296.

Eclogue.[234] Only in this Christian salvage operation is the gap closed which otherwise dooms the prophet, considered simply in himself, to linger under the dispensation of ancient religion. That portion of the unfinishable bridge which he is obliged to push to its conclusion, so as to round off his work—i.e. the identification of true 'glory' with Augustan Rome—is the only element that, itself excessive, introduces any imbalance into his beautifully poised architecture.

[234] On Vergil's legacy and influence, see esp. E. R. Curtius, Europäische Literaturgeschichte, 1954², and the bibliography in Perret, op. cit. 182f.

5. PLOTINUS

a. God in All and Above all

The second figure who sums up the achievement of the old world and offers it to the new is Plotinus (who died c. A.D. 270).[235] Although chronologically post-Christian, he is still untouched by the Christian ethos, entirely caught up in his own vision in which he attempts to draw together and integrate all the philosophical awareness of the ancient world – the philosophical awareness and, even more, the religious awareness, since all the real value of myth is seen by him as summed up in religion, not in the inconsequential manner of the religious syncretism treated above, but in a passionate return to sources—as in Vergil—the sources where all things are still to be found together, not yet divided from each other. So too he moves beyond the dualism of myth (as revelation from God) and philosophy (as the victorious work of human thinking): for Plotinus, being itself is the divine and its total revelation is for him so overwhelmingly glorious that it far outshines all the splendours of particular myths. Plotinus refers to a great many myths—not just to resolve them into cosmological assertions in the old allegorical fashion but to elucidate how the single and complete theological revelation of being appears in them. His thought, through often taking its point of departure in scholastic-type problems, is not a school orthodoxy; he is not a disciple but a founder; his thought both has a spare, economical exactitude (he makes very sparing use of ὑπερ-formulae) and is inspired and pervaded by a silent bright glow of intensity. Like Vergil, he is 'an uncommonly pure and unassuming personality'[236] who lives in silent and unrecognised retirement in Rome, enjoying high honour only in a select circle of cognoscenti; aristocratic Romans entrust him with the guardianship of their children; incurably sick and shunned by his disciples, he dies alone on an estate in the Campagna. There have already been hints enough given about his legacy to European thought—not to mention Arabic as well; it is through him that the entire heritage of classical thought is authoritatively transmitted to the most intellectually powerful of the Church Fathers – Gregory of Nyssa, Augustine, Dionysius, Maximus; they vie with him in the task of providing an exhaustive metaphysical account of being. The scholastic conception of philosophy is coloured by him, from Boethius and Eriugena to Albert, Bonaventure, Thomas, Eckhart, Dante, Nicholas of Cusa, Gerson and Ficino. It is to him that the humanists turn back to open up afresh the vision of a holy and whole totality of being, beyond the dust of the schools, and to him that those thinkers turn who are rapt by the vision of the unity of all things and its glory, once the Stoicism of the Baroque age and the Enlightenment are past—Bruno, Shaftesbury, Herder. In him Hegel recognizes his one great predecessor; and it is in terms of Hegel[237] that Plotinus today is often interpreted, in the hope of finding there a speculative justification for his system. Yet this is simply one of the two possibilities of interpretation presented to us by Plotinus' work, which indeed presses us to decide how we are to read it in a way unparalleled in writings from the age of transition between pagan and Christian eras. Christians understood this work as a theological philosophy and used it accordingly; non-Christians in the modern age interpret it, apparently with just as much reason, from the point of view of an idealist 'identity philosophy'.

---

[235] [Balthasar refers to Plotinus' works as far as possible in the new edition of Harder, continued by Theiler and Beutler, of which the first three volumes had appeared at the time of writing. He also utilizes the standard critical text of Henry and Schwyzer, as much of it as had appeared at this date, supplemented from the older edition of Bréhier. The English-speaking reader will note also the Loeb edition of A. H. Armstrong (1966–). Translations in the text do not follow existing English versions, as these do not always lend themselves to excerpting at precisely the points Balthasar requires; extracts are thus translated in a way reflecting as closely as possible the structures of the German versions used by Balthasar but checked at each point with available English translations to secure some minimal recognisability in vocabulary.]

---

[236] Harder, Plotinusauswahl, 1958, 8.

[237] Or at least in relation to some corresponding variety of idealism, as in Bréhier's significant work La philosophie de Plotin, 1928. This was criticised by Karl-Heinz Volkmann-Schluck, 'Plotin als Interpret der Ontologie Platons', Philosophische Abhandlungen X, 1957^2: 'Bréhier's interpretation manifestly moves in the direction of modern idealism' (8). But Volkmann-Schluck's essay falls into just the same one-sidedness: 'In what follows, we shall seek for a means of understanding him [Plotinus] by way of Hegel's concept of Geist' (11).

Plotinus stands in awe and wonder before the glory of the cosmos: it is manifestly a vast ensouled organism, in which all individual souls, rational and irrational, have their share (this is the late Platonic, Aristotelian, and, above all, Stoic element in his scheme). Throughout this glorious world radiates the presence of an eternal and intelligent spirit in which noêsis and noêma, the act of thought and the object of thought are one (Aristotle's god, νόησις νοήσεως);[238] and in the ultimate ground of this spirit there is an unutterable generative mystery at work which in all the splendour of the cosmos simultaneously reveals and hides itself, present everywhere yet unapproachable (the Platonic divine 'Good', 'beyond definable being', ἐπέκεινα τῆς οὐσίας, Rep. VI. 509b). All intellectual activity in Heaven and earth circles around this unattainable generative mystery, all longing love (ἔρως) struggles upwards towards it, all the beauty of the world is only a sign coming from it and pointing to it so that as he contemplates and seeks to understand the things of the world the philosopher is compelled at a deeper level to run away, to let go, to turn again (ἐπιστροφή) to the uniqueness of absolute unity. But Plotinus, in seeing beyond the Stoic and Aristotelian to the Platonic God, penetrating past the God immanent in the world to the eternal spirit at rest in itself, the transcendental mystery of ultimate origin, finds the way open to the depths of a unique mystery in being itself: once its potential is unfolded, it possesses an all-prevailing 'implicative' urge [to simplicity and unity], towards the height or the depth or the centre, that centre in which the centres of all beings coincide;[239] but this is no more than a response to the equally all-prevailing explicatio of the divine ground of being out towards the frontiers of worldly reality. This primal moment of actuality is not a falling-away in the life of God, nothing that needs to be cancelled or remedied. In this respect Plotinus is as much a 'Western' thinker as his Greek spiritual forebears and his European disciples. Woe to the person who thinks as the Gnostics do, the Gnostics that find fault with the world so that they are compelled to find fault with the Creator,[240] who pretend to give honour to God by spurning the reality of the world. 'If you love someone, you love all that has to do with them; you love the children if you love the father. But every soul derives from the eternal Father'.[241] Epicurus had denied providence and taught that we should give ourselves over to pleasure; but 'this doctrine [Gnosticism] is far more brazen: it insults the Lord of providence as well as providence itself', and so destroys all possibility of virtue.[242] For Plotinus, in contrast, the vision of the starry heavens directly reveals the certainty of the world's divinity, and an 'awed reticence' (ἐυλάβεια) fills the soul: it is 'the manifest and glorious image' of an 'unimaginable wisdom', a 'wondrous intellectual power' reveals itself in this vision;[243] how can the stars be anything but 'divinity made manifest'? Why should we rob this world, springing forth from God's spirit, of its maker and seek to confine him to a meagre 'beyond'? Let us rather grant all realities a share in God, 'let us not confine the divine being to unity, let us allow it to be seen just as much in multiplicity, as God himself elects to reveal himself in this way; this means considering the almighty power of God which, while remaining what it is in itself, is still able to bring forth a multitude of gods dependent on him and deriving from him and through him.[244] There is no trace of world-weariness in Plotinus' yearning to get back to the primordial source.

---

[238] 'Plotinus . . . soared upwards into the highest region, into the Aristotelean thought of Thought; he has much more in common with Aristotle than with Plato', Hegel, Lectures on the History of Philosophy II, 429.

---

[239] κέντρῳ κέντρον συνάψας, VI.9.10; cf. V.1.11, II.2.2, and, more comprehensively, VI.5.4–5.

[240] II.9.15–16.

[241] II.9.16.

[242] II.9.15, V.8.8, III.2.3.

[243] II.9.8.

Of course he had to wrestle with the question of how the early Plato, in flight from the world and the flesh could be reconciled with the later Plato of the Timaeus, where the cosmos in its eternal spiritual materiality is itself 'a blessed god'. The question is expressly posed[245] and the first and predominant answer is given (following the sense of the Timaeus): the development of God into Intellect and World-Soul is not a falling-away from primitive purity. Intellect and World-Soul are not temporally generated and so do not undergo any sort of process (in a gnostic or evolutionary way);[246] they are perfectly good and beautiful just as they are. The question of a 'fall' is first posed in the case of individual souls, and it is resolved by Plotinus in close engagement with the text of the Timaeus—i.e. in the most optimistic way possible. In the first place: as Intellect unfolds within itself the infinite multiplicity of thinking and contains it all within its own unity, so the Soul of all things unfolds itself into the countless multiplicity of individual souls, which themselves represent just as eternal and divine an aspect of Soul as its comprehensive totality. For Plotinus, individuality is, taken all in all, thoroughly positive;[247] it develops from above, from God, ratione formae,[248] not from below, ratione materiae. But when the individual soul within the Soul of all (which in turn gives form to the material totality of the world)[249] is in its right place, in a state of well-being, it still has a tendency to separateness and encapsulation in itself. The World-Soul sovereignly forms its material embodiment in and around itself (so that this material element rests within the Soul that sustains it, like a net submerged in water),[250] draws the fleshly order closer to itself and allows what is below it to come into its vicinity—we too 'were there: all other men and even gods as well, pure souls and true intellect, united in and with the whole of being, portions of intellectual substance, not divided or separated, no, but belonging to the All'.[251] But while all this is true at one level, we have now become beings tormented by desires, joys and sorrows, deluded by the phantoms of the material order[252] and wearily sinking downward.[253]

---

[244] II.9.9.

[245] IV:8.1.

[246] IV.7.8: a polemic against the view that the spiritual soul or intellect is a product of the vegetative and sensual soul. If we were to take this seriously, the spirit would first develop out of the soul and finally God from intellect—or, in Aristotelean terms, act would arise from potency. But this contradicts the most elementary axiom of philosophy, for which all potency presupposes act (V.9.4, II.5.3). It is quite impossible that intellect should arise out of the bodily (IV.7.2). Any kind of evolution in the cosmos is thus ruled out: 'the All was never a little child, still to come to its full stature, its limbs progressively growing and its body taking shape' (II.9.17).

[247] IV.7.12, III.1.8, IV.3.5: individuality does not disappear at death, 'otherwise there would be a Socrates only so long as Socrates' soul is in the body; and precisely at the point when he enters the highest realm, he must exist. But nothing of what is disappears [in the transition to a higher level]; thus individual intellects also do not disappear in the higher realm, for their differentiation is not in any way corporeal. Each individual remains in its alterity and possesses its own peculiar being. So it is too with souls.'

But Plotinus underlines three things here: (i) that the soul as such cannot become evil[254] and that something within it always remains 'above';[255] (ii) that the descent of the soul as such has a twofold sense even for the individual soul: for it too it is 'a freely chosen change arising out of the fullness of its powers, in order to form what is below it',[256] in which it draws profit even from the unpleasant experiences it has brought about and becomes conscious of many things that it would not otherwise have recognised as possibilities in its own beings;[257] (iii) that the All suffers no diminution even when contemplated in relation to this 'falling away'. That which has fallen away is indeed far from the source of things, but 'that too is till a miracle (θαῦμα)'.[258]

---

[248] Cf. Plotinus' dialogue with himself in V.7, 'Whether there are ideas of individuals'. The question is answered in the affirmative, since, in particular, 'differentiation can mean a diversity of beauty' (V.7.2). 'We must not think that the plurality of souls exist because of the quantitative extension of bodies; prior to bodily existence, both the plurality and the unity of souls existed (VI.4.4, cf. IV.3.8).

[249] Hence the question as to whether the individual souls formed the physical world along with the World Soul (although they were not conscious of it) is answered affirmatively but with the qualification that they did and do so only in so far as they are united with the World Soul and remain at one, and have not sunk down to the level of their own separate individual wills (V.1.2, cf. IV.3.6).

[250] IV.3.9.

[251] VI.4.14.

[252] VI.4.15, IV.3.17.

[253] See the whole of IV.8, 'The soul's descent into the world of bodies.'

[254] I.8, 'Whence comes evil?' (esp. 4).

[255] IV.8.7.

[256] IV.8.5. This is at once interpreted as a creative-erotic impulse; ibid. 6.

This depends on the fact that in the All there prevails a just order, a distributive justice, that preserves harmonious balance—a 'providence' that is not an external tribunal but more significantly and interiorly a universal Logos.[259] However Plotinus may seek to resolve the issues of death, suffering and poverty, the sufferings of the righteous, anguish and guilt,[260] he never entertains the least doubt as to the total harmony of the divine cosmos. If we wish to talk of a 'descent' or a 'fall', we must always set over against this the reverse side of the descent which is the drive upwards of what is lower in the scale of being.[261] In any event, the divine energies are not weakened by their outpourings and at the highest level the capacity for generating the forms of multiplicity disappears.[262] The great tractate entitled 'On the Truly Existent: whether it can be one and the same with itself, while being everywhere, as totality', is careful not to give the impression that there are gradations of distance between the divine hypostases—the One, Intellect, Soul; 'we are not at a distance from the truly existent, we are within it/him, and he is not distant from us'.[263] At the heart of each hypostasis is the reality next above it, so that they all share a single centre and focus. And if we still speak of distance, diastasis, it is only relative to those distinct, warring portions of the whole that are, nonetheless, eternally comprehended and reconciled in the plan of the whole[264]—just as if a single general were in charge of the disposal of both forces in a conflict.[265] Even the fall of the souls below their proper level has something of this Logos-related character; they 'do not go forth by compulsion, nor by constraint', but as naturally 'as children leap for joy or as men are drawn by sexual desire'.[266] From the point of view of 'Logos', the whole notion of 'fate' is, as it were, neutralised; and even if it is true, as the Timaeus says, that everything is formed from nous and anagkê,[267] since God must go forth from himself into the totality of the world and the 'nothingness' of matter, nonetheless 'nous triumphs over anagkê'[268] so completely that the world presents to us a perfect drama with opposed yet ultimately, in the light of the whole structure, harmonious roles devised by the divine reason itself.[269]

---

[257] Ibid. 5.

[258] III.3.3.

[259] Cf. the whole of III.2 and 3, 'On Providence', esp. III.2.14.

[260] These questions preoccupied Plotinus above all at the end of his life, as his thinking drew closer and closer to the realities of life and struggled harder with them. The solutions he proposed take on board many features of Stoicism, but remain, sadly, unsatisfactory. However, he was faithful to the end to the vision of divine harmony in the cosmos, however muted his arguments may sound. Thus in I.4, 'On Happiness' and III.2–3, 'On Providence', death appears as an act of divine mercy, which releases the sufferer from his or her bonds—though admittedly in such a fashion that re-embodiment in an eternal world and an eternal cycle of reality follows.

[261] VI.4.12, IV.3.6.

[262] VI.5.8.

But does this mean that this drama must be played out, that God must emerge from his unapproachable mystery in this multiplicity of Intellect and Soul? What does 'must' mean when applied to the Absolute? In no sense can it mean some kind of necessity or requirement, 'for what is entirely simple and truly self-sufficient is wholly a stranger to necessity', even necessity 'arising from its own self' (as is subsequently the case with Intellect).[270] Enneads VI.8 (39) raises the question of 'the freedom and the will of the One'[271]: do these concepts permit of application to the One? As far as God's essence is concerned they are as little applicable as the idea of an external 'must'. 'God does not 'happen' to be, but must be, and this necessity of being is the root and principle of all other necessity . . . Or, better, God is not that which he 'must' be; for all other things must wait to find out under what form the King will show himself to them. For that which he is he himself establishes, and so appears not as one who rules by chance or contingency but as truly and essentially King and true Principle, as the Good-in-itself, not as one that acts according to the good'.[272] Everything depends on our following through the convergence of what in the 'world' (and even in the highest level of Intellect) we know as reason and (free) will towards an unattainable vanishing-point in the Absolute. God, in himself and in his sharing of himself, is 'beyond-reason' but he is no less 'beyond-will': 'an almighty power potentiated of itself, that which is what it wills to be, or rather which leaves will itself behind among existent things, being itself higher than all willing, with willing inferior to it.[273] So the necessity of God's being is simply the expression of his perfection, since it is the highest freedom to be, incapable of increasing or bettering itself (which is what such freedom otherwise does). Thus he is 'overflowing potency' (ὑπερβολή τῆς δυνάμεως) and, as such, he is both his own 'necessity' and the law of all other beings.[274]

---

[263] VI.5.1.

[264] III.2.2.

[265] III.3.2.

[266] IV.3.13.

[267] Tim. 48A, 1.8.7, and also III.2.2.

[268] In the same passage of the Timaeus.

[269] III.2.15–18.

[270] V.3.13.

[271] On the correct understanding of this treatise, see Bréhier's note in volume 7 of his edition, 119–132.

The lordship of the Absolute is now firmly established and it becomes possible to understand its 'manifestation' in the universe as the epiphany of its own inner necessity (rationality) or, on the other hand, as that of its unconditionedness (freedom): both are saying the same thing. God is 'lord over himself',[275] 'choosing himself and willing himself',[276] 'loving himself',[277] and so also 'subject neither to any substance nor to himself, but rather the ground of all substantiality'[278] and thus 'wholly free activity' (ἐνέργεια καθαρῶς ἐλευθέρα),[279] indeed 'that which lies above and beyond all and which alone is only free'.[280] What must always be said of Intellect and Soul is pre-eminently true here: 'The primal ground of things has no need of the things that come after it'.[281] But if all beings down to the very lowest possess in their nature the power of generation that corresponds to the desire to share that nature by diffusing it, how can the 'inexhaustible potency', 'the primal source of all being' be lacking in this 'obligation'?[282] It is, then, an 'eternally resourceful infinity, never tiring and never emptied out, never exhausted existence that is in itself brimming over, so to speak, with life.'[283] As 'the primordial energy of all things', it is 'a wellspring that has no source but itself, sharing itself with all rivers, yet never exhausted in this giving but remaining at rest in the streaming forth; while the floods coming forth from it are mingled with one another in their beginning; yet for all that, they already know along which channel among them their own waters will flow.'[284]

---

[272] VI.8.9.

[273] VI.8.9.

[274] Ibid. 10. Plotinus develops this intuition of the character of the Absolute as beyond both necessity and freedom, starting from the problem of the potential being as a 'world', in twelve arguments, extending from VI.8.13 to VI.8.18.

[275] κύριος ἑαυτοῦ, ibid. 15.

The image of the brimming wellspring or the sun[285] can be readily applied but always with the qualifying οἷον, 'as it were'. It can also be negated: at any rate, the beings that proceed from God are not powers 'radiating' from him[286]—since the Good which radiates and overflows remains throughout integral in itself; and God is present in and to these things in such a way 'that he in no way needs to pour himself forth', or, 'while remaining in himself as the Whole', to have 'another reality, proceeding from his own yet distinct from it' (rather like what the Gnostics meant by Sophia).[287] Rather the primal source of all things remains unshakably the same in and with itself, as 'King of kings and father of the gods',[288] and the totality of the cosmos is its 'throne[289] (this 'throne', for Plotinus, constitutes the ultimate essence of beauty).[290] As the One, it is so royally solitary that it has nothing over against its pure singularity; it is so 'wholly other' that it can be called 'not-other' (as Nicholas of Cusa, like Plotinus, was to term it).[291] But for just this reason, the One is not separated from anything: because God is the absolutely transcendent, therefore he can be the absolutely immanent in all things. Thus Plotinus does reject not only the utter 'beyondness' of Aristotle's God, reposing in himself, but also the Platonic χωρισμός[292]—though without thereby committing himself to Stoic pantheism (by which he is even less impressed). And once the divine transcendence is secured, he is able to expound God's immanence in terms of his self-unfolding, explicatio: 'just as the One cannot exist alone—otherwise everything would remain just as buried and obscure since the One would have no form . . . so too the Soul cannot exist alone, without that being manifested which comes into being because of it. Within each being there dwells the urge to bring forth what ranks next after it and so to unfold itself, to advance toward the goal of sense-perceptible manifestation as though from a seed within an imparticipable source. Yet in this movement the higher level abides always in its own place and as it were gives birth to the lower level by virtue of its superabundant power, whose fullness it carries within itself, and which it cannot hold back within the bounds of jealous miserliness; for it must for ever advance until the entirety of reality has reached the last level possible, . . . for nothing can prevent any and everything, according to its own capacity, coming to have a share in the being of the Good.'[293]

---

[276] τὴν αἷρεσιν καὶ τὴν αὐτοῦ θέλησιν, ibid. 13.

[277] ἑαυτὸν ἀγαπήσας, ibid. 16.

[278] Ibid. 19.

[279] Ibid. 20.

[280] Ibid. 21.

[281] VI.9.6.

[282] V.3.15.

[283] VI.5.12.

[284] III.8.10.

[285] V.3.12.

[286] Cf. the comprehensive defence of the idea in VI.4.9–10.

---

[287] VI.5.3.

[288] V.5.3.

[289] Ibid.

[290] I.6.2.

[291] VI.9.8. Only matter, in its ultimate opposition to God, can be called wholly other: II.4.13.

[292] VI.5.8.

So it is that, at the end of the classical period, a theological ontology is at last arrived at which provides definitive formal structure for the subsequent development of Western thought. The formal element of this conception of transcendence and immanence continues, as such, to hold good, even when the Christian revelation fills that form with an entirely new content. In this context, the divine freedom is not only the conclusion of an inductive argument from the world to some supereminent limit concept but makes itself known in a hitherto undreamt of manner. While the movement outward of the royal majesty of God in the Old Covenant-glory that can now indeed definitively be called the glory of the Lord—causes the dimension of immanence to recede for the moment, this latter emerges fully in the encounter between the New Testament (and its proclamation of the Holy Spirit) and Greek ontology. In relation to the biblical revelation, the concept of Creation is truly able to come into the light for the first time, with the experience of God's freedom through his historical action. This concept is already[294] very thoroughly signalled in advance, as far as its formal problematic is concerned, in Plotinus' scheme, and can take on board in many ways the stimulus, and the warnings too, that can be found there—even when its new content is joined on to this schematic structure. Here we may grasp how Plotinus, in a similar position to that of Vergil, is an unrepeatable moment, a kairos of human thought in the mode of Advent expectation, which gives decisive direction to the philosophy of the Christian era.

b. The Defining of the European Mind

The expectancy in which Plotinus holds himself and the firm direction in which he sets himself become clear when we consider his doctrine of Intellect (nous). Intellect is the essential act of pure thinking, understood as separable from 'accidental' thinking (the life of Soul) as a higher limit-concept (intellectus archetypus); as such it must be thought of as the precondition for all derivative modes of thinking. Pure thinking as a unity-in-duality (ἓν πολλά)[295] the tension between noêsis and noêma which eternally reaches conclusion or resolution in identity through the act of thought (ἐνέργεια). There is an unsurpassable priority of object over subject: the latter 'contemplates' (not 'constructs'), and the prior reality that is contemplated is the form, εἶδος.[296] Yet what is thought cannot exist outside thinking and in this sense be prior to it (this holds only for sense-perception); 'rather Intellect is itself its own objects . . . it is identical with them'.[297] But as thought it establishes itself on the basis of what is thought, 'it finds security in forms'.[298] In Intellect there is a movement (κίνησις) of self-seeking, so as to discover itself eternally in the object, to return to itself by this route and achieve rest (στάσις) thereby.[299] In Intellect's act of seeing there is an element of Sehnsucht, of yearning: ἔφεσις γὰρ ὄψεως ὅρασις.[300] Thus the act of thinking in its ἐνέργεια is also erôs,[301] but an erôs that always possesses and embraces its object in pure thinking and so, qua yearning, is set at rest. This is why Plotinus calls Intellect that which needs only itself, in distinction from the One which does not 'need' even itself.[302] But again, the form that is thought exists purely in so far as it is thought; it has its actuality, its effective and operative reality (ἐνέργεια) in thinking, so that the ἔνεργεια of subject and object is identical—or, in other words, thinking and existing are one and the same.[303] But since pure reason is always 'in act', and therefore henceforth is what it perceives:[304] so too being is always actual, and indeed is so in its totality, which includes the sum of all its differentiations into individual forms. In pure thought and being, every potential (which is present there as the ground of duality) is always already actual.[305]

---

[293] IV.8.6.

[294] 'Already' although Plotinus lived after Christ, his ontology is still independent of the Christian variety; he is following through to the end the lines of spiritual insight developed in classical Greek philosophy.

---

[295] V.3.15.

[296] III.3.1.

[297] V.4.2.

[298] VI.9.3.

[299] V.6.5.

[300] Ibid.; cf. V.3.10, ἔφεσις . . . ἀτύπτως ὄψις.

[301] V.3.10.

[302] V.3.13.

[303] V.9.8.

There is, then, a complete reciprocity between thinking and being which yet never does away with this always presupposed and always transcended otherness (the Platonic heterotês).[306] 'In so far as [the One] thinks, it makes itself Two, or, better, because it thinks it is Two, and because what it thinks is itself it is One'.[307] To the extent that we have to do here with the primordial 'mutuality of sameness and otherness', each individual object of thinking (as identical with itself, yet limited as much by the thinking subject as by those objects of thought that are 'other' to it) will itself possess this mutuality.[308] Plotinus constantly uses the example of science, built up from countless individual propositions, yet constituting only one coherent ('sy-stematic') and simple truth in the intellect of the knower.[309] In this doctrine of the duality-in-unity of thinking and being, Plotinus seeks to comprehend in his vision the whole overcrowded sum of the philosophical tradition: Plato's world of ideas comes into its own but so too do Parmenides, 'to the extent that he makes being and intellect coincide', Heraclitus, Empedocles and, finally, Aristotle.[310] What is in view is a form of objective idealism, or 'ideal-realism', which grounds all being in its logical nature, its primordial character as that which is thought by archetypal Intellect.[311]

But now the question is how this duality-in-unity is related to pure and absolute unity. Of decisive importance here is

---

[304] III.6.2.

[305] II.5.3.

[306] 'Differentiation is what makes possible the thinking subject and the thought object', V.1.4.

[307] V.6.1.

[308] V.3.10.

[309] V.9.8; IV.9.5, III.9.11; VI.4.16; VI.5.7.

[310] V.1.8–9.

[311] V.6.6.

Plontius' doctrine that the uniquely intended, sought and striven for object of Intellect what it strains towards in all its thinking, is the One itself,[312] which, however, can never be an 'other' to thought, an object since it remains always essentially not 'the other'. But how does thinking Intellect come to be other than the One in the first place? At this point the word τολμᾶν or τόλμα comes up again and again[313]—risk, 'venturing oneself', perhaps 'inquisitive presumption': in any event, the desire to know what God is. And the journey, the κίνησις, of reason through all the forms of being and conceptuality is the—fruitless?—journey in search of the knowledge of God. All that it encounters, time and again, is existent reality (ὄν) which means determinate reality, though this does not imply limitation for Plotinus. Being, however, especially in so far as it encounters thinking, is form: the concepts of οὐσία and εἶδος or μορφή are coextensive.[314] 'Being (οὐσία) that is derived [from the One] is perceptible form (εἶδος), and one can say that nothing other than form can spring from such a source. But this is not the form of any particular thing but form in general, which leaves no individual form outside its scope. But that One is necessarily form*less*, and because formless so too without the character of being—which must always involve 'being something or other' (τόδε τι) and so must be circumscribed (ὡρισμένον)'.[315] Plotinus' aesthetic is founded on this statement: all being is beautiful because it is form, in its encounter with Intellect. The One is beyond being and Intellect and Form and Beauty, as their common source. On the other hand, the 'form' of being is in no way the individual form of specific things, and can in this sense itself be called 'formless' (ἄμορφον), 'although it has form from other points of view',[316] i.e. as object of Intellect. Accordingly both Intellect and being are secondary, a reflection from the point of origin that lies beyond and prior to their duality—which is as such the 'place' of what is 'formed', of the beautiful, of knowledge and love. Intellect and being are thus boundless and infinite in their inextricable mutuality: this healthy and fruitful ἄπειρον in the celestial world (not only in the material sphere) is, for Plotinus, a participation in the One, a direct reflection of God and his power.[317] Also, Plotinus, in expressing the nature of this 'good infinity' as thoroughly as he can, does not shrink from postulating a 'spiritual materiality' in the realm of eternal Intellect and being—something obscure in itself, it is true, but for ever perfectly illumined, perfectly actualised, awakened to definite and substantial life;[318] for every form presupposes something that has been formed.[319] This 'material' character belongs naturally not only to the noêma, but just as much also to noêsis, since Intellect in proceeding forth into the act of knowing is itself empty, the capacity for that cognitive form that it will encounter (intellectus possibilis or passibilis, quodammodo omnia, tabula rasa, as St Thomas would put it). That is why the comparison between matter and intellect is perfectly possible.[320] [313] V.1.1. Here 'presumption' or 'curiosity' is depicted as 'an entry into the realm of becoming, a primordial differentiatin and the will to belong to oneself'. On bold presumption (τολμηρότατον μέρος of the lower part of the soul, which draws itdown into the material, see V.2.2; and in VI.9.5 we read of the presumptious daring (τολμήσας) of spirit, standing aside from the One so as to marvel at it as a θαῦμα.

---

[312] V.4.2.

[314] V.1.7.

[315] V.5.6.

But now we can no longer avoid the question of whether Intellect has found what it has been seeking if, in its endless journey through the noêmata in search of the One, it always returns, in the same moment as it moves outward, to the identity of an encounter with itself. If thought (and thus too reason, nous) is and remains secondary, then surely it must transcend itself; but if we designate this transcending movement as the erôs which sets thought in motion, is this erôs more than thinking or simply its inner dynamic? and is the Plotinian nous then a 'blessed god' in its repeatedly depicted identity with being, or does it belong with what is no longer divine, whose movement towards the One is never more than unfulfilled yearning, until the One itself satisfies it? Inquietum cor, donec requiescat in te: so Augustine was to translate Plotinian erôs into Christian desiderium. Plotinus wants to hold on to both aspects at the same time in his philosophy: he expressly defined heavenly erôs as an eternal quest,[321] which is also immediately an eternal discovery. Movement and rest coincide here; Intellect, endlessly moved in itself (since it returns upon itself in all its eternal going-forth through the whole of being and its separate phenomena), is yet overall eternal repose as well.[322] 'Its thinking is not seeking but possessing; its bliss is not something arrived at but it is eternally all things; it is itself authentic eternity'.[323] So there is nothing it lacks; it possesses in its infinite cycle of activity what it has constantly been seeking—the One. It is 'heaven', 'the epiphany of God'.

---

[316] VI.7.32.

[317] II.4.15.

[318] II.4.5, II.5.2–3.

[319] Ibid. 4.

[320] In III.6.18, Plotinus compares the soul with the lower level of solid matter, in which, naturally, differentiation becomes far wider as the last traces of spontaneity and inner form fall away.

It is a rare and strange fate for a thinker both to draw together and bring to conclusion the themes of Antiquity and to open up the realm of Western philosophy: it means being compelled to put side by side the fulfilled and the unfulfilled, the joy of discovery and the torment of searching. Thought indeed thinks the whole of being in a cyclical motion that is open but cannot be transcended, for just as being only exists in being thought, so thought exists only in encountering existent reality, and comes to its own reality through what is thought: both share a single energeia.[324] But in this cyclical motion what occurs is that thought always encounters only οὐσία, i.e. determinate, intelligible being that has already found logical form. So it eternally finds only itself. But if this self-encounter is what Intellect is, and if Intellect is God and God is Intellect, then it is not evident why the One, which Intellect seeks in its going-forth, can and must be something other than the depths of Intellect (or being) itself, that which is presupposed as the origin of that going-forth and the goal of that return upon itself. Why should we not once and for all interpret Plotinus in a Hegelian direction and dismiss and discard all other aspects of his teaching as relics of a bygone epoch—a mythical form of thought that expects revelation from God, or, better, a vocabulary derived from the (Egyptian) mysteries that has already been historicised and aestheticised, since neither Plotinus nor anyone in his age seriously believed in such mysteries any longer?[325] Only in this way, it seems, can we give any consistency to his thought: nous, which possesses the One in its own depths, then becomes the a priori of all acts of knowing in the cosmos (the World-Soul) and the human sphere (the individual soul). All discursive reason is still thought of as comprehended in and made possible by an absolute, 'divine' reality, in which all self-alienating going-forth is always already a return to itself, all understanding of facts is self-understanding, all seeking is finding.

---

[321] Cf. the whole of III.5 on erôs and its subdivision into human, daimonic and divine. Heavenly erôs is a 'mediator between the one who longs and what is longed for, the eye of yearning that makes the lover, by its power, able to behold what is loved, though it is there beforehand and, even before it bestows the capacity of vision, it is itself sated with what it beholds'. Erôs thus becomes an eye fulfilled in seeing and a seeing that already carries its image within itself (III.5.2, III.5.3). Over against heavenly erôs stands the lower, daimonic variety, by nature incapable of fulfilment, as it constantly struggles and turns about to its goal (III.5.7).

[322] 'Intellect abides in stillness and yet moves about its own self' (II.2.3).

[323] V.1.4.

[324] V.9.8 : Μία οὖν ἀμφοῖν ἐνέργεια.

There is undoubtedly much in Plotinus that gives coutenance to such a radicalising reading in terms of modern thought—not least his notion that all being is 'form': why should this not be taken in the Kantian sense? 'Being' then becomes what is logically intelligible to Intellect, what objectifies Intellect; beyond this may lie postulates but nothing that can be objectified as having existence—or even nothing at all, as Hegel rightly concluded, if Intellect, as it returns upon itself, can leave nothing beyond or outside its own synthetic identity. What sort of 'revelation' can it then expect? Whence can it come except out of the depths of Intellect itself? But Intellect and being are always there, always present already παρεῖναι, παρουσία, συνεῖναι;[326] they are always manifest to anyone with eyes to see, coming forth, indeed, from the place of eternal beauty. All that is needed, therefore, to encounter the unsurpassable glory is the right way of looking, with open eyes, the theoria which breaks through from the depths of Intellect or being. This is the path which modern philosophical aesthetics will follow, in so far as they mark themselves off from theological aesthetics, which by now has a sharper and more distinctive profile. In Plotinus the anti-Gnostic and perhaps to some extend anti-Christian affirmation of the world as the best it could be, the loveliest, the most divine, the affirmation outlined at the beginning of his work,[327] points towards this differentiation, as does, above all, the relentless reduction of all the activities of life and spirit to theoria.[328] All activity (ποίησις) happens for the sake of contemplation, even indeed in sub-spiritual nature, where the logoi (rationes seminales) are what act and direct, where phusis is a (slumbering) soul which, remaining in itself, organises the material that surrounds it. Plotinus is here developing a fundamental feature of his teaching, the unity of energia as actus (substantialis) and as actio (ad extra et infra). The stronger the inner act of a substance, considered as its active 'possession of itself', the more powerfully its energeia radiates out from it beyond itself.[329] Thus nothing is more productive than contemplation; action is only its radiation outward.[330] So too the logos within Intellect is eternally the precondition for the 'word' of meaning that proceeds outward (λόγος ἐν προσφορᾷ);[331] and Plotinus can never sufficiently stress how silently and secretly and self-concentratedly all real action and creation goes on. It is not a matter of hearing but of seeing;[332] the word is secondary, a necessary expedient,[333] and Intellect 'brings forth its work in silence, so that creation is effortless'.[334] 'Silently and without being moved Intellect has shaped all things'.[335] Theoria is the twofold activity of, on the one hand, a total absorbtion in the perception of being as noêma, so fully surrendered to what it beholds that the beholder forgets himself in what is beheld, and is 'lost' in the intensity of the vision,[336]—and yet, on the other, also of a return to oneself, an encountering oneself in the object.[337] For the inner reality that stirs us is unknown to us—like a man who catches sight of his own reflection, and reaches out in search of it, not knowing where it comes from'.[338] Ultimately, the goal is for the seer to become the seen,[339] like those heavenly images of the gods that contemplate themselves.[340] Everything, even thought proceeding towards the world of sense, has this reflection or return (ἐπιστροφή) or self-relatedness at its foundation;[341] at the basis of soul lies the reflexivity of nous, and thus the soul, to the degree that it turns back to its origin in nous, finds itself,[342] like Intellect when it strives upwards towards the One, 'attaining not to another but to itself'.[343] 'All this is one, nous, noêsis, noêton'.[344] This leaves nothing except the One in its moment of eternal self-identity to define what Intellect stretches out towards: God is nothing other than the 'inner depth' of things,[345] the centre of that circle whose periphery they consitute,[346] the source to which they are the stream, the light of which they are the radiance, the root of which they are the branches,[347] so that they come at last to the realisation of their own divine nature—θεόν γενόμενον, μᾶλλον δὲ ὄντα.[348] Plotinus—otherwise a stranger to the historical dimension—here adopts an eschatological idiom. 'Why does the soul not remain there above? Because it has not yet wholly won free. But the time will come when we shall behold without interruption, with no more interference from the flesh'.[349] 'All is not yet one; but it will one day be so'.[350] However, the motif of the soul's self-contemplation, beholding with wonder its inner divine glory (a theme translated into Christian terms by Gregory of Nyssa)[351] is depicted lovingly by Plotinus.[352] [325] Thus, for example, Bréhier; cf. his note in vol. V. 85ff.

---

---

[326] VI.9.4, VI.9.7, and esp. V.5.8, where God's 'future' is described, a 'future' for which everything is always ready without qualifications at hand. 'It does not 'come', or it 'comes' without coming; it appears, although it does not come, for it is already there before all things, before the future known to intellect'.

[327] II.9.8f.

[328] See, on this, the whole of III.8, 'On nature, contemplation and the One.'

[329] IV.3.10, IV.5.7.

[330] III.8.5.

[331] V.1.3.

---

[332] V.5.6.

[333] III.8.6.

[334] V.8.7, cf. III.8.6.

[335] III.2.2.

[336] I.4.10.

[337] Self-knowledge is a divine ordinance, so that we are bound to enquire about the nature of enquiry (IV.3.1).

[338] V.8.2. Elsewhere the image of Narcissus is used pejoratively: I. 6.8.

[339] V.8.11.

[340] Ibid. 4.

[341] Volkmann-Schluck, op. cit. 82; V.3.6.

[342] V.3.7.

[343] VI.9.11; cf. V.3.4–5.

[344] V.3.5.

[345] VI.8.18.

Yet if we go further than these themes (which point us again to Hegel) we do Plotinus a manifest injustice. Although the centres of Soul, Intellect and One coincide for him, this does not lead to an abolition of their hierarchy. The modern conclusion that the ultimate synthesis is achieved at the level of intellect is bound to degrade the One to the level of a function of nous, a moment within it, for the sake of this conclusion. The philosophy of absolute Spirit thus becomes ultimate; and, correspondingly, the aesthetic of a proportion between noēsis and noēma, seen from the level of Soul, is at best an aesthetic of the 'Sublime', the elevation of the spiritually 'noumenal' soul above its sensible 'phenomenal' substrate—the aesthetic developed in German Idealism from Kant to Schiller and Schiller to Hegel. But the crown of the whole of Plotinus' philosophy is the difference posited between the levels of Intellect and One, however paradoxical, indeed 'mythical', this differentiation may seem to the philosopher. It is in fact a theological point, though in a sense hard to pin down. What is in view is in no way a divine self-manifestation comparable to what is found in mythology but a manifestation that breaks forth from the central depth of being itself, in the sense explained in the first volume of this work.[353] Understood thus, the 'glory' that breaks out is that of being itself, or, more precisely, as Plotinus draws careful boundaries here, it is the 'glory' that breaks into the sphere of Intellect and being from what is above being and bestows on it its absolute and transcendental beauty. But it is just this lifting of the vision above the level of being that gives this radiating-outward of beauty a more than philosophical character and makes it specifically theological; and this is just what is completely lost sight of in modern idealistic interpretations.[354] The division of absolute being into two spheres, one wholly rational, the other, as a result, emphatically irrational was clearly, for Plotinus, the only way to bring philosophical attention to bear on the descent of inbreaking glory without falling into gnostic mythology. This 'descent' alone permitted him to follow though in a consistent way his aesthetics as an aesthetics of 'glory', a non-biblical but theological aesthetics which cannot be captured in the categories of modern idealism. It was his Greek heritage that made this possible, that vision which since the earliest ages of myth had been able to view being as a divine epiphany. When this 'sun-like eye' (Goethe's phraseology, is as well-known, stems from Plotinus)[355] later loses its power of vision, the responsibility of reawakening the sight of the blind falls to those to whom it is given to see the glory of God in flesh: to the Christians. On them is the task laid of finding God in all things.

---

[346] Ibid

[347] VI.9.9

[348] Ibid.

[349] Ibid. 10.

[350] V.2.1.

[351] Cf. my book Présence et Pensée.

[352] I.6.6; ibid. 9; V.9.2, IV.7.10.

[353] Vol.1, p. 145: 'The formal object of theology . . . lies at the very heart of the formal object of philosophy . . . Out of those mysterious depths the formal object of theology breaaks forth as the self-revelation of the mystery of Being itself.'

[354] It turns up, undeniably, for a brief moment in Fichte and the later Schelling, but what is decisive for these writers is still Hegel's scheme, especially in a generally materialistic climate of thought.

[355] ὀφθαλμὸς ἡλιοειδής, I.6.9. What this means is that the eye possesses light within itself, which then streams out to encounter what is outside. Cf. IV.5.7; for the literature, see the note in Harder's edition, vol. 1, p. 382.

c. The Beautiful and the More-than-Beautiful

The real Plotinus never rested content with speculation in the modern sense. Throughout his life he was to stand speechless before the miracle of being that transcends all reason. That there is something, that what is is a world of such immense wonder, this is for him the clearest possible revelation of the source lying behind all things, the groundlessly self-giving Good. 'Where is the one who has brought forth such beauty, such boundless life? Where is the Father of being to be found? You see that beauty which is poured out over all manifest forms . . . but whence do these intelligible forms come? Whence comes their beauty? Their origin cannot be any one among them . . . It must be what is formless, not lacking in form, but the source from which all intellectual form comes . . . And since it was able to create all things, what magnitude will it possess?'[356] So we find it casually remarked that 'The fact that the First exists is evident from what exists after it; to enquire after its foundation means to look for some foundation other than itself; but the primal foundation has no foundation'.[357] Thus, 'Whoever knows himself, knows also whence he has his origin'.[358] This is how the name 'Father' is used here. The greatness of the Father may be judged from the nature of the world, the 'Son'.[359] The 'Son' is what is generative, what possesses the will to share itself, what has bestowed on all things something of the Father's power.[360] In itself it has need of nothing,[361] it is 'the more-than-good which is good only in respect of others, not for its own sake',[362] and in which, therefore, all things are contained and hidden.[363]

[356] VI.7.32.

[357] VI.8.11. On Plotinus' aesthetics, see the extensive bibliographies in E. de Kayser, La signification de l'Art dans les Ennéades de Plotin, 1955, and F. Bourbon de Petrella, Il problema dell'arte e della belezza in Plotina, 1956.

[358] VI.9.7.

[359] V.8.12.

[360] V.4.1.

[361] VI.9.6.

[362] Ibid.

[363] V.5.9.

The reverent and wondering tone of what Plotinus says is no mere literary drapery but the expression of an immediate sensation. The intellect perceives beyond its own being something marvellous, a θαῦμα,[364] something sublimely worthy of veneration, σεμνόν,[365] something at whose 'blinding light' we can as little stare as we can at the sun's brightness;[366] 'amazed dread (θάμβος) seizes whoever beholds this'.[367] It is something that cannot be accommodated in any concept, still less in any utterance, something that is ἄρρητον and nameless; at best, it can only be hinted at.[368] It is something of which we become 'capable' only in so far as we leave everything behind—ἄφελε πάντα[369] forsaking our very selves,[370] 'letting go' even of God, ἀυτὸν ἔα.[371] It is not we who lay hold on it; it lays hold upon us.[372] If you try to seize him, he escapes you; and, still more, you escape him'.[373] Faute de mieux, we may call it or him the One, but not in the sense of a mathematical unit or of a single individual substance:[374] 'we are talking about what cannot be talked about[375] and all our images get no further than the forecourt of the temple. We must again return to the language of the adyton,[376] the pure and endless power of all (δύναμις πάντων),[377] the apeiron, the unlimited sphere of ungraspable plenitude: 'for if you think in terms of Intellect or God, it is not enough'.[378] 'We may express what That One is not; what it is, we do not say. What, then, we say about it derives from those things that are posterior to it . . . Just as those inspired of God or possessed know enough to be sure that they bear something greater within themselves, even if they do not know what it is, so we shall not be held back from possessing it even when we cannot express what it is'.[379] To ascribe to it thinking, reflecting and choosing seems questionable for Plotinus, as these things are adequate descriptions only of nous.[380] How this affects the concept of providence has already been indicated.

---

[364] VI.9.5; III.8.10.
[365] III.8.9.
[366] V.8.10.
[367] III.8.11.
[368] V.3.13.
[369] Ibid. 17; VI.8.21.
[370] III.8.9.
[371] VI.8.18.
[372] V.5.9.
[373] Ibid. 10.
[374] V.9.5; ibid. 4.
[375] V.5.5.
[376] VI.9.11.
[377] V.3.15, V.4.2.
[378] VI.9.6.

But it is impossible to have things that have come into being without there being a primal source. However ungraspable and unknowable it is, it remains the one thing necessary. We are pressed in this direction on the basis of all that the knowing, desiring, and wondering at worldly truth, goodness and beauty actually mean. The One 'abides in itself and enters into no other; but all other things depend upon it, just as they all, through their yearning, have found where it is. This is that erôs 'that waits at the door' (Symp. 203c), always coming from outside into the presence of the beautiful and striving after it, content if it may thus have some share in it. Yet even here, the lover still living on the earth possesses this beauty only in such a way that he cannot cling to it as his own but only stands on its frontiers . . . For this very reason, because that One abides in itself, it suffices for all things'.[381] The ascent of the nous towards identity is indeed profitable for knowledge of the One; and yet again, it is also useless: 'We may learn, thanks to Intellect, the existence of that which is beyond Intellect; but to know it, to know how it is constituted, we must leave Intellect behind'.[382] To attain to the One is only possible when we are 'caught up' (ἀρπασθείς) into the 'desert place' (ἐν ἐρήμῳ),[383] in an 'upward leap' (ἀῖξαι),[384] in a 'dreadful yearning' that freely cuts loose from all the forms of seeing and conceiving, so as 'alone to encounter the Alone'.[385] 'Suppose it happened that the soul was fortunate enough to have the One come to it or, rather, to reveal Its presence to the soul once it has turned away from the things around it and made itself ready, as beautiful and as like to It as possible . . .: then it may befall that it suddenly (ἐξάιφνης) sees It appear; and nothing lies between them, they are no longer two but one, there is no more distinction so long as It remains there (the earthly lover and beloved who long to merge into one another are an image of all this); the soul is no more conscious of the flesh . . . it no longer beholds itself but only What it has found. It would not change this state for anything, even if it were promised the very vault of heaven entire, for it knows well that there is nothing better, nothing to be preferred. It can ascend no higher; everything else, no matter how exalted, would force it downward again . . . No error is possible for it there: how could there be anything more true than Truth itself?'[386]

---

[379] V.3.14.

[380] III.9.9. but cf. V.17, where 'a kind of self-awareness of his own capacity' is ascribed to God! On the other hand, there is no question of God 'remaining-in-himself so as to guard the purity of his unity' (VI.9.6). Cf. the whole of V.6, 'That what is beyond being does not have intellection.'

[381] VI.5.10.

[382] V.5.6.

[383] VI.9.11.

[384] V.5.4.

This union is indeed dressed in the language of 'enthusiasm' (ἀναβακχεύω,[387] ἐνθουσιάω);[388] but more important is the language of love which, as is evident, distinguishes sharply between heavenly and earthly erôs, and portrays love for the divine One in terms of chaste reticence. Turning away from God, losing oneself among other things, is for Plotinus infidelity, whoredom![389] though he calls God Father rather than bridegroom. The soul that has gone astray and that 'perceives its own disgrace, purifies itself from what is earthly, and sets itself again on the road that leads to the Father, that soul finds where its good lies'.[390] At most, we hear of a 'touching',[391] but one in which 'we lay hold of that One with our whole self, and there is no part in us with which we do not touch God'.[392]

---

[385] VI.7.34. This famous dictum already appears in Plotinus' earliest work (1.6.7) as well as in V.1.6; Porphyry in his arrangement of the Enneads makes it Plotinus' last word (VI.9.11).

[386] VI.7.34.

[387] I.6.5, VI.7.22.

[388] V.3.14, VI.9.11.

[389] VI.9.9.

[390] Ibid.

[391] ἐφάψασθαι, θιγεῖν, VI.9.4; ἐπαφή, ibid. 7 and 9, I.2.6; θίξις καὶ οἷον ἐπαφή μόνον (!) ἄρρητος, V.3.10, ibid. 17.

What such yearning seeks after, what no name suffices for, is haltingly described (following Plato) as κάλλος ἀμήχανον, 'indescribable', a strange and terrible beauty that leaves us 'disarmed and helpless and utterly wretched',[393] and ultimately as 'more-than-beauty' (ὑπέρκαλος)[394] as 'excess of beauty' (περιουσία τοῦ κάλλους).[395] These words are not (as in later Neoplatonism) exalted expressions that can be used at will, but rarely employed utterances, carefully and exactly pondered, which, taken together, give shape to the fundamental stance of the Plotinian aesthetic. It is constantly repeated that the One is exalted over all beauty (which has its proper place in the duality-in-unity of nous). The One 'does not deign to be beautiful';[396] if the Beautiful makes us weak with longing, stirs us and kindles desire in us, the Good is already present long before; love for the Good is innate in us, present even in sleep and we are so accustomed to it that we fail to notice it.[397] The Beautiful is more in evidence but also more dangerous; it can torment us and even draw us away from the Good without our noticing, as the lover lures the girl from her father's house.[398] 'The Beautiful is the object of astonishment, but the Good is the object of striving—or rather, whoever has not yet beheld the One strives towards it as the Good; but whoever has caught sight of it and is granted to wonder at its loveliness, is filled with joyful amazement, with a terror that is without pain and loves this true Love and sets at nought the torments of desire that belong to all other loves, spurning all that once seemed fair. So it is with those to whom there comes a manifestation of a god or a daimon; they can no longer allow that there is beauty in other material forms as once they did':[399] He has attained the One through worldly beauty through the Intellect which conceals in itself 'all beautiful forms'; this is how he has come to that 'trancendent sphere, to the source and wellspring of the Beautiful' which 'has the Beautiful cast about itself like a veil'[400]—'for all that is beautiful is posterior to the One and comes forth from the One as daylight from the sun.'[401]

---

[392] VI.9.9.

[393] Plato, Polit. 509 AB, Phileb. 16 A; Plotinus I.6.8, cf. II.9.9: σοφία ἀμήχανος V.3.16; ἀμήχανος δύναμις.

[394] I.8.2.

[395] VI.7.32.

[396] V.8.8.

[397] V.5.12. The chapter as a whole deals with the transcendence of the Beautiful by the Good.

[398] Ibid.

In this way the ultimate structure of the beautiful is laid bare: it has its proper existence in the realm of nous, the realm of form, of the mutual transparency of subject and object, otherness and identity. But at the same time this 'proper' level of existence subsists only as an epiphany of the mystery of and a summons back towards that mystery. It is (horizontally) the outward radiation of reality; but the ray that links what is illuminated with what shines upon it comes (vertically) from above. It was this structure that provided our starting-point at the beginning of the first volume: forma and splendor[402] combine in a kind of anatomy of beauty[403] but in such a way that there is no beauty without the more-than-beautiful—what we are here calling 'glory'—and no understanding of beauty without reference to it. The fascinosum, which is the radiance sent forth by beauty at every level of Intellect, Soul and nature, signifies beauty itself, yet also signifies that there is in beauty something beyond it. The structure of the Beautiful inscribes itself within the formal structure of a doctrine of God. The 'in' here is not voided of force by the 'beyond'; there is no reduction to 'pure appearance'. But the radiance of manifestation presupposes the One, from whose centre all the rays emanate and become manifest. For Plotinus, Intellect and Soul are not entities illuminated from outside themselves but possessing their own particular and contingent structure; rather the structure of both is the product of the irradiation. What is 'generated'

[399] I.6.7

[400] I.6.9

[401] VI.9.4.

[402] Vol. I, 19–20.

[403] V.1.6: the chapter as a whole contains the deduction of plurality from unity.

from the One is necessarily Intellect, which necessarily seeks to know its 'father' and is a 're-flection' and thus an objectifying of the object—and so too a doubling within the unity of intellectual being and in this sense a mirroring process. The reflection of the light as it shines out gives birth, according to Plotinus, to the form or determination of being in its objectifiable mode, and (the same thing seen from the opposite point of view) to the determination of thought as a movement directed towards that which shines into the mind, which the mind must make its own. The infinite interplay between subject and object, the play of concealment and unveiling, of wonder at what is other and discovery of what is one's own, of erôs and identity (superbly depicted by Novalis in his story, 'The Young Men from Sais'), is the play of beauty. But this play can only happen in the unifying light of the Good, which gives it its pleasure, its brightness, its inexhaustability. And this light desires to be recognised by those involved in the play of beauty as the more-than-beautiful, since no individual form satisfies the soul's yearning: ἴχνος τοῦ ἀμόρφου μορφή. Form is the trace left by what is formless.[404]

Plotinus' treatises on aesthetics in the strict sense must be read primarily from this point of view if they are to be read rightly: the early work 'On the Beautiful' (I.6) and the later 'On Intelligible Beauty (V.8), which should be read alongside III.8, 'On Contemplation'. The first of these is an haute vulgarisation, in which the work's lack of speculative depth is compensated by energetic idiom. Starting from what is already an orthodox academic definition of beauty in syncretistic Stoicising terms (a definition we also find in Augustine),[405] as 'the harmony of parts with each other and with the whole, united with beauty in colouring', Plotinus criticises the first element of the definition, symmetry: if this were to hold, the totality of the foundation of all cases of beauty, the non-measurable – as, for example, ideas, the axioms of a science, virtue, Intellect itself, which stands alone—could not itself be beautiful. And colour is itself a simple property but its beauty must first be demonstrated. Symmetry is only the expression of a unity that lies deeper or higher, of unity or idea which is able to organise itself powerfully; and, just as the superiority of the idea over material multiplicity[406] shines through, and gives quantitive structure to the darkness of matter, so too 'colour' is the qualitative manifestation of the light of the idea, which is why light (or fire) and beauty are primitively related.[407] Existent reality (Intellect) is both illuminated from its source and itself a source of light; the idea (Intellect = form = eidos) gleams and flashes, λάμπει καὶ στίλβει ὡς ἂν εἶδος ὄν.[408] It is certainly in the first place the light of what is superior (κρατοῦν), because it is totality and interiority, that impresses 'inner form' (ἔνδον εἶδος; the first appearance of this well-known concept)[409] on the external; equally certainly, in Platonic style, it can be said that it is the brightness of the soul bringing itself towards unity, the virtuous soul that has purified itself and mastered itself and become united in itself.[410] But Plotinus does not stop here, with this 'inner form'. The soul cannot claim this form as its own, for it can exist without it: it finds it beyond itself, in Intellect, which 'is beauty for it and, indeed, no stranger to it but that whence it comes; only so is it truly Soul'.[411] In Intellect and only in Intellect are being, Good and Beauty identical; this is the way, then, in which Soul must find unity, in the sphere above itself. Only here, in the realm of the 'divine', can the soul be itself.

---

[404] VI.7.33.

[405] Vol. 2, 121.

This is the point at which Plotinus' early work remains, with this idea of transcendence in the Intellectual and divine sphere. The negative aspect of 'flight' from the sensible world predominates, and we find it said—with a directness that does not appear in the later works—that the soul united in and with itself in Intellect 'has become wholly and absolutely pure, true light'.[412] Even this 'first transcendence' that leads [406] 1.6.2.

[407] Ibid. 3.

[408] Ibid. 3.

[409] Ibid. 3.

[410] Ibid. 4–6.

[411] Ibid. 6.

[412] Ibid. 9.

us from soul to the purity of Intellect, can display relatively immanent and relatively transcendent aspects; the latter is actually strongly stated in I.6, which deals with the 'mysterious path inwards', from appearance to substance, from what is pleasing to what is worthy of honour, from losing the self in the other to finding the self in the identity of Intellect. If this is taken no further, it opens the door to the development of a purely idealist aesthetic in which the 'more-than-beautiful' is practically swallowed up in the 'properly beautiful, the intellectually beautiful'. But Plotinus can also stress the immanent dimension more strongly, even when dealing with this aspect—at least as the indispensable starting-point for all transfiguration. If we are to engage with the Beautiful, we must be able to see it everywhere. Only those moved by love (ἐρωτικώτεροι)[413] can do this; and, as in the Symposium, this is brought about by engagement with the sensible embodiment of the Beautiful.

In the fine treatise that forms I.3 of the Enneads, the question is raised of what sort of human beings are receptive to higher things, divine things. Three categories are indicated, philosophers, musicians and lovers. The erotic lover 'possesses a particular kind of recollection of beauty', possesses in what is beautiful to the senses a point de départ for the ascent to the spiritually and intellectually beautiful.[414] The musician is enchanted by the rhythm and proportion and is, as it were, already on the level of Intellect, needing only to make a final break with the material world.[415] The philosopher, in contrast to both, is already 'prepared, fitted with his wings, as it were, needing no further separation from the world; he is already on his way to what lies above, and needs no more than to be given direction'.[416] But even the philosopher's movement is in its own way 'erotic'—i.e. it starts from the beauty of the world in which the 'glory' of its ultimate ground appears. 'How should God himself fail to be present here below?'[417] 'How shall someone blind to the world of the senses learn to contemplate the intelligible realm? What musician, aware of the intellectual relationships of harmony, could fail to be grasped when he hears a chord of sensible sounds? What geometer or mathematician, familiar with relation, proportion and order, will not rejoice to see them with the eyes of the flesh? . . . From such experiences, erôs grows. There are those who are transported into the realm of Intellect by a glimpse of the beauty figured forth in a human face . . . seized by trembling awe, they say to themselves, 'How glorious this is! and from what glory must it spring!'[418]

---

[413] Ibid. 4.

[414] I.3.2.

[415] Ibid. 1.

[416] Ibid. 3.

However, Plotinus' aesthetic doctrine appears in all its fullness only at the end—without any attempt to bypass the realm of nous. Enneads V.8 sets out to locate beauty firmly as being at home with form. This form is to be found in the intellectual interiority of nature and in the inner spiritual intellect of the artist who imitates nature not in what she produces but her manner of producing it[419] – which effectively silences Plato's critique of art. 'Pheidias created his Zeus without any model in his sense-experience: he apprehended him as he would be if he, Zeus, deigned to reveal himself to our eyes'.[420] If the artist in his or her creating beholds God, just the same holds for nature itself: neither blood, nor colour, nor external shape constitute the beauty of a living substance, but something radiating from within, an inner unity and simplicity which contains from external form within itself as well as its material. 'Whence comes the glowing beauty of the much-fought-over Helen, the grace of all those women like to Aphrodite, the beauty of Aphrodite herself, or of any human being endowed with perfect loveliness! It is always a question of some interior quality that excites us and the splendour of form resulting from this quality awakens our interiority by its own,—awakens, as Plato has it, our recollection and directs us towards that realm where outer and inner, what is thought and the act of thinking, the beloved and the lover are transparent to each other and merge into each other. The soul becomes the material upon which the light works; what shapes the soul from above takes possession of it and it becomes 'light that shines from the greater light of the primal beauty'.[421] The objective and the subjective moments in all beauty thus converge in that realm in which all duality is wholly transparent in unity and the darkness of opposition is done away. Shape and form are still preserved but in that realm zest and movement are bound up with each other, likeness and contrast require each other; each entity has all the rest in itself, each sees all things in each and every other, the totality of all things is all in all and each in all and there is 'immeasurable brightness'.[422] This is the world of ideas—not of 'concepts', for the eternal 'images' are living essences; there each sentence is an image that is lived and full of being.[423]

---

[417] II.9.16.
[418] Ibid.
[419] V.8.4.
[420] Ibid. 1.

This realm of beauty possesses an inner inexhausibility that permits no satiety or weariness—an idea which provides a central inspiration for Gregory of Nyssa and decisively shapes the whole of his theology of love. 'This inner inexhaustibility comes from the fact that the stillness that is there leaves no room for rejection or scorn and to this we owe our own repose. Lost in contemplation, we gaze more and more, and, as we understand that we share the limitlessness of what we contemplate, we abandon ourselves to our own nature.[424] Here, being and Wisdom coincide. 'True Wisdom is being, true being is Wisdom; being has its own worth and dignity from Wisdom and being is authentic being because it springs from Wisdom'.[425] 'Authentic' being is being which is, as such, identical with beauty: 'for where can there be any beauty devoid of being? And where beauty diminishes, so does being. Being, then, is what is always longed for, because it is identical with beauty, and the beautiful is a fit object of love because it is being'.[426] Here below, both are equally fragile and ambiguous: being is only becoming, beauty is only appearance, but both point to the realm of identity, without which nothing would be intelligible. And yet, at the very heart of this 'first beauty', the One is still present, that which subsists beyond the Beautiful,[427] the object of all the love and striving drawn out by beauty. Already in the contemplation of the beautiful there is a self-contemplation, a rising above subjective consciousness; and so the gaze is led towards the One, which is pursued through all the world's phenomena. And more yet, we 'become no longer a beholder but an object of beholding for an Other whose gaze is upon us'.[428] In this ultimate suspension between being-in and being-for-oneself, 'we know our identity with what we behold'[429]; we are in the One and in the presence of the One.

---

[421] Ibid. 2–3.

[422] Ibid. 4.

[423] Ibid. 5.

[424] Ibid. 4.

[425] Ibid. 5.

Once more Plotinus draws together the various strands of the Greek heritage in his vision of being as Beauty, because it is the revelation of the divine. Beauty is thus characterised by an inner differentiation between radiance and form, light and harmony. It is in the fact that his formal ontology and aesthetics leaves the way open to pure philosophy and self-conscious theology that Plotinus represents a moment of kairos; it is in this that both the risks and the fruitfulness of his thought for future ages lies. Christian theology will take over his basic frames of references, for the understanding of the Trinity (with nous transformed into Logos), of the mystical Christ (for which the relation of the World-Soul to the individual soul furnishes an analogy), of the conversion of the sinner (patterned on Plotinus' ἐπιστροφή), of purgation, illumination and union as the stages on the soul's path to God, of the nature of the creature's love for God, which the whole of Plotinus' thought defines as yearning (ἔρως, ἔφεσις, πόθος) for the Absolute. How far such frames of reference are appropriate for a Christian content can only be judged according to how that content itself is understood.

[426] Ibid. 9.
[427] Ibid. 8.
[428] Ibid. 11.
[429] Ibid. 11.

II ELABORATIONS

A. THE THEOLOGICAL APRIORI OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF BEAUTY

1. THE CHRISTIAN STARTING-POINT: THE FATHERS

The Christian event, as the estuary and goal of the biblical story, ushers in a completely new experience of the divine glory. This new thing provides not merely an additional dimension to what mankind had already known of glory; it completely transforms it. Christian experience is not only an 'experience of newness'[1] but an experience of uniqueness: to such an extent that, in comparison, all other experiences of God retire together into some kind of generic category of their own, while it alone remains as the one central point, dispensed from above, unattainable from below. The understanding of the new, incomparable centre in its own self-exposition will be from now on Christian 'theology': logos about God, derived from the logos of the God who expresses himself in the prophetic and incarnate Word.

But of course all the mythical, philosophical and religious knowledge that Antiquity had of God was always itself theological. To the men of Antiquity God was always truly revealed in the cosmos, and the fundamental resolution of human existence was to be found in its transcendence in God as the ground, form and goal of human existence. It is superficial and wrong to reproach these men with having 'divinised' the cosmos; if the category of divine creative freedom necessarily escaped them, they had nonetheless given formally correct expression to the relationship of transcendence and immanence between God and the world in the double aspect of their religious cosmology: in the cosmos (especially in the stars of heaven) the 'beauty of order' of the absolute shines forth, while cosmic being as a whole radiates forth dynamically from its source in God back to its source in God. If among the early Greeks the transcendence of the finite human form in this absolute ordering could be experienced as the highest tragedy and questionableness of the human, late Antiquity, in so far as it remained religious, had resigned itself to the tragic and let the question be swallowed up in a loving faith in an all-embracing goodness, in spite of all and transcending all.

---

[1] Karl Prümm, Christentum als Neuheitserlebnis (1939).

'What therefore you worship as unknown, this I proclaim to you,' says Paul to the sages of Athens. And once Christianity had spent its first century in understanding and proclaiming its own distinctiveness, it had then in its proclamation to the cultural world of Antiquity to go on to introduce itself as the gracious fulfilment of all humanity's 'seeking after God', 'if haply they might feel after him, and find him, though he be not far from every one of us' (Acts 17.27). So, to borrow one of Claudel's images the forest of Greek pillars bend over in preparation for the gothic keystone, which is set in place from heaven.[2]. Or to use another image: Christian theology surrounds its new mystery with the theological philosophy of Antiquity (in which all the religious thought of mankind is present), just as the plain piece of bread is surrounded by a costly monstrance. But this now means that Christianity uses the conceptual resources of Antiquity in order to approximate in thought its own mystery of faith, so far as that is possible; it means, for our particular inquiry, that it availed itself of the ancient concept of glory, in order to lend expression to the biblical and Christian event of glory. And, because it encountered a very late form of Antiquity, it was the concept of glory not of archaic and classical Antiquity, but specifically of Hellenistic Antiquity that it used.

It is in this encounter that we must perceive the greatness and tragic questionableness of Christian theology, art, culture and politics, from the second to the twentieth century, even if the cathedral built over the ancient pillars, the monstrance fashioned out of ancient gold were, down the centuries, repeatedly plundered and half-destroyed (but then again rebuilt and extended), and if too—as our second volume showed—as the modern period approaches, the distinction between ancient beauty and Christian glory is more and more keenly felt and experienced. Seen as a whole Christianity has preferred to think of itself in foreign categories: this was the price it had to pay for the boldness of Paul (and of Jesus himself), in bearing the Gospel directly to the Gentiles who conceived God, the world and mankind in long established, special thought-forms. So the new, without renouncing its demand for penitence and conversion, was first seen predominantly in terms of fulfilment, (a tendency which in the Middle Ages even increased) and because in Antiquity God and man met one another in the mediating concept of the (macro-) cosmos—in which God expresses himself and of which man is a small, all-embracing instance—Christianity for more than a millennium became cosmology.[3] This is true both in the East, from the Alexandrines and the Cappadocians to Denys and Maximus, where the ancient θεῖος κόσμος everywhere re-emerges in Christian form, and in the West, if the more historical vision of Augustine is supplemented, and often almost masked, for the Middle Ages by Boethius, the Carolingian theologians, and John Erigena, if, instead of Anselm, it is Denys and the Timaeus who offer the framework for a view of the world: we find it in the Victorines, the school of Chartres and their spiritual relations, in early and high Scholasticism right up to Dante, Ryckel, Nicholas of Cusa, Ficino. With Origen, Basil and Ambrose, with Augustine and Bernard of Chartres, with Thomas and Nicholas of Cusa, even with Eckhart, the 'philosophical' cosmogony and the doctrines of creation drawn from Genesis mutually illuminate one another; and it matters little in all this how strong at times in the beginning the share of early or late Platonism, of Aristotelianism or Stoicism may be.

---

[2] 'As formerly when, brought from heaven, the head above the temple,/ The key-stone of the vault comes to intercept the pagan forest./ O my God, I see it, I see now the key that brings deliverance,/ It is not the one that opens, but the one that closes!' Deuxième Grande Ode: L'Esprit et l'eau (Gallimard, 1957, 42).

From that it becomes clear—in a very rough and ready way—how the biblical glory of the Lord God could be thought and expressed in the categories of the ancient understanding of the glory of God and the world: and it was all the easier because this understanding was, in its very origins, a complete theology, which was only waiting to be purified in the Christian realm and then to continue its existence in a higher mode. Spolia Aegyptiorum (Exod 3.21–22; 12.35–36), the famous image, so much discussed by the Fathers, expresses the essential: the investment of the rightful heir with the goods of an earlier culture, whereby these goods are indeed consecrated by their holy use but yet cannot be transformed into that sanctifying process itself. God and silver serve as a monstrance (i.e. as a pointer); they do not become what is thus manifested. So all 'Christian culture' remains in an ineluctable crisis: very often, indeed in the best cases, the framework is understood as exhibiting the central mystery which may indeed remain virtually inexpressed—Denys is a good example, for he virtually never speaks of the Cross and Resurrection but regards the whole cosmos as liturgical worship; often the showy splendour of such cosmic and mystical piety leads to a forgetting of Christ, and the world of beauty overshadows the mystery of the biblical glory, and one must wait for Luther—whose influence is only slowly beginning to be felt in the Catholic realm—to bring the sharpness of the crisis to consciousness. Yet with the supposed collapse of the 'Platonic' tradition through the rise of the modern natural sciences the question is only shifted: certainly to begin with (with Kant and his various followers) a new anthropocentrism replaces the old cosmoscentrism,[4] yet this means no more than taking seriously the freedom of the human spirit and (something that was always known) the teleology of nature at the level of mankind; so the old religious θεῖος κόσμος and the enthusiasm for it—in Schelling, Darwin, Soloviev, Teilhard de Chardin—must rise up again virtually unchanged, and the question about 'beauty' and 'glory', about oblivion of Christ and consciousness of Christ, be posed again without alteration.

---

[3] 'The Cosmological Method' in: Love Alone: The Way of Revelation (E. T. London 1968), 11–24.

---

[4] 'The Anthropological Method': op.cit. 25–42.

Christians feel themselves to be the legitimate heirs of all revelation of God in the world (Homer, Aristotle), of all reference to and exposition of God by men (the tragedians), of all loving ascent to God and attachment to the Absolute (Plato, the Stoics), every homecoming of the creature to the One (Plotinus), every courageous pilgrimage, full of renunciation, through time towards a future civitas (Virgil). There is only one God, 'sought' by the Greeks as the 'Unknown', now revealed to the Christians by grace. So the veil is lifted for the converts, but it is still the same vision: for Clement of Alexandria, for the Neoplatonist and Christian bishop, Synesius, for Nonnus, the poet of the epic of Dionysus and the paraphrases of John, for the speculative philosopher of emanations and the Trinity, Marius Victorinus, for the statesman, Boethius, who let himself be consoled as a Christian, on his approaching death, by ancient philosophy.

Three great themes of Antiquity pass almost unbroken over into the Christian: the theme of the procession and return of creatures from God and back to God, a theme that rules theological systematics from the Peri Archôn of Origen to the Summa of Aquinas, a theme which the Johannine Christ makes his own (Jn 16.28) and which is so formal that it seems to include within itself, without reservation, both the non-Christian and the Christian. Secondly, there is the theme of erôs as the fundamental yearning of the finite creature for transcendence in God as the primordial unity, the primordial beauty, a theme which is applied by Philo to the men of the Old Testament, by Gregory of Nyssa (in his Life of Moses and his Commentary on the Song of Songs) used to express a general, theological ontology, embracing both the Old and the New Testaments, of the fundamental condition of the creature,[5] in Augustine appears in a still deeper form as the Christian, restless desiderium of creaturely need for the God of Love and thus extends throughout the Middle Ages in this form, shimmering in a multitude of shades in Bernard, William of St Thierry and Richard of St Victor, and again in Dante, Petrarch, Ficino and Michelangelo. Finally there is the theme of the beauty of the spiritual soul: a theme which traces its descent back to Plato and Plotinus, a courageous, world-affirming theme, which does not mourn the passing of physical beauty in a melancholy vein, but dares to see it as the reflection and sensuous image of a deeper, indestructible glory. It is only necessary to link the antique perception of the beauty of virtue with the Christian theme of justification through redeeming grace to show, apparently effortlessly, its validation within the system of Christian theology: the ancient, actively achieved harmony of virtue (which however—as with Pindar—is based on the graceful nobility of nature, φυά) becomes Christianly admissible when it rests on justification given by the free love of God and the divine virtues infused with it: here the theological aesthetic of the commentaries on the Song of Songs should—with an indissoluble union of agapê and erôs, of the glory of God and the beauty of the soul—afford an almost inexhaustibly variable treasury of themes: from Origen and Methodius, from Gregory of Nyssa, Ambrose and Bede, there stretches the unbroken procession of these commentaries through the monasteries and universities of the Middle Ages to Luther and into the Baroque period.[6] The biblical erôs-motif, expounded in relation to Christ and his Bride (Church-Mary-the soul), leads both to the heart of the distinctively Christian mysteries (for the sake of which alone the whole external theology of the councils and the schools is worth studying) and also to the deepest justification of the spoliatio Aegyptiorum, i.e., Platonicorum. Or to put it another way: the glowing heart of the mystery of Christ is pure beauty, if it is true that all revelation, all faith, all suffering and death, takes place for the sake of the marriage feast of the Lamb, where creaturely and Christian truth and goodness is transfigured in the eschatological glory.

---

[5] Présence et Pensée. Essai sur la philosophie religieuse de Grégoire de Nysse (Paris, Beauchesne 1942).

None of these three themes—procession-return, erôs-desiderium, the beauty of the soul-eschatological marriage feast—can be spared the critical question: in what relation they stand to 'philosophical' beauty and 'biblical' glory. Wherever the monstrance has referred to itself instead of the bread and has drawn men's gaze to itself, it has awakened Christian mistrust and finally called down upon itself Christian iconoclasm. And yet such iconoclasm was never a solution, because it is negative and contradicts the universality of Christian truth. In the end there remains a critical balance which demands, ever again, Christian watchfulness about what is distinctive. This is still to be dealt with in the final part of this book.

---

[6] For Luther see E. Przywara, Humanitas (1952), 386–396. In general: F. Ohly, Hohelied-Studien. Grundzüge einer Geschichte der Hoheliedauslegung des Abendlandes bis vor 1200 (1958).

But for the meanwhile there is something else to be done which is no less difficult. It has to be shown how the ancient theological aesthetic (with its mythical a priori regarding revelation) was transformed through the mediation of Christianity into the modern, supposedly 'purely philosophical' aesthetic. That all ancient theory and practice (of the art) of beauty ascribed itself to the revelation of the divine, so that all canonical Western art is of a theological lineage, can be seen to be the result of what has already been expounded. For the men of Antiquity all worldly beauty is the ephiphany of divine glory. But while the Christian world prepared to give to this theological a priori its all-focusing centre and crown and for many centuries indeed gave itself out as the synthesis (not ever thoroughly thought out) of natural and biblical theology, it provoked counter claims from the history of human thought. The Renaissance and the Reformation destroyed this unreflected configuration from opposing directions: the former, with its enthusiasm for Antiquity, dissolved the Christian glory into an all-embracing cosmic revelation (which was then perfected in the Enlightenment), while the latter so stressed the distinctiveness of the biblical glory that by comparison all cosmic beauty faded and was submerged. All that resulted from this crisis—speculative aesthetics from Kant, through Schiller, Goethe and Hölderlin to Schelling, to Romanticism and to Hegel and the variety of post-Hegelian hangers-on—necessarily stands under a double judgment of the tradition: can such philosophical aesthetics be justified in the face of the theological a priori of Antiquity, to which it still for the most part appeals (in part against Christianity)? Further: can this aesthetics recover the fundamental presupposition, common to Antiquity and Christianity, that reality as such, being itself, is καλόν, radiant goodness, glory endlessly to be affirmed? And if it no longer has the power, what can such an aesthetics have to say? If the transcendental καλόν is to be removed from being, why then is being any better than non-being? If we have come to a period which no longer has any answer to this question, then the beauty that we meet with within the world will sooner or later be stripped of its radiance and worth; and even where it is still perceived it will simply be classified pleasant, as a mere quality of nature, to which one has no sooner succumbed, than in that very moment one has seen through it. Aesthetics then becomes an epiphenomenon of psychology and relinquishes any claim to being a philosophical discipline.

2. ENTRY INTO THE MIDDLE AGES

a. Harmony between God and the world

BOETHIUS

Boethius provides the foundation-stone for what in the Middle Ages can be called aesthetics.[7]. Doubtless Augustine's mighty synthesis lies in the background, into which in turn so much of Plotinus' teaching on beauty and Varro's books on music had flowed, but Augustine himself will be above all the patron of theology—Denys takes his place alongside him later, to rise in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries to a position of the highest authority in matters of aesthetics. It is however Boethius who transmits the philosophy of Antiquity: he is the chief witness both for the middle (Neoplatonic) and for the later (Aristotelian-Stoic) Plato, and in his Philosophia even cites Euripides several times and calls him 'one who is more important than I'.[8] More important still is the fact that Boethius writes his Consolation of Philosophy in the same situation as Socrates: in prison, awaiting an unjust death. He is the innocently suffering just man of Plato's Republic who 'is held to be really guilty',[9] justusque tulit crimen iniqui.[10] Just like Socrates, quite in the manner of the Old Testament, the sufferer protests his innocence: 'never had anything seduced me from righteousness to wickedness'.[11] His path to death becomes, under the guidance of philosophy, a Platonic and Pythagorean 'following of God', 'making oneself like God'.[12] Socrates is frequently mentioned as the model, together with the tortured Zeno and the dying philosophers, Canius, Seneca, Soranus.[13] In the face of death philosophy appears and proves herself: she teaches how to pacify the mutiny against injustice, how to free oneself from earthly cases, how to relocate one's tiny, finite destiny within the immense, indestructibly holy order of the cosmos, where the sovereign Spirit and Will of the Most High can be caught sight of directly. 'The starry heaven above me' and no less 'the moral law within me': both point gently and ineluctably to God, directly before whom the dying one stands.

---

[7] The main work is Edgar de Bruyne, Etudes d'Esthéthique Médiévale, vol 1: De Boèce à Jean Scot Erigène; vol. 2: L'Epoque Romane; vol. 3: Le XIIIe Siècle (De Tempel, Bruges 1946): cited hereafter as Br. Further: E. R. Curtius, Europäische Literatur und lateinisches Mittelalter (2nd edn., 1954); Edmond Faral, Les arts poétiques aux XIIe et XIIIe siècles (1923).

[8] Boethius' theological works are available (with English tr.) in the Loeb Classical Library (Theological Tractates, ed. H. F. Stewart, E. K. Rand, and S. J. Tester, London, 1973). De Consolatione is cited: book-number, metre or prose, page-number (of the German tr. by E. Gothein in the edition in the Bibliothek der Alten Welt, 1949, followed by page no. of English W. Cited).

[9] I pr 4 (60)(157).

[10] I m 5 (62)(161): 'and the just bears the crime of the wicked.'

The inserted poems almost without exception revolve around the beauty of the world, a beauty which above all shines forth in the radiant order of the heavenly realm but also in the seasons of the year, in tree and beast, ocean and wind, lightening and rainbow. The pattern of the good and beautiful order is above,

Illic justo foedere rerum
Veterem servant sidea pacem,[14] and yet, even though disturbed by matter, the order reaches down to the earth, where 'concord regulates the elements in equal measures',[15] a concordia which proves amor to be the law that holds sway throughout the world: 'Love is that which binds the chain of things, ruling the lands and the sea, and ordering the heavens. If it let go of the reins, everything now bound by mutual love would wage continual war . . . O happy race of men, if the love by which heaven is ruled should rule your souls!'[16] This love, sovereign over the cosmos, is so much the ever-present harmony that throughout the course of passive time it is present unalterably and uniformly; not for nothing does the Consolatio reach its climax in the famous definition of eternity as interminabilis vitae tota simul et perfecta possessio,[17] while all time (according to the Timaeus) proves itself to be but a sunken 'copy of that continual presence', which in the 'infinite flow' of duration imitates the simplicitas praesentiae.[18] It does not depend on history, progress, the end of the world but simply on the drawing up of divine eternity from the well from which all time flows. In this sense 'each single thing seeks its own way back and rejoices in its return. None is consigned to any ordered course, except that which joins the beginning to the end, and makes it cycle secure.'[19] [11] I pr 4 (52)(149).

---

[12] I pr 4 (58)(157).
[13] I pr 3 (46)(143).
[14] IV m 6 (254)(373). 'Up there, by the just covenant of the universe, the stars preserve their ancient peace.'
[15] Ibid. [256][373].
[16] II m 8 (124)(227); cf. IV m 6 (258)373).

Only man, in his selfishness and his attachment to the transient and illusory, strives against the universal law. It was none other than he who drove himself out of Paradise;[20] he has himself preferred the unhappiness of disorder to the happiness of order. Instead of being sufficient for himself (tui compos,[21] sufficiens sui[22]), he has betrayed himself in his attachment to passing beauty, esteem, fame, nobility, wealth, in short all the benefits of the 'blind goddess', Fortuna.[23] But who is this Fortuna or fate or accident? It is—thus Boethius' answer can be pieced together—providence, reaching down into matter which is alien to the spiritual, accountable itself to the regio dissimilitudinis. The same power, which is manifest above and in the heavens and in the pure heart as 'pure providence', in the lower realms assumes more and more the form of destiny and accident;[24] the wise man however transcends this self-alienated form and discovers even in it the eternal and pure providence. He sees beyond the contradictory, apparently meaningless chances of life to what is rather advantageous to him;[25] he discerns the inner transience of the goods of Fortuna.[26] They are transient because they are as fragments of an exploded unity, to which they point, just as man himself rises from the fragmentary to wholeness, from the mortal to the immortal.[27]

---

[17] V pr 6 (300)(423), 'simultaneously complete and perfect possession of boundless life.'

[18] V pr 6 (302)(425).

[19] III m 2 (136)(239).

[20] I pr 5 (64)(163).

[21] II pr 4 (94)(195).

[22] III pr 3 (138)(243).

[23] caeci numinis: II pr 1 (78)(177).

[24] IV pr 6 (242–246)(359ff.).

And now philosophy spreads out its central doctrine before the spiritual eyes of the prisoner, its doctrine of being, which one day will be formalised in High Scholasticism, first in the source material by Alexander's Summa, in the tractate on the transcendental determinations of being. If the evil man is always entrapped in a state of essential loss and thus never achieves the essential power he strives for, it is on the contrary a characteristic of the good man that he achieves what he wills, namely blessedness; for the good, which he possesses within himself, is that which gives satisfaction and rest.[28] He then who is capable, not only of the good, but of evil too, is capable of less and is less powerful, than he who is only capable of the good[29]—a thought which will determine the inner core of Anselm's doctrine of freedom.[30] He who possesses in himself the good as the blessed, understands his self-sufficiency and undivided simplicity[31] and it is just this mightiness of being which makes the good manifest as the most uncontemned, or, to put it positively, the most venerable (veneratione dignissimum). 'Well then, she said, do you think it obscure and undistinguished, or not rather splendid with all renown (celebritate clarissimum)? Consider however whether that which is conceded to lack nothing, to be most powerful and to be most worthy of honour, could lack any renown (claritudo), which it could not provide for itself, and whether in that respect it would seem to be lower . . . We must concede then that renown differs not at all from the other three determinations.' But where these four properties are found together, there cannot be lacking a fifth: happiness (laetissimum).[32] 'Sufficiency, power, renown, veneration and joy are certainly different names, but the substance to which they all refer is one and the same.' There is expressed here, as a legacy of Antiquity and a pledge of the Middle Ages, the transcendentality not only of the good, but of the beautiful, and that in its threefold aspect as the venerable, the radiant and the blessed.[33]

---

[25] II pr 8 (122)(225).

[26] II m 3 (90)(191); II pr 4 (92)(193).

[27] II pr 4 (96)(197).

[28] IV pr 2 (206f.)(321ff.).

[29] Ibid. (214)(329).

[30] Cf. vol. II, 237f.

[31] III pr 9 (158)(265).

Immediately after this analysis Boethius appeals to the Timaeus and sings that prayer of praise in which he addresses God as the most glorious who has created the world as glorious after the model of his own pure goodness and fashioned the perfect parts into the most perfect whole:

> tu cuncta superno
> Ducis ab examplo; pulchrum pulcherrimus ipse
> Mundum mente gerens similique in imagine formans
> Perfectasque jubens perfectum absolvere partes.[34]

In this world of perfect, reflected beauty, it is man (as conscious spirit) who achieves the innermost participation in the Godhead (participatione deus): and this thought is pulchrum atque pretiosum.[35] From the insight that the absolute, divine goodness is at once uniform, powerful, good, beautiful and blessed, there derives an ethic for mankind according to which man is to stake his powers on goodness, and that means on unity with himself, and to await his blessedness that radiates from it. But that means however that for Boethius the transcendental demonstration cannot for a moment proceed along formal, a priori lines (by constructing, for example, an ontological proof of God's existence out of the convergence of the fundamental determinations), rather quite in the manner of Antiquity he reckons with the revealedness of God in the glory of the cosmos: the beauty of the world points to the primal beauty of God which is again expressed and proved in the world-harmony—everything is accomplished within this theological circle. Certainly there is the a posteriori ascent from the empirical experience of the beauty of the grata intuitu species[36] of a landscape, or a work of art, and there is given to men the spiritual power to strip away the transitoriness of this accidental, inessential beauty of things and to achieve the essential synthesis between virtue (as spiritual beauty) and its own radiance: he understands the pulchritudo dignitatis—in so far as this is conceived of not as an external position of honour but the essential worth of virtue.[37] This essential worth (propria dignitas virtutis) and essential beauty (proprium decus) is not inferred, but seen, and in this vision the proper worth and the proper beauty of absolute and all-fashioning being is made accessible for Boethius and for the men of Antiquity: a making accessible, in which it is more the self-disclosure of being which is experienced than the conclusion of reason's endeavour. On the circle of accessibility achieved between God and man rests both the culture of Antiquity and of the Middle Ages and, even if this can still be regarded as valid in the modern age (Goethe, Hölderlin), the beginning of the modern age can nevertheless be placed where its obviousness is first lost sight of (Duns Scotus).

---

[32] Ibid. (160)(265ff.).

[33] In III pr 10 (174–175)(281–285) it is shown that the five indicated determinations of being are not joined to being as constitutive parts, rather each one reflects and expresses the identical whole under a particular aspect. This whole is designated Platonically as the 'Good', because this forms the content of the worth, value and therefore desirability (affirmability) of being.

[34] III m 9 (166)(273), 'You lead everything by a supreme example; Yourself the most beautiful, ordering the beautiful world by mind and forming it in a similar image and commanding the perfect to separate into perfect parts.'

[35] III pr 10 (174)(281).

The Christian figure is only lightly sketched on to the picture of Antiquity: from the prayer of Cleanthes[38] to that of Boethius it is a scarcely perceptible step. A greater freedom however is found in the transcendence of eternity over all time; but this is characteristically not discovered from the external revelation of the Bible but from the thinking creature's self-experience;[39] from this it becomes clear that there is no contradiction between God's freedom and the 'necessity' of his providence, from this the ultimate human attitudes to God are naturally derived: hope, prayer and humility, by which we enter in illud inter homines deumque commercium sperandi scilicet ac deprecandi, through which we justae himilitatis pretio inaestimabilem vicem divinae gratiae promeremur.[40] The circle that links human humility and divine grace, the circle formed out of hope and prayer: it is Antiquity breathing a Christian atmosphere, from which sin, Christ and the cross however are missing. The mystery of evil is that of its non-being.[41] So this powerlessness is always grasped anew by the providential power of being and led whither it does not will.[42] Even inwardly, for every existing nature strives from istelf (sponte) towards the good, even when it wills evil.[43]

---

[36] II pr 5 (102)(203).

[37] III pr 4 (142)(251).

[38] See above 000–000.

Thus once again the Platonic music becomes the redeeming mediator leading disordered pleasure to ethically-harmonious joy. There is a threefold music: the cosmic (of the harmony of being), the human (of the harmony between the soul and the body as 'virtue'), the instrumental. The last, rightly exercised, helps the second to introduce one to the first. Many classical examples given at the beginning of the book on music confirm this power of music over human existence; the art of the ear (as later with Luther) is granted precedence over the art of the eye,[44] and visible proportions are traced back to musical proportions.[45] Music is primarily the order of being, even before it is audible to the sense; that the spirit perceives it, is for Antiquity and the Middle Ages much more important than the fact that it reaches down to the rhythm of the heart-beat and to the senses. Music can finally only be judged by the spirit, even when the senses are involved. But meaning makes for wholeness (integritas) and consequently harmony can only be achieved confuse and never extended beyond that which is 'nearest'.[46] It is impossible for an animal to understand a symphony. Music can only be understood thanks to the spirit's highest capacity for integration, which judges proportions from the perspective of unity and knows whether the dissimilar sounds harmonious in an ultimate unity: consonantia est dissimilium inter se vocum in unum redacta concordantia.[47] One can thus see why the subjective-psychological aspect of aesthetics cannot develop for the Middle Ages any disturbing thematic of its own: the harmony of man within the universe and of the senses within man in the rhythm and proportion of the whole texture of spirit and body is joy, pleasure; the suavitas of the ancient definitions of beauty is not to be thought of as a second, alien moment alongside convenientia or consonantia but simply as the way they are experienced.[48] This is already clear from the notion of integration found in the Consolatio: the agreement with itself (as virtue) is at once worth and renown and joy.

---

[39] V pr 2 (270–272)(391–393).

[40] V pr 3 (280)(401), 'into that commerce of hope and prayer between God and men (whereby we) merit by the reward of just humility the inestimable response of divine grace.

[41] IV pr 2 (212–214)(327–329).

[42] IV pr 6 (252)(371).

[43] III pr 12 (192)(303), IV pr 2 (210)321).

[44] Nulla enim magis ad animum disciplinis via quam auribus patet. De Mus I.1; PL 63. 1169A.

[45] De Arith. II.1; PL 63. 1113.

b. Divine Majesty and Religious Awe

CASSIODORUS, BENEDICT, GREGORY

Cassiodorus, the same age as Boethius and Benedict, the mediator between the Romans and the Germans, outlived Boethius by half a century: the period of time he was a Christian. Now the artes liberales, together with theology, will be poured into the mould of monasticism. If with Cassiodorus and his powerful influence a broad stream of the aesthetics of authentic Antiquity flows into the Middle Ages,[49] there is also heard in him a just as authentic biblical sound, picked up indeed by a very Roman ear, a sound which will find an echo in the Roman Liturgy rather than in the mediaeval theologians. He may have admired, like Boethius, the harmony of the cosmic music and how it sounds without sound in the harmonies of number; he may have praised, more than Boethius, the beauty of the world: the sunlight, which streams softly down upon our bodily senses, and plays about us like the tenderness of grace (gratia), 'the green earth, the blue sea, the pure air, the sparkling stars: with what delight do we behold them all now.'[50] But if the passing world is itself so beautiful, then what must a glimpse of the 'incomparable majesty' be like! Majestas is the basic word for God and for his manifestation.

---

[46] De Mus. V.1; 1286C.

[47] De Mus. I.3; 1173D, 'harmony is the concord between notes different from one another reducing them to one.'

[48] De Mus. I.1; 1168CD; Br 26f.

[49] 'Cassiodore qui . . . a exercé une influence énorme en Occident, nous semble être le protagoniste de la christianisation de l'esthétique grecque': Br I 73.

God is spoken of in human images, 'while he fulfils all things in quite other ways through the ineffable power of his majesty. He is holy force, which creates and governs the universe; he holds sway in his own majesty and eternal glory, as incomprehensible, inestimable, eternal power . . . he is peacably angry, he judges serenely, and nothing changes him when the wicked receive their punishment. He is great in his mercy towards human misery; he forgives the repentant immediately; through waiting he reforms the sinner . . . O incomprehensible majesty and merciful goodness!'[51] 'All things hasten towards their destruction unless they are prevented by the majesty of your merciful goodness!'[52] It is majesty which is first truly discerned by piety: 'How weak we are, in truth you know; the unequal struggle seeks after you, mortal weakness waits for you: for it is the glory of your majesty, if the bellowing lion is overcome by the powerless lamb.'[53] Within this incomprehensible majesty is gathered together the harmony of the world: eternal blessedness will be the vision of the many in unity: 'There it will be revealed how many number is, there will be contemplated the distinction (discretio) of lines reduced to unity (absolute), the harmony of music will be laid bare, the course of the stars will be obvious certainty, the highest truth will be open to view; we shall see with what majesty God's widsom has arranged each individual thing.'[54] We creatures stand before God under number—auctori quippe suo omnis creatura sub numero est[55]—and nothing belonging to the world is more certain than mathematics, for nothing is without measure and weight;[56] but God transcends number. So for Cassiodorus the music of the world—as bodily, spiritual and cosmic—is the appropriate and necessary response to the grace of the Creator, except that the accuracy of the response itself can not in turn be expressed in measure, number and weight.

---

[50] De anima 12; PL 70. 1304B.
[51] Ibid. 1304D–1305C.
[52] Ibid. 1308A.
[53] Expos. in Psalt., Oratio. PL 70. 1056C.

Cassiodorus has the feel of Antiquity for the beauty of the body as such, in its paradisal nakedness,[57] but also in its Christian function: for it is the body which 'sings the heavenly psalter, which makes the martyrs glorious, which is worthy of the affliction visited upon it by its Creator, which even accepted the life-giving cross of the holy Redeemer';[58] all this honour only when it is a fitting musical instrument for the soul. 'You tune, beloved artist, the organ of our body, by which man is made sensitive to the harmony of the Spirit.'[59]

To come to the soul, Cassiodorus once again chooses a descending path: from the primordial model, which 'dwells in unapproachable light . . . which we honour as inexpressibly hidden, which is everywhere present' as the unity of three Persons, 'in undivided majesty, radiant beyond any light, glory beyond any glorification . . . incommunicable sublimity.' Thence flares up in us something of 'I know not what delicacy, movement, clear shining, which can shine without the sun and see without any external light . . . The souls become so much more radiant if they work their good in the grace of God'. For the 'image and likeness of light', which the created soul is, can 'not be the truth in itself.'[60]

---

[54] De anima 12; 1303B.

[55] Variar. I I ep 10 (ad Boethium); PL 69. 515A.

[56] Ibid. 514C.

[57] De anima 9: de positione corporis; PL 70. 1295–1298.

[58] Ibid. 1297C.

[59] Ibid. 1308C.

[60] Ibid. c. 3; 1288BCD.

Thus the soul is certainly a fundamental music which however only sounds truly through grace, in the obedient observance of the commandments of God. This is explained again and again in the commentary on the Psalms where he boldly links Pythagoras with David. Music is the doctrine of the harmony of things; in the observance of the commandments man is attuned to the sweetest harmony with absolute will and being;[61] and as all the strings are needed on a lyre, so all the virtues are needed for holy men.[62] 'Music is the art of fine modulation: if we lead a moral life, then we continually practise this art; if however we do evil, then we fall out of the music.'[63] If therefore (Platonically) the proper music of the senses can educate the soul (per dulcissimas voluptates expellit animi passiones),[64] then so much the more will the proper music of the soul bring the whole man into harmony with God. Through music 'which rises up from the hidden depths of nature', 'we think with measure, we speak beautifully, we move gracefully . . . we drive out all other (inappropriate) thoughts and therefore have the joy of listening to it alone.'[65] But music itself remains as a whole a parable of the ineffable, 'and so those have done right who have placed the ultimate reason for heavenly blessedness not in notes, but in the Creator.'[66]

---

[61] In Ps 97 conclusio; 692BC.

[62] In Ps 146.7; 1036B.

[63] De artibus ac disciplinis liberalium litterarum: C 5 De Musica; PL 70. 1209A.

[64] Variar. 1 II ep. 40 (ad Boethium); 69. 571B, 'it expels the passions of the soul through most gentle delights.'

[65] Ibid. 571A.

[66] Ibid. 573B. For the whole subject: G. Sowa, Die Musikanschauungen Cassiodors (Diss. Bln, 1953). In order to express the emergence of music from the unapproachable grounds of being, the Carolingian writers drew on the myth of Orpheus, already used by Boethius in a curious hymn. According to Boethius (following closely Vergil's Georgics IV and Ovid's Metamorphoses X) Orpheus is the world-music which turned back its gaze into Tartarus instead of simply welling up from the primordial source of the Good: certainly he could soothe even Tartarus, and lead his wife out, but he looked backwards—for 'love is its own law'—and therefore lost the one he had brought up (III m 2, 198–200). In Regino von Prüm's De

Benedict, although neither a theologian nor a philosopher, made a greater impression on the West, with his pattern for the image of God and of man, than the great thinkers. His God is the biblical God, his man is formed by his standing before this God, and the reflections of the forms of Antiquity manifest here are not allowed for a moment to constitute a second, independent theme alongside the biblical. In the Rule[67] God is manifest as the ineffably present, before whom the creature stands without any protection: 'We believe that God is present everywhere and that "the eyes of the Lord in every place behold the good and the evil" ';[68] 'let a man consider that God is always beholding him from heaven, that his actions are everywhere visible to the eye of the Godhead.'[69] The all-seeing God is one who calls us to himself and the vision of himself,[70] inviting us by his voice[71] and so the first word of the Rule is a demand for hearing which immediately passes over into a call for obedience. It is a call to Christ the King and to his Kingdom,[72] whence it is sonship not slavery,[73] but a sonship exercised in a following of the sufferings of the One Son:[74] wherein God becomes our Father,[75] who shows us the way of life in pietas.[76]

Man appropriates the truth of this all-penetrating gaze and call of God in an ever-deepening humilitas: at each step he harmonica institutione (PL 132 500) Eurydice, called back out of the underworld by human music, becomes a parable of the profunditas harmonicae subtilitatis which cannot be drawn out by men into the light of knowledge. Similarly with the Anonymous of the Musica Enchiriadis (c. 19): the invisible harmony cannot be drawn out, even by the best musicians, into visibility: dum videri videtur, amittitur, it is lost, because its origins lie in the unsearchable-divine (PL 132 981–982).

---

[67] Cuthbert Butler, S. Benedicti Regula Monasteriorum (2nd edn. Herder, 1927): cited by chapter- and line-number.

[68] XIX.

[69] VII.41–43, cf. VII.70–73, 87.

[70] Prol. 37, 55–56.

[71] Prol. 49.

[72] Prol. 7–8.

[73] Prol. 12–13, 17.

[74] Prol. 129–131.

[75] Prol. 17.

[76] Prol. 50–51.

descends both into his creaturely nothingness and into his conformity to Christ. This humility is founded on total obedience which is nothing but the response to the calling word.[77] It begins with the fear of God, of him who 'penetrates the heart and the reins', who 'knows the thoughts of men',[78] in which fear any delight in his own will is lost; he who is humble submits himself out of love for God and out of his following of Christ to the will of the superior, submits himself silently to contradictory commands and even to the suffering of injustice, lives in the act and attitude of an open confession of guilt, is satisfied with the least regarded and most despised (according to the verse of the psalm: ad nihilum redactus sum . . .), indeed esteems himelf as lower than anything else (ego sum vermis et non homo); after these seven rungs of the descending ladder of humility,[79] man is so limited a personality as to be annihilated; the last five rungs[80] imprint on this nothingness the form of Christ, as it shines through in the objectivity of the holy Rule: in the whole of his behaviour, including bodily behaviour itself, he is to offer no kind of resistance to the form being imprinted on him by God through Christ and the community-rule: through humility he 'achieves perfect love of God, which casts out fear'[81] and which is the 'love of Christ'.[82] Utterly poor through humility, 'possessing absolutely nothing of his own', he can 'expect everything from the father of the monastery'.[83] He lives out of his encouter with the 'authority of the Rule',[84] the 'discipline of the Rule',[85] and in so far as divine order is therein laid upon him, then, even in the least things which it treats, 'humility, earnestness and reverence are appropriate';[86] but the Rule, mediated by the abbot, is the form of the incarnate God, and therein above all discretio ('the mother of virtue'[87]), temperatio,[88] mensura et ratio[89] (omnia mensurate faciat[90]), humanitas in the spirit of Christ:[91] gracious apportionment,[92] so that the favoured one may fashion his measure from the given measure. In grace God meets us as one who gives, as love. So in the guest Christ himself is to be received, received in humility, indeed with prostration of the body, that in him Christ might be worshipped,[93] and above all in the poor and the stranger, 'because especially in them is Christ received';[94] so the sick should know in humility that they are 'cared for to the glorification of God', because through them the sick Christ is attended to;[95] it is thus above all that the abbot should regard his 'burden' as a slave and steward of Christ, as one which required that he be loved rather than feared', that he set 'mercy always above judgment';[96] he is the 'representative of Christ', whose fatherliness must be felt in him;[97] he must 'imitate the gentle example of the good shepherd, who went in search of one erring sheep';[98] for his sons he must be transparent to the Lord. He may never wield his 'authority' as a lord but only as a slave, in fear of his own reckoning.[99] But if obedience to the abbot is extended in a gradated form to a general, mutual obedience,[100] this means that all should be transparent to God and to Christ on one another's behalf, so that in the 'chaste brotherly love' and in the 'honour offered to each other'[101] the form of the measure of God in their lives will always be recognised. But this is in fact the gloria dei manifest in the world. This glory should, according to the verse of the psalm, be rendered 'not unto us, but unto thy name', and 'he who glories, let him glory in the Lord',[102] 'that in all things God may be glorified'.[103] Amore Deum timeant: in love and through love should God be feared, with that biblical and also classical and Roman filial piety, for which an awesome distance is the closest (because only right) position to the beloved God and Father.

---

[77] V.1, 9.

[78] VII.31f.

[79] VII.31–164; 'I am brought to nothing . . .'; 'I am a worm and no man'.

[80] VII.165–201.

[81] VII.202–205.

[82] VII.209.

[83] XXXII.6–10.

[84] XXXVII.3.

[85] LX.4–5.

[86] XLVII.9–10.

---

[87] LXIV.48.

[88] Ibid. 44.

[89] LXX.9–10.

[90] XXXI.23.

[91] LIII.21.

[92] De mensura cibi, de mensura potus: XXXIX–XL; cf. LV on the allotting of clothes.

[93] LIII.2, 12–16.

[94] LIII.30–32.

[95] XXXVI.1–7.

[96] LXIV.20f., 37.

[97] II.3–4, 7.

[98] XXVII.21–24.

[99] LXIII.5–8.

[100] LXXI.1–4.

[101] LXXII.6–7, 11.

Gregory the Great inherited not only the spirit of Benedict, whose historical image he determined, and the great Roman style in which he clothed his own painful experience of human life, he also inherited the asceticism of ascent and the mysticism of Eastern, Evagrian monasticism. This latter would be hard to reconcile within the rest of his inheritance; but the lasting, and at times urgent, interest in the active and contemplative stages of purification remains in spite of all firmly encompassed by and related by an all-governing experience of the overpowering glory of God. Even more strongly than with Gregory of Nyssa (the Sinai theophany in the Life of Moses) this experience is centred on two Old Testament revelations of darkly dazzling glory: the night theophany to the sufferer Job (Moralia in Job) and the priestly-prophetic, mystically encoded theophany to the prophet of the captivity, Ezekiel (Homiliae in Ezechielem).

The categories of the concept of God in late Antiquity serve as a golden background for this biblical experience of God, and their dark tones are deepened by Gregory's painful fate. Rare, and in Christian intellectual history certainly unique, is Gregory's use of his favourite word pondus (weight, burden), nourished as it is at its heart by his own human experience and dependent only in a peripheral way on the Augustinian use (pondus amoris: the gravitation of Christian, creaturely erôs towards God). Alongside other uses—like the pull of the flesh, of corruption, of the blows of fate, the burden of virtue and especially of authority (pondus auctoritatis)—it regains a moment of the revelation of glory in the Old Testament: kabod originally signifies the importance or weight of a person; with his kabod Yahweh weighs down on the prophet, on Israel, on the world.[104]

---

[102] Prol. 79–80, 84.

[103] LVII.18–19.

God is for Gregory the weighty majesty of the absolutely infinite, which holds sway in and over everything. 'Therefore he abides in everything, outside everything, over everything, under everything, transcendent by power, undergirding with support, outside in his greatness, within in his subtlety, sovereign from above, upholding from below, embracing from without, penetrating from within . . . and, as one and the same wholeness, everywhere supporting by ruling, ruling by supporting, embracing by penetrating.[105] He is, according to Job, 'higher than Heaven and deeper than Hell, wider than the earth and broader than the sea.' And Gregory comments: 'In bliss he will be clearly known as the almighty and yet never perfectly, for although we shall behold him in the glory of his light, we shall never really penetrate to his nature.'[106] He is the One who sees but who will never be seen as he is in himself, and therefore must be the more feared since he remains invisible, even when we raise our minds to the consideration of his majesty.[107] It is part of the genius of Gregory's concept of God that he, following in the wake of Gregory of Nyssa but almost more emphatically than he stresses the dialectic not only of earthly knowledge of God but also of the heavenly vision of God. He certainly says with Augustine that God hides himself as a bridegroom in order to be sought more passionately, so that the bride may find him more deeply and in more manifold ways;[108] but the seeking in finding remains the characteristic of blessedness for men and for the angels. 'They see him and yet still long to see him; and lest these be sadness in their longing they are satisfied in longing, but lest in their satisfaction there should be satiety, they long for satisfaction . . . In bliss we shall know within ourselves both thirst and its quenching.' We shall see God, but 'not as he himself sees'; thus our rest will be only a moving reflection of his rest, our eternity only an imitation of his eternity.[109] Indeed at the deepest level the lover wills the invisibility of the beloved God who is essentially inconceivable, and therefore the cry, 'Fly, my beloved, fly' (Song. 8.14) is the cry of the Church, 'filled with the prophetic Spirit, to the Lord who after death and resurrection goes to heaven, as if she wished to say: You, who were comprehensible in the flesh, transcend the grasp of our senses in the power of your Godhead and remain in yourself incomprehensible to us.[110] And after Ezekiel had seen the glory of the Lord in a manifest vision, he turned from Jerusalem to the captive, sinful brothers in Babylon. Then he heard 'behind him a mighty, thundering voice calling out: praised be the glory of the Lord in the place where he dwells' (Ezek 3.12). Gregory adds: the prophet has the glory of God behind him, for he is now travelling to Babylon; leaving contemplation behind him he proceeds to action.[111] All his life Pope Gregory hungered after pure contemplation and he never really knew (for it contradicted the ideology of his monasticism) that God's glory itself, unseen, goes into exile and lowliness, that precisely the descent from Jerusalem to Babylon, from the form of God to the Cross is glory. This descent of God remains for Gregory—as for the patristic period and Augustine and the now-emerging mediaeval tradition—the means for the ascent of man; but 'glory', as the heavenly blessedness striven for by man (even if the vision of God is its content) and as the 'transfiguration' of the world at the end of time, retains therefore a predominantly cosmocentric accent.

---

[104] On this see: Max Walther, Pondus, Dispensatio, Dispositio, Werthistorische Untersuchungen zur Frömmigkeit Papst Gregors des Grossen (Diss. Bern, 1941). Walther traces the classical, biblical and patristic use of the word without insisting on any simple lines of force. In the New Testament one text seems important, where Paul speaks of the aeternae gloriae pondus and its infinite preponderance over the light afflictions on earth (2 Cor. 4.17), but it is unlikely that there is here any reminiscence of the weight of kabod. Still less R. Reitzenstein's reference (Hellen. Mysterienreligionen, 3rd edn., 355) to Mandaeism.

[105] Moralia in Job II.8; cf. II.14 (PL 75. 565CD, 575C).

[106] Mor. X.7 (PL 75. 928C).

[107] Cuncta Videns minime videtur . . . cum mentem in consideratione Majestatis ejus attollimus. Mor. XVI.15 (PL 75. 1040BC).

---

[108] Mor. V.4 (PL 75. 683A).

[109] XVIII.28 (PL 76. 93–96).

[110] Mor. XVII.15 (PL 76. 29C).

[111] 1 I. *In Ezech. h.*10 (PL 76. 896A).

The philosophical theme of beauty, which had receded in Benedict and Gregory, is the more ready to be drawn out afresh, the more the theological theme of glory stands in danger of being constricted or not being recognised and exploited in its full breadth and depth. So for Isidore of Seville the beauty of the world becomes, quite in the manner of Antiquity, the most excellent way to God: 'from the beauty of the limited creature God lets us have a glimpse of his own beauty which is unlimited, so that man can find his way back to God along the same paths by which he turned away from him; and he, who from love of the creature alienated himself from the form of God, can again through the beauty of the creatures return to the primal beauty of God.'[112] Thus we light upon the germ of the aesthetics of the Carolingian theologians: in their affirmative engagement with classical culture, with representative art, which however, in conscious contrast to Byzantium, will be seen in the libri Carolini as a worldly, not immediately sacral or sacramental glorification of God and his kingdom.[113] This 'Christian freedom' will be won precisely through the fact that the authentic values of the art and literature of Antiquity were seen and acknowledged, and that the introduction of these values into the Christian realm was achieved by the freedom of allowing validity to the partial within a surpassing whole. Is not God, as he appeared in Christ, the insurpassable beauty to which our heart is more spontaneously attracted than it is to the always disappointing beauties of the world? 'What is easier to love,' asks Alcuin, 'than beautiful forms, sweet tastes, gentle tones, lovely scents, pleasureable feelings, the glories and joys of the world? The soul easily loves what will pass away like a fleeting shadow; and would it not be still easier for it to love God who is eternal beauty, eternal sweetness, eternal gentleness, eternal fragrance, eternal pleasure, eternal glory, eternal blessedness? Especially as Holy Scripture lays on us nothing more than that we should love God our Lord with all our heart, with all our soul, with all our strength and our neighbour as ourselves, and that we have the promise from him who cannot deceive that his yoke is easy and his burden is light? Indeed love of this world is more wearisome than love of Christ, for what the soul seeks in the world it never finds—blessedness and eternity—for this lowest beauty passes away and perishes, and sooner or later leaves its lover in the lurch or is abandoned by its loves. The soul therefore should hold itself to its own border (ordo).[114] It is, in Augustinian fashion, the greater love which is right, but which now—something more than Augustine—justifies the inclusion of classical beauty within Christian beauty: and so it will remain right through to Alan of Lille, to Dante, and to the Florentine Renaissance.

---

[112] Sent. I; PL 83. 540.

[113] PL 98. 1187–1188. In addition, Br I.267f.

c. The World as the Interpretation of God

JOHN ERIGENA

In Erigena's late Carolingian synthesis Western presuppositions are flooded with the results of Greek speculation: first Gregory of Nyssa in his boldest systematic utterances, then the Areopagite, who is freshly translated and commented on, and above all Maximus the Confessor who, himself already a synthesis of the whole theology of the East,[115] is likewise made available through the translation of his principal work, the Ambigua, taken over in his systematisations and inexorably built up into an all-embracing system of God and the world. What Erigena does in solitary daring at the beginning of the Middle Ages, Nicolas of Cusa will repeat at their end with just the same solitude and daring: the whole world-picture taken over from the philosophers and fashioned into a Christian utterance. For while it is doubtless Plotinus who provides the material for intuition and concept (in Denys' version), all this is nevertheless rendered dynamic—as one can already see in the Origenist Peri Archôn—in a biblical and historical way: for the outflow of creation from God and the archai, and the return of the world of the senses to its origins in God is a temporal process, the critical turning-point of which is Jesus Christ who brings into the static philosophy of Plotinus an eschatological stress and presses on to an insurpassable end. If God is at the beginning uncreated, creating nature, then the archai are created and creating nature, the sensible world created, but no longer creating nature, so that at the end, when everything has returned to him, God will be uncreated, but also uncreating nature: 'for what should the divine nature still create, when it will be all in all and will appear in nothing else than itself alone?'[116] This short question points in a flash to the problem: is God as it were exhausted by the process and is his explication at an end? Is Erigena in his radicalisation of Greek patristics to be seen as a precursor of Spinoza and Hegel, who also sought to offer a Christian philosophy?[117]

---

[114] Dial. de Rhetorica et Virtutibus; PL 101. 946AB.

[115] Cf. my book: Kosmische Liturgie, Das Weltbild Maximus' des Bekenners, 2nd edn., 1961.

Doubtless Erigena wants to be a believing Christian, neither Christology (as the doctrine of Incarnation and Redemption) nor the doctrine of the Trinity presents him with any difficulty; but because in Christ the whole truth of God has become manifest, he is necessarily the personal inclusive concept and inner pinnacle of all philosophy. The more universal standpoint is therefore always right. In the conflict between ratio and auctoritas the conclusion must be: nil aliud . . . vera auctoritas nisi rationes virtute reperta veritas.[118] But [116] Works after the edn. of H. J. Floss in PL 122. DN = De divisione Naturae, CJ = Commentary on John, P = De Praedestinatione. DN V.1019BC.

---

[117] Anton Staudenmaier (Joh. Scotus Erigena und die Wissenschaft seiner Zeit I, 1834) thinks fit to enlist the support of the ancient systematician in his attack on Spinoza and Hegel. On Erigena's sources: Henry Bett, John Scotus Erigena (Cambridge 1925).

[118] DN I.513BC, 'True authority is nothing else than the truth revealed by the power of reason.'

veritas is not properly to be found in the masterful concept but in the clear vision of the incomprehensibility of God which is no less emphatically extolled by Erigena than by Plotinus and Denys.[119] So ineffable is God that he can never be seen by any creature in his blessed eternity as he is in himself:[120] 'they would be blinded by the dazzling radiance in his sublimity';[121] 'the flowing radiance of the divine goodness is so mighty that it is changed, for those who wish to behold it, into darkness.'[122] So is 'the ineffable sublimity, withdrawn from all, designated as desert,[123] and if we designate the ways of being in the world that are entrusted to us as being, then God is not-being, 'which has emerged out of nothing into the something [of the world]'.[124] Indeed God is essentially unencompassable, even therefore for himself; 'it can at most be said: he understands himself, in so far as he understands that he is not conceivable'.[125] But it does not at all follow for Erigena that God goes out in the archai, the categories and individual things, in order to conceive himself; rather he insists on the two-edged claim that, in all theophanies or epiphanies in nature and grace, cosmos and Holy Scripture, it is the non-manifest that appears, the inconceivable that is conceived. Creation is non apparentis apparitio, occulti manifestatio, negati affirmatio, incomprehensibilis comprehensio, ineffabilis fatus, inaccessibilis accessus, inintelligibilis

---

[119] And not only is God, transcendent over the world, incomprehensible, the ways and manners of his processions, even the ways of the return of the creature into the primordial origin remain unsearchable. God 'moves himself' secundum excellentissimum modum, nulli creaturae cognitum 'in a most excellent way, unknown by any creature' (DN I.522C), the creatures are changed ineffabili modo Deoque soli cognito in suas causas 'in an ineffable way whose causes are known to God alone' (DN V.989D). Such expressions are very frequent. Cf. 671C.

[120] [Angeli] Trinitatem . . . non per seipsam aspiciunt, sed in theophaniis comprehensibilibus sibique connaturalibus '[the angels] behold . . . the trinity not in itself, but in theophanies comprehensible and connatural to them. DN V.1000BC.

[121] DN III.623D.

[122] DN III.681B.

[123] CJ 304C.

[124] DN III.681A.

[125] DN III.620CD.

intellectus ... informis forma, immensurabilis mensure, innumerabilis numerus, carentis pondere pondus, spiritualis incrassatio,[126] invisibilis visibilitas, ... indefiniti definitio, incircumscripti circumscriptio.[127] And each time there is as much emphasis on the first word, indeed perhaps more than on the second. In the continuation of the text the example of the human spirit is introduced which, being invisible and remaining so, makes itself known in signs and parables, whereby the double-sideness of the phenomenon is expressed still more clearly: dum silet, clamat, et dum clamat, silet; et invisibilis videtur, et dum videtur, invisibilis est, ... et dum vult, vocibus et literis incorporatur; et dum incorporatur, incorporeus in seipso subsistit.[128] Indeed he can go so far as to say that 'the spirit also penetrates other hearts without vehicula and is mixed with other spirits and becomes one with them, and while it does this, it remains ever in itself. While it moves itself, it stands still, and while it stands still, it moves itself.'[129] It is therefore certainly manifest as spirit but in its transcendence over its manifest form, in which its freedom becomes apparent, that is, its being able to be quite other and therefore its being quite other.

The absolute otherness of God is especially manifest in the fact that the world is put together from contraries, indeed from contradictories. 'God creates not only the like but also the unlike, for he is himself both the like and the unlike. He is therefore the ground of contradictory things.[130] 'For he is the likeness of like things and the unlikeness of unlike things, the opposite of contraries and the contradiction of contradictories. And all that he gathers together and reconciles in a wonderful, inexpressible harmony. What appears disharmonious in itself, is, regarded within the all-embracing harmony of the universe, harmony and melody.'[131] If God had created for himself only the like then 'it would appear that he had failed in the creation of contrary and contradictory things and he would not be shown to be the creator of all things that reason had declared to be realisable.'[132] Together with Maximus Erigena here transcends the Origenist doctrine of the fall which traces the distinction and opposition between finite natures back to a cosmic fall (veluti ex diametro sibi invicem e contrario repondent).[133]

---

[126] According to Gregory of Nazianzus and Maximus Confessor: ὁ λόγος παχύνεται. Cf. Kosmische Liturgie loc. cit. 347, 518f.

[127] DN III.633AB, 'appearance of the non-apparent, manifestation of the occult, affirmation of the denied, comprehension of the incomprehensible, ineffable utterance, inaccessible approach, unintelligible understanding, ... form without form, incommensurable measure, innumerable number, weight lacking weight, spiritual distention, invisible visibility, ... definition of the indefinable, circumspection of the uncircumscribable.'

[128] 'While it is silent, it calls out and while it calls out, it is silent; and the invisible is seen and while it is seen, it is invisible, ... and while it wills, it takes form in sounds and letters; and while it thus takes bodily form, it remains incorporeal in itself.'

[129] DN III.633C.

[130] DN II.510D–511A.

On the other hand the freedom of God is so securely established for Erigena by the absolute transcendence of the absolutely universal origin over every particular manifestation that any introduction of particular voluntary decisions by God into the universal history of the world seems to him blasphemous. Whence his decided struggle against Gottschalk's double predestination, and his attempt in the liber de Praedestinatione to enlist Augustine in his support. Philosophy and evangelium plainly converge here, the more so, as they must fundamentally be convertible one into another;[134] for as from the philosophical viewpoint only goodness can flow from the all-good origin, so Scripture never speaks of a double, but only ever of a single predestination, namely to the good:[135] Romans 8 and Ephesians 1 are rightly brought forward as the chief witnesses.[136] And the worldly oppositio of the elect and the reprobate must necessarily be dissolved in a final harmony, in which Erigena (with Origen, both Gregories and Maximus, but also with support from Plotinus and Augustine[137]) lets the damned by punished through the 'non-existent' illusoriness of their sensible natures, a Hell, which as absolute finitude cannot therefore in any way be thought of as coextensive with the divine, infinite eternity.[138] If the fire of punishment is depicted on the one hand as the self-destructiveness of sin and on the other as the unique glory of God as it is made known in its relation to evil—a theme which Nicolas of Cusa will take up—then this is no contradiction: it is the self-destructiveness of the lie in the flame of the immediate radiance of the truth. As the beauty of a virtuous man is exalted by his bearing within himself the possibility of vice, but as transcended, so the eschatological beauty of God in the universe is the victorious transformation of all evil into the good.[139] Erigena here (with the above-mentioned Greek fathers) uses the classical, aesthetic justification of evil through the cosmic harmony of opposites in a different way from Augustine and his followers,[140] who are in earnest in their attempt to make the notion of a Hell co-eternal with Heaven credible to us. The Greek argument—from Heraclitus to Plotinus—only works if redemption in Christ is thought of cosmically, in the manner of the Greek fathers, continued by Erigena, grasped afresh by Nicolas of Cusa and taken still further by the Idealists.

---

[131] DN II.517BC.

[132] DN III.637BC.

[133] 'They correspond to each other as diametrical opposites.

[134] P I.1: Conficitur, veram esse philosophiam veram religionem, conversimque veram religionem veram philosophiam (358A). On the place of the book in the events of the time, cf. Maïeul Cappuys OSB, Jean Scot Erigène (1923), 102–127. 'It is established that true philosophy is true religion, and conversely that true religion is true philosophy.

[135] P IV.369f.

[136] P XI.3, 398C–399B.

Is all this biblically acceptable, or has the classical, philosophical thought-form finally triumped over the biblical content? The theological intention is clear. In the incarnate Word, who is the historical Christ (he is not relativized), lies the unity of all wisdom;[141] through his Cross and his blood human nature, which fell in Adam (and was torn into sensuality and sexual differentiation), is quite fundamentally[142] saved;[143] pleads in beautiful prayers for the full understanding of the Word of Christ, in which the ever-greater mystery of God reigns.[144] And so the 'philosophical' insight into God's majestic glory is brought to bear on the unique form of the revelation of God in Christ. He is addressed in what follows: 'You are always sought and always found and yet evermore not found; found in your revelations (theophaniis), in which, in a manifold way and as in mirrors, you encounter the spirit of the one who seeks you, in the way in which you are pleased to communicate yourself—not revealing what you are but that you are and what you are not—but in contrast not found in your transcendent nature, in which you transcend and rise above any understanding that resolves on understanding you and raising itself to you.'[145] But the two motives—the cosmological and the biblical, the revelation of God in nature and in the Word—remain ordered one under the other: both fall under the same category of 'symbol',[146] both are equally 'not appropriate' when it comes to mediating what is distinctive about God.[147]

---

[137] De Gen. ad litt. XII.c. 32–33, n. 60–64; PL 34. 480–482.

[138] On the seeming character of Hell and its punishments: P XVII (417f.), DN V.949f., 971f., that Hell cannot be coeternal with Heaven: 963D.

[139] DN V.972AB. In this sense there is in the end plenissima pulchritudo . . . absque ulla dissonante [natura] harmonia: ibid. 965B 'the fullest beauty . . . a harmony without any dissonant nature.

[140] Cf. above vol. II.126f. (Augustine), 331f. (Bonaventure); vol. III. 82f. (Dante). Erigena speaks from the standpoint of a doctrine of universal salvation: nulla pulchritudo efficitur nisi ex compagine similium et dissimilium, contrariorum et oppositorum. DN V.982CD 'no beauty is realised except from the joining together of like and unlike, of contraries and opposites'.

---

[141] CJ 139D–140A.

[142] Cf. the posing of the question: DN V.1003: how far is the whole healing of nature already a coupled event through the death on the Cross?

[143] DN IV.748AB; DN V.1002B, 1007C; CJ 306C.

[144] O Domine Jesu, nullum aliud praemium . . . a te postulo nisi ut ad purum absque ullo errore fallacis theoriae verba tua, quae per tuum Sanctum Spiritum inspirata sunt, intelligam . . . Quoniam nihil ultra rationabilis anima etiam purissima inveniet, quia nihil ultra est. Ut enim non alibi aptius quaereris quam in verbis tuis, ita non alibi apertius inveneris quam in eis. DN V.1010C. 'O Lord Jesus, I ask no other reward except that of understanding your words; which art inspired by your Holy Spirit, purely, free from any error of false theory . . . For even the most pure rational soul will find nothing else, because there is nothing else. For as you will find nothing more appriopriate than in your words, so you should not seek anything more plain than in them.'

[145] Ibid. 1010CD.

[146] CJ 307AB; DN I.507B.

[147] DN I.518.

Add to that, the fact that Erigena takes over from Maximus[148] the doctrine of the three laws—the law of nature, the law of Scripture (Old Testament) and the law of grace (New Testament)—in accordance with which the law of nature prescribes that we 'love all our fellowmen equally' (because in all there is the same nature), the law of Scripture 'is a help to the law of nature' and the law of grace (which can only be obeyed in the grace of Christ) demands the readiness to die not only for good men and friends but also for the wicked and our enemies.[149] The law of nature is therefore formulated here in a way already implicitly Christian and the law of Christ appears so to speak only as its final consequence. From this point on Erigena can build up the beautiful teaching that natural human love already (consciously or unconsciously) has to do with the primordial image of man, the Son of Man, Christ, and that therefore those who have aimed no higher become blessed in the man Christ, while the followers of the law of grace are raised to the blessed vision of his Godhead.[150] Christ is the imago, man is only fashioned ad imaginem; whoever loves his neighbour is directing his love to the imago, Christ, and thus himself becomes the image.[151] But for the follower of the crucified one the Son is the Bridegroom who leads his own to the spiritual marriage, to 'deification' (theôsis).[152] The turning-point of the world's history is Christ's death on the Cross when he breathed out his Holy Spirit and thereby introduced the return from matter and of the letter to the Spirit and finally the raising-up of all phenomena to the origin.[153]

The return by which the creature is raised up seems to respond to the going-forth which gave it being; the going-forth is depicted as the splitting-up of the centre into the radii, of the sun into its rays, of the one Idea (verbum) into the partial ideas (as world-principles), and from the principles things are poured forth. But within these there lies a kernel of striving after return, so that Erigena, on the basis of mature consideration, likes to assign the resurrection both to grace and to nature;[154] there consists no tendency to self-annihilation but only to a fulfilment beyond any conceiving: only formally is 'the end like the beginning';[155] it is the Christian blessed fulfilment that is meant beneath the Plotinian (indeed Buddhist) turn of phrase: the Chalcedonian ἀσυγχύτως finds,[156] through Maximus, an eschatological application: ascent into God, without mingling of substance, without annulment of individuality, but in such a way that God is all in all, which is a New Testament phrase (1 Cor 15.28), fashioned out of the Old Testament 'God is all' (Sir 43.27). The risen Christ now already fills the world, so that 'only a madman could say that his body is contained within the world':[157] boldly Erigena explodes the whole picture of the cosmos (today designated as 'mythological') and subordinates it to an unimaginable ideal or archaic firmament. Carefully, patiently, but inexorably, he demythologises the eschatology worked out in cosmic categories by many a Church father (Basil, Augustine) in order to make room through the philosophy of Antiquity for an ultimate vision of the whole Christ[158] in the harmonia compacta[159] (Nicolas of Cusa will speak of complicatio) of the 'manifold enfolded into unity'. So everything is resolved into a gloria of God manifesting himself in Christ who as flamma ultima totum mundum implebit in the claritas manifestationis in omnibus.[160]

---

[148] Kosmische Liturgie loc. cit. 288–312.

[149] CJ 309AB; DN V.1003C.

[150] DN V.1012A.

[151] Ibid. 1013CD.

[152] Ibid. 1011B, 1014–1017.

[153] DN IV.744D–749A.

---

[154] ambabus cooperatricibus, ipsa quidem natura et gratia, resurrectio perficitur, so indeed that grace works this miraculum miraculorum, but with the cooperation of natural causes. DN V.902CD.

[155] DN V.870C; 892D.

[156] DN V.894A. In the integration of the world it will be as in the integration of notes to a harmonious concord, in which 'each single note, be it produced by a human voice or a wind instrument or the lyre, does not lose its own quality'. The same applies with several candles which unite their light: non confunduntur, sed solummodo adunantur. Correspondingly with the intregration of the world. DN V.883.

[157] DN V.993B.

[158] DN V.994B.

[159] Ibid. 987B.

[160] Ibid. 997A, D, 998A 'as ultimate flame fills the whole world in the brightness of his appearance in all things.'

The question remains open as to whether such modes of thought are appropriate to their Christian content or whether Erigena (and later Nicolas of Cusa), although he meant something else, was not compelled by the logic of hs concepts to give expression to what he did not really mean. He wants to speak of 'creation out of nothing'[161] but rejecting pre-existing matter (as set forth in the Timaeus) he rejects any matter at all and is content with the 'radiations' of first principles, out of whose union and conjunction (as with Gregory of Nyssa) the individual things come to be. The mediation of this 'created-creating' nature, which is to be met with again in the twelfth century in Chartres, but which as the flowing emanation of God achieves no consistency, is not adequate to express the free encounter between creator and creature of the biblical understanding. And when, in imitation of Plotinus and Denys, the harmony of the world is depicted as the indwelling of the divine love in things, as amor—for amor est naturalis motus omnium rerum[162]—then such a category is insufficient to express the distance between this immanence of the divine love in nature and its epiphany as caritas in Christ. All is grace, said Erigena, but there is a distinction between dationes, those divine gifts by which each nature is rooted in itself, and donationes, by which existing nature is adorned, so that each being (including the subhuman) consists of datio and donatio, natura and gratia.[163] Datio is the gift of human existence as this particular being but donatio means that the being participates in all the values of the good and the beautiful.[164] Even in this doctrine, with its profoundly religious tone—which will hold good until the beginning of high Scholasticism—the basic biblical assertion cannot find expression. Here (in Greek fashion) the creaturely nature is throughout preconceived theologically, so that, when biblical revelation comes on to the scene, the theological language has already been exhausted and Christian reflection has to make do with the same categories. The ineffable glory of God may be strongly expressed in word and concept: but if, at the same time, it is defined as the point from which the diverging rays proceed and to which they return, then this God-point can be constructed through such convergence and it is then nothing more than the fixed point of the harmony of the world. In the same way the seven liberal arts have each their reason and their purpose: dialectic has usia, arithmetic monas, geometry signum (the point), astronomy atom, music tonus (whether this is to be understood as the single note or as harmony[165]). And if music is again taken cosmically—as the 'discipline which establishes by the light of reason the harmony in all existing things, whether they are in motion or at rest, and in all natural proportions'[166]—then God's being and will is primarily only the place where the oppositions of the world are softened into harmony: as with polyphonic music (organicum melos) where the qualities of sound which are so remote from one another are fitted together according to the laws of harmony, 'so the harmony of the universe is brought into unity according to the uniform will of God (uniformis voluntas) out of the different constituents of nature which, considered one by one, clash with one another.'[167] If this is the reason why Erigena so decisively rejects double predestination and why it is in listening to music that the 'inner sense of the spirit' (interior sensus . . . mentis) finds its point of unity in which the sounds are integrated into the unity of harmony,[168] then the philosopher genuinely hears the harmony of the world from the 'God-point', something which is then affirmed as a requirement and mystical possibility.[169] In these aspects of the doctrine the whole philosophy of the Renaissance up to Bruno, the whole of Idealism up to Schelling, is already perfectly transparent; so much are they branches springing fom the roots of Western thought, that they must spring forth by a kind of natural necessity. The paths to a valid distinction between philosophy and theology have now been clearly marked out in intellectual history, in a process which has not even today come to an end.

---

[161] DN III. 634Af.

[162] DN I.519B.

[163] DN III.631D.

[164] Ibid. 631B.

---

[165] J. Handschin, 'Die Musikanschauung des Johannes Scotus' in D. Vierteljahresschrift f. Lit. u. Geistw. V (1927), 320–321. DN V. 868D–869C; cf. DN II.602: the law of primal ground and goal applied to the individual elements.

[166] DN I.475B. There are also harmonies, for the knowledge of which the light of faith is necessary: CJ 343D.

[167] DN III.638A.

[168] DN V.965D–966A.

[169] DN V.970.

But again and again it has to be said that Christian thought, in appropriating to itself classical concepts—no, formulas of experience—does not thereby principally take over a world-view which has to be 'demythologised' but an encounter with God through the cosmos, into the heart of which it injects its own revelation of God. What it takes from Antiquity and carries forward is the enormous courage of its affirmation of being in any form (over against Asiatic weariness), its heroic endeavour to trace everywhere the kalon and the agathon, indeed even blindly to presuppose it wherever the apparent form of reality pointed to straightforward dissonance. Because for Antiquity the point of harmonisation is called God—and man only in so far as he imitates the activity and image of God, which is to say in his piety—Christianity could then inject into this theological cosmology its doctrines of grace, redemption and justification as the decisive kernel. It could say 'beauty' and mean 'glory'. But that here an objective confusion of language occurred becomes apparent to the beholder in the fact that the 'glory' of the crucified love of God is here above all presupposed rather than contemplated. This separation will take a long time to develop, along very obscure ways, and, in the moment when it appears ripe for a breakthrough, the Areopagite's 'sacral image of the world' will break once again like a flood on high Scholasticism and be determinative up to the time of Nicolas of Cusa, whose vision will be taken over by the Florentine Plotinians and again resolutely classicised. If Luther then broke the spiritual world in two in order to salvage 'glory' from the amalgam, if our own time gives up altogether the classical-theological tradition of beauty and no longer wants to read the order of the world theologically: what will become of mankind? It is to this alarming question that the way we must now tread will lead.

3. TRANSITIONS TO PHILOSOPHY

a. Sacral Monism

THE VICTORINES

It is not the lonely figure of the thinker, Anselm of Canterbury, that will give inner form to early and high Scholasticism but the view of human existence, mediated by Boethius and bearing his mark, uncannily radicalised by Erigena. Anselm alone took the distinctively Christian mysterium out of the philosophical monstrance and made of it the object of a passionately concentrated contemplation and inquiry: why did God become man? Why redemption through the sufferings of the God-man? All the data of the historical revelation had to be made to yield their inner logos and to come together into a synthesis,[170] the foundations of which certainly were laid down by the Fathers, Irenaeus, Athanasius, Augustine, but which now for the first time was constructed on a stringently pure theological basis. Anselm's synthesis had no real successor, for even Bernard and his school, emphatically patristic in reaction against the rising philosophism of Abelard, clothed their experience and utterance not in a primarily biblical but in a spiritual, contemplative, mystical robe of ultimately classical origin.[171]

Still more strongly and, for the ensuing ages, more authoritatively does this unity of classical and Christian contemplation control the school of the Victorines, centred on HUGH, who 'with his interests in mysticism writes the first aesthetic treatise of the Middle Ages'.[172] For such mystical aesthetics nothing is more characteristic than its taking over the classical, Boethian erôs without a break into Christian agapê: the words amor, dilectio, caritas are used as synonyms; even the sharp contrast between caritas and cupiditas points simply to the twofold—right or wrong, ordered or disordered—direction of amor.[173] Amor is, as for Boethius and Erigena, the vital-subjective side of the harmony of the world, which is rooted in God and therefore must necessarily (in the sense of the Symposium) be universal but as God's love at the same time uniform: love for all in the unity of God or love for the one God who himself loves all as Creator and Redeemer. Ergo omnes Unum unice diligant, ut omnes ab Uno unice diligantur, quia nec alius praeter Unum unice ab omnibus diligendus est, nec alius praeter Unum unice omnes diligere potest.[174] This unice (ἑνιαίως) is in line both with the (neo-) Platonic integration of all individual beings and individual loves into the all-embracing divinity and the biblical 'specificity' of the love of Yahweh for Israel, which as such becomes universal in Christ. To such balance between natural and supernatural love there corresponds in Hugh the balance between the immanence and transcendence of God, and therefore between the love of God in all things and the love of God beyond all things in himself. The restless impulse we find in Denys and Erigena (still to be found in Richard of St Victor in both his treatises on 'Benjamin') to tear to pieces all the veils of world-symbols and penetrate into the wayless abyss of God is in Hugh (in a Christian? or aesthetic? manner) softened into a love for the beauty of the world which as such is the first and steadiest bridge to the love of God. If the things of the world are simulacra (ἀγάλματα) invisibilium, through their countlessness a holy indication of God's power, through their beauty a holy indication of God's wisdom, through their usefulness an indication of God's goodness, then is 'the indication through image of the beautiful in cognitione prius, quia in manifestatione evidentius',[175] and because man 'as created wisdom is the principal sacrament of wisdom', he is as visible beauty the door but as invisible spiritual beauty the way to the contemplation of God.[176] Form (forma) is as such beautiful (formosa) because it is the mastering of unordered stuff (order, harmony) and therefore 'the determined form (formatum) is more like God than that which lacks form'.[177] Form is always the being arranged in relation to one another of parts (for example, body and soul in man) and therefore harmony, that is objective pleasure and blessedness; the love of one's own flesh (Eph 5.29) 'is music'[178]—and becomes pure music when the spirit is loved more than the flesh, an imitation in miniature of the objective music of the world. As all existence in the world is music (according to Boethius) and therefore pleasure, 'so too everything is created for man's delight (deliciae)'; it is therefore simply a matter of using and contemplating nature in 'ordered love' anagogically so as to be raised up to God. Significantly altering an illustration of Augustine's, Hugh demands of us that we not only admire the beautiful scriptural signs in the book of nature but learn to read them. For he only really sees, who understands the signs.[179] The legibility rests on the fact 'that visible beauty is an image of invisible beauty', that an 'affinity' (cognatio) and 'friendship' (amica similitudo) holds between the two realms, that man, who is in himself already the point of contact between the sensible and the spiritual, can experience and interpret the whole world as the beautiful body which gives expression to the glorious Godhead.[180] Hugh would like us to learn to experience 'the beautiful forms which delight the eye, the gentle aromas which quicken our sense of smell, the softness of bodies which are pleasant to the touch and welcomed with caresses',[181] as a universal approach to us of the inconceivable love of God, which creates us, gives us the world and dies for us.[182] In this sense he repeats the ancient derivation of kalon from καλέω, to call: God calls us back to himself through the beauty of the world.[183] Hugh knows indeed that of the two books which God has given man to read—that of nature and that of grace (of the Incarnation)—the first certainly presents objective beauty, though 'cannot enlighten the eyes of the beholder from within', while the second gives the power of sight with the truth'.[184] From this point of view the philosophical theoria remains pure theory, even though Hugh, and after him Richard, develop a doctrine of man in which the power of the imagination takes over step by step the mediation of the bodily to the spiritual, the symbol to truth.[185] But on the other hand it is almost the case that the light of grace is the means by which the spiritual senses are restored to grasp the universal harmony of love, by looking beyond transitory beauty to that which is permanent. 'The fashion of this worl passes away, says the Apostle, but the form, the grace, the beauty of this world, which is the other world, does not. This other world is in this world and this present world is less than that, for that world embraces this, which cannot however comprehend that.'[186]

---

[170] See above, vol. II, 211–259.

[171] For the connexions see Endre von Ivanka, Plato Christianus. Übernahme und Umgestaltung des Platonismus durch die Väter. Johannesverlag 1964.

[172] De Bruyne II.238.

---

[173] Hugh's works cited from PL 175–177, as vols. I, II, III. Cf. II.15D–16A: amor est dilectio cordis, . . . desiderium in appetendo . . . Ordinate ergo caritatem, et jam malum nullum est. II.958: licet beatum esset, isto amore te [scil. animam] vel solam perfrui, . . . affectus dilectionis expanditur, caritatis gaudium . . . ampliatur. 'Love is the delight of the heart, . . . desire in longing . . . Therefore set love in order, and, now it is nothing evil.' 'It is allowed that it may be blessed for you to enjoy this love, each alone . . . the feeling of delight expands, the joy of love increases.'

[174] De arrha an. II.959A, 'Therefore all things uniquely love the One that they may be uniquely loved by the One, because nothing other than the One is to be uniquely loved by all, nor can anything other than the One love all things uniquely.'

---

[175] Didascalicon 7.16; II.823D–824B.

[176] Ibid. 7.17; 824D.

[177] Ibid. 824A.

[178] Musica haec est ut ametur caro. Didasc. 1.13; II.756D.

[179] Didasc. 7.3; II.814.

[180] Expos. in Hierch. Coel. 1.2; I.949–950.

RICHARD adds only a few new features to all this: a stronger emphasis on the element of mystical experience in the symbolic, contemplative ascent, even where the excessus is supra rationem and ultimately praeter rationem,[187] because in

---

[181] Ibid. 950AB.

[182] Arrha an. II.959f.

[183] In Hierch. Coel. 1.5; I.1007; 1.3; I.982C.

[184] Ibid. 1.1; 926BD; cf. QQ in ep. Pauli: sine omnimoda gratia nihil potest videre oculus mentis. I.442.

[185] De unione corporis et spiritus III.286–294. Richard, Benj. major I. c. 6; PL 196. 70f.

[186] De arca Noe morali 4.9; II.680.

[187] Benj. mai. 4.17; PL 196. 156AB.

God major est dissimilitudo quam similitudo.[188] And further, because the folly (infatuatio) of human reason results in a final Christian intensification of erôs, which is depicted in the treatise de Quattuor gradibus violentae caritatis. It is the longing which turns to 'burning', 'drunkenness', furor, desperatio, 'madness' (insania),[189] but which is seen as the following of the God who 'has emptied himself in taking human form'. Therefore the mystic too must descend again into the ordinary world but in such a way that together with Christ he now wants to be 'anathema for the brethren' and in the 'madness of love' casts himself under the wheels of the omnipotence of the divine righteousness because his love too has become omnipotent in God:[190] erôs, which at last reveals itself as pure caritas; classical theoria with philosophical admiration (Richard always emphasizes admiratio[191]), which attempts to penetrate through the harmony of being into the innermost mystery of love of the same being. For this reason, too, biblical allegory is never pressed so far, is never so conscious of its goal and so unburdened as in Saint Victor. As with Gregory the Great it is again above all the complex of the Old Testament symbols of the days of Creation, the ark, the tabernacle, The Temple, of the Song of Songs, the visions of Ezekiel and of the Apocalypse which give to the ascending contemplation a similarly darkling gold background as in the splendid words of the Areopagite. Already with Bernard and his school and again with the Victorines, the Song of Songs becomes in a way the essence of the meaning of the world: here with the highest biblical authority human (and why not cosmic?) erôs is guaranteed and confirmed as the unmediated expression of all the mysteries of caritas, human passion as passionate feelings passes over without a break into the divine passion as the sufferings of Christ, enraptured love of beauty becomes the revelations of ultimate truth and wisdom: enthusiasm and inspiration flow into each other. No-one could reproach these theologians—Rupert of Deutz, Bernard and his friend, William of St Thierry, Richard, Philip of Harveng, to name only a few of the greatest names—with any clouding of the purity of the Christian heart; if they go much further than has been known yet in the history of theology in their use of erôs for the language of agapê, they stay all the time within the catholic universality of this love: the Bride is the Church (even mankind as a whole), realised symbolically in Mary, and the soul only in so far as it consents to the Church's love (as anima ecclesiastica).

---

[188] Ibid. 162D.

[189] De 4 gradibus; PL 196. 1212–1213.

[190] Ibid. 1222–1224.

[191] The Allegoriae in Vetus Test. (attributed to Hugh: PL 175, 635–750) belong to Richard too.

'For these synthetic thinkers, who embrace the world in a religious totalitarianism, beauty is infinitely wider than for the moderns.'[192] This vision of unity is the signature of the age and embraces such contrary spirits as Bernard and Suger of St Denys, who are diametrically opposed to one another in their aesthetic viewpoints: the one the advocate of the greatest possible simplicity, the other the defender of an ecclesiastical architecture for which nothing can be too costly, too magnificent or too great to serve as a monstrance for the Christian mysteries:[193] he writes the Magna Carta for cathedral architecture which in the spirit of the Victorines leads from earthly beauty by means of an aesthetic and mystical anagogy 'up to spiritual perception of the higher beauty'. We find contrary spirits too like Hildegard who in her visions sees divine truths, attitudes and deeds embodied in powerful cosmic symbols, and the quarrelsome Gerhoh of Reichersberg who in Christology defends the essential equality of the glory of the glorified Son of Man to that of the Father against a modernist rationalism.[194] They are all members of the same spiritual family, manifest most clearly in their common front against the new profane philosophy: they represent the world-view of an unbroken sacrality.

---

[192] De Bruyne, II.111.

[193] Suger of St-Denys, Libellus de consecratione Ecclesiae a se aedificatae: PL 186. 1239–1254.

[194] In a similar spirit Rupert of Deutz writes his book de Victoria Verbi Dei: PL 169. 1218–1507.

b. Discovery of the World

THE SCHOOL OF CHARTRES

The School of Chartres meditates on the origin of the world, drawing its inspiration both from the Timaeus and Genesis (ad litteram and secundum physicam): the interest shifts from God to the cosmos, symbolised in poetic myth by the 'goddess Physis' (Natura); to be sure, her metaphysical 'place' is derivative, standing in the third position after the opifex (Father, God) and the Ideas (whose embodiment, the feminine Noys, is the Platonic Nous)—considered in trinitarian terms it is the place of the Holy Spirit, Platonically the place of the world-soul. It is important that the two superordained principles only come into view for the natural philosopher in so far as they help to constitute the cosmos: the opifex as creator of matter, Noys as the one who arranges and adorns it. The focal point of the perspective has sunk, the vision is no longer, as with Denys and Erigena, directed towards the infinity of God (even where he is understood as the centre of the radii) but towards the centre of the cosmos, the uniting of matter and form, which is essentially where man is to be found, as the embodiment of the world: microcosmos. So at the beginning of Bernardus Silvestris' poem about the world (De mundi universitate seu Megacosmus et Microcosmus)[195] nature cries out weeping to Noys that matter is raw and without order, Noys complies and carries out the work of ordering the world by planting the ideas of God (and this includes the universal as well as the individual) in matter. Then she glorifies herself before Physis because of what she has done and promises to crown her with her fashioning of mankind to which Physis (as distinct from natura) contributes the elementary part, Noys the eternal and divine. So man comes into being as divine and earthly at the same time. The point of intersection of matter and form (as embodied Idea) is frequently described by the Chartrians as the marriage of Heaven and earth, and at the same time as erôs and harmony.[196] Matter's way of ascent to the point where it takes form, the Ideas' way of descent to being materialized, awake a countless number of soaring, dynamic world potencies (as Pantomorphos, Urania, Genius, Psyche, Venus, etc.) which come closer to a return of the cosmic δαίμονες of Antiquity than to pure 'allegories', behind which however the highest Godhead, who bears the name tugaton (the Platonic Good), fades into unreality.

---

[195] Bernardus Silvestris, De Mundi universitate, ed. by Barach and Wrobel, 1876. Reprint 1964. Extracts in Victor Cousin, Ouvrages inédits d'Abélard (1836), 627.

It is here that ALAN OF LILLE's two nature poems, Planctus naturae and Anticlaudianus, the latter powerfully influential,[197] have their roots. In the first, Nature bewails the corruption of man which however does not primarily consist in sin against God (or Christ) but in the unnatural sin of sodomy. The dress of nature in the Planctus, the pictures in her house in the Anticlaudianus, as well as the description of the garment of Theologia, restore to these forms much of the magnificence which, woven out of classical themes, had been placed round the shoulders of the Godhead. Nature is God's viceroy, prima vicaria procreatrix, and as such takes over his attributes.[198] Again it is obliged 'to bind all together with one another though the legitimate marriages of proportions',[199] and in these marriage settlements 'to mint (monetare) the pure Ideas of Noys in the individual forms of things';[200] the union of matter and form is described as connubium, osculum, unio, also as concretio, growing together, which draws attention to the erotic undertone of the concept of the 'concrete'.[201] Certainly nature humbly confesses herself the originate handmaid of the unoriginate God, she confesses also her lack of familiarity with theology which, while it does not teach what is opposed to nature, at least teaches something different. In the first poem she calls on the priest, Genuis, who paints the pictures of things on parchment (a borrowing from Bernard) and who pronounces the anathema against all sinners. The second poem provides the positive supplement: nature wants to bring forth a perfect man in the place of rejected man: he will have to be God and man at the same time, therefore she needs for the soul a heavenly, supernatural helper. Prudence praises the plan; Sophia's help is enlisted; the seven liberal arts build the vehicle for the journey to Heaven; the matter is presented to theology; the ascent is made through the crystal heaven into the empyrean; in the place of God the Ideas dwell, as also Mary and Christ; the highest God grants the request, he directs Noys to choose the best Idea; the perfect man is fashioned and in a final battle (modelled on the Psychomachia of Prudentius) has to overpower all the vices. What is striking in all this is that while Christ is certainly to be found in this Heaven of virtues and Ideas,[202] though only as the son of Mary, he nevertheless remains apparently without a role in the new creation of man. And yet he is to become the 'heavenly man',[203] even the 'divine man' who 'will be human on earth and divine in the firmament, and so man and God at the same time'.[204] In which reality does the doctor universalis place us? 'The motive of the redeemer is introduced again and again without ever becoming established . . . The whole content of the history of salvation and of the heavenly hierarchy is effectively excluded.'[205] Huizinga means that the ethical and cosmological symbolic figures, which should be integrated at the heart of the perfect man, refer back to a sphere where 'the aesthetic and the intellectual were still unseparated, where philosophies sprung up within mythologies', where also 'the dogmatic formulations' were rooted.[206] A mythical sphere, then, which however without serious deliberation is placed immediately next to the Christian, dogmatic world to which Alan of Lille quite naturally belongs.

---

[196] Mundum silva [=hyle, materia] matre progenitum ne maritum sponsa gloriosior imparem recusaret, cujusdam foederis pactiones providentia curavit, quibus silvestris coelestisque natura congruo per congruos numeros modulamine convenirent. (Cousin 628). 'The world was begotten by matter, lest the more glorious bride make an objection against her unequal husband, the agreements of whose agreements providence has cared for, and they agree naturally by congruent modulation, though congruent numbers, both in earth and in heaven.'

[197] Just what the central figure of Natura applies to: M. Gothein, 'Der Gottheit lebendiges Kleid' in Arch. f. Rel. wiss. IX (1906), 337f. etc.

[198] Alan's works in PL 210; Anticlaudianus in the critical edn. by R. Bossuat (P 1955; by book and verse number); Planctus Naturae: critical edn. by Wright, The Anglo-Latin satirical poets of the eleventh century, II. –476B.

[199] 433C.

[200] Ode to Nature, 447–448.

---

[201] J. Huizinga, 'Über die Verknüpfung des Poetischen mit dem Theologischen bei Alanus de Insulis', in Mededeelingen d. kon. Akad. Amsterdam (1932), 89–199; cf. p. 121. E. R. Curtius, Europ. Lit. c. 6: Göttin Natura, which gives literature and connexions from the late classical Orphic hymn on Physis to Goethe's 'Fragment über die Natur' (Tiefurter Journal) which sets out a resolution and expansion of the Orphic hymn (translated by G. Chr. Tobler) with additions from Shaftesbury. 116–117.

[202] Anticlaudianus l.V.505–543.

[203] Ibid. l.V, 392.

[204] Ibid. l.I, 236, 239–240.

But his main interest lies in the cosmogonic, ideative process: how do the Ideas (in God) come to form (in things)? It is the ontological aspect of the problem of universals that exercised the philosophers of Chartres most intimately. God in this is only the terminus a quo. And since Alan actually attempts to reduce the whole of theology to an axiomatic basis (Regulae de sacra theologia[207]), the doctrine of God and the Trinity in particular is handled in axioms. It is the God who for Erigena was the identity of the converging world-lines but who now, necessarily, forfeits the classical tremor before the tremendum and the ineffabile. Alan's axioms will be influential: monas gignit monadem et in se suum reflectit ardorem,[208] Deus est sphaera intelligibilis cujus centrum ubique, circumferentia nusquam.[209] Omne esse ex forma est, with the explanation: cum Deus forma dicatur, quia omnia informat, et omnibus esse donat, recte omne esse a forma dicitur.[210] This is the universal teaching of Chartres, which necessarily sounds pantheistic, although it is not so intended, but is the result of the concept of God derived from world-convergence. So for Thierry of Chartres God is the forma essendi of things,[211] for all forms are ultimately 'indifferently' established in a unique form, the form of being.[212] So above all for GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE God is primarily pure form without any matter, from whom all forms proceed, first as Ideas, then as forms engendered in matter and growing together (formae nativae, concretae). Lest God be understood as the pure form of being (id quo) for worldly reality, Gilbert restores the creaturely concretion as composition to God himself (who has the Godhead for the id quo and the tripersonality for the id quod), something that brought upon him Bernard of Clairvaux' accusations and very nearly ecclesiastical condemnation. But is perhaps that being, which Gilbert sees as the universal form of the world and from which he cannot construct God, perhaps not God at all but the same mysterious reality, which the other Chartrians pointed to in speaking of Physis as the embodiment of the world—that reality which in another Platonic dialect (for example, that of Denys) is designated as the first and fundamental emanation or archê? And if that were so, would not the legitimate translation and continuation of the problematic thus opened up be the speculation, that unfolded in the thirteenth century under Dionysian influence, about being and its transcendental properties? That will be dealt with later. But it is hardly surprising that Amalric of Bène and David of Dinant, in following the teaching of Chartres about the constitution of the natural kinds through the one act of being of God as form, and in reverting to Erigena, arrive at a true pantheism, against which—too late—proceedings are instigated with ecclesiastical censures and the ban on the writings of Erigena.

---

[205] Huizinga, loc. cit. 142, 174.

[206] Ibid. 179.

[207] PL 210. 621–684.

[208] Regula 3; 624, 'A monad begets a monad and in it reflects its own ardour.'

[209] Regula 7; 627, 'God is an intelligible sphere whose centre is everywhere and circumference nowhere.'

[210] Regula 14; 629. Two of these axioms were taken up in the book, made up of 25 axioms about God, Liber 24 philosophorum: ed. by Bäumker, Studien und Charakteristiken (1927), 194–214, 'When God is said to be form, because he informs everything, and gives being to everything, rightly he is every being said to be from the form.'

The impenetrable darkness of the objective problem of universals—how is universal nature present in individuals?—was pushed into the background by the struggle over the subjective aspect—how can the universal be recognised in individuals? The turning-point, associated with the name of PETER ABELARD is an event in so far as with the emphasis on the understanding's power of abstraction (though without as yet any satisfactory theory of the process) a demystification of universals resulted: since the mind, raising itself above individuals, fashions them out of the comparison of similarities, universals are no longer simply the sacred ultimate reasons lying next to the Godhead (ἀρχαί or πρόοδοι[213] or primordiales causae[214]), but general properties which the mind masters and which now no longer unambiguously transcend the individual. For Abelard they are indeed more or less vague general properties whose cognitive value diminished by contrast with the clear experiential knowledge of particulars: from here the route lies clear via Thomas to Ockham.[215] So while in this way the this-worldly, both particular and universal, comes together in the vision of the philosophers, space is again created for the incomprehensiblity of God.[216] The development of logic as an independent philosophical discipline has contradictory consequences for theology: on the one hand, a theological rationalism which will prove everything rationally right up to the Trinity itself; on the other, a defence of the mysterium through the method of sic-et-non.[217] On the first line lies the confidence that God has granted to the heathen by the light of reason the essentials about God, the Trinity and the Incarnation; so that those who will to follow this light can be saved—a catholic breadth which enrols Abelard in a great family tracing its descent from Maximus and Erigena and continuing through Nicolas of Cusa, More and Erasmus to the Enlightenment; the second line can be subordinated to the first as philosophical dialectic (for reason rules the sic as well as the non) and so once again endangers the Christian mysterium. So overall the pathos of knowledge as mastery of the world prevails and makes itself felt even in the theological realm: in cosmology God becomes the ultimate cause that constitutes the world, in logic the object of the system of axioms; moreover, in a daring new physics, he becomes the primordial model of worldly being.

---

[211] De sex dierum operibus (Hauréau), 61.

[212] Boethiuskommentar, ed. by W. Jansen in: Der Komm. des Mag. Clarembaldus zu Boeth. de Trin. (1926), 16*.

---

[213] Denys, Div. Nom. 2.11: PG 3 649B; cf. 11.6: χύσις 956B.

[214] Erigena, DN III.622B.

[215] In addition cf. Gilson, La philosophie du Moyen Age (2nd edn. 1952), 286–287.

[216] Theologia christ. III; PL 178. 1242A.

[217] Sic et Non, ed. Cousin (1836).

This new physics (conceived as the doctrine of nature but it could also be called metaphysics) understands the essence of being as Light.

ROBERT GROSSETESTE, the Chancellor of Oxford and Bishop of Lincoln, sharply sketched out the physical dimensions of this theory, certainly not without patristic inspiration from Basil, John Philoponus and Augustine, but also from Arabic treatises on optics. The Liber de Intelligentiis of Master Adam in Paris had made the spread of physics in to metaphysics and theology inevitable; Alexander of Hales and especially Bonaventure and Albert had taken over aspects of this, likewise the Franciscan Bartholomew of Bologna worked out the physical theory in his de luce theologically, while Dietrich of Freiburg worked it out neo-Platonically.[218] For Grosseteste light is matter: formam primam corporalem, quam quidam corporeitatem vocant, lucem esse arbitror.[219] But light has the property (according to Aristotle) of being able to extend from a point subito, timelessly, like a globe, so far as its power reaches, and therefore to multiply itself and beget itself. God therefore needs only to position one indivisible point of light to create the world; as this extends itself, material space will come into being. Grosseteste explains the distribution of matter into spheres, individual elements and individual bodies from the relations of reflexion of light reflected back on itself. The wonderful actuality and activity of the matter of light makes it appear in the sub-spiritual world as that which is most like the spiritual, indeed most like God;[220] not only is [218] Grosseteste, Philos. Werke, ed. Baur 1912 (G. Ph.). L. Baur, Die Philosophie des R. Grosseteste (1917); ditto, 'Das Licht in der Naturphilosophie des R. G.' in Festschrift Hertling (1913), 41f. Liber de Intelligentiis with detailed historical commentary ed. by Cl. Bäumker: Witelo 1908 (L d Int).

---

[219] 'the first corporeal form, which certain call corporeity, I choose to call light.'

[220] G. Ph. 52.

light in accordance with its nature both opening and revealing (manifestabilitas), but it has in its self-multiplying light in accordance with its nature both opening and revealing (manifestabilitas), but it has in its self-multiplying and 'as it were, self-begetting'[221] a power which is an analogue of life and spirit. Without appealing to the world-soul of the Timaeus and the School of Chartres, Grosseteste provides something like its physical justification and prefigures Schelling, Soloviev and Teilhard. How light begets colour will be shown in a special treatise. How through its reflection the numerical relationships develop, how through both light becomes the fundamental element of beauty and of the adornment of the universe,[222] can readily be ancitipated. Even the beauty of sound is derived from the beauty of light in contrast to the traditional theory of world-music which contrariwise traced back the optical to (in the wider sense) the acoustic laws of harmony. It is therefore hardly surprising that such a thinker should draw on the Augustinian theology of light and illumination in order to comprehend the process of coming to know the truth; as he does in his de Veritate, but without confusing physics and theology. Creaturely truth shows up only when it is seen in the light of eternal truth, just as colours show up in the light, and then becomes capable of revealing an existent thing, just as the colour revealed by the light for its part reveals bodies.[223]

But Grosseteste has also expressed this act of divine radiance of light in another way, this time in close dependence on Thierry, Alan and Gilbert's classical manner of speaking which had designated God as the form of all things. 'It seems to me that this is right: that God is form and the form of all things.' Form of such power at once of expression and of reality that it creates for itself its own matter on which it stamps itself and lends to it being and shape in an unbroken process of imprinting. Ipsa [Dei forma] simul exemplar est et efficiens et formans et in forma data conservans.[224] Creation is therefore a process of imprinting and expressing the form of God in individual forms and this artistic process awakens in Grosseteste first of all the concept of the beautiful: 'What then is form if not the being in itself of a thing and its fulfilment? But God is a still open finality, an imperfectible perfection, and therefore the most beautiful shape that shapes all else: forma formosissima et species speciosissima; he is as the one who forms all through himself formositas omnis formosi.'[225]

---

[221] Cited by Baur from the unpublished commentary on the Hexaemeron: Philos. des. R. G. loc. cit. 81, 83.

[222] G. Ph., introduction by Baur, 76*.

[223] G. Ph. 137: Potentia est lucis summae veritatis, quae sic illustrat veritatem creatam, quod ipsa etiam illustrata ostendit rem veram. 'The power of light is that of the highest truth, which so illuminates created truth, that what is illuminated also manifests true reality.'

Grosseteste is a discoverer and speaks soberly; the liber de Intelligentiis worked the thought to death in a massive expenditure of effort which moreover axiomatizes God in the manner of Alan. It is true that in John's Gospel Christ calls himself the Light of the world and that God himself is Light without any shadow, as it is true that Augustine and Denys had let this biblical glory of God stream forth in a cosmological glory of light. But the consciousness of the unapproachability of God meant that not for one moment could they think that the concept of light could be applied to God univocally or even in such a straightforward analogy as holds between matter and spirit. That Master Adam does this and thus fashions a metaphysics of light that embraces naive theology, philosophy and physics, points again to the already-mentioned lowering of the focal point. God is unity, the world is manifold and has its origin in God sicut rivulus in fonte.[224] If therefore 'the first substance is light', as maxime divinum et nobile, then all 'participation in light is participation in divine being'.[227] Light is physically and metaphysically simplicitas et sui multiplicatio, therefore it is also diffusivum sui esse et influens in aliud.[228] Light is the most active, the most living,[229] in itself almighty,[230] the self-revealing; it is, as reflection, spirit and knowledge;[231] it is experienced as the most delightful, the purely delectable.[232] God is therefore eternal desire and blessedness in himself;[233] therefore too the desire for knowledge in the creature is that material and spiritual expansiveness which reaches out into the finite and encounters there a related yet other extension, knows like through like,[234] and lets that other desire come to rest in its own desire; it is erôs, amor. This metaphysic which transforms being from top to bottom into a radiant, flowing glory—the poetical expression of which will be Dante's Paradise, where all the forms are of light which stands out against other light and yet communicates in the universal light—has retained only a few references from biblical theology which help to justify an all-embracing cosmological parable.

---

[224] De unica forma omnium; G. Ph. 110.

[225] Ibid. 108.

[226] L d Int 3, 'as a stream in a fountain'.

[227] L d Int 8, 9.

[228] Ibid. 9, 'being flowing from itself and into another.'

[229] Ibid. 13: vita est actus entis diffusivi sui esse in aliud.

[230] Ibid. 17.

But all these cosmologies together with their theological short circuits—God as being and form of the world—will be overtaken by the rising Aristotelianism which teaches the cosmological thinkers to construct worldly being, to which their interest is directed, neatly out of matter and substantial form and so to achieve a reality which does not come into existence through a depotentiation and dissection of the divine All-and-One, but is posited as one and good in its own right. With this Aristotelian foundation the thirteenth century could anticipate without anxiety the new Platonic assault, which—with a repeated Dionysian wave, initiated by Thomas Gallus and with a Proclus quickly gaining importance in the form of excerpts in the liber de causis—advocated a renewed form of the relationship of God to the world as dynamic, radiantly flowing 'processions' out from God: of being in general, of the true, the good, the beautiful in general, etc. Out of this encounter between Aristotelian existences and Platonically flowing being there is born, put schematically, the transcendental philosophy of high Scholasticism, which, from now on as philosophy (which knows itself to be exactly

[231] Ibid. 14, 15.

[232] Ibid, 16.

[233] Ibid, 23, 28 (Axiom 23.3).

[234] Ibid. 23f.

distinguished from biblical theology[235]), dares to maintain that all being as such is not only one, true and good but also beautiful.

c. Transcendental Aesthetics

FRANCIS, ALEXANDER, ALBERT, ULRICH

Philip the Chancellor was the first to develop in his Summa de Bono a treatise about transcendental properties of being, those, that is to say, which transcend every species and belong to every existent as such;[236] from this the author and compilers of the Summa Alexandri developed their own broader explanations,[237] then followed the anonymous writer from Assisi who was perhaps the young Bonaventure;[238] in 1245 Albert gave an exposition of Denys which Thomas Aquinas and Ulrich of Strasbourg heard, from a part of which the treatise de Pulchro et de Bono was developed, a transcript of which (in Naples) is probably in the hand of Thomas himself[239] and which clearly bore fruit for Ulrich in his treatise de Pulchro.[240] Thus during the decades from 1230 to 1270 the question of the transcendentality of beauty enjoyed wide prominence,[241] however it was solved: beauty identical with goodness or with truth or as itself a final, proper transcendental. With Scotus and the Nominalists the question is silenced, apart from stragglers like Ryckel (Denys the Carthusian) with his treatise de venustate mundi et pulchritudine Dei[242] and Nicolas of Cusa, who carries the mediaeval view forward into the Renaissance.

---

[235] Thomas separates the philosophical doctrine of God or metaphysics (theologia quam philosophi prosequuntur, quae alio nomine metaphysica dicitur) very clearly from the theology of revelation of Holy Scripture: in Boeth. de Trin. 5.4.

[236] H. Pouillon OSB, 'Le premier traité des propriétés transcendentales. La Summa de bono du Chancelier Philippe' in Rev Neoscol. Phil. 42 (1939), 40–77. Possibly the Summa Duacensis, which only survives in fragments, offered the chancellor a model (on dating: P. Glorieux, La Summa Duacensis, 1955, 9f.). A couple of appendices to our question from William of Auxerre: Summa Aurea (printed in Paris, 1500), lib. 2, tr. 9.4 (fol. 57d), lib. 2, tr. 13.1 (fol. 67a) on the nature of beauty and the identity of goodness and beauty.

[237] Summa theologica, 4 vols. and supplementary vol.: Quaracchi (1924–1948): cited as SA.

[238] Tractatus de transcendentalibus entis conditionibus (Assisi, Biblioteca Communale Codex 186) ed. Dieter Halcour, in Franzisk. Studien 41 (1959), 41–106 (cited as TrT); in addition: D. Halcour, Die Lehre vom Schönen im Rahmen der Transzendendalienlehre der Metaphysik der frühen Franziskanerschule von Paris (Diss. Masch. Freibg. 1957), with literature (cit: Halc).

[239] Cited after the edn. of the Opuscula omnia S. Thomae, ed. Mandonnet, V.417–443.

The hunch that the posing of the question of transcendental philosophy in general, especially as it applies to the beautiful, is bound up with the Dionysian Renaissance is supported by the facts: with Alexander the most important support from the tradition comes from the Divine Names; Albert comments on this book; it is through his own commentaries on Denys[243] that Thomas is stimulated to a thematic and more original handling of the question and thus gives up for the time being 'his typical lack of interest in the question of beauty'.[244] Bonaventure's theology is throughout determined by Denys,[245] Ulrich's treatise derives from the second book of his Summa which is 'put together and arranged entirely from the point of view of the Divine Names',[246] and so already points externally to a connexion with the Areopagite.

---

[240] Edition and commentary by M. Grabmann, 'Des Ulrich Engelberti von Strassburg O. Pr. Abhandlung De Pulchro' in Sitz. ber. bayr. Ak. Wiss. 1926.

[241] Important collection of texts: H. Pouillon, 'La beauté, propriété transcendentale chez les Scolastiques (1220–1270)' in Arch. Hist. Doct. Litt. MA 21 (1926), 263–329.

[242] Opp. omnia (1907) XXXIV, 227–253. In addition: O. Zückler, 'Dionys des Karthäusers Schrift De venustate mundi. Beitrag zur Vorgeschichte der Ästhetik' in Theol. Stud. u. Krit. (1881), 636–665.

[243] Kovach 54 (see following note).

[244] To have confirmed this forms the pricipal service of the detailed investigation of the sources by Francis Kovach: Die Ästhetik des Thomas von Aquin, Quellenstudien z. Gesch. d. Phil. ed. by P. Wilpert (Berlin 1961). Further: Winfried Czapiewski, 'Das Schöne bei Th. v. A.' in Freib. theol. Stud. 82 (1964).

[245] Cf. above in vol. II Bonaventure's synthetic vision of the Dionysian and the Franciscan, and of the transcendental-philosophical and the christological: 270, 352f.

[246] Grabmann, loc. cit. 28.

The significance of all this becomes clear as soon as one asks: what is the object of the metaphysical statement about being and its transcendental properties? Thomas, here at his most competent and free from the suspicion of any dependence on Denys, will designate as ens commune or esse, that which for him is neither God nor yet the sum of individual worldly entia nor (what finally suggests itself) a conceptual abstraction (conceptus entis) but the first created reality proceeding from God, by participating in which all beings really are, something 'abundant, simple, not-subsisting',[247] 'universal',[248] 'flowing',[249] participating in an infinite manner and thence in itself infinite,[250] lending form inexhaustibly,[251] which however is distinguished from God by the fact that God subsists in himself, while being only subsists in finite beings. This being which Thomas uniquely discerned with his sharp sight and comprehensively defended but which was intended by Denys when he described being-in-itself as the first procession from God,[252] and which without doubt was intended by the other Scholastics when they explained it as the object of metaphysics: this being is creaturely reality in so far as it is seen and conceived as the all-embracing manifestation of God. It is therefore a theophanic being, in the classical but also in a thoroughly Pauline sense (Rom 1.18–21; Acts 17.22–29), to which unity, truth, goodness and beauty do not belong as properties possessed at one's own disposal–how could they, since this being does not subsist as such?—but with which it rather, in so far as they adhere to it, refers to the primordial ground of being which replicates itself in it like an image: ipsum esse est similitudo divinae bonitatis.[253]

---

[247] De Pot. 1.1.

[248] Communissimum: De Hebd. 2.

[249] Emanatio totius esse as a general description of creation: S Th I.45.1. The whole question is headed De modo emanationis rerum a primo principio.

[250] C. Gent. I.43.

[251] formalissimum: De nat accid; maxime formale omnium: S Th I.7.1.

[252] Div. Nom. V.5 (820A); and above vol. II, 187–188, where Denys prefigures the Thomist actus essendi.

[253] De Ver. 22.2.2, 'Being itself is a likeness of the divine goodness.'

So this transcendental philosophy of the Middle Ages points back beyond the cosmos of late Antiquity, now really 'divinised' because closed in upon itself in the vibrations of its harmony of beauty, to another revealed being of God such as was met with in pre-Platonic Hellas. The kingdom of beauty (of the Thomist esee non subsistens) is as a whole, as being, transparent to a divine esse subsistens only comprehensible as mysterium, which is, as a hidden primordial ground, radiant glory. The elevation of God over being, now at last established by Thomas (over against all pantheism), secures at the same time for the concept of glory a place in metaphysics. This place was always intended and envisaged in every form of Platonism but while these addressed being and the other πρόοδοι reposing in it directly as 'names of God', the sublimity of God was not revealed as absolute freedom, the Godhead was therefore dragged into an unfree dialectic of in-itself and out-of-itself, hidden and revealed, resting and moved, as is the case with Erigena and is always the danger in all those who tie the innerdivine trinitarian process all too closely to the process of Creation,[254] something that later will have tragic consequences in German Idealism. The philosophy of the transcendentals was developed by early Scholasticism in a conscious approximation of classical ('natural') theology to a Christian understanding of the world, while by Thomas it would be methodically and neatly distinguished from Christian theology; all the same both shadowy notions remain close to one another and let the (natural-supernatural) theological a priori shine forth everywhere.

In this form the mediaeval, especially the Thomist, transcendental philosophy of being forms the (higher) centre and mediation between classical and modern metaphysics and in this context is the most valid representative of distinctively Western thought. It is required of being that as such it be something united, something true and something good and beautiful. The first, that it is something united, characterises every metaphysic, even Asiatic metaphysics, and does not allow the difference between being and God to emerge, just as the proposition ens et unum convertuntur positively obscures this difference and leaves the problem of different essences unilluminated. But that being is true, true and not illusion, not maya, is characteristic of the West from the time of Homer and the tragedians, and this truth holds precisely in difference: in the like-ness between God and being, in aequalitas or rectitudo (Anselm) as cor-respondence. And only on the basis of this truth can being as such be good and beautiful, in so far as the image-likeness means that God, in positing being, does the good and in so doing reveals the goodness which he is and which, as revealed, he acknowledges, approves and loves. Prima processio quae est in mente, est secundum apprehensionem veri, deinde illud verum excandescit et accipitur in ratione boni, as Albert splendidly says,[255] in imitation of an already-mentioned proverb of Alan's, which was, it must be said, intended in a trinitarian way.[256] But the doctrine of the Trinity is the final underlying guarantee of Western, transcendental philosophy: for only a triune God can render credible a world outside himself as true and good and yet in its free independence united with him, who is most free and most independent. The philosophical difference points back to a revealed, theological mysterium and is most happily confirmed by it. If the positing of something really united points back to the creative ultimate cause, to God the Father, then likeness, truth, correspondence point to the eternal aequalitas in God, the Son, who is the exemplary (or transcendently formal) cause[257] of the genuineness of being able to be opposite, and only then can the judgment of being good reveal the love between original and copy as the unifying spirit which offers a meaningful goal for the whole process. In this way the whole is good, an expression of divine goodness, whence the early Scholastic summa's call themselves de Bono by preference. Were the truth of being not secured first, then the good would remain a mere Plotinian outflow which could certainly guarantee the goodness of the one who pours forth but not of that which is poured forth. Thus Gilson is right to point to exemplarism as the heart of metaphysics.[258] [254] Thus Erigena, the School of Chartres, in his own way Eckhart, more prudently Bonaventure. Cf. Alex. Gerken, Theologie des Wortes. Das Verhältnis von Schöpfung und Inkarnation bei Bonaventura (1963).

---

---

[255] De pulchro et bono, loc. cit. 419, 'The first procession which is in the mind is according to the apprehension of the true, then the true itself is enkindled and is received in the reason of the good.'

[256] Monas gignit monadem et in se suum reflectit ardorem: Theol. reg. 3; PL 210. 624. 'The monad brings forth the monad and reflects its heat in itself.'

[257] On the relationship of exemplary and formal judgment: G. Schulemann, 'Die Lehre von den Transcendentalien in der schol. Phil.' in *Forschungen z. Gesch. d. Phil. u. Päd.*vol. IV. 2. Leipzig (1929).

In thus uncovering the trinitarian underpinning of such philosophy we have also revealed the external reason for the difficulty of assigning to the beautiful its systematic place: since the One, True and Good of being referred back to the trinitarian causality of God as Father, Son and Spirit, there seemed to be no more room in God for another transcendental. Whence, and in dependence on the Greeks, the first and most frequented way: that of understanding the beautiful as one manner of the good (καλόν καί ἀγαθόν). But the closeness of the beautiful to the concept of form and therefore to that which rests in itself, is pleasing in its shape and subordinate to no purpose, means it is also possible to see the beautiful as pertaining to the true. The Anonymus points to this oscillation of the beautiful between the transcendentals as a final, ineffable preciousness of being when he says: pulchrum circuit omnem causam et est commune ad ista;[259] and this in an expressly conclusive way because the beautiful, the good, the true, the one and being fundamentally presuppose one another. And yet even those writers who speak of the beautiful as a form of goodness or of truth may too be cited as witnesses to the transcendental validity of Beauty, not least those who let themselves be stirred by the great programmatic prepositions of the Areopagite about the all-pervasiveness of Beauty.[260] It is this which will have induced the already mentioned Anonymus to make the utterance, which is not further justified, that in general (communiter) four transcendentals were posited: the one, the true, the good and the beautiful.[261]

---

[258] La Philosophie de S. Bonaventure (12th. edn. 1943), 120.

[259] TrT 65. The author is able to refer to Denys, Div. Nom. 4.7 (PG 3, 704B). where it says that the good and the beautiful are to be striven after 'according to every reason'; 'the beautiful encircles every cause and is common to it.'

[260] Passages in Halcour, 126f. (Robert Grosseteste, Thomas Gallus, Albert, Thomas Aquinas, Bonaventure, Thomas of York).

The Franciscan Impulse. If human existence, ascending from the beauty of worldly forms and rhythms is confirmed a posteriori by the beauty of the world, the leap from the acknowledgement of sensible and even spiritual beauty to the proposition that being as such is beautiful can hardly be attempted from below. That it was attempted for the first time in metaphysics by the Franciscans is once again determinative for the theological a priori of Scholastic philosophy which was endeavouring to set itself apart from biblical theology. As the proposition defended by Plato, Plotinus and Denys presupposed a Greek eye for being, so now in the Middle Ages it presupposed a Franciscan heart. The attitude of St Francis justified a certain experience of being which fashioned for itself in Chartres a first unclear expression, was formulated by the Franciscan theologians and which in Bonaventure fused with the Areopagitical experience.

FRANCIS OF ASSISI wants 'discipleship of our Lord Jesus Christ in his humility and his poverty', 'who was not ashamed to become poor and alien for our sake' even to the point of need which makes 'alms its legal right . . . for need knows no law'.[262] It is a launching oneself into the world 'without bag, purse, bread, money or staff' which renders the disciple unable to put up any resistance to the wicked, which constrains him to offer the left cheek if the right is struck, which prevents any demand for restoration if one is robbed.[263] In the nothingness of impoverishment everything beyond bare existence comes to man as a gift and, if he has become poor for God's sake, then it is so that he might receive everything as a gift from God, because he recognises it in all truth as his free gift of love. The Franciscan life is therefore pure, glorifying praise for the glory of the grace and love of God which streams forth from every being. The 'Hymn to the Sun' is praise through nature and together with her; the original rule is still more radical in that it demands this attitude of glorification urgently and soberly first from the brothers, then from the Church and then from mankind as a whole. 'Let us refer everything good to the highest and most sublime God and acknowledge that all goods are his, and give thanks to him for all because they all proceed from him; and he, the most high, most sublime, unique, true God should have and hold and receive all respect and honour and praise and blessing and thanksgiving and glory, he, to whom everything good belongs and who alone is good.'[264] But the brothers should hold one another in such honour while they admonish and encourage one another: 'Fear and honour, praise and glorify, give thanks and pray to God the Lord, the Almighty in his Trinity . . .'[265] The rule comes to a resounding conclusion in the great hymn of praise and thanksgiving (no. 23) which addresses the 'most sublime God, the holy and just Father, Lord and King of Heaven and earth': 'For thy sake we give thee thanks' for the goodness of Creation, of Redemption and the hoped-for coming again in glory and, because the poor sinners cannot render such praise, they invite Jesus Christ with the Holy Spirit 'to give thanks to the Father for all, the glorious Virgin and Mother Mary, the angels, the saints and the elect in the order of salvation, then Holy Church in all her hierarchical orders, the religious, all children, boys and girls, the poor and needy, kings and princes, workers, farmers, employees and masters, all virgins, the single and the married, laymen and women, all minors, grown-ups, youths and the aged, healthy and sick, small and great, all people and kindred, all races and tongues, all nations and all men in the whole world, who live and will live: all we humbly beseech and implore, we lesser brothers and useless slaves', to love God the Lord 'who has given and gives everything good to us miserable and poor, rotting and loathsome, unthankful and wicked men.' Always and above all 'we will truly and humbly believe him and hold him in our heart, and love him and honour him, beseech, serve, praise, bless, glorify and raise him above all and extol him and give thanks to him, the most High, most Sublime and Eternal . . . who is without beginning and without end, unchangeable, invisible, inexplicable, inexpressible, ineffable, unsearchable . . . glorious, raised on high, surpassing, exalted, kind, lovable, attractive and always above everything else to all eternity the perfect object of our longing.'[266]

---

[261] TrT 64.

[262] Prima Regula S. Francisci n. 9; Holstenius: Codex Regularum III (German tr. in Balthasar, Die Grossen Ordensregeln (2nd edn. 1961), 296–297).

[263] Ibid. n. 14 (how the brethren should go through the world).

---

[264] Ibid. n. 17 (on the preachers).

[265] Ibid. n. 21 (on praise and admonition which all brethren can give).

The God of the poverello is in his glory very close to the ineffable, dazzling ocean of light of the Areopagite but his infinite streaming-forth is pure love which flows towards the one who praises in every element and creature in the world. The one who praises makes himself poor so as to be able to experience all being as the flowing love of God; so in the 'Hymn to the Sun' he passes 'from noble lord and brother Sun', 'sister Moon and star', gentle or harsh weather, from the spring, from friendly or fearful fire and from the material earth immediately on to those who 'for the sake of thy love forgive and overcome torment and trouble in peace', and to 'brother Death', like the elements gentle or fearsome, according as he meets a lover or a sinner.[267] But that means: 'Everything that makes it difficult to love God and anyone who makes it difficult for you, brothers or others, even if they beat you: everything you should look to as grace and wish it to be such and nothing else.'[268] Poverty as not resisting the flow of love has yet many other names: Queen Wisdom, Sister Pure Simplicity, Sister Holy Humility, Sister Holy Obedience; they all 'come from the Lord' and no-one possesses them without dying to himself beforehand; but their embodiment is the 'holy Virgin, the most holy Queen, the Mother of God, Mary', in whom 'all the fulness of grace and all goodness was and is'.[269] Yet this fulness of grace dwelling in her is God himself whose goodness contains originally within itself all the Franciscan and Marian virtues: 'You are goodness, you are each good, the highest good, Lord, the living and true God. Tu sei amore et charità, Tu sei sapientia, Tu sei humilità, Tu sei patientia, Tu sei bellezza, . . . Tu sei bontà infinita.'[270] God's beauty is revealed in the procession of his virtues amongst which Francis also names humility, which for him is one with the wisdom of self-spending love.

---

[266] Ibid. n. 23 (prayer, praise and thanksgiving).

[267] Cantico in Franz von Assisi, Legenden und Laude ed. by O. Karrer (3rd edn. 1945), 520–522.

[268] Letter to a superior, ibid. 554.

If one looks from here at the doctrine of transcendentals in the Summa of ALEXANDER OF HALES, what strikes one is the way the analogy between God and the creature is developed. Everything true, good and beautiful about the creature is a gift of the Creator; true, good and beautiful are names of God, are predicated formally of him and only per denominationem of the creature. In the case of the being of the creature such a double predication is rejected, for here there is primarily opposition: that being which God possesses as a proper name no creature can partake of, for no common nature embraces both.[271] In the expression 'being' (existing) there is reference only 'absolutely' to the reality of this particular thing here but, as soon as it appears endowed with properties of nature and value, the relationship to the All-Good becomes apparent. In Chartres therefore the work of creation (which only posits 'matter') is distinguished from the work of endowment (ornatus) whch precedes the infusion of divine powers and privileges into matter. Erigena similarly had distinguished between datio and donatio:[272] a doctrine of [269] Laude delle virtù etc. ibid. 534–536.

---

[270] Blessing and praise for brother Leo, ibid. 552.

[271] SA I, n. 105 ad 5; cf. n. 109 ad 5: ens vel essentia non dicit comparationem ad causam sicut bonum; immo cum loquimur de re secundum suam essentiam loquimur de ea absolute; sed bonum notat comparationem ad causam, bonum enim dicitur qui a Bono et quia ad Bonum. 'Being or essence does not speak of comparison with a cause as something good; rather when we speak of something according to its essence, we speak of it absolutely; but good does denote comparison with a cause, for something is said to be good which is from the Good and because it is ordered towards the Good.'

[272] See above, 'Erigena', p. 000 nn. 47–48.

analogia entis which as it were starts with pure equivocation (aequivocatio) so that it can proceed to ascribe everything that the ultimately dissimilar, null creature receives, in spite of all, to the outflowing goodness of God—and that, in the end, includes even human existence itself.[273] 'Alexander' imagines this was already sufficient to have put behind him Gilbert's doctrine, that God can be called in denominatio extrinseca the esse of the creature; but his solution will not hold: it wavers between the abolition of the analogy of being and (therefore!) emanationism. Only Thomas will achieve final clarity here and thus do justice to the Poverello's deepest concern to find the glory of God in the humility-poverty-beauty of all being.

But one sees how for the Franciscans the transcendentals, including beauty, can be a priori. They are the self-disclosures (notificationes) of the infusion of final reality and, in so far as this infusion prepares finite spirit to gain insight into and to express the absolutely true, there radiates also the (Dionysian) ray of beauty. Expressly, to be sure, only apropos the a posteriori knowlege rooted in the sensible;[274] and the Franciscan interpretation of the transcendentals is no different. Even Francis had, as the Legenda say, 'discovered the transcendent beauty in beautiful things'.[275] But why is beauty transcendental then? The answer begins with the fundamental identification of the beautiful with the authentically good, in order then to continue to a conceptual prescinding from it and to approximate it to the true. The authentically good is (by contrast with the useful) the good-in-itself, to be aspired to for its own sake—that is the definition that Aristotle and Cicero gave—and that not simply because it is perfect (perfectum) in itself but, beyond that, because it is not contained in itself but opening, communicating and radiating itself (diffusivum sui)—corresponding to the Platonists. But while as itself fulfilled it helps the unfulfilled other to fulfilment (and therein acts preeminently as the 'good' worth striving for), in communicating itself it gives participation in its own unitedness: its united-fulfilled being (unum) is manifest and approachable (verum) in such a way that it does not relate the other to itself for its own sake (utile) but leads it in its self-communication to its own unitedness and perfection: it gives form as the perfect one; itself form (as unum) it impresses and ordains the other into the form. Here in the self-outpouring of the good lies the moment that reveals itself (embracing all other transcendentals) as beauty. The pulchrum relates itself to the causa formalis;[276] not for nothing is formosus derived from forma, speciosus from species, an idea of Augustine's[277] which he took over from Plotinus[278] and Hilary[279] and passed on to the Scholastics. At this point the beautiful can be seen as distinct from the good and shows its affinity with the true which on its side is grounded in the one. Form is unitedness in itself; the self-illuminating form offering itself to knowledge however is the truth; in so far as in self-existing form it remains unattainable and unavailable in its revelation, it is beautiful; for it points to its essential transcendent, sublime glory.[280] But then (as the Anonymous of Assisi adds, going beyond Alexander), no single thing is ever true for itself alone; precisely because it is true in virtue of its own form, by which it distinguishes itself, this distinction and therefore the connexion, the agreement (consensus), the harmonious accord of the individual existent with the universe belongs to the truth, and this truth 'gathers all individual truths into being and holds and protects them there according to their proper duration, and is a unique'[281] transcendental. Here it finally becomes clear how these thinkers could raise beauty to a property of being-in-itself and how they had to do this precisely from the interconnection with the one, the true and the good, with none of which the beautiful could be finally and completely identified. Even the conceptual constraint of the Trinity which would like to conclude with the Good was broken because in the beautiful a moment radiated which pointed unquestioningly from the good to the true (and therefore also to the one); 'The good tends towards that which flows from the origin by reason of its lack of differentiation, the beautiful towards that which flows from the origin by reason of its differentiation.'[282] That is: God is for us so much the good that he remains, beyond any fulfilment offered us, the unique and unapproachable: beyond the love of union there is the love of letting be (out of love). Here the beautiful stands as the constellation above the truth which in its differentiatedness from unity appeared to us as the Western charisma. The fourth transcendental is the seal of that charisma.

---

[273] SA I, n. 116 resp. Alexander takes over the formulation of William of Auvergne. Cf. A. Masnovo, Da Guglielmo d'Auvergne a San Tomaso d'Aquino (Milan 1930), I.203f.

[274] SA I, n. 72.

[275] Thomas of Celano, Vita 2a S. Francisci, c. 124, n. 165.

---

[276] SA I, n. 103 contra 1.

[277] Ver. rel. 40, c.20 (PL 34.138f.), Divers. quaest. 83, q.10 (PL 40.14).

[278] Ennead I.6.2; cf. the commentary of F. Creuzer, Plotini liber de Pulchritudine (Heidelberg 1814), 171f.

[279] Hilary, De Trin. II.1 (PL 10.51); on its use in scholasticism, cf. above vol. II, 296–297 (appropriation of beauty to the Son within the Godhead, because he is species).

[280] SA II, n. 76.

[281] Assisi Bibl. Comm. 186, 50 vb (cited from Harbour, Die Lehre vom Schönen, 140).

Hence the frequently quoted saying of Thomas: pulchra dicuntur quae visa placent,[283] with its deeper justification: pulchrum respicit vim cognoscitivam (beyond the distinguishing ratio of the good), central in its simplicity, if also traditional. It is found in William of Auvergne who, extending the proposition to the sensible and spiritual, includes the inner and outer 'vision'[284] and therefore traces it back to the Greeks and to Augustine.[285] Just as the Thomist account needs a transcendental broadening, so too with Augustine's well-known definition of beauty as partium congruentia cum quadam suavitatem coloris—a definition which can be pursued back beyond Basil and Plotinus to Clement of Alexandria, Philo, Cicero and the Stoics.[286] The Scholastics will attempt to understand the sensible moment of the charm of colour as a partial expression of a transcendental 'enchantment' of being. But this will occur more on the ontic than on the ontological level, more as a matter of natural philosophy than as metaphysics in so far as the Franciscans of Oxford—close to whom Bonaventure stands—seek to contain the radiance of God in the world as Francis had experienced and praised it within their theory of being as light. Moreover for Grosseteste the material sun is a genuine likeness of God in that by illuminating and warming it unites all things, gathers them to itself, befriends them and gives them peace.[287] Thomas of York in his Sapientale persists in an immediate thought of unity which grounds the transcendentality of beauty in this circular way: everything is beautiful because it stems from God, the primal beauty, who is the unity of all that is manifold. He needs, in order to validate this conclusion, a cosmological induction which he summons from the right place: in Cicero's de natura deorum where the world was described in detail as the most perfect and most beautiful.[288] For Bonaventure reference should be made to Volume II.

---

[282] SA I.103.

[283] S. Th. I.5.4 ad 1, 'those things which please when seen are called beautiful'. 'It refers to the beautiful as a prayer that makes [something] known.'

[284] De bono et malo (in: Pouillon, La beauté etc. loc. cit. 315): Quemadmodum enim pulchrum visu dicimus quod natum est per seipsum placere spectantibus, et delectare secundum visum, sic et pulchrum interius quod intuentium animos delectat et ad amorem sui allicit . . . Ipse interior visus testis est nobis interioris et intelligibilis pulchritudinis. 'For just as we say that something is beautiful to sight because it is made to please by itself those who look upon it, and to delight in a visible way, so [we speak of] interior beauty because it delights the souls of those who behold and arouses them to love of it . . . Interior vision itself is a witness to us of interior and intelligible beauty.'

[285] Plato, Hipp. major 297e, 299a; Gorgias 474d; Aristotle: 'That is beautiful which is pleasant through the mediation of sight and hearing': Topics 6, c.7 (146a22); Plotinus: I.6.1, first sentence; Augustine; De ordine 2.11, n. 33 (PL 32.1010). Texts collected by Halcour: 44.

The Dionysian Impulse. By contrast it was only through the revival of Dionysian inspiration that the Dominicans achieved a transcendental aesthetic which however because of its drawings on Aristotle assumes clearer contours than Franciscan aesthetics. With Albert both strands of the aesthetics of Antiquity—the Aristotelian one of harmony and the Plotinian one of light, which had never formed a proper opposition—converge effortlessly; with Ulrich Denys once more gains the upper hand; with Thomas the true balance is found through his metaphysics of esse and essentia and his emphasis on secondary causality which that made possible.

---

[286] De Civ. Dei 22.19, n. 2 (PL 41.781); proof of its influence in Pouillon, La beauté, 276–277, and Halcour, 49–50; 'congruence of parts with a certain gentleness of colour'.

[287] Dionysioskommentar, in extract in Pouillon, loc. cit. 320–323.

[288] Sapientale. Extracts in Pouillon, loc. cit. 323–327.

ALBERT, as already mentioned, lectured in Cologne in 1250 on Denys' Divine Names and in his audience there sat Thomas and Ulrich. The exposition of the fourth chapter, which is most important for aesthetics, exists in printed form as the treatise de Pulchro et de Bono.[289] Albert proposes a definition which he continually repeats and from which he derives all further characterisations. The principal moment of beauty is: splendor formae substantialis supra partes materiae proportionatas et terminatas, just as the body is called beautiful because of the resplendentia coloris supra membra proportionata. Thence follow the results: the beautiful exercises charm, it draws forth longing, et hoc habet in quantum est bonum et finis. And the beautiful gathers everything together, et hoc habet ex parte formae, cujus resplendentia facit pulchrum.[290] Therefore, not simply a freewheeling harmony between parts, but a harmonisation in virtue of an essential, transcendent form which gives form to all the parts (the Aristotelian moment), but which as such clarifies in itself and reveals its sublime radiance precisely as determination (terminatio) and the fashioning of relationship in the material. Winckelmann and Goethe could accept this definition; it is classically Western. Not primarily a theological, but an essentially worldly determination, which describes the form of the world primarily as aesthetic and includes the good as an effect of the beautiful. The 'material' parts could also be 'powers and acts of the soul',[291] whereby the definition can be extended to include the 'beautiful soul' and even God who is rightly called the highest beauty, because he is the highest unity in the multiplicity of his attributes.[292] Therefore it can also be said in a theological way—from above—that God is called beauty and absolute beauty, not only because he is the effective ground of all worldly beauty, but because (as Gilbert and Grosseteste had already said) he 'creates through his nature'[293] and, as the effective cause, is at once the model and the (quasi-) formal cause.

---

[289] S. Thomae Opuscula ed. Mandonnet, vol. V, 417–443 (with many mistakes of transcription and printing). The booklet consists of an expositio textus in which are inserted 12 questions with dubitationes, solutio, responsiones.

[290] 420; 'the splendour of substantial form beyond the proportionate and determined material parts . . . the replendence of colour beyond the proportionate parts . . . and it has this insofar as it is good and an end . . . and it has this from the aspect of form, the resplendence of which creates beauty.

[291] 421.

Beauty has therefore a formal and a material moment: 'for beauty to exist, harmony (consonantia) as the subject (subjectum) and radiance (claritas) as the (shaping) nature (essentia) must come together.[294] Claritas is nothing other than the radiant and illuminating nature of the form of being, its self-mastery which it realises within itself and which 'from above' penetrates and orders what is inferior: quibus super*splendet claritas formae*. This self-mastery of a being, which however comes to it from being itself, is its being composed and present to itself, its perfection, in virtue of which it is also 'good' for another and worth striving for; if its own value is spiritual, then its goodness is honestas, which according to Cicero is that which sua vi nos trahit et sua dignitate nos allicit,[295] to which must be added, says Albert, only the moment of radiating over the proportionate parts in order to have beauty. The moment of gathering together is also already contained within the concept of form which Albet clearly distinguishes from mere radiating light: congregare convenit [pulchritudine] inquantum est forma, et secundum hoc non

---

[292] 423. Walter Müller (Das Problem der Seelenschönheit im Mittelalter, Bern 1923) points to the continuity of the thought since Plato and Augustine, and its highpoint in the twelfth-century commentaries on the Song of Songs.

[293] 423: facit per essentiam suam. The fourth question (p. 424) asks expressly whether the beautiful as such is effective; the solution lies in the transcendentality of the beautiful; in so far as the absolute being (God) is beautiful, it is effective as the beautiful (as form) which it is: pulchritudo quae est forma pulchrorum, facit pulchritudinem vel pulchra formaliter (i.e. in the manner of being a form), licet non effective.

[294] 426.

[295] De invent. rhetorica, II.157, quoted already by Albert (p. 419, q.2) and again (p. 427, q.6); 'honourableness . . . which draws us by its own power and allures us by its dignity'

convenit lumini.[296] Form is the higher concept, which includes within itself that of light,[297] a concept of light of not only physical, but metaphysical dignity.[298] The form determines the being, it is finally its being, in it lies its truth and, in so far as this being true as illumination is its own dignity of being (bonum), the beautiful radiates from it. Hence the deeply significant words: ipsi vero absolute respondet processio luminis; apprehensioni autem veri, secundum quod habet rationem boni, respondet processio pulchri.[299] And the establishment of transcendentality: inquantum unumquodque habet de pulchritudine, tantum habet de esse.[300] Being and form dynamically include one another in a reciprocal way; 'for esse est actus formae and form orders everything to its act (its self-realisation)'.[301] In so far as the unformed longs to be formed it strives after form as its good but, because this form gives it its being, it strives after it as something beautiful for it.[302] But, because God is infinite goodness and beauty, the creature can 'progress eternally in beauty and goodness according to the strength of its being ordered after the original and according to the access this gives the creature to itself.'[303]

ULRICH OF STRASBOURG writes his great, unfinished Summa de bono[304] as theology articulated according to a trinitarian plan. In the treatise on the unity of the divine nature (bk 2) he deals with the 'divine names', drawing here on Denys: the basic name is goodness to which are added other names like light, beauty, love (amor). Thus while Ulrich genuinely seeks to offer a doctrine of transcendentals, its emphasis will necessarily be not on being[305] but on God. His philosophical point of departure is Albert, with whose definition he begins: 'as the form is the goodness of each thing, in so far as it is perfection, which is desired by that which is being perfected, so is it also the beauty of each thing, in so far as in virtue of its formal nobility (formalis nobilitas) it radiates like light over that which is formed'.[306] But since there is resistance on the part of matter and since the form cannot completely fashion any matter but only that which is proportionate to it, beauty is to be determined complementarily as consonantia proportionis: between form and the formable.

---

[296] 427 (q.6, sol. and ad 1); 'to gather together is fitting [to beauty] in so far as it is form, and in this way not fitting to light'.

[297] . . . quamvis lucem omnia habeant inquantum participant de forma. 431.

[298] As de Wulf has rightly maintained: 'L'histoire de l'esthétique et ses grandes orientations' in Rev. Neoscol. 16 (1909), 236–259.

[299] 419 (q.1 sol.); 'To this indeed absolutely responds the procession of light, to the apprehension of the true however, insofar as it is genuinely good, there responds the procession of the beautiful.'

[300] 434, 'In so far as any one thing participates in the beautiful, it participates in the good.'

[301] 437 (q.11 sol.).

[302] Ibid.

[303] 438 (q.11 ad 4). For the other utterances of Albert on aesthetics, cf. Pouillon, loc. cit., 298f. and Grabmann (see n. 5 above), 16–18.

[304] Critical edn. of the first book by Jeanne Daguillon, 1930 (survey of the general plan: pp. 14*f.). The chapter on beauty (Bk II, tractate 3, c.4)

God is absolute beauty; because the form-light of his godhead informs the suppositum of his tripersonality in real identity (as it is put, under the influence of Gilbert), so he radiates forth creating omne lumen formale, quod est pulchritudo omnium rerum; and as the one corporeal light breaks up into colours according to the condition of the surfaces which it meets, so too the divine presents itself diversely according to the difference in those who receive it.[307] This statement is dangerously ambiguous: without qualification it sounds neo-Platonic; the difference of form contributes nothing to beauty.[308] This danger is only overcome, if the recipiens, as in Thomas' understanding, is not simply matter but in the first instance the essence which as such displays a positive, creative idea of God. Nevertheless Ulrich wants to counter the monistic tendency, underlining the fact that the divine beauty 'in itself or even in its copy' is, as that which brings perfection, critically edited by Grabmann (see above n. 5), a supplementary unedited text in Pouillon, 327–328. In the following page-numbers are cited from Grabmann.

---

[305] Ulrich deals with esse only in the fourth book apropos the doctrine of creation, where creation is appropriated to God the Father; there too he deals systematically with the relationship of esse and forma.

[306] Grabmann, 73–74.

[307] 75; 'all formal light, which is the beauty of all things?.

[308] Ibid. line 26.

the object of striving of creaturely beauty.[309] But he continually slips back to the Dionysian doctrine of light, as, by contrast with Albert, he sets light above form: lumen est prius pulchro quia est causa ipsius.[310] In his restrained way Thomas will avoid acknowledging the category of light, which belongs primarily to the world of the senses, as the universal key to the realm of the spiritual. Certainly he takes a position opposed to Denys and Ambrose whose view was that light could be applied to the spiritual and the divine only in a metaphorical sense and agrees with Augustine who wants to see the character of light in the spiritual realm as more true and more real than that in the realm of bodies; he explains this however as simply due to its character as revelation: manifestatio verius in spiritualibus.[311]

Since we are treating here of transcendental beauty, the speculations of the Scholastics from Alexander to Thomas of York and Ulrich on the beauty of the cosmos should not go unmentioned. They are all of a kind and come down to the classical, Augustinian and Boethian, idea that the universe, contemplated from a sufficient height with all its contradictions and all its darkness and even, for a number of writers like Bonaventure, with its eternal Hell, is an unsurpassably beautiful work of the eternal artist. Even here there is still detectable the will of Antiquity and Christianity to affirm, despite all objections, the goodness of being and of the eternal Creator. And in this way their reflections, which work happily with the biblical and Platonic triads of mensura-numerus-pondus and modus-species-ordo, reinforce the transcendentality of the beautiful in the sense of a theophanic presence of the glory of God in all being.[312]

---

[309] 76. Grabmann attempts therefore to oppose Ulrich to monistic symbolism (ibid. 40–41), an attempt that only half succeeds. Ulrich will indeed later emphasise that everything effected by God possesses a model (species, following Augustine) in him; but how far it is an individual form, he does not say. Other formulations refer back to the School of Chartres and the theologians of the Summa of Hales, as when it is said that God is ever beautiful, while created things ordine naturae primo fuerunt deforma, cum terra erat inanis et vacua, et post formata sunt, cum spiritus Dei ferebatur super aquas bonitate et spirituali pulchritudine fovens et formans omnia (82 1.10–14). The theological act of Creation is here, as in Chartres, equated with the cosmogonic process. Here too only the distinction of the orders of esse-essentia and forma-materia can bring clarity.

[310] 80 1.20; 'light is prior to the beautiful because it is its cause'.

[311] 2 d.13, 1, 2 sol.

As a final genuine witness of this world-view let us mention MECHTHILD OF MAGDEBURG, the title of whose work, The Flowing Light of the Godhead,[313] itself betrays so much of her view. This time it is, without any Platonising backward glance, the pure Christian experience of God as 'the endlessly flowing, inexhaustible fountain',[314] which dissolves the creature, in so far as it does not resist this flow, in the 'torrent of longing':[315] 'if I radiate, you must illuminate; if I flow, you must melt.'[316] The flowing of God is for Mechthild both being in itself and out of itself, glory and humility, riches and poverty,[317] for it is the 'burning God in his longing',[318] who goes out of himself into the 'God-alienated' and thus awakens the longing of the soul, by overflowing over it and compelling it to flow together with it, overflowing into the alien: 'through the sinners', 'through the imperfection of the clergy', 'through the necessity of poor souls', in a total dissolving and therefore in a universal- and catholic-becoming of the loving soul which only thus realises its natural quodammodo omnia in grace. So once again it is an experience altogether close to that of the Poverello: the flowing gift of the Holy Spirit visible as the ray of the heart coming from the wound in the side, whence the 'blood of the Godhead flows out', and as the inexhaustibly flowing milk from Mary's breasts.[319] In a neo-Platonically spiritualised era, the wounds are imprinted on Francis, Mechthild is hurled through all the heights and depths of an incarnate love lest the love of the living God should lose, amidst all the philosophy of beauty, the power of its discerning glory.

---

[312] Denys the Carthusian with his little work De venustate mundi et pulchritudine Dei (Opp. omn. vol. 34, 1909, 227–253) is a straggler who only echoes the utterances of Alexander and Albert speculatively, and contributes of his own only inspired descriptions of nature. Omne ens est pulchrum, . . . forma quippe est species et decor rei (229a), but this form stems from the 'sovereignly beautiful God' (230a). Then the beauty of the world is praised, 'and the scripture says most rightly: God's work is full of his glory. How desirable are all his works. Who could be sated with the vision of his glory?' (232a). Things are beautiful, beautiful too, according to Augustine, is the rhythmic cycle of the seasons; even if the parts of the world refuse to iron out contradictions, the world as a whole could not have been made more beautiful by God (art.8–10). Even the bizarre, ugly oddity, even the ridiculous is not excluded (236a). Nature is beautiful, man is beautiful, the angels who are closest to God are still more beautiful, God is the All-beautiful (art.20). With Richard and Hugh there must be an ascent from the beauty of the world to that of God (art.22).

[313] New German edn. in Menschen der Kirche, vol. 3 (1955), with a study by H. U. von Balthasar. E.T. by Lucy Menzies: The Flowing Light of the Godhead (London).

[314] Ibid. Bk I, c.8; cf. V.26.

[315] Ibid. VI.5.

[316] Ibid. II.6.

[317] Cf. Ibid. I.22.

[318] Ibid. I.17.

[319] Ibid. I.22; II.3; VI.24.

4. ST THOMAS AQUINAS

a. The Posing of the Problem

Beauty is seldom a central concern for St Thomas Aquinas, and for the most part his discussion is dependent on material presented to him by tradition. He calmly reviews this inherited material and tries to harmonise the elements that pour in upon him from Augustine, Denys, Aristotle, Boethius and his master, Albert, without, so it would seem, making an original contribution of his own to aesthetics in the strict sense. However, at another level everything is put in a new light by the fact that the doctrine of the transcendentals is interpreted in the perspective of Thomas's major creative achievement—his definition of esse and its relation to essences. As everything so far has shown, the material handed down was 'theological' in a two fold sense: Greek metaphysics was orientated towards the theion and the Christian view of reality took possession of this 'natural' aesthetics in order to complete and transcend it on the basis of revelation. Now Thomas sees esse as the non-subsistent fulness and perfection of all reality and as the supreme 'likeness of divine goodness',[320] and so God can no longer in any way be regarded as the being of things, except in the sense that he is their efficient, exemplary and final cause.[321] Thus in a new and much more radical way God is placed over and above all cosmic being, above everything that can be calculated or attained within the structures, real or ideal, of the cosmos: he is indeed 'the [320] Ipsum esse est similitudo divinae bonitatis; 'Being is a likeness of the divine goodness' (De Ver. 22. 2. 2); (De Ver. 22. 2. 2); res . . . inquantum sunt, divinae bonitatis similitudinem gerunt; 'Things insofar as they exist, bear the likeness of the divine goodness' (CG 3. 65). Numbers refer to the Marietti edition; for the Commentary on the Sentences to the incomplete Lethellieaux edition.

---

[321] S Th 1a. 3. 8c. & ad 1.

Wholly Other'. We can know that God is, but not what he is,[322] or rather, since there is no knowledge of existence without at least some indistinct apprehension of essence,[323] we have a knowledge which is surpassed and negated in a greater and definitive unknowing: a knowledge based solely on the argument from effects to cause and from essences on their various ascendant levels to God.[324] But it is precisely this which 'brings home his transcendence. And so, thirdly, he is known the more he is recognised to be remote from everything that emerges from effects . . . and he is known through negation'. Then follows this remarkable statement: 'In this progress of knowledge the human mind is usually most helped if its natural intelligence is strengthened by a new light: the light of faith and the gift of wisdom and understanding, by which the mind is elevated above itself in contemplation, in so far as it recognises that God lies above and beyond everything that it can know by nature. And since it cannot press forward to the vision of his essence, one may say that it is reflected back on itself through the superior light, and so Gregory's gloss on Jacob's saying, "I have seen God face to face" (Gen 32.31), can run: "When the eye of the soul turns towards God, it is thrown back by the lightning flash of the Infinite"'.[325] 'There is, of course, a certain proportion between the creature and God as between effect and cause, between knower and knowable, but then again, because of the infinite transcendence of the Creator over the creature there is no proportion between them . . .'[326] Detaching esse and its transcendental truth from God frees Thomas of any suspicion of ontologism, as if God were thought of, however unconsciously, as the first known.[327] Only Aquinas's doctrine of being gives negative theology (as it came down to him from Proclus (Liber de Causis) and Denys) the necessary safeguard against reduction to a purely conceptual dialectic between 'God in himself' and 'God for us', which we find in Erigena and which was a constant threat well into the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Indeed, this dialectic will re-emerge not long after Thomas (in Nicholas of Cusa) and will continue relentlessly until it culminates in Hegel. However, from Thomas onwards it will have to declare itself, more and more clearly and explicitly, to be the antithesis to a philosophy of the analogy of being (in the aforementioned sense)—it will have to declare itself to be a philosophy of identity.

---

[322] In Boeth. de Trin. 1. 2.

[323] Ibid. 6. 3; saltem cognitione confusa . . . scire quid hoc nomen significat; 'knowing, at least by an indistinct apprehension, what this name signifies'.

[324] 'If someone enters a house and feels the warmth, and the further he goes inside the more he feels the warmth growing, he will be convinced that in the innermost part of the house there is a fire, even if he cannot see it . . . so, likewise, the man who contemplates this world: he finds all things arranged in their different degrees of beauty and nobility, and the closer they are to God, the more, he sees, that they grow in beauty and goodness' (In Symb. Apost., a. 1, n. 878).

[325] In Boeth. de Trin. 1, 2.

[326] Ibid. ad 3.

Thomas's doctrine of the real distinction between esse and essentia is a philosophical thesis but it enables us once again to make a clear differentiation between the 'glory' of God and the beauty of the world; indeed, as the quotation above showed, it enables us to recover the true meaning of that glory as much for the ordinary believer as for the theologian. After Thomas other 'images of God' emerge and dominate thought: there is, for example, the God who is found within, on the journey through selfhood; there is the God of absolute subjectivity (Eckhart) and of absolute free will (Ockham) but in neither of these roles can he really be the God of glory. Then, on the other hand, there is the God who is the point of intersection where all the lines of the universe meet (Nicholas of Cusa), the God who will soon turn into the cosmic deity of the Renaissance. Thus, where our theme of glory is concerned, Thomas is a kairos, more through his general ontology than his aesthetics.

Thomas is a kairos in so far as ontology here shows itself to be genuine philosophy (and thus consciously disengages itself from the theology of revelation).[328] At the time it builds upon the 'theological' ontology of the Greeks and early Scholastics who had understood being, together with its properties, as dynamically transparent to divinity. He is a kairos in the even stronger sense that he sees man, to whom it has been given to reflect on being, in a peculiar state of suspension between nature and supernature: he is disposed by nature for the revelation of God in grace; and although he can make no claim to grace, without it he can never be fulfilled or complete. In this lies man's noblity.[329] It is a state of suspension which seems, in the individual, to accentuate the 'fluidity' of being and its transcendental openness to God. Thomas, in this way, is a kairos in the sense of being an historically transient stage between the old monistic world of thought which, whether Greek or Christian, saw philosophy and theology as a unity and the approaching dualistic world which, whether Christian or non-Christian, will try to rend philosophy and the theology of revelation asunder and to make of each a totality. Now the historically transient can nevertheless provide the conceptual means whereby the two halves are permanently held together if it is thought and worked out in a sufficiently comprehensive manner. Thomas never fails to remember the way in which being points critically to the eternal, hidden God nor the way in which reason points noetically to the possible revelation of that God, and consequently he wants all metaphysics to be seen as orientated towards 'theology'.[330] Because of all this Thomas does not forget that the illuminating revelation of the hidden God and the knowledge of him through faith and through the gift of the Holy Spirit does not invalidate negative theology but rather elevates and completes it. It is precisely the manifestation of the absolute ground of all being, with his eternal Word and Spirit, in the realm of ens commune which proves definitively how little God's essence belongs to the ens commune. When St John says, 'We have beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father', Thomas offers this commentary: 'Just as if someone saw a king coming forth in his manifold splendour and, being asked to describe the king, answers by summing up all that splendour in a single word: he came forth like a king, so it is with the Evangelist. If someone were to ask him what the glory of the Word was like, the glory which he had beheld, he would not have been able to express himself adequately. And so he says simply: it was the glory as of the only Son from the Father'.[331]

---

[327] Ibid. 1. 3.

[328] Ibid. 5. 4, where it is a question of a theologia duplex. The first is 'that of the philosophers, which by another name is called metaphysics'; the other is revealed theology, 'which is transmitted in Holy Scripture'.

---

[329] S Th 1a 2ae. 5. 5 ad 2.

[330] 'Almost all the consideration of philosophy is ordered to the knowledge of God' (CG 1. 4). For whoever investigates the principles of being in general and its consequences (ens et ea quae consequuntur ens) and so applies himself to the transphysica, arrives at God (cf. Proem in Expos. Met.).

b. The Inheritance

It is the function of the wise man to put things in order and so Thomas works with the material put at his disposal by tradition. First of all, there are the definitions of beauty in which several already long traditions are summed up under three heads: Denys, Augustine, Aristotle. Denys says (in Div. nom. iv, 7)[332] that God, as the cause of all that is beautiful, gives to everything consonantia et claritas (εὐαρμοστία καὶ ἀγλαία): consonantia is the concord among parts, which is therefore essentially the same as harmony, proportion, order, fairness of aspect; claritas is the brilliant light that descends vertically upon this horizontally ordered structure.

Thomas makes the different expressions mutually equivalent: debita proportio sive consonantia;[333] then again, proportio is the same as harmonia,[334] commensuratio,[335] conformitas,[336] convenientia[337] and so on. Claritas stands on its own, although Thomas tries to reduce the second aspect of Augustine's description of beauty (of Stoic origin) to this mysterious Plotinian-Platonic aspect: pulchritudo corporis est partium

---

[331] In Joh. Expos. 1. 1. 7 (n. 185).

[332] PG 3. 701C. The very first allusion to beauty in Thomas's works (1 d.3, 2. expos. 1 partis) gives Denys' double definition.

[333] S Th 1a. 39. 8. In what follows several citations will be made from Francis Kovach, Die Ästhetik des Thomas von Aquin (1961). It contains many misprints.

[334] Proportiones in sonis vocantur harmoniae, et per quamdam similitudinem proportiones quarumcumque rerum harmonia dicuntur (In Div. Nom. iv, lect. 8).

[335] Kovach, 121.

[336] Ibid. 123.

[337] Ibid.

convenientia cum quadam coloris suavitate ['The beauty of the body is the agreement of its parts together with a sweetness of colour'].[338] Thomas's predecessors had already amplified this definition (limited initially to the corporeal plane) in a transcendental manner by understanding coloris suavitas as the material mode of appearance of claritas in general. This can be seen quite clearly in, for example, Albert's metaphysics of form and light. Thomas does the same.[339] He extends the concept of beauty transcendentally to the point where he can even apply it to truth itself.[340] In his early writings, which show an affinity with Albert, he follows his teacher in placing form and beauty in direct relationship: forma rei est decor ejus,[341] decor resultans ex forma et proportione partium.[342] Under the renewed influence of the Areopagite, in the commentary on the Divine Names, claritas, as a transcendental property of being, is referred back, in line with the theological context, to divine claritas, from which it is derived.[343]

From St Augustine Thomas adopts the emphasis on the objectivity of beauty. Something is beautiful not because it is loved; no, it is loved because it is beautiful.[344] From Augustine and Hilary (mediated by Peter Lombard)[345] he derives the appropriation of beauty to the Second Person of the Holy Trinity, an idea from which St Bonaventure had drawn so many conclusions. For Thomas it is more just a case of receiving something handed down. However, it gives him the opportunity of quoting and inserting the Aristotelian definition alongside the Dionysian and Augustinian. For in addition to συμμετρία Artistotle laid down a further criterion for beauty: appropriate size,[346] without which something can at best be 'pretty' but not beautiful. Thomas generally interprets this aspect of beauty (again in the spirit of Aristotle) in terms of perfectio, which is an anticipation of his later, central concept of ordered being. Thus in the principal passage dealing with aesthetics in the Commentary on the Sentences Thomas lets all the diverse streams of thought converge: the divine person of the Son is 'beautiful' as species (Hilary), as perfect image (=aequalitas and consonantia cum Patre: Augustine), as possessor of the perfecta natura Dei (Aristotle); but as 'perfect Word of the Father' he has claritas (Denys), which shines upon all things and which all things reflect back (Albert). At the point in the Summa where Thomas incorporates this synthesis, somewhat modified (1a, 39, 8), he calls the Son imago expressa Patris and thus takes account of Bonaventure's favourite doctrine.

---

[338] 4 d. 44. 2. 4. obj. 3 and passim 'the beauty of the body is the agreement of its parts together with a certain sweetness of colour'. For ancient philosophy cf. Pouillon and Halcour, op. cit. For Augustine: Civ. Dei 22. 19, n. 2; Ep. 3 ad Nebrid. n. 4; De Ver. Rel. 32, n. 59; De Mus. 6. 11, n. 32.

[339] 'We call a man beautiful because of a fitting proportion of members in size and position, and because of the fact that he possesses a brilliant (clarum) and bright colour. Hence, it should be taken proportionally in the case of others that each thing is called beautiful because it has the brilliance of its genus, either spiritual or corporeal (claritatem sui generis vel spiritualem vel corporalem), and because it is established in due proportion' (In Div. Nom. 4, lect. 5; ET, Vernon J. Bourke, The Pocket Aquinas (New York, 1960, p. 269). Cf. S Th 2a2ae 145. 2c, where Thomas quietly inserts the claritas of Denys in place of Augustine's suavitas, and for incorporeal things the spiritualis rationis claritas.

[340] Veritas habet splendoris rationem, et aequalitas tenet locum proportionis; 'Truth involves the idea of splendour, and equality that of proportion' (1 d. 3. 2, expos. 1). The second part of the affirmation has, as will be shown presently, a theological (Trinitarian) prehistory.

[341] 3 d. 23. 3. 1. 9, 1. 1 (n. 225).

[342] 3 d. 1. 1. 3, obj. 3 (n. 52).

[343] In Div. Nom 4, lec. 5: omnis forma . . . est participatio divinae claritatis; 'All form is a participation in the divine radiance' (In Div. Nom. 4, lect.5).

From Boethius Thomas takes over the notion that God in his absolute beauty conceived the world's beauty in his mind. Thomas puts this notion into a context which portrays God as the sun of goodness, which 'sends out its rays of light, id est participationes sui, in the creation of the world', as the Psalmist says: 'When thou openest thy hand, they are filled with good things'. 'When God's hand was opened with the key of love, creatures came forth'.[347] It almost goes without saying that in this world—and Thomas stresses this more than his predecessors—not only opposed essences but also the opposite of goodness, evil, must be fitted (per accidens) into the all-embracing harmony of cosmic order.[348]

---

[344] Augustine, De vera rel. 32, 59; In Div. Nom. 4, lect. 10.

[345] d. 3 (for Augustine); 1 d. 31 (for Hilary).

[346] Eth. Nic. 4. 5 (1123a. 10ff). Cf. 4. 7 and Thomas's Commentary 1 8, n. 738; Poet. 7. 4 (1450b, 38f.); ibid. 8. 4 (1451a. 30f.).

[347] 2 Sent. Prol.

Lastly, Thomas adopts the idea of placing the pulchrum within and yet beyond the transcendentals, the verum and the bonum, in that, like Denys, he presupposes the fundamental unity of the good and the beautiful and, with Alexander, William of Auvergne and Albert, makes a conceptual distinction between the two, a distinction which brings the beautiful closer to the true. We strive after the good as a goal to be attained, while the beautiful is admired and loved for the sake of its form; it is that which is pleasing not for me but in itself as it is seen; pulchra dicuntur quae visa placent,[349] id cujus ipsa apprehensio placet.[350] It is its 'relation to the cognitive faculty' that distinguishes beauty from goodness and causes it to shine forth from the true as pulchritudo veritatis.[351] This last point is in line with Aquinas's inspired insight: maxima pulchritudo humanae naturae consistit in splendore scientiae ['The supreme beauty of human nature consists in the splendour of knowledge'].[352] For Wisdom plays before the face of God, but 'this playful action is not performed for the sake of extrinsic goals, but happens for its own sake. This is also true of the delights of Wisdom'.[353]

c. Being as the Likeness of God

The development of Aquinas's theory of beauty follows a serpentine course. It starts off very much from within an Augustinian and Albertine perspective ('form' as 'splendour'), yet without any explicit consideration of transcendentality; next he shows signs of influence by Aristotle and turns to the theme that seems specifically Thomist: the reduction to proportion and order (so much so that the aspect of claritas almost disappears). Then, in the commentary on Denys, he returns unexpectedly to the 'Platonic' point of view and at last, definitively, he expounds the transcendentality of beauty.[354] This reversion is bound to be surprising to anyone who considers that Thomas was an Aristotelian to the very end, in fact increasingly so; and that his image of God formally bears more resemblance to Aristotle's transcendent νόησις νοήσεως than to the Plotinian and Dionysian deity who pours himself out and expresses himself in the universe.

---

[348] CG 3. 71. Cf. Kovach, 193–200 (on ugliness) and à propos the contrasts of the world.

[349] S Th 1a. 5. 4, ad 1.

[350] S Th 1a 2ae. 27. 1, ad 3 'that whose apprehension is itself pleasing'.

[351] In Ps. 44. 2.

[352] De Malo 4. 2, obj. 17.

[353] In Boeth. de Hebd. Prol.

Yet it is from Denys[355] that Thomas derives his most characteristic philosophical opinion, namely, the doctrine of the actus essendi as the primary, immediate and comprehensive cosmic operation of God. Thomas speaks of the processus essendi a divino principio in omnia existentia; nomen entis designat processum essendi a Deo in omnia entia ['The procession of existence from the divine principle into all existing things; the name of being designates the procession of existence from God into all beings'].[356] And though Thomas (like Denys) is opposed to the hypostatisation of the 'emanations' (being-in-itself, life-in-itself, etc) and understands them as a single divine cause, nonetheless for him the per-se-esse is primum et dignius quam per-se-vita et per-se-sapientia.[357] Consequently, Thomas expresses here not a specifically Platonic point of view but his own constant and fundamental position. The procession of being—Thomas also speaks repeatedly of its emanation from God[358]—is the procession of act-uality (it is not, as it were, just a naked being 'there'). However, ἐνέργεια, actus, actual essence can exhaust, a comprehensiveness that no concept can entirely exhaust; on the contrary, it is in relation to esse that every essence and every concept can be united. Far from being an external addition to a complete essence thought of as possible (an essence which may or may not exist),[359] it roots the possibility of every possible thing in reality, in the fact that an essence can be admitted to the vast fulness of real existence and to participation in it. Thus esse is communissimum,[360] that in which all communicate,[361] that which is most perfect[362] beyond all imagining—and at the same time 'innermost and most profoundly present in all things' (intimum, quod profundius omnibus inest).[363] In fact, as has been said, it is the foundation of the most interior unity of every singular and particular essence. It is that which embraces all things (and cannot be exhausted by any number of natures but on the contrary can be participated in more and more in an infinite way),[364] yet only in the sense that is is the actualising support

---

[354] It is to Kovach that we owe the discovery of this line in Thomas's thought (59f.). Spiazzi (introduction to the Met. Expos.) dates the work between 1261 and 1264. Other similar datings in Kovach (43, n. 25).

[355] And, of course, also from the Procline Liber de Causis, which Thomas, dependent as much on Aristotle as on Denys, adapts. Thomas recognised the dependence of Denys on Proclus (cf. above vol. II, 151).

[356] In Div. Nom. 5, lect. 1 (Mandonnet 479, 480).

[357] Ibid. (Man. 489).

[358] Emanatio totius esse a causa universali; 'The emanation of all being from the universal cause' (S Th 1a. 45. 1); esee rerum fluit a Verbo sicut a quodam primordiali principio, et hic effluxus terminatur ad esse rerum quod in propria natura habent; 'The being of things flows from the Word as from a kind of primordial principle, and this flow is terminated in the being which things have in their own nature' (S Th 1a. 58.) A Deo effluunt res, ut subsistant in propriis naturis; 'Things issue from God in order that they may subsist in their own natures' (S Th 1a. 57. 2; cf. 104. 4, ad 2; De Ver. 8. 11c, towards the end.) Formae rerum in mente divina existentes sunt, ex quibus fluit esse rerum quod est commune formae et materiae; 'The forms of things exist in the divine mind, whence flows the being of things that is common in form and matter' (De Ver. 10. 4c. towards the end). Influentia essendi: Subst. sep. 7 (Mand. 101). Esse manat; 'being emanates': 1 d. 8. 1. 2; esse diffunditure: De Ver. 21. 2. 8.

---

[359] Esse rei, quamvis sit aliud ab ejus essentia, non tamen est intelligendum quod sit aliquod superadditum ad modum accidentis, sed quasi constituitur per principia essentiae; 'The existence of a thing, though distinct from its essence, is nevertheless not to be thought of as something superadded in the manner of an accident, but as, so to speak, constituted by the principles of the essence' (Met. 4, lect, n. 558).

[360] In Boeth. de Hebd. 2; Subst. sep. 1. 8.

[361] De Pot. 7. 2, obj. 5.

[362] Perfectissimum: S Th 1a. 4. 1, ad 3.

[363] S Th 1a. 8. 1.

[364] Ipsum esse absolute consideratum infinitum est, nam ab infinitis et infinitis modis participari possibile est; 'Considered absolutely, being is infinite, because it can be participated in by the infinite and in infinite ways' (CG 1. 43).

of natures. It only realises natures in so far as it realises itself in natures. In itself it has no subsistence but inheres in natures: esse non est subsistens sed inhaerens.[365] Thomas is adamant that this self-realisation of the real must not be understood as the actualisation of a potency. 'On the contrary', natures are potential vis à vis the realising act of being.[366] But because esse does not subsist, it cannot even be said to release natures from itself as its 'possibilities'; it is only in them that it comes to 'standing' and subsistence. Confronted with the infinite range of the possible that can participate in the act of being, only the divine intellect is able to 'discover' and posit the circumscribed forms, even if they are not joined to the act of being as an external addition,[367] but are, so to speak, stamped out from its constantly unlimited fulness. In an image reminiscent of Grosseteste, Thomas says that the forms are 'nothing other than a kind of seal of the divine knowledge in things' (quaedam sigillatio divinae scientiae in rebus).[368]

It is precisely here that a new kind of initimacy of God in the creature becomes clear, an intimacy which is only made possible by the distinction between God and esse. Allowing natures to participate in reality—God's most proper prerogative—is not to be understood as the disintegration or diminution (on the part of the creature) of God's being and unicity (which is how it is invariably seen outside the Christian tradition) and the essences of things must not appear as simply the fragmentation of reality, in a negative sense, but must be seen positively as posited and determined by God's omnipotent freedom and therefore are grounded in the unique love of God. In what we might call the 'real distinction' (circumspectly, because here we are dealing with an inexplicable mystery) God contemplated his Creation with free, so to speak, stereoscopic sight, which means at the same time that God preserves for the creature this wholly new plasticity: it is precisely when the creature feels itself to be separate in being from God that it knows itself to be the most immediate object of God's love and concern; and it is precisely when its essential finitude shows it to be something quite different from God that it knows that, as a real being, it has had bestowed upon it that most extravagant gift—participation in the real being of God. Thus esse, as Thomas understands it, is at once both total fulness and total nothingness: fulness, because it is the most noble,[369] the first and most proper effect of God,[370] because 'through being God causes all things'[371] and 'being is prior to and more interior than all other effects'.[372] But being is also nothingness since it does not exist as such, 'for just as one cannot say that running runs', but rather that 'the runner runs', so 'one cannot say that existence exists'.[373]

---

[365] De Pot. 7. 2, ad 7. Cf. De Pot. 1. 1: esse significat aliquid completum et simplex sed non subsistens; 'Being signifies something complete and simple but non-existent'.

[366] It is a case of a simple circumscription of the mystery and not of a simple reduction of what elsewhere is acknowledged as the relation between act and potency. This is shown by the hesitant and cautious mode of expression Thomas uses: esse inest substantiis ut quidam (!) actus ipsarum; 'Being is in substances as a kind of (!) act of their own' (CG 2. 53); esse ad recipiends; 'Being is not referred to other things as receiver to received, but rather as received to receiver' (S Th 1a. 4. 1. ad 3). Non determinatur esse per aliud sicut potentia per actum, sed magis (!) sicut acuts per potentiam; 'Being is not determined by another thing as potentially is by act, but rather as act is by potentiality' (De Pot. 7. 2, ad 9).

[367] De Pot. 7. 2, ad 9.

[368] De Ver. 2. 1, ad 9. On this, see G. Siewerth, Der Thomismus als Identitätssystem (1939), 8: 'The proper determination of the essence (can)not "result" simply from the act as such as a necessary outcome, because the act possesses an infinite dimension, to which only infinite determinations correspond'. L. Oeing-Hanhoff, Ens et unum convertuntur (BGPhThMA vol. 37, 3, 1953) 38, 90.

This incomprehensible coincidence of fulness and emptiness in a different sense aroused the imagination of Nicholas of Cusa and inspired him to make the statement that beneath all precision lies the imprecise (conjectura). It also intrigued Pascal, who regarded man as being in an indefinable state of ontic oscillation between grandeur and misère.[374] It demands, as the irreplaceable foundation of any metaphysic, a constant, active humility which neither gives up all claim to the truth nor in any sense whatever makes itself master of ultimate, quasi-divine truth. The real distinction between existence and essence necessarily opens our eyes to the truth that God is self-subsistent being but it also closes our eyes and forbids us to cling on to what we have seen. For quite obviously the created intellectual spirit (if it is going to be able in any sense to know reality) is situated precisely within this distinction, in that active, illuminated fulness (lumen intellectus agentis) which at the same time remains nothingness (intellectus possibilis). In this distinction created spirit encounters the real whenever the real attains subsistence, i.e. in the subsistence of finite, material essences (omnis cognitio incipit a sensu). But these in their turn can only be object of thought if they exist, if they participate in the reality which contains in itself all that is real, which compenetrates and dominates it and, as it were, indifferently transcends it.

---

[369] De Pot. 7. 2, ad 9.

[370] Compend. 1. 68.

[371] In Div. Nom. 5, lect. 1 (Mand. 491).

[372] De Pot. 3. 7.

[373] In Boeth. de Hebd. 2.

[374] Cf. above vol. III, 188–205.

The period following Thomas was not able to sustain this state of tension and either reduced esse to a supreme and completely vacuous essential concept, which—as pure being 'there'—can be derived, abstracted, effortlessly from essences: this is rationalism. The other response was so to consolidate esse in itself that it coincides with God and now generates essences from itself in the divine cosmic process: this is pantheistic idealism. The first way leads inevitably to the death of philosophy, to its dissolution in positivistic science. For when being is no more than just being 'there', something simply posited in a colourless, valueless way, it is robbed of its transcendental fulness, is in itself neither true nor good nor beautiful and this immediately affects the natures to whom it gives its 'thereness'—as we shall see later. And the second response also leads, in a roundabout way, to the same self-destruction of philosophy (as the transition from Hegel to Feuerbach shows). For if being necessarily generates itself in finite natures, it must itself be finite and so turns into the potentiality of man, with the result that finite man is greater than what he thinks in his philosophy. Man remains in both cases the question-mark left over behind reality, as the only 'glory', questionable yet worthy of our questions, which is left.

Both these reductive analyses of being, the logical and the essentialist, destroy its supra-logical and supra-essentialist mystery. Both extinguish the image and likeness that glow within being, the image which the Greeks had a presentiment of and constantly contemplated without being able to grasp it adequately in its distinction from God. And because they could not separate the image from God who creates in freedom, they were bound (as a result of the link between human thought and sense experience) 'to experience it onesidedly in its rootedness in the objects presented to the senses. And so intelligible essences appeared as being in the true sense, which Plato refers to the super-celestial realm of the Ideas and Aristotle to the cosmic energeia of pure, rationally moving, self-concretising form'.[375] The de-essentialising of reality, as demanded by Heidegger and as achieved by Thomas, is an extension within philosophy of the illumination by biblical revelation of the idea of God as creative principle. When God, in his knowing and omnipotent love, is seen as freely choosing to create, there can be no question of a restrictive fragmentation of being into finite essences. Esse can be suspended without confusion or limitation, in creaturely, free infinity and perfection, before the free God and only thus become the allusive likeness of the divine goodness: ipsum esse est similitudo divinae bonitatis.[376] Thus and only thus is the creature liberated in the presence of God and in relation to God and can aspire with all its powers towards God and love him without having to comply with the perverse demand that it deny itself in its finite essence. This demand hung like a dark cloud over philosophy from India to Greece and Arabia, and soon after Thomas it begins once more to cast its shadow—from Eckhart to Bruno, Hölderlin, Fichte, Hegel. The metaphysics of Thomas is thus the philosophical reflection of the free glory of the living God of the Bible and in this way the interior completion of ancient (and thus human) philosophy. It is a celebration of the reality of the real, of that all-embracing mystery of being which surpasses the powers of human thought, a mystery pregnant with the very mystery of God, a mystery in which creatures have access to participation in the reality of God, a mystery which in its nothingness and non-subsistence is shot through with the light of the freedom of the creative principle, of unfathomable love.

---

[375] G. Siewerth, Das Sein als Gleichnis Gottes (1958), 50f.

[376] De Ver. 22. 2. ad 2. We must not forget here that, of course, we possess the aesthetic of Thomas in close association with Denys's Platonic theory of erôs, though his commentary on the Canticle has been lost.

d. Metaphysics as Aesthetics

It has already been shown that in his aesthetics Thomas works with speculative material that comes to him from tradition. It should, however, now be clear that this material has to undergo a re-evaluation as a result of Thomas's transformation of the fundamental structure of metaphysics. In the formulations he inherits it is a question of the transcendental definition of beauty. However, what Thomas does is to use beauty to define being, which can only be rationally apprehended in terms of the 'real distinction' (esse as opposed to essentia). The essentialist aesthetics of 'size, number and weight', of convenientia and claritas, is completely justified by the fact that reality realises itself only in essences. Moreover, since human knowing in every case starts off from concrete sense-experience, the starting-point of aesthetics will necessarily be (more than ever) corporeal beauty, experienced on the sensory, empirical plane: pulchra sunt quae visa placent. But the whole sphere of essences can only ever be synthesized at the superessential level, which transcends it, and consequently can only be finally grasped in thought at the superessential level.[377] The light of the intellectus agens is the light of esse as reality: with this orientation the intellect attains essences, and in this meta-logical light they become logically comprehensible. But this means that the essential categories of aesthetics thrive in 'spherically curved' space, that is to say, they have to express more than they seem able to convey: they express both themselves and the mystery of the 'proportion' between esse and essentia. Since all proportional relations between essences are established, attested, confirmed in their beauty by this incomprehensible 'proportion', it can be regarded as fundamental to all wordly beauty. Moreover, this 'proportion' is immediatley transparent to the primordial, free creativity of God, who is the hidden source of worldly beauty. Hence, Thomas can without embarrassment appropriate the entire, aesthetically theological metaphysics of the Areopagite but at the same time, thanks to the mediation of being, can be absolutely free from suspicion of any pantheism. He even found this understanding of being in Denys (as the first emanation) and needed only to give it his own interpretation for the final structure of his metaphysical aesthetics to emerge.

---

[377] This means, of course, that the precise distinction between the ordo essentiae and the ordo existentiae, as proposed by the Neo-Thomists in order to investigate (like other essentialists) the essences for their own sake, cannot hold up.

It should now be clear why, for Thomas, the definitive aesthetic concepts do not centre around 'form' (with its essential parts and its interior light) but have to be concepts implying comparative relation: ordo, ordinatio, dispositio, proportio, proportionalitas. Reality realises only in a proportionality which, while incomprehensible in itself, is the foundation of all order and thus of all form. Proportion belongs primarily and properly to the order of quantity but, understood in a wider (and improper) sense, it is the 'habitudo ordinis, for example, between matter and form because matter, in the order of being, finds itself fulfilled by form, and this happens according to proportionality, for just as form, can give being, so matter can receive the same being . . . and in such a case the passive potency of the recipient does not need to be commensurate with the active potency of the cause, neither with regard to number—for one artist might make his work of art in a variety of forms, such as the form of the chest or the form of the key, but the wood can only receive one of them—nor just with regard to design, for the artist can use his art to produce a beautiful object which, however, cannot be received as beautiful by a knotty piece of wood'. The conclusion drawn in the next sentence reaches sublimity:

'Consequently it is not unfitting for there to be a similar kind of proportion between God and the creature, although they are infinitely remote from one another; and so a union (even) between them is possible'.[378] But the creature itself is essentially a proportio between esse and essentia, so that its proportion in relation to God becomes 'the proportion of a proportion', what Thomas calls proportionalitas,[379] a suspension of a suspension.

In this creaturely suspension either esse or essentia or both can serve as principle: in one sense, essences have their principle in being; in another sense, being comes to be a principle in essences. However, where there are principles, there is order. Ordo semper dicitur per comparationem ad aliquod principium.[380] ['Order always has reference to some principle']. Unde oportet quod ubicumque est aliquod principium sit etiam aliquis ordo.[381] ['Consequently, wherever there is some principal, there must be some order']. And 'all order is a kind of proportion'.[382] It is God who is the ultimate provider of principle and so it is obvious that the provision of principle in the sense of order is an intellectual process: ordo ad rationem pertinet,[383] for only the intellect perceives proportions to guide them meaningfully to their end.[384] Thus all order in the cosmos, as Thomas time and again explains, is at once immanent and transcendent: since all things have their principle in God and are related to him, they can also be ordered to one another by means of the relations that underlie them.[385]

---

[378] 3 d.1. 1.1 (n. 19). The same distinction between proper (quantitative) proportion and improper proportion (explained with regard to the God/creature relation) is made in Quodlib. 10. 8, ad 1; S Th 1a. 12. 1, ad 4.

[379] Est enim proportionalitas similitudo proportionum ['Proportionality is the similarity of proportions') (De Ver. 2. 3, ad 4), where what matters is the functioning not of the proportionate members themselves, but only of the two proportions.

[380] S Th 1a. 42. 3. More exactly: 1 d. 20. 1. 3 qla 2. For an exposition: Kovach, 152f.

[381] S Th 2a 2ae 2.1. Ed. A Pace, 'The Concept of Order in the Philosophy of St Thomas Aquinas', New Scholasticism ii (1928), 51–72.

[382] 8 Phys. lect 3 (n. 2064). In the context it is shown that 'nature is the principle for order, so that what lacks order cannot be natural'.

[383] De Car. 9, obj.2.

[384] CG 2. 24.

[385] S Th 1a. 21. 1, ad 3.

It is in relation to these fundamental ideas that Thomas interprets the aesthetics of the Areopagite. God, he says, is the ultimate principle of all beauty in so far as he causes consonantia and claritas. He is the cause of claritas in that he lets things participate in his own primal light; the cause of consonantia in two senses, first of all because God orders and turns all things to himself and calls them home (here again the etymology of καλόν from καλεῖν), and secondly because he orders and assembles things in relation to one another, 'and from the fact that all things are mutally in relation to one another in a definite order, it follows that all things are ordered towards one and the same ultimate'.[386] The fact that God is the principle of something other than himself cannot be explained in terms of any need on his past but by 'the love he has for his own beauty, for whoever has beauty of his own wants to multiply it as much as possible, that is, through the communication of his likeness . . . Thus everything is created in order as far as possible to imitate the divine beauty',[387] and this is true as much of the particular forms, by which things are distinguished from one another, as of the common possession of being, in which they communicate. For ex pulchro esse omnibus existentibus and this being is assigned to existent things through form,[388] in which it becomes the 'protective mansion' (mansio conservativa), even though 'all parts of the cosmos share in the common empire of reality'.[389] In this way they are fundamentally harmonised with one another and 'can come under the sway of a single order' and can also for this reason help and support one another. 'Just as the walls and roof are supported by the foundation and the roof protects the walls and foundation, so in the whole of things the higher ones give perfection to the lower ones and the power of the higher is manifested in the lower'. This is 'friendship' in objective reality and debita proportio in partibus, through which the whole forms an 'everlasting order'.[390]

---

[386] In Div. Nom. 4, lect. 5 (Mand. 362–363).

[387] Ibid. 366.

[388] Ibid. 365, lect. 6, 368.

[389] Ibid. 369.

[390] Ibid. 369–370.

This order of the world in the whole and in its parts rests on a double necessity. The first and most fundamental is that it is due to God's own wisdom and omnipotence that, in his unfathomable freedom, he wants to manifest his goodness in the world. The second is that God bestows on essences what his wisdom and omnipotence have decreed as belonging to them. But this second necessity depends on the first, which means at the same time that all the merit of the creature, which fulfils its essence according to God's will, rests on a prevenient, inscrutable grace.[391] Since the real is God's most proper effect, and since the real depends on God's free goodness, everything, the greatest and the least, is preserved by his providential care for all beings. 'Everything that has esse in any way is necessarily directed by God towards some end, as the Apostle says, "Those things that are of God are ordered" (Rom 13.1)'.[392]

Modern science, which strives to investigate the order of the world more and more deeply, has its ready-made metaphysics in Aquinas's doctrine of order and relation, presupposing, of course, that science does not absolutise, in essentialist fashion, the laws it discovers but lets them rest on a profound creaturely proportion between existence and essence and thus be in suspension in relation to the absolute freedom of God.

Finally, it must be remembered that there can objectively be no 'definition' of the transcendentals, just as being itself is indefinable.[393] The circumscription of the beautiful, through such allusive concepts as integritas (perfectio), proportio (harmonia, convenientia), claritas, ordo, is a circle that does not permit any running off in one direction or univocal construction. The circle can be entered through the sensory experience of beauty, which has an irreducible primacy. However, it is clear that, like the other transcendentals, beauty too, even sensory beauty, can only be recognised by a free and rational mind: solus homo (as opposed to the animals delectatur in ipsa pulchritudine sensibilium secundum se ipsam.[394]

---

[391] S Th 1a. 21a. 1, ad 3; cf. 1a2ae. 114. 1, ad 3; CG 2. 28–29. On this aspect, see A. Dyroff, 'Zur allgemeinen Kunstlehre des hl. Thomas', BGPhMa, suppl. ii (1923), 197f.

[392] S Th 1a. 22. 2.

[393] It is therefore foolish to regret that Thomas never 'defined' beauty. Cf. Kovach, 104.

---

[394] S Th 1a. 91. 3, ad 3; 'Only man . . . takes pleasure in the actual beauty of sensible objects for its own sake.'

INDEX OF PROPER NAMES

Abalard 356, 362, 367
Abraham 264, 265, 277
Adam of Paris (Master Adam) 368, 370
Aeschylus 44, 81, 93, 102, 107, 109, 113–122, 130, 140, 149, 153, 170, 232
Alan of Lille 26, 343, 363–366, 369, 376
Albert 281, 368, 372, 373, 376, 377, 385, 386–388, 389, 390, 391, 398, 399, 400
Alcaeus 90
Alcmaeon of Croton 157
Alcuin 342
Alexander of Hales 328, 368, 373, 381–385, 390, 400
Amalric of Bène 366
Ambrose 319, 322, 390
Anacreon 90, 186
Anaxagoras 225
Anebo 237
Anonymus of Assisi 372, 377, 378, 383
Anselm 319, 328, 356, 376
Antisthenes 225
Apollodorus 225
Apollonius 170
Apuleius 193
Aratos 236, 243, 258
Archilochus 84–86, 97, 102, 244, 247
Archytas 164
Aristophanes 131, 132, 188
Aristotle 19, 29, 43, 44, 74, 102, 106, 113, 123, 129, 157, 179, 195, 198, 199, 216, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 227, 228, 232, 236, 244, 247, 260, 282, 290, 293, 321, 368, 382, 384, 385, 386, 393, 397, 399, 400, 401, 406
Astius 174
Athanasius 356
Augustine 17, 25, 26, 33, 184, 206, 217, 238, 247, 248, 281, 308, 319, 321, 325, 341, 343, 347, 348, 351, 356, 358, 368, 370, 383, 384, 385, 387, 390, 391, 393, 397, 398, 399

Bachem, Rolf 36
Bahr, H.-E. 16, 27
Balthasar, H. U. von 15, 16, 166, 280, 319, 320, 321, 343, 345, 348, 349, 356, 374, 378, 391, 406
Barthe, Karl 243
Bartholomew of Bologna 368
Basil 319, 351, 368, 385
Baumgarten 19
Baumker Clemens 368
Baur L. 368, 369
Beckmann, J. Th. 68
Bede 322
Benedict 37, 266, 332, 336–339
Benz, Ernst 170
Bernard of Chartres 319
Bernard of Clairvaux 321, 356, 361, 364, 366
Bernardus Silvestris 362
Bett Henry 344
Bezold, F. von 44
Bidez, J. 220, 237
Boccaccio 36, 44
Boethius 247, 281, 319, 321, 325–332, 356, 357, 366, 390, 393, 399
Böhme, J. 79
Boll, F. 222

Bonaventure 32, 35, 281, 348, 368, 273, 378, 385, 390, 399
Borchardt, Rudolf 278
Boros, Ladislaus 33
Bourbon, F. di Petrella 302
Bréhier, E. 280, 281, 287
Broch, Hermann 277
Bruno 281, 354, 406
Bruyne, Edgar de 325, 356
Bultmann, Rudolf 15, 27, 37, 243
Butler, Cuthbert 336
Bywater 221

Calderon 45, 63, 104
Callimachus 246
Camõens 49, 247
Canius 326
Cappuys, Maïeul 347
Casel, O. 37
Cassiodor 332–335
Cato 257
Catullus 246, 249
Chaeremon 225
Chartres, School of 319, 362–372, 375, 381, 390
Cicero 170, 217, 222, 223, 229, 230, 237, 382, 385, 387
Clarembaldus 329
Claudel, Paul 47, 48, 253, 274, 318
Cleanthes 226, 227
Clement of Alexandria 171, 297, 385
Constantine 278
Copernicus 247
Corneille 104, 132, 143
Cornutus 225
Cousin, Victor 363
Crates of Mallos 225
Creuzer, F. 36, 383
Cumont, F. 222
Curtius, Ernst R. 34, 278, 279, 325, 364
Curtius, Ludwig 122
Cusanus—see Nicolas of Cusa
Cuttat, J. A. 37
Czapiewski, Winfried 373

Dante 34, 44, 47, 49, 172, 242, 247, 248, 255, 265, 281, 319, 322, 343, 348
Darwin 320
David 335
David of Dinant 366
Décharme, Paul 225
Defradas, Jean 98
Deichgräber, Karl 158
Democritus 164
Dempf, Alois 22
Denys Areopagite 37, 233, 240, 281, 319, 320, 325, 344, 345, 352, 354, 357, 360, 366, 367, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 377, 378, 380, 382, 385, 389, 390, 393, 395, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 406, 408, 410
Diehl-Beutler 85, 86
Diels-Kranz 91, 157
Dietrich of Freiburg 368
Dion of Prusa 223
Dionysius of Syracuse 187
Dirlmeier, Franz 74
Dodds, E. R. 238
Driesch, Hans 30
Duchemin, J. 98
Dumézil, Georges 43
Duns Scotus 330, 373
Dyroff 411

Eckhart 37, 281, 319, 375, 395, 406
Ehrenberg, V. 158
Ehrenfels, Christian von 30, 31, 32, 33
Eliot, T. S. 278
Empedocles 29, 164, 195, 225, 257, 293
Ennius 249, 262
Epictetus 226, 244
Epicurus 229, 230, 275, 283
Erasmus 367

Erigena, John 26, 247, 281, 319, 343–355, 356, 357, 365, 366, 367, 375, 381, 395
Euphorion 246
Euripides 101, 107, 110, 112, 124, 126, 131–154, 253, 273, 274, 325
Eusebius 170, 237
Ezekiel 95, 339, 341, 360

Faral, Edmond 325
Festugière, A. J. 221, 222, 226, 235
Feuerbach, Ludwig 405
Ficino, Marsilio 247, 281, 322
Fichte 301, 406
Finsler, G. 45
Fischer, Kurt von 27
Foucauld, Charles de 28
Francis of Assisi 37, 378–381, 382, 385, 392
Frank, Erich 163, 164
Frankel, Hermann 50, 51, 53, 80, 87, 88, 98, 121, 158, 159, 161, 162
Frenzel, Elizabeth 143
Frey-Salman, A. 44

Gadamer, H. G. 225
Gale, Thomas 237
Gallus, Thomas 249, 252
Geffken 225
George, Stefan 95
Gerhoh of Reichersberg 361
Gerken, Alexander, 375
Gerson 281
Gigon, O. 102
Gilbert de la Porrée 366–368, 369, 382, 387, 389
Gilson, Etienne 336, 377
Girauldoux 45
Glorieux, P. 372
Goethe 13, 30, 31, 32, 45, 49, 132, 156, 194, 247, 277, 301, 323, 386
Gothein, E. 325
Gottschalk 347
Grabmann, Martin 373, 389
Gregory of Nazianzus 346, 348
Gregory of Nyssa 180, 265, 281, 300, 312, 321, 322, 339, 340, 343, 348, 352
Gregory the Great 339–342, 360, 394
Grillparzer 45
Grosseteste, Robert 368–372, 377, 385, 387, 403
Grousset, René 43
Grunach 247
Guenon 36
Gundert, Hermann 96, 98, 99

Häberlin, Paul 29
Habicht, C. 246
Haecker, Theodor 34, 253, 254
Halcour, Dieter 372, 377, 383, 384, 398
Hampe, R. 100
Handschin, J. 353
Harder, Richard 248, 280, 281, 301
Hegel 13, 25, 26, 32, 194, 218, 228, 241, 273, 274, 281, 282, 297, 300, 301, 323, 344, 395, 405, 406
Heidegger 21, 406
Heinemann 225
Heraclitus 29, 69, 86, 102, 156, 159–163, 180, 182, 195, 197, 224, 225, 233, 236, 244, 293, 348
Herder 30, 36, 247, 281
Hermes Trismegistus 228, 235
Hermias 225
Herodotus 126
Hesiod 44, 52, 78–84, 85, 90, 97, 102, 115, 162, 167, 188, 225, 232, 238, 257, 258
Hilary 383, 399
Hildegard 361
Hirzel 158
Hofmannsthal, Hugo v. 143, 146

Hölderlin 101, 115, 116, 323, 406
Holdstenius 378
Homer 19, 20, 21, 22, 43–77, 78, 79, 82, 90, 102, 106, 108, 151, 162, 164, 167, 188, 197, 225, 233, 238, 244, 247, 257, 260, 262, 263, 270, 271, 273, 277, 321, 376
Hommel, Hildebrecht 256
Horace 230, 246
Huizinga, J. 364, 365

Iamblichos 237–241
Ignatius Loyola 240, 266
Illiupersis 253
Immisch, Otto 246
Irenaeus, Vätern 233, 356
Isidore of Seville 342–343
Ivanka, Endre 356

Jaeger, W. 220, 225
Jens, Walter 137
Johannes von Kreuz 361, 362
John (St) 243, 265, 321, 370, 375
John of Salisbury 26
John Philoponus 368
Jonas, H. 235
Joosan-Waszink 225
Justin 25, 170, 171
Jüthner, Julius 204

Kant 19, 30, 156, 177, 297, 300, 320, 323
Kerényi, Karl 22, 64
Keyser, E. de 302
Keyser, Hans 163
Kierkegaard 15, 194, 243
Klinger, Friedrich 249, 257, 260, 261
Koch, Franz 247
Koheleth 86
Köhler, W. 30
Kovach, Francis 373, 397, 400, 401, 409, 411
Kullmann, Wolfgang 48, 51, 70, 75

Leeuw, G. van der 36
Leibniz 26
Leisegang 235
Lesky, Albin 140, 142, 143, 151
Lewin, K. 30
Liebeschütz, H. 44
Linus 36
Loeb 280
Lohmeyer, E. 246
Lorenz, S. 228
Lubac, Henri de 225, 226
Lucretius 79, 230, 249, 253, 257
Luther 15, 26, 37, 320, 322, 331, 354
Lüthi, Kurt 27

Macrobius 256
Manilius 236
Marcus Aurelius 226
Marius Victorinus 321
Marti, Kurt 27
Marx, Karl 228
Masnovo, A. 382
Mason, Eudo C. 36
Maurras, C. 36
Maury, P. 251
Maximus Confessor 281, 319, 343, 348, 350, 351, 367
Maximus of Tyre 193
Mazon, Paul 78, 81
Mechthild of Magdeburg 391, 392
Methodius 322
Metrodorus of Lampsace 225
Metzger, W. 30
Meyer, W. 276
Michelangelo 322
Milton 247
Moliere 49
Mombert 101
More, Thomas 367
Moritz, Karl Philipp 31
Mühll, P. von der 230
Müller, Conrad 225
Muller, Walter 348
Murray, Gilbert 138

Nägelbach, C. Fr. 50, 55, 65, 75
Nævius 262
Nebel, Gerhard 33, 95, 116
Nicholas of Cusa 26, 29, 39, 247, 281, 290, 319, 343, 348, 351, 354, 367, 395, 404
Nichomachus of Gerasa 220
Nietzche 104
Nonnos 321
Norden, E. 236, 255, 256
Novalis 308

Ockham, Thomas 367
Oeing-Hanhoff, L. 403
Origen 26
Ohly, Fr. 322
Opermann, Hans 256, 263, 267
Origen 26, 240, 321, 322
Orpheus 36
Otto, R. 37
Otto, Walter F. 52, 58, 72, 75, 103, 105, 116
Ovid 246, 249, 335

Pace, A. 409
Pannwitz 101
Paracelsus 247
Parmenides 156, 157–159, 160, 161, 164, 166, 178, 188, 197, 198, 199, 200, 225, 233, 257, 293
Paul 17, 24, 28, 100, 167, 222, 236, 243, 265, 318, 319
Pautrel, Raymond 243
Pax, E. 238, 244
Peguy, Charles 104, 112
Perpeet, W. 52
Perret, Jacques 250, 251, 254, 271
Perses 82
Peter Lombard 399
Petrarch 322
Pheidias 45, 202, 311
Phillip of Harveng 361
Phillip the Chancellor 372
Philo 221, 243, 265, 321
Philoponus, Ap. 220
Pindar 19, 22, 23, 73, 78, 90–100, 102, 103, 106, 115, 121, 137, 158, 167, 232, 233, 322
Plato 19, 21, 23, 24, 25, 29, 43, 69, 72, 74, 88, 96, 106, 113, 143, 155, 157, 161, 162, 163, 164, 166–215, 197, 220, 222, 224, 227, 233, 236, 237, 239, 244, 247, 249, 251, 266, 282, 284, 293, 306, 311, 319, 320, 321, 325, 378, 384, 389, 397, 401, 406
Pliny 260
Plotinus 19, 21, 25, 37, 39, 106, 213, 219, 233, 237, 247, 280–313, 321, 322, 325, 344, 345, 348, 351, 352, 377, 378, 383, 384, 385, 397, 401
Plutarch 193, 194
Ps. Plutarch 225
Polycletes 45
Porphyry 225, 237, 238, 241, 280, 305
Poseidonius 223
Pouillon, H. 372, 384, 385, 388, 398
Proclus 233, 237, 371, 395, 401
Protagoras 197
Prudentius 364
Prümm, Karl 246, 256, 317
Przywara, Erich 37, 322
Pythagoras 163–165, 181, 182, 335

Racine 45, 104, 132, 253
Regenbogen, O. 132
Regino von Prümm 335
Reinhardt, Karl 69, 71, 120, 122, 125, 127, 133
Reitzenstein, R. 340
Richard of St Victor 321, 357, 359–361, 391
Riemer 13
Rilke, R. M. 20, 155, 261
Rossetti 247
Rudberg, G. 98

Rüdiger, Horst 86
Rupert of Deutz 361
Ryckel (Denys the Carthusian) 319, 373, 391

Sappho 22, 86–87, 186
Schadewaldt, W. 86
Schefold, Karl 74
Schelling 32, 35, 79, 301, 320, 323, 354, 369
Schierse, F. J. 243
Schiller 104, 127, 132, 142, 156, 300, 323
Schlier, Heinrich 12
Schmitt, Johanna 148
Schrade, Hubert 52, 68
Schulemann, G. 376
Scotus Erigena—see Erigena, John
Seneca 45, 132, 212, 217, 326
Sextus Empiricus 229
Shaftesbury 247, 281, 327
Shakespeare, William 75, 104, 277
Shelley 101
Siewerth, Gustav 196, 403, 406
Simonides 90, 167
Siro 250
Snell, Bruno 70, 79, 253
Socrates 21, 131, 156, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 173, 175, 176, 177, 179, 184, 186, 187, 189, 191, 192, 193, 194, 197, 199, 202, 203, 204, 210, 216, 220
Söhngen, G. 159
Solon 87–90, 103
Soloviev 169, 320, 369
Sophocles 20, 49, 107, 109, 116, 118, 122–131, 132, 136, 148, 151, 162, 274
Soranus 326
Sowa, G. 335
Spicq, C. 243
Spinoza 344
Spoerri, Theophil 33
Staudenmeier, Anton 310
Steinwender, H. 143
Stenzel, Julius 163
Stobaeus 228
Strohm, Hans 149
Suger of St Denis 361
Synesius 321

Tasso 49, 247
Teilhard de Chardin 37, 320, 369
Teresa of Avila 266
Theagenes of Regium 225
Theocritus 250, 251
Therese of Liseiux 28
Thierry of Chartres 366
Thimus, A. von 163
Thomas Aquinas 16, 17, 35, 39, 247, 281, 295, 321, 367, 372, 373, 374, 375, 377, 382, 384, 385, 386, 389, 393–412
Thomas Gallus 371, 377
Thomas of Celano 382
Thomas of York 385
Thummer, Erich 100
Treu, Max 84, 86
Tyrtaeus 51, 88
Ps. Tyrtaeus 90

Ulrich, Ferdinand 38
Ulrich of Strasbourg 372, 373, 388–391

Valentinus 233
Valéry 45
Varro 216, 217, 218, 257, 260, 325
Vergil 20, 21, 34, 39, 44, 47, 49, 219, 230, 241, 247, 248, 249–279, 281, 291, 321
Verres 170
Victorines 319, 356–361
Villon 86
Volkmann-Schluck, K.-H. 281, 299

Wagner 129

Walther, Max 340
Watkin, E. I. 36
Weinstock, S. 225
Wertheimer, M. 30
Wetmore, M. N. 249
Wilamovitz 98, 199
Wili, Walter 273
William of Auvergne 382, 384, 400
William of Auxerre 372
William of St. Thierry 321, 361
Winckelmann 247, 386
Wulf, de 388

Xenophanes 69, 91, 157
Xenophon 202, 228

Zeller 238
Zeno 326
Zeno, ap. 226
Ziegler, Leopold 36
Zöckler, O. 373

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN · LIBRARIES ·

THE GLORY OF THE LORD

Hans Urs von Balthasar

THE GLORY OF THE LORD: A THEOLOGICAL AESTHETICS

By Hans Urs von Balthasar

VOLUMES OF THE COMPLETE WORK

Edited by Joseph Fessio, S.J., and John Riches

1. SEEING THE FORM
2. STUDIES IN THEOLOGICAL STYLE: CLERICAL STYLES
3. STUDIES IN THEOLOGICAL STYLE: LAY STYLES
4. THE REALM OF METAPHYSICS IN ANTIQUITY
5. THE REALM OF METAPHYSICS IN THE MODERN AGE
6. THEOLOGY: THE OLD COVENANT
7. THEOLOGY: THE NEW COVENANT

The publishers gratefully acknowledge the support of the Pro Helvetia Foundation in the preparation of the English translation.

THE GLORY OF THE LORD

A THEOLOGICAL AESTHETICS

BY

HANS URS VON BALTHASAR

VOLUME V: THE REALM OF METAPHYSICS IN THE MODERN AGE

Translated by Oliver Davies, Andrew Louth, Brian McNeil C.R.V., John Saward and Rowan Williams
Edited by Brian McNeil C.R.V. and John Riches

T&T CLARK, 59 GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH

GRAD
BT
78
.B193
1982
v.5

Copyright © T&T Clark, 1991
T&T Clark, 59 George Street, Edinburgh EH2 2LQ, Scotland
T&T Clark is an imprint of HarperCollins*Publishers*

Authorised English Translation of
Herrlichkeit: Eine theologische Ästhetik, Band III, 1:
Im Raum der Metaphysik, Teil II: Neuzeit
Copyright © Johannes Verlag, Einsiedeln, 1965

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of T&T Clark.

First Published 1991

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Balthasar, Hans Urs von, 1905
The glory of the Lord: a theological aesthetics
Vol. 5: The realm of metaphysics in the modern age.
1. Christian theology
I. Title II. Riches, John 1939—
230

ISBN 0 567 09576 2

Typeset by Barbers Highlands Ltd, Fort William
Printed and bound in Great Britain by Billing & Sons Ltd, Worcester

GL
175015X
C&EL1
5-d-21
[illegible]

CONTENTS

VOLUME V
THE REALM OF METAPHYSICS IN THE MODERN AGE

2. ELABORATIONS

B. THE AESTHETICS OF TRANSCENDENTAL REASON 9
1. The Parting of the Ways 9
   a. Origins of the Modern Period 9
   b. Being as a Concept 16
   c. Being as Neutrality 21
   d. Being as God 29
2. The Metaphysics of the Saints 48
   a. Christology and Tragedy 48
   b. Abandonment (Gelassenheit) and Imitation 52
   c. In the Whirlpool of Glory 67
   d. Espousals in the Night 78
   e. Ignatius of Loyola and 'Representation': Glory in the Age of Baroque 102
   f. The Final Systems 114
   g. The Metaphysics of the Oratory 119
3. Folly and Glory 141
   a. Holy Fools 141
   b. Gallows-birds and Duellists with Death 147
   c. The Transformations of the Fool 152
   d. The Analogy of Folly 164
   e. Ridiculousness and Grace 169
   f. The Fool as Rogue 180
   g. The Christian as Idiot 188
   h. Christ in the Clown 201
4. The Knot: Nicolas of Cusa 205
   a. The Remaining Themes and the New Beginning 205
   b. Total Glory 213
   c. Training in Analogy 222
   d. Conjecture or Absolute Knowledge? 238

5. Classical Mediation 247
  a. Refuge with the Past 247
  b. Eros: the Glory of Melancholy 264
  c. Retreat to the Human Person as Centre 284
  d. Hölderlin 298
  e. Goethe 339
  f. The Final Period 408
6. The Metaphysics of Spirit 451
  a. The Other Possibility 451
  b. The Immediacy of the Man-God Relation 455
  c. Kant 481
  d. The Self-glorification of the Spirit 513
7. Aesthetics as Science 597

3. OUR INHERITANCE AND THE CHRISTIAN TASK

A. THE SITE OF GLORY IN METAPHYSICS 613
1. The Miracle of Being and the Fourfold Distinction 613
2. The Theological a priori Element in Metaphysics 628

B. LOVE AS CUSTODIAN OF GLORY 635
1. The Light of Being and Love 635
2. The Christian Contribution to Metaphysics 646
Index of Proper Names 657

B. THE AESTHETICS OF TRANSCENDENTAL REASON

1. THE PARTING OF THE WAYS

a. Origins of the Modern Period

What we are offering here is neither a history of philosophy nor a general intellectual history; we are inquiring solely into what became of the classical experience of God's glory over the course of the centuries. And we are conducting this inquiry in such a way that the element of Christian glory within this philosophical survey is excluded as far as possible and reserved for the concluding, biblical section. We have already seen how the Early and High Middle Ages dutifully received and developed the classical experience of a world which reveals God, how they understood the historical salvation-event wholly within a comprehensive and cosmic context, to such an extent that the universal categories of beauty which we find in antiquity served largely as a conceptual language in which the total revelation of God—with its centre in Jesus Christ—was expressed. Admittedly, this monistic vision (Erigena, the Victorines) was undermined by the advancing philosophy of Chartres and Abelard and by the Aristotelian renaissance, but during the period of High Scholasticism the Franciscan and Dionysian wave had once again produced a system of contemplation which transcended Being, in which not only the believing but also the philosophizing Christian felt that he could dare to say that the reflection of eternal goodness and beauty is perceptible in all being. In terms of intellectual history, this precept disappears after Thomas Aquinas. His ontology, upon which it was based, remained without imitators—if this is understood in the sense of an elemental, historical experience of Being. Thomas's experience of Being gathered within itself and embodied the inheritance of antiquity in its entirety, of an Aristotle who is always transformed and imbued with a religious light by Plato (with his historical backgrounds!), Dionysius and Augustine. For Thomas, to contradict an experience of this kind would have been to cast doubt on whether the religious experience of mankind (which had drawn close to Christianity in its Greek guise) still had an obligatory character in the present.

It was Averroism, which since 1250 had purported to be the sole serious and radical interpretation of the sole 'scientific' philosopher, Aristotle, which brought the turning-point. It understood itself to be the attempt to ascertain how far human reason could go in the inquiry into the ultimate grounds of Being when it excluded and dispensed with all revelatory knowledge, be it Islamic (Avicenna!) or Christian. The fact that in 1270 initially fifteen propositions, and then in 1277, two hundred and nineteen propositions of Averroistic inspiration were condemned by the Bishop of Paris at first appeared only to be one event in the struggle between the secular philosophers and the Christian theologians, and for the latter it seemed in the broader perspective one which was by no means unfavourable, in that it stimulated an attempt (upon which Thomas had already painstakingly embarked) to draw the boundaries more clearly between philosophy and Christianity. And the more clearly Christianity, as it moved into the modern period, distanced itself from philosophy, the more clearly it had finally to begin to set forth its own irreducible understanding and possession of glory. In the background, however, there was a completely different line of decision: that concerning Plato and the openness to God which Plato inherits, which can be described as 'mythical' and which was permitted at least in principle by Aristotle in his lost Peri Philosophias. For now the Averroists placed philosophy, as the sole comprehensive science, above theology. The latter was based upon fabulae (myths),[1] while the ultimate science identified reality, rationality and necessity, with the result that God must create the world, which exists from eternity, of course in such a way that he produces only the One Being, which is his own likeness, and which he orders by virtue of subordinate causes in a descending scale from himself to the material plane. This is a God without freedom, without knowledge of creatures, or a true otherness with respect to the world. This is a mental creature which lacks psycho-spiritual individuality (since the intellectus agens is only a single—divine—reality), without freedom or immortality. A world (according to Siger of Brabant) of eternal recurrence. This is a man who is characterised in his highest powers of philosophical reasoning as Θεῖον, as is the case in Aristotle: 'Just as we call divine that which is best in the totality of beings, so too we call divine that which is best in man' (Boethius of Dacia).[2] But it is clear to what extent the original Greek opposition between gods and men is lost here in these undifferentiated statements. However much in subsequent ages theologians sought to identify what belonged distincitively to the nature of revelation, nevertheless they were simultaneously inclined to accept as fact and as counterpart the proudly resigned self-limitation of philosophy, and thus largely to renounce the infrastructure of a 'natural revelation' in order merely to cast light from within on the nature of faith for those who already believe.

---

[1] Condemned theses, quoted following Gilson, La Philosophie au Moyen-Age, 2nd edn. 1952, p. 559, E.T. (1955), p. 406.

The late Middle Ages is a time of darkness like few others;[3] the social order is in ruins, war and plague prevail, secular and ecclesiastic façades are collapsing, the face of the visible Church is disfigured beyond recognition, especially through the great schism; and the radiance of the heavenly Jerusalem no longer breaks through the clouds to illumine God's earthly realm. Those realistic, often cynical spotlights on human existence, which have always accompanied the forms and images which transfigure and console—we mentioned at the beginning Archilochus, who repeatedly celebrates resurrections, or Martial, or many cynical and blasphemous wandering minstrels' songs—now take the upper hand in such a way that existence as a whole appears in the image of the dance of death. And just as Socrates and Boethius philosophised in the face of death, now numerous 'books of consolation' from Eckhart[4] to Peter of Blois, John of Dambach[5] and far beyond seek to interpret existence under the rubric of suffering.[6] But it is mostly classical, Stoic and mystical elements which predominate among the reasons for consolation, and only rarely do we find—as, e.g., in Catherine of Siena—that suffering enters so brilliant a Christian light that it can itself be understood as glory. And thus for the first time something is born in the Christian sphere which corresponds to the position of the Greek spirit in the age of tragedy, and the preconditions are created for the emergence of the sole tragedy to attain the metaphysical heights of antiquity during the Christian age: the tragedies of Shakespeare, above all his tragedies of kings.

---

[2] De summo bono sive de vita philosophi, ed. Grabmann in: Arch. Hist. doctr. litt. MA VI (1932) (Mittelalterliches Geistesleben, II, pp. 200–204). As an Aristotelian, Boethius of Dacia can nevertheless feel an 'astonished admiration' of the 'first principle' and 'a love for it' and can find therein 'the highest delight' or bliss of man on earth.

[3] J. Huizinga, The Waning of the Middle Ages, E.T. London 1955.

In Thomas's ontology, the transcendental aesthetics of the classical period (which Dionysius sums up and passes on to Christian theology) achieves a state of balance: Being (esse), with which he is concerned and to which he attributes the modalities of the One, the True, the Good and the Beautiful, is the unlimited abundance of reality which is beyond all comprehension, as it, in its emergence from God, attains subsistence and self-possession within the finite entities. Where this balance is not maintained, then there are only two possible ways forward: either to formalise Being to the extent that it becomes the comprehensive concept of reason (which is the case with Scotus), and thus expressly or by implication to concede to reason the oversight and control of Being. Being then necessarily becomes the category which is both highest and most devoid of meaning, whose syntheses with their ever more concrete forms can be rationally reconstructed or, as in the Idealism which prevails between Kant and Hegel, can be pre-constructed by reason. We see immediately that Being which is formalized to this extent can still just possess the inner modalities of unity, truth and goodness, but no longer that of transcendental beauty. For how should the divine and mysterious pleroma radiate from this empty space? Since Scotist formalism provides the model for the scientific thinking of our day, it is to be expected that the consciousness of any transcendental glory must be alien to it, and must become ever more alien.

---

[4] In his 'Book of the divine consolation' for Queen Agnes of Hungary who was in mourning for her murdered father, Emperor Albrecht I of Habsburg.

[5] A. Auer, 'Johannes von Dambach und die Trostbücher vom 11. bis 16. Jahrhundert', in: BGPhThMA, 1928.

[6] A. Auer, Leidenstheologie des Mittelalters, Salzburg 1947; F. Maurer, Leid, 1951.

The other way in which Being can be interpreted after Thomas is simply to identify it (once again) with God, as Meister Eckhart does, thus setting his stamp upon the conceptual model of late-medieval mysticism and to a large extent upon that of its spiritual descendants. Plotinus had avoided this identification and characterised the primal ground beyond Being as the Good. Dionysius followed him in this, but Erigena already inclined towards interpreting the God-world relation in terms of complication and explication, and for the school of Chartres, especially for Gilbert, God appeared as the form of Being which determines all else. This is the tradition which Eckhart continues, and Nicolas of Cusa will take up Erigena's scheme at the end of the medieval period. But if in the development of the Scotist model reason gains the upper hand over God, then in the logic of the Eckhartian model it is difficult to understand how there can exist a world outside God; and so the mystical self-annihilation of the creature must change sooner or later into a renewed appropriation of the Divine Being, which after Scotus and Eckhart now appears mainly in the form of spirit and freedom. Even in the medieval mystical tradition which follows Eckhart, the glory of the Absolute is called into question by the fact that it has little or no remaining space in which and through which it can become manifest. Both models turn into one another—as two forms of a pan-theism of the spirit or of reason—and form in their dialectical reciprocity the structure of philosophy between the medieval and the modern periods.

The high points of this whole period, which guaranteed it world-wide influence, justify its designation as the Germanic age. There are three great movements; Scotus and Eckhart (with their descendents: Ockham on the one hand, Tauler and Nicolas of Cusa on the other) determine both the scientific and the religious self-understanding of Europe. The thought of Suarez will follow that of Scotus, while Ignatius of Loyola, and later the Grand Siècle, belong to the family of German mysticism, and the points of origin for those elements of the latter which return to Germany through Tersteegen and Poiret still remain Germany and Brabant. The second movement is Luther and his age (to which in the broader sense Erasmus and Shakespeare belong). Itself standing on the shoulders of mysticism, the Reformation offers its own shoulders to the third intellectual event, that which extends from Kant to Hegel and Marx. If the Reformation shapes the religious spirit of England and America, then it is here that the spirit of Russia and the 'scientific' age as such are given their shape.

We can see from this list of names that the philosophical history of the age was very strongly influenced by Christians. Even if, in what follows, we do not treat the biblical and theological problematic as a theme in itself, it is nevertheless impossible to ignore the contribution made by spiritual Christians, even and precisely when these employ the conceptual language of their day in order to make themselves heard and to ensure their comprehensibility. The dynamic interrelationship of classical theo-philosophy and the Christian theology of revelation is indissoluble, because the transcendental claim of reason and the universal claim of revelation will always sit uneasily together. Thomas Aquinas himself brought both together in a bold paradox when he declared that it belongs to the nobility of human nature that we can attain perfection in our desiderium naturale for the very Highest only through a free self-disclosure by God.[7] No matter how the interpretations of later Christian theology may have reduced this principle, the nexus which it contains will preoccupy the philosophy of the modern period and will dictate its decisions: this double inheritance, which is both Platonic and Christian, will not cease to fascinate the human mind.[8] In the late middle ages, 'mysticism' (which flows almost without interruption into humanism) functions as a universalising medium: it drives the divisive dogmatic formulas to a point where they become transparent, as we can observe in the dialogue which Ramon Lull and Nicolas of Cusa conduct with Islam and later in Sebasian Franck's understanding of religion. In an age which sees the hardening of confessional positions, Catholic consciousness responds to Protestantism not only with a dogmatic counter-position, but quite consciously with a world culture (the 'Baroque') which wills and knows itself in terms of universality—in a sense of geographical catholicity which, though undergoing colonial expansion, is still Augustinian. Finally, the Enlightenment and Idealism stripped Christianity of dogma to such an extent that nothing more can prevent its total absorption into a transcendental philosophy. And if from the very beginning (Augustine and his theory of predestination) and with Calvin, Bañez and Jansen, Christianity seems to have been given severe, anti-universal contours, then it is Protestant orthodoxy (in the dogmatics of Karl Barth) which has significantly and prophetically stepped beyond these limits today and has set Christianity face to face on this basis with the transcendental claim of reason and of Idealism (Schleiermacher).[9] It is precisely in Barth's dogmatics that (despite all the protestations to the contrary) a feeling for 'glory' emerges in a new and elemental way.

---

[7] S. Th. II I, 5, 5 ad 2.

[8] Cf. my 'Geschichte und Integration', in: Das Ganze im Fragment (1963), pp. 201–215 (Eng. trans., Man in History, 1968).

[9] Cf. my Karl Barth (2nd edn. 1962), esp. pp. 181–259, also 'Christlicher Universalismus' (Origen and Karl Barth), in: Verbum Caro (1960), pp. 260–275.

b. Being as a Concept

SCOTUS, OCKHAM

The decision of DUNS SCOTUS to conceive of being as a concept springs from his concern for the formal object of philosophy in the face of Christian theology. If reason grasps Being alone as its first unlimited concept, then every anticipation of the self-revelation of the sovereign and free God is excluded. In this concept therefore reason transcends the distinction between finite and infinite Being, and thus becomes capable of attaining a natural knowledge of God and is not entirely unprepared for the Word which the free God utters. The concept has not only logical (expressive) universality, but also metaphysical universality, for it captures Being in its objective and all-comprehending ('catholic') generality, so that it can be univocally applied to infinite and to finite Being, that is to God and the world, to substance and accidents, to act and potentiality. That is its indistinction (indifferential),[1] which does not of course refer to the concrete reality of the oppositions which occur within it/them (where analogy holds), but to the objective content of the concept, to the 'essentiality' of Being, which as such pervades neutrally (neuter)[2] all its/their distinctions. 'Being' is therefore no longer reality, but the most comprehensive essentiality, 'ideality', the sole possibility of which is reality and which can on the one hand be infinite (God) and on the other finite (creature). 'Being' is therefore that which is wholly indeterminate, yet which can be determined by nothing other than itself. For Scotus, this paradox is the formal object of philosophy, which thus becomes capable from the very outset of achieving both too much and too little: too much, since in its concept of Being it raises itself above God and the world, comprehensively dominating the Absolute from the standpoint of a greater absolute, and too little, since reality, as insubstantiality, is silently eliminated in this realm of graded formalities and essences.[3] Even individuality is not determined by reality, but by a substantial 'this-ness' (haecceitas). Thus anything can be conceived of in this realm of essences with the removal of existence, and if existence is included in the concept of God, then this is so only as it were as the final consequence of his self-comprehending ideality. 'Who can fail to see that this position contains everything, in order through a form of speculation which is unmoderated by any regula Fidei (as in Hegel) to make the subsisting Spirit-God at the heart of the process of thinking (in contradiction to a ratio which univocally embraces Being . . . and potentiality) into the ultimate determination of substance and finally, by Spirit's resolution, into "reality"?' (G. Siewerth).[4]

[1] Works cited in the edition of Vivès, with the exception of the Opus Oxoniense which is quoted in the edition by Garcia (Quaracchi, 1912–14). Qu. in Metaph. 1.4 q 1 n. 6–7; Op. Ox. 1 d 3 1 3 a2 n. 14.

[2] Op. Ox. 1 d 3 q 2 a4 n. 6. That which exists is no longer neutral: ibid., 1 d 8 q 3 a1 n. 11.

The assignment of Being as Being to the philosophers—apparently in accordance with their own wish and their tradition since Aristotle and Avicenna—is made by the Christian theologian, who hopes thereby to make space for the revelation of the living God. Scotus believes that he can derive from the non-Christian history of philosophy the fact that the a posteriori proofs of God from contingency and movement can lead the spirit only to a 'First Principle' (Avicenna preferred to call this the Primus) within the nature of the world (physis),[5] the personality and freedom of which remain just as uncertain as do the immortality of the human soul and its future destiny of eternal bliss. In order to give the philosopher access to metaphysical transcendentality, Scotus consigns to him the neutral essence, which encompasses God within itself, as the formal object of philosophy, and he does so knowing full well, of course, that even this will fail to overcome his uncertainties, while not suspecting that philosophy, on the basis of this newly acquired area of 'ideality' and its essential 'necessities', will once again (as with the Averroists) outstrip theology. For theology's object is God's most free salvific words and deeds, and faith in these is its foundation. For Scotus, it is an essentially practical science[6] which offers mankind the help we need in order, first, to be able to pursue our supernatural calling and, second, to assist our reason, scarred by original sin, in the acquisition of a knowledge of God which is also in philosophical terms more precise. In a reawakening of the Augustinian tradition,[7] the distinction between what the philosophers call 'God' (τὸ θεῖον, le Dieu des philosophes) and what Christians know through faith as the living God of the Bible, is perceived during the late Middle Ages as a yawning gulf, but with a new anti-philosophical emotion which opposes to the 'necessities' of the philosophical enquiry into existence the sovereign and arbitrary freedom of the living God, which entirely counters any deduction of Creation from God (through the Platonic ideas). Thus the following tragic situation develops: at the very same moment that the distinctively Christian glory of God would have been ready to emerge (freed from the religious aesthetics of antiquity), it is deprived of the medium by means of which it could have been manifested. Since on the one hand philosophy is assigned to an undifferentiated and neutral sphere of 'existence' and the vision of God through the medium of the Creation in its actuality (Rom 1.18f.) is obscured and cast into doubt and, since on the other hand, as a consequence of this, the contemplative component of theology is relinquished in favour of one which is wholly practical and gnosis yields to pure pistis: therefore, although the 'sovereign' (Herrschaftliche)[8] dimension becomes manifest in the divine revelations for the theology of this time, a dimension that contains its own rationality within its sovereign and arbitrary will, because (as for Anselm) the rectitudo resides within the will of God, still the element of glory (Herrliche), the δόξα, does not truly become manifest; neither philosophical reason in its contemplation of existence nor theological faith in its practical, ethical and non-aesthetic orientation can any longer possess a sensorium for this. The philosopher, to whom the field of 'Being' is yielded, advances towards the ultimate principles—neutral to God and to the world—without ever glimpsing theological glory. He is empowered to approach them as reason, and they stand as 'intentions' before his eyes: and thus William of Alnwick (+ 1332) will be the first in his Quaestiones de esse intelligibili[9] to develop from every angle the question with regard to the mode of reality which pertains to the intentional.

---

[3] Existentia non est per se ratio objecti ut scibile est. Quodlibet. 7, 8–9. On this, cf. Jean Gilson, Jean Duns Scot (the basic study today), 1952, pp. 451–466.

[4] Das Schicksal der Metaphysik von Thomas zu Heidegger (1959), p. 97. On the self-determination of God to existence in the Scotist François de Mayronnes, cf. E. Gilson, La philosophie au Moyen Age (2nd edn. 1952), pp. 610–611, ET History of Christian Philosophy in the Middle Ages (1955), pp. 466–467.

[5] This drastic reduction of the scope of philosophic proofs of God, everywhere present in Scotus, is carried out in the Theoremata (Vivès edn., Vol. 3), whether this is by Scotus (Balic) or not (Gilson). This criticism of philosophy will soon be radicalised by Ockham.

---

[6] This is set forth in detail by the Prologue to the Op. Ox., also the Prologue to the newly-edited Lectura in 1. Sent., critical edition Vol. 16 (1960), Pars 4 (pp. 45–62).

[7] Gilson, op. cit., pp. 617–620.

WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, who was Scotus' confrère and compatriot as well as his most acute opponent, does no more than draw possible conclusions from the esse univocum. For if undifferentiated Being defines itself in its ultimate differentiations as haecceitates, why should we then not conceive of it from this pole as the utterly specific 'this' and view the determinative grades of the class and species as purely subjective schemes of classification, which point confusedly to what is individual and real? It is this alone which encounters sense experience, which—in the English empiricist tradition up to and including Locke and Hume[10]—constitutes the whole content of reality and presents it to thought. Thus it is the specific indivisible entity which is real, and in this 'specificity' there lies once again the univocity of Being, whose ground is only the possibility of being posited specifically by the infinite power of God's freedom. This possibility of the specific individual entity which occurs directly through the freedom of God is an intensification of the divine sovereignty which goes beyond Scotus and which gives a theological basis to positivism, which refuses to ask questions that go beyond the mere givenness of what is. This formidable Franciscan creates space even more radically for the sole sovereignty of God when, sweeping away the entire Platonic and Aristotelian tradition, he directly opposes to the yawning abyss of absolute freedom a world which is fragmented into irrational points of reality. With this rupture within the tradition of a mediating or natural (philosophical) theology, every contemplative dimension of the fides quaerens intellectum is in principle removed. Theology, which now closes itself in upon itself, must become fideistic and can ultimately be only practical. And the Franciscan image of God—love beyond the limits of knowledge—must therefore degenerate into an image of fear (which is no longer even that of the Old Testament), since this God of pure freedom might always posit and demand what is contrary; for instance, that man should hate him (Robert Holkot), that the innocent should be damned and the guilty saved (Ockham), and why should he not be able to destroy the world in such a way that it would never have existed (Jean de Mirecourt)? And, of course, the late Augustinianism of double predestination makes its appearance here with renewed virulence (Gregory of Rimini); from here, it will be bequeathed to the Reformers.

---

[8] Ibid., p. 599.

[9] Ed. A. Ledoux, Quaracchi 1937.

[10] Indeed, up to Berkeley, since God is powerful enough to permit the subjective immediate experience to persist even where its object had vanished: ipsa re destructa potest poni ipsa notitia intuitiva (quoted following Gilson, op. cit., p. 654).

We will ask in the following chapter how the central Christian experience could be represented in this philosophical atmosphere. Initially, it is evident only that this experience remains without the mediation to philosophy (in so far as radical empiricism can still be given this name), and to such a degree in fact that an entirely different logic is demanded for the mysteries of faith than for secular thinking (Holkot). The conceptual space between sensualism and formal logicism is the birth-place, devoid of metaphysics, of the modern 'natural sciences'. Following the removal of Aristotelian substance and of all causality, apart from that which relies upon immediate experience, and indeed explicitly of all hierarchies of values in the universe, which leads logically to a Democratic atomism, Nicolas of Autrecourt begins to investigate the laws of spatial movement, and is followed by John Buridan, Albert of Saxony, Nicolas of Oresme, from whom Copernicus and Galileo are directly descended. We cannot pursue these paths here, but should note how trenchantly positions are held only fifty years after the death of Thomas: how small the steps are, and how internally consistent, from an ontological formalism (Scotus) to empiricism (Ockham), and from pure theological voluntarism and 'positionism' to a positivism which possesses no values, and from there, quite consistently, to materialistic atomism. Along these pathways, nothing new has appeared down to the present time.

c. Being as Neutrality

SUAREZ

There is a direct line of descent from Scotus—despite the Renaissance—to Francesco Suarez, the father of Baroque- and Neo-scholasticism, for in this disciple of Ignatius Loyola the univocity of Being and thus the indistinction (indifferentia) of Being emerges anew. As it is here that the philosophical openness of the finite spirit to God is sought, and as indistinction is an Ignatian and indeed a basic Christian concept, this confrontation must prove illuminating.

What Ignatius will call indiferencia is nothing other than the 'detachment' of the German mystics and the amici Dei, which they themselves understood to be a serious commitment, involving the whole person, to the Franciscan ideal of poverty. Francis himself had seen 'wisdom, poverty and love' as one: the ascetic transcendence of all psycho-physical possession into a free receptivity to the love of God alone. We meet this too in Benedict as humility, in Augustine as the pure desiderium for the caritas of God, and in the early Church Fathers it bears the Stoic and Neoplatonic name of apatheia, which points back to pre-Christian forms of spiritual transcendence. Nor should we forget here that behind the constraining systematisations of the Stoa there stand Virgil and the Tragedians with their self-transcendence through suffering into their incomprehensible God-given fate, and behind these too, there is the Odyssey, whose hero conquers through his patience that bears everything.

Thus the pre-Christian indifferentia as the decisive proof of man's nature as spirit hovers between two poles: between blind faith in God, the courage of the heart, blind hope (chiefly in the poets) and a certain rationalised technique of withdrawal from all that is (in order not to be attached to anything), the self-projection into transcendence, the mastering of fate and ultimately even the mastering of the gods (chiefly in the philosophers). But in this indeterminacy we always find an exaltation of the heart, of the whole person, in the unity of thought and life. In the Christian world, this fundamental attitude is illumined by the love of God which breaks forth from the depths in the form of the πραΰς καὶ ταπεινός (Mt 11.29), who proclaims the 'poor in spirit' and the πραεῖς to be blessed (Mt 5.3, 5), always does the will of the Father and goes to his death into the incomprehensible darkness of God. Transcendence as a going beyond the self clearly becomes the yielding of the self (faith, hope, love) to the unfathomability of divine love. The technique of apatheia in antiquity for self-salvation from the world becomes, in the Christian age, the ascetic expansion of the heart and its preparation in order that it should flow into an unlimited readiness to love (ecce ancilla) and ultimately into God's ever greater glory of love in the Cross, which we encounter through grace: ad majorem Dei Gloriam. From Augustine via Benedict to Francis and Ignatius, this remains the primal truth which, though unchanging in its essence, is constantly illumined in new ways. Nor can it stand indifferently beside metaphysics with the latter's question as to the transcendence of reason; rather, it casts light on this very question and clarifies it from its own ultimate sublimity. But what is rejected in any case is the overpowering of God, either by a conceptual pre-apprehension of the mind or by mystical and ascetical technique. What is adopted in any case is the open acceptance of our fate, in daring and in trust, and this is so to such an extent that 'grace' does not destroy 'nature' here (only that gnosis which replaces daring trust with manipulative knowledge is destroyed: 1 Cor 13.9; 2 Cor 10.5); rather, the attitude of open acceptance is made both divine and eternal ('then there remain these three . . .': 1 Cor 13.13).

We must therefore ask in what ways the charisms of the founders of the great religious orders achieved philosophical expression. The charismatic indifferentia has rarely been immediately reflected in its philosophical counterpart, and so philosophical transcendence has rarely been the true initiation into the encounter with the glory of God. Not the least reason for this was the fact that intersubjectivity, upon which the ethics of the Gospel is based, failed to find an adequate philosophical foundation in the classical period, and even today has yet to become the principal theme of Christian philosophy. Accordingly, it is a largely Neoplatonic (and therefore undialogical) metaphysics which provides the conceptual underpinning for the Augustinian theology of caritas, to which the Benedictine theology of caritas (in Bernard and his school) also looks back. On the other hand, that which is originally Franciscan in Bonaventure is interpreted with reference to Augustine and Pseudo-Dionysius, the Dominican charism (which is difficult to grasp) is referred back to Aristotle and, in the case of Eckhart, to Parmenides, and what is originally Ignatian in Suarez turns back to Scotus, so that there is no inherent unity between his philosophy and his commentary on the Exercises. Thus in historical terms Christian thought is not commensurate with the forms of Christian inspiration, nor does it seek to keep pace with it, but is content rather to cut a paltry coat for it from the huge store of material of extant thought. Neoscholasticism, to which period the contribution of Ignatius belongs, was particularly burdened by the weight of prior thinking, of what was apparently already contained in the treasury of tradition, so that the original Ignatian vision of Divina Majestas and Gloria was no longer able to create any original mode of conceptual expression.

SUAREZ[1] has recourse to the Scotist notion of 'univocal being', the ens ut sic, which as the simplest and most universal concept (conceptus simplicissimus)[2] is the precise object of metaphysical enquiry. This concept habet unam simplicem rationem formalem adaequatam[3] in itself, which, as 'abstracted' (praecisa) though 'real'[4] (ratio quasi actualis),[5] returns in all its logical inferiora, to whose level we 'descend' (descenditur)[6] in order to be able to conceive of individuality. If we wished to relinquish this univocal, all-embracing notion for the sake of an unassailable analogia entis, then all the clarity and the certainty of metaphysics would be threatened, 'and so we ought not to deny the unity of the concept in order to defend the analogy; rather, if we had to relinquish one or other of them, then this would be analogy, which is uncertain, and not the unity of the concept, which is based on certain and demonstrable grounds'.[7] This real concept 'must embrace God' (debere comprendere Deum), as well as the angels and all material substances and accidents.[8] A metaphysics which has knowledge of Being as a whole 'includes God in the sphere of its object' (ut sub objecto suo Deum complectatur),[9] and it can develop a priori the dimensions of Being as such (unity, truth, goodness) without direct reference to the inferiora (God and the world),[10] between which, for the first time, analogy and the principle of causality prevail. And yet God is the purest realisation of 'real Being' and thus the precise (material) object of metaphysics, its objectum primarium ac principale,[11] whereby of course Scotus' endeavours to constrain metaphysics and to set its limits with respect to theology, are lost sight of, and the vigorous attempts of the nominalists to create room for God's freedom are forgotten. Or rather: because the nominalistic reduction of reality to one plane, whether in terms of concepts (conceptus) or of sense experience (experientia), has abandoned the totality of actual reality between God and the world, Baroque Neoscholasticism can apparently recreate this by means of a constructive conceptualism. But once freed from the external theological discipline of faith and of the schools, what Suarez pursues with the complete naivety of the schoolman, becomes (as Gustav Siewerth has shown in his fierce analyses)[12] the direct foundation for modern metaphysics from Descartes, Spinoza and Leibniz to Kant and Hegel. At the same time, it will unchangingly dominate the clerical activity of philosophical and theological Neoscholasticism (that is to say, beyond Hegel and the collapse of constructive Idealism); this shows clearly that the de facto occurrence of the scholasticism of the schools continues to confirm Suarez's naive point of departure, whether or not the latter is formally taught.

---

[1] Disputationes Metaphysicae (Opera, ed. Vivès 1866, 1866, Vols. 25–26).

---

[2] Disp. 2 sect. 2 nr. 9.
[3] Ibid. n. 11.
[4] 1, 1, 26.
[5] 1, 2, 12.
[6] 2, 1, 12.
[7] 2, 2, 36.
[8] 1, 1, 26; cf. 1, 1, 19.
[9] 1, 1, 19.
[10] 1, 1, 28; thus also Disp. 3.
[11] 1, 1, 19.

The conjunction of the opening of the heart's most inward idea of God within the biblical sphere and Greek, metaphysical speculation on the Θεῖον and the Πᾶν, this conjunction in which speculation apparently gains the academic qualifications to know about God, his essence, his thinking and his acting within the Creation, salvation and perfection (in faith), to receive Being laid bare to its depths and to manipulate it in these depths by conceptual means, with the support of an immense body of tradition which is composed of what has been 'worked out' partly dogmatically and partly in the schools, and has been already objectively thought (and which therefore is not to be thought through afresh): this conjunction stands behind metaphysics as it exists in the modern period both in the Church and beyond. A symptomatic expression of this was the controversy over grace between the school of Bañez and the Molinists, the pitiful controversy De Auxiliis, in which the young Society of Jesus allowed itself to become entangled and the very problematic of which presupposes that the theological metaphysician can peer from above into the interaction of the Causa Prima with the causa secunda, and that its precise, formal expressions and distinctions can be reduced to a single order of absolute validity. This is in essence the claim of the ancient Gnosis, and it is not so surprising therefore that at the outset of the Counter-Reformation the Augustinian General, Cardinal Giles of Viterbo, should have attempted in his 'Schechina' to renew the Speculatio Majestatis of the Kabbala and to transform it along Christian lines.[13] The Neoscholastic closed circle is virtually unbreakable: since the biblical revelation of God's depths, which the one who possesses the Spirit 'searches' together with the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 2.10–12), apparently invites us to bypass the philosophical mystery of Being, and since, with the disappearance of the sense of philosophical mystery, the sense of theological mystery also dissolves, and this, according to the axiom gratia supponit, non destruit, elevat naturam, ought to be an intensified and deepened feeling for the mystery of glory. But the clerical and Neoscholastic methods of instruction with their apologetic all-knowingness no longer convey any sense of this feeling, and they have a corresponding effect upon the preaching and the instruction of the Church, if not indeed on the prayer-life and contemplation even of those Christians to whose attitude this kind of enlightenment stands in stark and insurmountable contradiction. Whereas during the early Middle Ages, up to about the time of Bonaventure, theology and (objective) mysticism were indivisible—something to which Augustine and Dionysius, Gregory the Great and Erigena, the Cistercians and the Victorines, the Joachimites and the Spiritual Franciscans well attest—the 'mystic' is now identified increasingly in terms of his subjective experience of glory and is stamped as an exception, while the 'rule' is represented by the strictly logical and intellectualist metaphysics of the Church. Those who are concerned to restore the lost unity (Gerson, Nicolas of Cusa, Petavius, Gerbert, etc.) remain outsiders and often pursue paths which lead to speculative Idealism. What is characteristic here is that in Neoscholasticism, when the feeling for the glory of God was lost—that glory which pervades the Revelation as a whole but which is not perceived by conceptual rationalism, or concerning which it remains silent, or which it wholly removes by means of method—there perished also the sensorium for the glory of Creation (as 'aesthetics') which shone through the whole theology of the Fathers and of the Early and High Middle Ages. This sensorium passed pre-eminently to the poets and artists (from Dante to Petrarch, to Milton, Herder, Hölderlin, Keats . . .), but also to the great natural scientists (such as Kepler and Newton, the early Kant, Goethe, Carus, Fechner, Teilhard), whereby Neoscholasticism found itself doubly bereft and denuded.

---

[12] Das Schicksal der Metaphysik von Thomas zu Heidegger (1959).

---

[13] Ed. by F. Secret in: Edizione Nazionale dei Classici del Pensiero Italiano II 10–11, Rome 1959.

The conceptualisation of Being in Scotus and Suarez annuls the experience of reality and encloses thought in a sphere which is characterised by bare, essential predications, by the play of the analysis and synthesis of concepts, and accordingly by the inner-subjective opposition of the act of thought (noesis) and the content of thought (noema). That bare, essential predication represents an irreducible contradiction, becomes clear once again in Suarez. Although Being as the highest category is the 'most perfect'[14] category, it is also the one which is most hollow, because it excludes its own determinations, which all nevertheless belong to and are Being, so that this category is filled only through contraction to the level of the singular.[15] Within this contradictory space, which Suarez—following Scotus[16]—calls 'real', reason plays its game of juxtaposing concepts in statements before resolving them again into other, homogeneous concepts. For Suarez, as for Scotus, the word 'real' denotes that which is compossible, realisable, not that which is actual, for which only the positio extra causas remains, though this can no longer be the object of thought, because the essence as the 'real' within comprehensive Being has already been thoroughly individualised. This is the case unless, of course, we conceive of comprehensive Being (as a concept!) as reality, which would mean, however, that all that is possible is actual. But it is evident that this cannot be said, and thus actuality remains excluded from 'reality' as something which has no place and which cannot be thought. Or if it is comprehensive Being which is reality, and existence as that which is possible is constituted by its 'being ordered to Being' (ordo ad esse), then it will be constituted beyond God (and thus vis-à-vis him) in the sphere of comprehensive Being,[17] whereby the formal precondition for 'Molinism' emerges, in which the creature attains an ultimate particularity and freedom which is independent of the will of God.

---

[14] 1, 1, 30.

[15] From this point of view, all-embracing Being is minus perfectum than that which is specific: ibid.

[16] 2, 4, 14.

On the other hand, the concept of Being belongs to the subject; the latter stands in opposition to the former—and to all the concepts which inhere in the former—as to that which is conceived. For Suarez these do indeed 'represent' the so-called 'external world', but these concepts, which are 'abstracted' 'intentions', are understood to be objectified representations of 'things'. It is a short step from here to Descartes and Kant; less than that even, for here the Copernican revolution has already taken place, viz. the turning from Being to mental concepts, from things (and God) existing in themselves to things conceived as existing 'for me' and 'from me'. From now on, the subject can regard itself as legislative reason. In an original synthesis, it pronounces judgment a priori in its luminous space over the initial concept of Being, which it has been given and which lies open to its comprehension, to which judgment other a priori and a posteriori judgments attach themselves. And it can assure itself of the correctness of this judgment through reflection upon itself in its action (cogito), and then either seek the ultimate certainty in that kind of reason whose postulates are archetypal, in which it participates and which is God (Descartes), or understand this participation as an ultimate identity of the finite with the infinite subject and, in conjunction with it, project and creatively produce possible real essences (concipere): statically (as in Spinoza) or dynamically (as in Leibniz and Fichte), or both together (as in Hegel). Beyond the realm of these projected essences, there remain at best those pure, irrational postulations extra causas, those positions which Ockhamism understood to be worthless atomic points of reality, and which in their lack of depth and their indivisibility already for Ockhamism are left over as pure matter: as matter which for Suarez is no longer (Aristotelian-Thomist) pure potency with respect to the act of form, but now appears—though colourless and actionless—to be constituted as actual Being. These are that 'passive mass', which appears in Descartes as res extensa, and which is the sole representative and last remnant of the external world and of the Ding an sich, the substratum of the 'classical physics', which in materialism (where the unreality of the conceptual realm which is constituted by the subject is perceived) must be raised to the level of the one sole reality which supports all things, even spirit and God. This res extensa is the pure quantitative element, the unlimited empire of numbers, and it is here that the metaphysical origins lie for the ideal of mastering the whole of the external world through numerical calculations. An ideal of this kind could never have arisen if the whole of reality had not already been stripped of its living depths and spontaneity, its own truth, goodness and beauty, and had thus been set in unmediated contradiction to the res cogitans. The foundations of our 'modern' materialism were laid long ago in the intellectual history of our Western, Christian tradition.

---

[17] 31, 4, 5. Siewerth, op. cit., p. 179, and even more sharply on p. 186.

Besides the logical and conceptual apprehension of Being, there has existed since the death of Thomas another parallel strain, which achieved its greatest impact during the Germanic age: the position that Being is God. Having developed initially in independence from the logical and conceptual thread, it soon becomes intertwined with the latter, and thus possesses its own history in this limited form up to the time of Hegel.

d. Being as God

ECKHART

Eckhart, thanks to his disciples Suso and Tauler and their innumerable successors, has become a father of modern intellectual history and spirituality. He is further confirmation of what the Origen-Evagrius case proved in the history of the early Church: ecclesiastical condemnations of individual extremist propositions from the writings of creative minds, even their proscription for posterity, do not prevent them bearing thousandfold fruit. They leave their mark on ideas which, consciously or unconsciously, esoterically or openly, have a determining influence on later thinkers in their most fundamental stances. Eckhart's case has also perhaps a personal resemblance to Origen's: an originally very pure Christian piety clothes itself in an unsuitable garment that ill fits the body. Origen expresses Christianity in Gnostic-Hellenistic categories. Eckhart has to (and therefore wants to) translate a very pure Christian experience of God in the technical language of traditional and contemporary Scholastic philosophy. No more than Origen is he an original philosopher like his confrère Thomas. He treats the great mass of philosophical speculation inherited from the past—Platonic, Aristotelian, Arabic, Patristic, Thomistic—in the way the Christians of Rome used the ruined temples of their city: as quarries.

So we have to divest Eckhart's wholly limpid and shadowless experience of God of its conceptual and verbal attire. It is an experience that is authentically Christian, even in its most daring conceptions, but it clothes itself in garments of the past and, thus disguised, bequeaths to the future a legacy with consequences almost beyond measure: Luther, but also Nicolas of Cusa, Spinoza, Böhme, Kant, Fichte, Schelling, and Hegel. Emphasising this in no way implies that Eckhart was 'really' a pantheistic Idealist or a Protestant with a forensic doctrine or justification. However, ideas have their own historical dynamic; they are governed by and obey their own laws, regardless of the meaning they had for their originator. In calling God 'Being', Eckhart performed an act of absolute religious devotion. He availed himself of a language, rooted in antiquity, which Augustine and Boethius, Erigena and Gilbert, had used with impunity. But he applied it directly to God and the creature's immediate dependence on God[1] in such a way that the derivation of a reality of being from God seemed to him like God's coming to being, as being's coming out of God. The assertion 'God is being' runs through virtually all his works, and the Thomistic mediation of the non-subsistent actus essendi is lost from sight. That loss has a spiritual cause. What Eckhart seeks is the total transference of all being, all unity, truth, goodness and glory to the one and only God, loved and worshipped above all things. Nothing that can be said and thought about God is too great, too bold, too unconditional: id quo majus cogitari non potest.[2]

The source is an experience of glory, which unfolds into four propositions and thus defines Eckhart's theological aesthetic:

1. God is beyond everything explicable by finality (the good) and propositions (the true). He is 'the Whyless'. The only thing worthy of God and appropriate to Him is what takes place 'whylessly' as a free act of homage. Shining through the face of things is an unquestionable and unfathomable mystery. 'The rose is without why; it blooms because it blooms'.[3] The words are those of Angelus Silesius, who had the profoundest understanding of Eckhart. He also expresses the other aspect of the truth: this 'whylessness' of the rose points to that first principle which is God:

---

[1] Non enim ipsum esse et quae cum ipso convertibiliter idem sunt [the transcendentals] superveniunt rebus tamquam posteriora, sed sunt priora omnibus in rebus. Ipsum enim esse non accipit quot sit in aliquo nec ab aliquo nec per aliquid, nec advenit nec supervenit alicui, sed praevenit et prius est omnium. Propter quod esse omnium est immediate a causa prima (Prol. gen. op. trip.; L I 153). Our citations are from the critical edition: Latin works = L, German works = G, then volume and page number; n = marginal numbers; S = Sermons; D = Instructive Discources; C = Book of Divine Consolation; N = Of the Nobleman. For supplementary material: Joseph Quint, M. E. Deutsche Predigten und Traktate (Hanser, Munich, 1955) = Q; F. Pfeiffer, M. E. (1957) = Pf.

[2] Prol. gen. (Amplon) L I 38, 41; Tab. prol. L I 129; Prol. gen. L I 156f.; Prol. op. propos. L I 166f., ibid., 181; In Exod. 3 n. 16, L II 21f.; In Sap. 5 n. 55, II 382; Serm. 6 n. 53: Deus communis est: omne ens et omnium esse ipse est: L IV 51. In Exod. 3 n. 21: Omnis perfectio eget ipso, qui est ipsum esse . . . modus est ipsius esse, ipsi innititur, ipsi inhaeret: L II 28; ibid., 15 n. 29: Deus autem esse est et solus dat esse immediate omnibus: L II 34; cf n. 177 152; S 3 G I 55–56.

[3] Wandersmann I 289.

The rose which here thine outer eye doth see Hath bloomed in God eternally.[4]

Eckhart himself speaks thus: 'In the Beloved, Love contemplates not How and Why, but purely and simply the spotless essential form. Thus the Holy Spirit is the Love between Father and Son, a pure and generous outflow, beyond efficient and final cause.'[5] The ultimate whylessness of love, of freedom, but also of thought and form: this is the root of Eckhart's strange statements about the 'uncreatedness' of the latter in the creature.[6]

2. This whylessness is perceived in the wonder of eternal being, its being always now, its fontal character (fontalitas),[7] the fact that it is unceasingly occurring and disclosing itself. Eckhart identifies this with God's eternal birth from God, the perpetual now of the Son's generation from the Father: semper nascitur.[8] When that birth takes place for me and in me, when I am born with the Son from the Father, then God is born for me as well.

3. What this comes down to is that being a Christian means simply, unresistingly, letting God be born, letting God happen. Eckhart calls this pure fiat the passivum, which is the very heart of the glorification of God. passivum generaliter est laus, honor, gloria sui essentialis activi . . ., passivum enim . . . clamat et testatur in omni et ex omni sui perfectione et bono suimet egestatem et miseriam, activi vero sui superioris praedicat divitias et misericordiam. The glorifier must not, therefore, take up the Glorified into himself as if he were trying to keep and possess Him for himself. No, it all has to be quasi in transitu, an endurance, and not a permanent possession acquired by endurance. So it does not belong to the glorifier, but comes from the Other and is in the Other, to whom all honour and glory are due, for that is proper to Him. 'For example, an

---

[4] Ibid., I 108.

[5] In Eccli. 24 n. 8, L II 237.

[6] In Sap. 1 n. 22, L II 343; Quaestio Utrum laus Dei etc. n. 11; arca in mente non est creabilis L V 60; Serm. 29 n. 301: intelligere est increabile L IV 268/.

[7] In Sap. 1 n. 38, L II 359.

[8] In Joh. 1 n. 8, L III 9.

expensive coat that servant wears when he attends his master does not give honour to the servant but to the master.'[9]

4. Man is meant, then, to be built up beyond himself in God. His course is a flowing stream, like the flowing essence of God and His grace: Gnade enist niht ein blîbende dinc, si ist allez in eime gewerdenne.[10] According to Paul, in the glorifying vision, we are transformed by the Spirit of the Lord into God's glory. Now 'it is said of the first of the just, of the Son of God, that He is the reflection of God's glory and bears the very stamp of His nature (Heb. 1.3), and this what we want to say: namely, that the virtues, justice and so on are unceasingly occurring assimilations rather than something with a fixed form, entrenched and rooted in the virtuous person. They are in a state of permanent becoming like gleams of light in ether and reflections in a mirror'.[11] Thus the whole of the life of faith is a movement towards divine sonship: est ergo credere et fides quasi motus et fieri ad esse filium.[12]

These four fundamental themes place Eckhart in a line with Benedict, Francis, and Ignatius: they signify a life of total disappearance, pure transparency to the ever greater glory of God. There can be no doubt that this and this alone is what Eckhart, as preacher, philosopher, theologian, and poet, with all the conceptual and linguistic means at his disposal, was trying to say. And since this was his one intent, he could treat all forms of expression with a sovereign freedom. He melted down the philosophy of every thinker and recast it into the central theological mystery of the divine birth. Appealing to Augustine's use of Scripture in the last three books of the Confessions, he was able to relate dynamically each and every Biblical text to the one mystery, from the same passage opening up very different perspectives on the one thing needful. In particular, he could and had to deepen his interpretation of the Genesis creation narrative by connecting it with the prologue of St John's gospel: the eternal generation of the Word is the ground and goal of all creation and gives it its form and measure. He was well aware that treating the Word of God in this way had something poetic about it. But everything that the infinite God wants to express about Himself is sensus litteralis; God, says Augustine, 'has made Scripture so fruitful that everything the mind can elicit from it He has seeded and sealed therein'. 'Plato himself and all the ancient poet-theologians (sive theologizantes sive poematizantes) used to teach about God, nature, and ethics by means of imagery, for the poets never wrote fables without meaning.'[13] But all philosophy becomes a parable, which, once detached from the context of a doctrinal system, points to the mystery.[14]

---

[9] Lib. parab. Gen. 1 n. 25, L I 495–496.

[10] Sprüche 6 (Pf 599).

[11] In Sap. 1 n. 45, L II 368. The major aesthetic text in Paul (2 Cor 3.18) is cited by Eckhart with predilection: cf. In Joh. n. 106, L III 91; ibid., n. 119, L III 104; ibid., n. 155, L III 128; B 2 G V 32.

[12] In Joh. 1 n. 158, L III 131.

The mystery is the mystery of absolute love, the Love that created the world out of love[15] in order to shine resplendent in it. For the man who has received God into his innermost soul, 'all things taste of God, and God's image can be seen in all things; for him God is gleaming (blinket) all the time.[16] God shines (liuhtet) as brightly in worldly things as in the most divine.[17] At all times and in all circumstances God is aglow (liuhtet).[18] 'Man should grasp God in all things'.[19] He need not, therefore, flee the world; he has only to 'learn inner solitude ... to break through things to reach his God in them'.[20] Just as the thirsty man has the constant thought of drink in mind, so the man who loves God constantly thinks of God. However, he must not make do with a 'thought

---

[13] Lip. parab. Gen. Prol. L I 450–451. Reference to the last books of the Confessions: Prol. in opus Expos. II, L II 321.

[14] Cf. Vladimir Lossky, Théologie négative et connaissance de Dieu chez Maître Eckhart (1968), p. 125. Lossky's great study is now the most accurate and unbiased analysis of Eckhart's thought.

[15] Creaturae productae amore: Lib. parab. Gen. n. 45, L I 125.

[16] D 6, G V 205.

[17] D 7, G V 210.

[18] D 21, G V 276.

[19] D 6, G V 203.

[20] D 6, G V 207.

God'.[21] Instead he must so humble and impoverish himself before God that the true and living God fills all the space within him.[22] God is nearest of all to us, but near through His loving will, and so it is only he who seeks and does God's will who dwells in God.[23] He is to seek 'only the most precious will of God and nothing else; whatever God then sends him, let him immediately accept and deem his best possession and be fully and completely contented with it'.[24] Transparent, pure obedience is 'being of one will with God, so that one wills all that God wills'.[25] Obedience is the 'virtue above all virtues' and the one perfect work that gives all other works their worth and fruitfulness.[26] It is 'the pure way to return to God'[27] and, at the same time, 'the true and best penance of all',[28] a perpetual attitude of confession before God, laying bare all that is one's own, offering it, handing it over.[29] It is the surrender of all finite images, exterior and interior, which as acquired and defended possessions can be played off against God and prevalent a total and transcendental opening up of the heart. The heart should be pure wax in the hands of God:[30] then the whole man, existentially and in free self-realisation, actually is what as spirit he potentially is: quodammodo omnia, and therein capax Dei.[31] But just as the 'intellect is "nothing at all" in order to understand all',[32] and just as the eye must be free of all colour if it is to perceive all colours,[33] so must the lover of God be calm and serenely surrendered (gelassen) if he is to make full room for God in himself.

---

[21] D 6, G V 205.

[22] 'The soul is more closely united to God than soul and body, which make up one human being' (D 20, G V 269). 'Man must in no sense ever regard himself as distant from God' (D 17, G V 249).

[23] 'For the man who surrenders himself to God and seeks with all diligence only His will, the best is whatever God gives him' (S 4 G I 61).

[24] D 22, G V 285.

[25] C 2, G V 22.

[26] D 1, G V 185–186.

[27] C 1, G V 12.

[28] D 16, G V 244.

[29] D 21, G V 275; cf. S 11, G I 185–186: 'Nothing should be hidden within us that we are not prepared to expose completely and hand over entirely to God.'

[30] C 2, G V 55.

[31] Expos. Gen. 1 n. 155, L I 270–271.

[32] In Joh. 1 n. 100, L III 86.

Eckhart's Gelassenheit is one of the most beautiful illustrations of that unchanging Christian challenge of the saints which in the last chapter was described as the necessary condition of a Christian transcendental aesthetic. 'Whoever wants to receive all things must also give away all things: that is equitable trade and fair exchange.'[34] For 'the more we have of our own, the less we own of Him'. That is why poverty of spirit is the first of the Beatitudes in the Gospel.[35] 'The nobler things are, the more inclusive and universal they are; love is noble because it is all-inclusive'.[36] In the form of Gelassenheit, it is the organ of universal receptivity. All finite things are only truly known and received when they are accepted as the gift of the infinite Giver, who wants to give Himself in them; yet only the person who is serenely surrendered (gelassen) is capable of that.[37] Although he does make reference to Seneca and Stoic indifference, Eckhart's interpretation of them is completely Christian.[38] Indifference 'in adversity and prosperity, in sorrow and in joy',[39] means having the same love for all that God decrees, and thus, with the same love, deeply and gladly loving all men, who are of equal dignity with me.[40] Paul was prepared to get every one of his brethren into heaven at the price of his own damnation.[41] 'So long as you love just one person less than yourself, you are not truly loving yourself . . . In one man all men; and this man is God and man.'[42] Even though he is not constantly affirming it, it is self-evident for Eckhart that this great love is only mediated through Christ; it is the love He had for us, the love He gave us through His Passion.[43] True renunciation is based 'upon the precious Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, the perfect work of expiation; the more a man is conformed to it, the more all sins and punishments for sin fall from him. Moreover, the man must accustom himself to conform himself always, in all his actions, to the life and work of our Lord Jesus Christ, in all he does and consents to, all he endures and experiences. And in doing this, let him keep [Christ] before His eyes, just as He had us before His eyes.'[44] Suso and Tauler will recall the Passion more frequently and penetratingly, but they will add nothing new to what their Master had said before them. The indifferent person has handed himself over to God in everything, and so God takes over care and responsibility for him. To be in contact with him is to be in contact with God; God takes over his suffering, which comes to him only by way of God and in that way is transfigured by God.[45] Transfigured, for one no longer knows whether this suffering is bliss with God precisely because it is love, and one 'would be glad to suffer incessantly for love of God and of the good'. Or is this suffering a 'super-suffering', given infinite dimensions in God?[46] 'Since the Son of God could not suffer in His divinity and in eternity, the heavenly Father sent Him into time so that He could become man and capable of suffering'.[47] However it is experienced, 'only the sorrow that is suffering in God's will and from God's will is perfect sorrow.'[48] Eckhart thus completely transforms Indian/Greek/Arab apatheia: it is the opposite of a technique of preserving oneself from sorrow; it is not a question of pain or pleasure but of the total gift of oneself to eternal love.

---

[33] Ibid.; according to Aristotle, De an. II (418 b 26). The image constantly recurs in Eckhart. C 2, G V 28.

[34] D 23, G V 295.

[35] D 23, G V 97.

[36] S 4, G I 67.

[37] D 21, G V 278.

[38] C 2, G V 20; C 3, G V 60; N, G V 111.

[39] S 5a, G I 81; S 6, G I 102; S 11, G I 200.

[40] S 5a, G I 79.

[41] D 10, G V 223–224; C 2, G V 21; ibid., 26; ibid., 40; S 12, D I 195; In Exod. 32 n. 270, L II 217.

[42] S 12, G I 195.

---

[43] D 12, G v 232.

[44] D 16, G V 246; cf. D 17, G V 249; D 18, G V 259.

[45] 'And so it is that God suffers before I suffer, and if I suffer for the sake of God, all my suffering easily becomes for me consolation and joy' (C 2, G V 52). 'Everything that the good man suffers for the sake of God he suffers in God, and God is with him, suffering in his suffering'. And then 'my suffering loses its sorrow, and my sorrow is in God, and my sorrow is God' (ibid., 53–54; cf. S 2, G I 36–37); 'The man . . . entrusted to God does not suffer. Were he though to suffer, the heart of God would be struck' (S 13, G I 214).

[46] C 2, G V 39.

[47] C 2, G V 48.

[48] C 2, G V 22.

And now indifference is seen in a Marian light: 'remaining maidenly and free, without any obstacle to supreme truth'. 'For a human being to conceive God in himself is good, and in that conceiving he is a virgin. But for God to become fruitful in him is better, for the only gratitude for a gift is to be fruitful with the gift. The spirit is a wife, in its gratitude giving birth in return, when it gives birth to Jesus once more in God's fatherly heart.'[49] 'As soon as Mary gave up her will, she immediately became the true Mother of the eternal Word and straightway conceived God.'[50] The more masculine the man is in giving and the more feminine the woman in conceiving, so the more perfectly successful are generation and birth. The more naked the spirit makes itself for receiving God, the better it conceives Him. This can be expressed in a philosophical analogy: 'Anaxagoras says that the intellect must be separated, unmixed, and naked if it is to be able to distinguish. Aristotle himself says that the intellect must be like an empty, that is, naked tablet. The greater the nakedness, the deeper the union. Therefore, the absolutely first act, which is being or form, rightly befits prima materia, since among all the powers of receptivity and acceptance it alone is utterly naked and pure.'[51] It is the nakedness of Paradise, a nakedness of which the spirit is not ashamed for it is the state in greatest conformity to its nature.[52] Again there is a philosophical analogy: 'Just as the thing seen exists for seeing and, vice versa, the seeing for the thing to be seen, the two coinciding in the act of seeing', just as, as a general rule, 'desire and the desired, active and passive, seek each other out',[53] so God and the ready soul come together in the 'kiss of his mouth' (Cant. 1.1). If, on the other hand, in the act of spiritual conception, we place obstacles, 'we do violence to God and kill Him'.[54]

[49] S 2, G I 26f.

[50] D 11, G V 226.

[51] Lib. Parab. Gen. 1 n. 32, L I 501.

[52] Ibid., n. 124, L I 589.

[53] In Joh. 1 n. 177, L III 146.

[54] S 4, G I 74.

The doctrine of Gelassenheit attains its Christian completion in a Trinitarian context. The Marian womb receives the seed of the Father, and since the Father is eternally, at every moment, begetting the Son, the eternal procession of the Son takes place in the pure medium of receptivity. 'Were God to find man as poor as this, God would do His own work, and man would suffer God',[55] 'and the Father gives birth to His only-begotten Son as truly as in Himself . . . and [man's] spirit with the Father gives birth to the same only-begotten Son and to itself as the same Son and is the same Son in this light and is the truth'.[56] The mention of man's spirit shows that Eckhart remains aware that here the creature is caught up by grace into the inner life of the Trinity. But for Eckhart creation takes place for the sake of grace, nature at its summit touches supernature, createdness has its deepest and most secret roots in Uncreatedness and in the eternal procession of the Son, which happens now and at every moment and for ever. 'Where the Father gives birth to His Son in the innermost ground, there this human nature is suspended.'[57]

In God's birth in man rests the freedom that makes man at home in the Immemorial, the Absolute, the Unfathomable, in a depth from which, according to Eckhart, God Himself originates. The divine birth is the root of all ethics, for the act of giving oneself up totally in order to receive is the work par excellence, an interior, spiritual work that gives value to all exterior works and in fact takes the place of all exterior works, for it contains all fruitfulness in itself: 'this work is to love God . . . whereby all that the man with a pure and perfect will wants and would like to do in all good works is already done'.[58] True, the exterior work gives testimony to the interior,[59] but—here Eckhart is at odds with Aquinas and anticipates Luther—it 'adds in no way whatever to the goodness of the interior work'.[60] In God's begetting of

---

[55] Q 307.

[56] S 2, G I 41.

[57] S 5b, G I 87.

[58] C 2, G V 38.

[59] In Joh. n. 169, L III 139.

[60] C 2, G V 40.

Himself in the soul is also to be found every commandment: the self-imprinting form as such bestows, in a process which happens now and at every moment and for ever, the natural law on the creature: 'Just as fire, by producing and communicating its fiery form in the sufferer, imparts to him all that goes with fire . . . so God, who in His perfection is Being and Goodness and Kindness, imprints what is good, imparting it, commanding it, moving and promoting and inspiring it.'[61] The content of such an ethic is the ever-greaterness[62] of self-dispossession: the disowning of all 'owning' (the fetter of self)[63], ever deeper poverty—the word now receives its comprehensive spiritual and interior meaning: letting go of self,[64] or even inadequacy, 'which God imposes on his friends so they lose every support . . . and find their support in Him alone.'[65] And 'the more complete and naked this poverty, the more one possesses this possession': God.[66] But man must let go even of this possession; he must 'for God's sake let go of God'.[67] This means going out into the 'wilderness', like Yahweh's leading of His people into the wilderness to wed her there (Hosea 2.14),[68] the wilderness where 'the spirit has no more why'.[69] But, in imitation of Christ, this way is a way that leads below—a homo of the humus, humilis:[70] 'Whoever would receive from above must of necessity be below in true humility'.[71] He must abide 'in humble self-annihilation and abasement',[72] still better by bearing the inflicted shame,[73] even the inner shame of insuperable temptations.[74] He must renounce interior consolation and joys in prayer, when the needs of his fellow men demand it.[75] But he must also come to terms with the limitations of his path to God; if he is really poor, in the one 'way' he has all others.[75] The more expropriated he is of his own justice, the more penetrated he is by the justice of God; indeed, he becomes (in the divine birth) a 'Word of Justice' himself.[77] The sermons on the chief commandment give the key and conclusion to all this: the highest love 'with all one's heart' for the highest Beloved 'is the standard for every lover and beloved'. Self-love is measured by love for God, not for the sake of His rewards or His attributes, but solely because God is God, and accordingly one's neighbour. According to St Thomas, each member or part loves the whole more than itself. This transcendence is natural, but nature is rooted in grace, because God is love, and to share in God's inner life of love is beyond all claim and thus beyond all reward.[78]

---

[61] Lib. Parab. Gen. 2 n. 87–88, L I 549f.

[62] Eckhart continually insists on the infinitude and unendingness of the striving for an ever greater love, devotion, purity, availability. 'In this life a man never lets go of himself so totally that he finds himself in the position of not having to let himself go further' (D 4, G V 196). 'You never get to the end of progress' (D 22, G V 290).

[63] D 10, G V 218; S 6, G I 102.

[64] D 3, G V 194.

[65] D 19, G V 260–261.

[66] D 23, G V 299.

[67] S 12, G I 196.

[68] C 2, G V 46; cf. S 12, G I 193.

[69] Q 291.

[70] M, G V 115; Serm. 2 n. 17, L IV 19; Serm. 22 n. 206, L IV 191; Exod. 20 n. 240, L II 197 and passim.

[71] S 4, G I 73.

But this is not enough for Eckhart. He collects together everything beautiful and sublime he has found in the wide realm of philosophy to give form and multiple expression to the mystery. He heightens philosophy's powers of expression and raises it above its own level of systematisation. He uses it in a paradoxical and hyperbolic way, approaching problems from a variety of angles, thereby proving he is unafraid of contradiction. His audacities are intended to arouse a sense of the mystery. The whole of tradition supplies him with his material, which, sharpened and intensified, he bequeathes to a distant future. That future will not think, as he does, with a worshipping heart, and so will misuse his words and insights for the purposes of its Titanic Idealism.

---

[72] S 5a, G I 82.
[73] D 17, G V 254.
[74] D 9, G V 214–215.
[75] D 10, G V 221.
[76] D 22, G V 285.
[77] In Joh. 1 n. 15, L III; ibid., n. 50, L III 50; n. 171, L III 140.
[78] Serm. 30 and 40, L IV 271f., 335f.

If God is Being, Not-God is Non-Being. 'All creatures are pure nothing. I am not saying that they are of little value or really something after all. They are pure nothing.' And here is the proof: 'Add the whole world to God, and you have no more than if you had God alone.'[79] 'Our whole being consists in nothing coming to nothing.'[80] 'God begins where the creature ends.'[81] If God (and the idea in Him of the creature) is light, the creature, as it is in itself, is darkness. The words of the Gospel about the light shining in the darkness, about John not being the light but bearing witness to the light, sum up the whole God/creature relation. 'The just man or the just thing in itself is dark and does not shine. But in justice itself, its principle, it does shine. Justice shines in the just man, but the just man, being inferior, does not comprehend it.'[82] This is Plotinian: the inferior can never adequately express the superior, which is why the idea in the artist's mind is always more perfect than its material realisation.[83] This suggests new analogies: the creature relates to God like pure matter to form.[84] Its supreme opportunity is supreme passivity. God fulfils it as light pervades pure air. However, though light absorbs heat and retains it after the sun goes down, 'light puts down no roots and does not remain in a medium once the luminous body has gone'.[85] The fact that the creature takes into itself (as air absorbs heat) the gift or rather 'loan'[86] of God's being is less important to Eckhart than God's preservation of the creature in being through the perpetual event-act of His presence. Thus to be creature is to be constantly drinking God and, in the drinking, constantly thirsting, 'so that it is constantly in a state of becoming, and the becoming is its being'.[87] 'He who feeds on me', says

---

[79] S 4, G I 69–70; cf. In Exod. 15 n. 40, L II 45.

[80] D 23, G V 294.

[81] P 5b, D I 92.

[82] In Joh. 1 n. 22, L III 18; Lib. Parab. Gen. n. 56.

[83] Cf. preceding volume, pp. 280ff. (Eng. tr.). The axiom frequently recurs in Eckhart: In Joh. n. 22; Lib. Parab. Gen. n. 43, n. 56, n. 61–62.

[84] Prol. in op. propos. n. 17, L I 176.

[85] Lib. Parab. Gen. n. 24, L I 494; In Joh. n. 182, L III 150.

[86] C 2, G V 36.

[87] Lib. Parab. Gen. n. 23, L I 493.

Wisdom, 'hungers more'. In his exegesis of this passage Eckhart distinguishes 'eating', in the sense of taking being into oneself, from 'drinking', in the sense of ever greater dependence on the grace of being.[88] And the more active the work of God, the more passive must the creature's disposition be, for only thus do the two become one in the pure act-event. This is a participation in the intra-divine act/unity of begetting and being begotten.[89] Thus 'building is the same as being built; either both are or neither is'.[90] True, in God the persons are distinct, but the event of the Godhead is one.[91] Because of this divine principle all natural events have a threefold character: they always involve generatio (generation, bringing forth), both active and passive, and the mutual love breathing within it.[92]

If God is pure event, Being does not suffice Him as a name: 'Being is His forecourt', 'His Temple is Intellect',[93] pure per se and ad se, spirit. The quaestio whether in God Being and Intellect (intelligere) are identical, is first of all answered by Eckhart in the affirmative, in keeping with tradition, but then he explains that the actus secundus is nobler than the actus primus; consequently, 'God does not know because He is, but He is because He knows; knowledge is the foundation (fundamentum) of His being'.[94] But in knowing—here is a further philosophical elaboration—things have not real but intentional being. For example, an image as an image has no being in itself, 'and the more attention you pay its being, the further you are led away from the thing whose image it is . . . Thus what belongs to the intellect is as such non-existent . . . and so all that is in God is beyond being and utterly intellect'.[95] From this point Eckhart takes a few swift steps forward: he sees the depths of God as absolute identity that comes to be—in thought, Eckhart transposes it beyond the [88] Super Eccli. 24 n. 42–61, L II 270–290.

[89] Serm. 2 n. 6, L IV 8.
[90] Lib. Parab. Gen. 1 n. 51, L I 519.
[91] Ibid., n. 14, L I 484; In Joh. n. 24, L III 20.
[92] In Sap. 1 n. 28, L II 348.
[93] S 9, G I 150.
[94] Quaest. Paris. n. 4, L V 40.
[95] Ibid., n. 7–8, L V 43–44.

Trinitarian process.[96] Now if this depth is spirit and freedom, something of the spiritual creature must be grounded in its ineffability. Eckhart calls this the 'spark' or 'little castle': 'the intellect as such is uncreatable.'[97] This is just like Plotinus: the innermost motive core of the intellect (νοῦς) is the One (ἕν) beyond all discursus. At this point Eckhart reorders the transcendentals: truth (according to Thomas) is more in the mind, goodness is more in things, the mind tends towards the good. And so, Eckhart concludes, the Good is deeper than the True,[98] since it presupposes that being is placed extra causas,[99] and that means a casus, a descensus,[100] a fall, a descent, exile in the external.[101] This necessitates a Plotinian 'reassembly', the return to 'where there is no opposition. When the soul comes into the light of reason, it knows of no opposition'.[102]

Here Eckhart's entire speculative edifice enters into crisis. The philosophical material threatens to overpower the content it expresses. Parmenides and Melissus are invoked,[103] all the Platonists, Origen, Denys must play their part, Eriugena's cosmology is at hand. The elevation of intellect above love; the argument that it is primarily the intellect and only secondarily the will that is free;[104] the interpretation of creaturely perfection as pure relation to God,[105] pure ecstasy, of virtue as something flowing, eternally becoming, without root in the virtuous person, only like the reflection in a mirror, only like a gleam in the air:[106] all of this converges, against Eckhart's intention, towards the abolition of created natures and their proper operations, towards, in fact, an Indian kind of doctrine that everything is God.[107] Eckhart clothes Christian humility and poverty without qualification in the mantle of pagan antiquity's doctrine of departure and return. In so doing, against his most deep-seated intentions, he gives Christian accentuation and enhancement to the pre-Christian religious systems later inherited by the post-Christian Geistphilosophien. Thus the gory of Biblical revelation, which Eckhart had authentically glimpsed, is robbed of its expression. And though he knows and says that the innermost point within God is the infinite free 'I' of the God of Israel,[108] it is only a question of time before the move is made to construe all being in terms of that point of identity in the intellect where God and creature coincide. Looking forward from Eckhart to Luther, Hegel, and Heidegger, we can without difficulty discern the inner affinity between these great speculative systems.

---

[96] C 2, G V 41; S 10, G I 173.

[97] Quaest. Paris. n. 10–11, L V 60.

[98] Lib. Parab. Gen. 1 n. 36, L I 503; ibid., n. 53–55, L I 521–524.

[99] S 8, G I 132; Q 295; Lib Parab. Gen. n. 11: cadit in plura . . . cadit in numerum. Cf. n. 13 and n. 16, which is expressed in a completely Plotinian way: natura non facit saltum, sed . . . ordine progressivo deficit paulatim n. 73: casus ab uno et per consequens ab ente et a bono. Exp. in sap. n. 38: cadit ab uno et cadit in distinctionem (L II 359).

[100] C 2, G V 41.

[101] Descendit foris, extra esse producentis et extra ipsius vivere et intelligere, obumbratum umbra temporis, vel saltem factionis (Lib. Parab. Gen. 1 n. 62, L I 529).

[102] S 8, G I 136.

[103] Prol. op. propos. n. 5, L I 168.

[104] Quaest. Paris. n. 14, L V 62; cf. Lib. Parab. Gen. n. 63: Voluntas autem et amor descendunt ab intellectu et cognitione (L I 530).

[105] In Eccli. 24 n. 4, L II 233.

Luther, in particular, needed only to change the emphasis of one or two points in Eckhart's thought. The creature, after all, is and remains of itself sin and darkness[109] and, when inserted into the justice of God mediated by Christ, is ecstatically outside of itself. To be good is adhaerere Deo, something already taught by Augustine. Eckhart calls this adherent trust hope, confidence, love.[110] Luther calls it faith. Of their very nature neither attitude can involve mistrust; both possess interior certainty of salvation;[111] both cover a multitude of sins. Eckhart too stresses that 'the greater and graver the sins, the greater the immense gladness with which

---

[106] In Sap. 1 n. 45, L II 368.

[107] Rud. Otto, Westöstliche Mystik (1926).

[108] Especially in the commentary on Exodus on the text 'I am who I am' (In Exod. 3 n. 14f.; cf. In Eccli. 24 n. 8–10).

[109] 'Man should consider that, in his natural being, of himself he is nothing but badness and misery. All that is good, all being good, has been lent him by God' (C 2, G V 36).

[110] D 14, G V 36.

[111] D 14, G V 239.

God forgives them.'[112] The exterior work has no value of its own; it is merely the outward radiation of the 'interior work', of 'faith'.[113] Any kind of 'trade with God', even in 'good Christians' is exposed as unbelief.[114] Looking at it in the light of Eckhart, one is hesitant about interpreting Luther's 'forensic' doctrine of justification as simply Nominalist; it may well also have Platonic features. Thus Eckhart can say: 'Being and every perfection . . . such as unity, truth, goodness, light, justice and so on are predicted of God and creatures analogically. Consequently, the good, the just and the like [in creatures] derive their goodness entirely from something outside of themselves, something above them to which they are raised up, namely God.'[115] Karl Barth's doctrine that the real subject of justice and faith in man is God Himself thus becomes unavoidable.[116]

The relation of finite to absolute Spirit will later cease to be seen as the adoration of pure loving abandonment. Eckhart prepares the way for this by interpreting that relation as a kind of speculation knowledge. For 'the secret way is inwards', while the exterior approach to God in the sense of a sacramental theophany (the cosmos and the Church) has almost entirely disappeared. Eckhart, so to speak, stares fascinated at the absolute point of identity with the divine in the subject. It is almost a challenge to speculation, and the distinctions between theism, pantheism, and atheism are immediately blurred. The relation between absolute and empirical subject, once placed at the centre of philosophy, moves inevitably from the atmosphere of prayer to that of concepts or intellectual speculation. And it is precisely through this that something crucial for us takes place: the waning of the category of glory.[117]

[112] D 13, G V 238.

[113] C 2, G V 40.

[114] S 1, G I 6–7.

[115] In Eccli. 24 n. 52, L II 281; cf. In Sap. 1 n. 41–42, L II 363–364.

[116] 'I say . . . that a good man, inasmuch as he is good, has a property of God'. God is not just the object of what he does but the subject too, 'for what he loves is God the Father unbegotten; the one who loves is God the Son begotten' (C 2, G V 44).

[117] Paths can be traced from Eckhart that lead not only to an admirer

This waning characterises the post-Christian philosophy of the modern era in contrast to pre-Christian philosophy (from the pre-Socratics through Plato to Plotinus), which had always preserved a glimmer of doxa. Scripture in both Old (Wisd. 13.1–5) and New Testaments (Rom. 1.18f.; Acts 17.22f.) speaks to Hellenistic man about this glimpse of glory. Now, though, history approaches a moment of decision: Christian man stands before the glory of the Christian God, which enables him to preserve something of the glory of creation; non-Christian man stands before the yawning abyss of reason and freedom, first opened up by Christians, and encounters there the self-glorifying Absolute. Faced with this destructive fissure, he once more invokes the aid and mediation of the glory of antiquity. That aid will sustain more than three centuries before being exhausted and leaving spirit to make its lonely and unavoidable decision. But since the darkening of the eyes of the spirit is the fate of a whole epoch, to which Christians also belong, this moment of truth compels them to make a specifically Christian decision of their own, a decision repeatedly postponed through the alliance with antiquity, one that even the Counter-Reformation did not completely make: self-surrender to the sign, in all its purity, of the glory of God's love revealed in Christ.

like Nicolas of Cusa (Herbert Wackerzapp, Der Einfluss Meister Eckharts auf die ersten philos. Schriften des Nikolaus von Kues, BGPhThM 39/3 (1962), but also, for example, to Böhme and Kant, and especially to Fichte, Schelling, Hegel, and Dilthey. Heinrich Maier Heimsoeth (Die sechs grossen Themen der abendländischen Metaphysik), Erich Seeberg, Ernst von Bracken in a comprehensive monograph (Meister Eckhart und Fichte, 1943), and Gustav Siewerth (Das Schicksal der Metaphysik von Thomas zu Heidegger, 1959) have indicated the fatal connecting lines.

2. THE METAPHYSICS OF THE SAINTS

a. Christology and Tragedy

Eckhart renounced the idea, to be found in antiquity and the Areopagite, of a relationship with God mediated through the cosmos. This desire for immediate contact with God was not only the first step towards idealistic speculation (already present, in rudimentary form, in the contemporary 'Brethren of the Free Spirit'), it was also a stimulus to critical reflection on the Christian's relation with God, reflection that was undertaken theoretically with hitherto unprecedented purity. This event left an indelible mark on the development of western metaphysics or transcendental philosophy and forms the antithesis to the ascendant speculation of modern philosophy. We must therefore give it the space it deserves in the course of this investigation, even though to some extent this will anticipate the later theological problematic. It is above all important to recognise that we are dealing here with an over-all turning-point in intellectual history, at which this distinctively Christian metaphysics (even though as yet incomplete) emerges for the first time.

This is the interim period when Aristotle's reputation is in the decline after the death of St Thomas and the condemnation of the Averroists, and the Neo-platonist upsurge of the early Renaissance has not yet taken place. Christians who do philosophy are intent above all on destroying misleading philosophical tenets. And yet the question of transcendentality continues to be posed. What is the open 'being' into which—according to Avicenna, Thomas, Scotus—the human spirit ascends? On the existential level it is experienced, during the sombre fourteenth century, as emptiness and darkness. Unprotected man is exposed to an uncertain destiny, the grounds for consolation derived by the Stoics and by Boethius from the surrounding divine cosmic order no longer apply, philosophical apatheia does not do justice to reality, since life is sorrow. In this interregnum between Aristotle and Plato a face emerges which both the great philosophers concealed: the face of ancient tragedy. Human existence, even when it attains authenticity and greatness, means suffering, physical suffering, of course, but above all spiritual. And it is this which distinguishes man. He finds himself exposed to a superhuman, divine destiny, the meaning of which remains indecipherable: is it wrath or benevolent providence? Suffering man can rebel against it, but at a deeper level he knows that he must place himself at the disposal of the divine disposition he cannot escape. He must give himself up in abandonment (Gelassenheit), which is not a technique for avoiding pain (a-patheia), but the patient perseverance (ὑπο–μονή) of Odysseus and Aeneas: patience, in the face of one's destiny, with the God and in the God. Tragedy existed before philosophy, and philosophy has not made it redundant. Christianity encountered philosophy, and not tragedy, and so its history of salvation always appeared just as an 'existent' in the background of existence: Christ with his redemptive suffering appeared above all as the 'way', the true method, leading to the truth (of the Father, of heaven, but also of gnosis): a way which led (as no other could do) through himself as man to himself as God. This 'way towards' was the realisation of what 'philosophical eros' (desiderium) could have as some kind of aim but could not attain without the descendant grace of God. Agape then appeared as an eros empowered by divine grace, expiated by the Passion of Christ and purified in the imitation of Christ. Augustine saw it as an insatiable longing, Thomas as amor Dei ('naturalis') super omnia. And it was all directed towards an experience of God, which could be expressed, with Aristotle and Denys, as 'a suffering of God' (θεῖα παθεῖν, pati Deum).

This suffering/experience of God was, however, in the main interpreted 'metaphysically'. Presupposed (as a way) was liberation from finite existence in the sense of an ascetical and practical, and then as a contemplative and theoretical, elevation of ἀπάθεια from images to pure, imageless being (the experience of light in Evagrius, Simeon, Palamas). But Thomas had taught that the total 'indifference' of the actus essendi and the active, luminous 'indifference' of the intellectus agens should be understood as the objective/subjective openness of the creature as such. In Eckhart there was the increased tendency to conceive the being of God as spirit. The consequence of this for the doctrine of man was that Thomas's notion of the luminous openness of the act of being (which descends from God to every essence) would be based on the luminous open-endedness of the human spirit (which ascends from every essence to God). Eckhart thought of this empty open-endedness as freedom, but he explicitly, almost passionately, maintained that it was freedom, not of the will (that is, as inclination and eros) but of the intellect, face to face with the absolute free existence of the divine intellect. Eckhart came dangerously close to making an ultimate identification of the two freedoms; speculative Idealism will make the identification. And when that happens, the finite person is bound to be absorbed in the absolute person.

The other possibility was to interpret the transcendental locus of human freedom in relation to God in a Christological manner: to see indifference as 'tragic' patience in the face of the obscure destiny decreed by God, not only the active contempt of the world, despicere mundum (the Buddhist, Platonic and Stoic idea), but also the passive endurance of contempt by the world, despici a mundo. This goes beyond the Supplices situation, where the 'truth' of man is defined in terms of loss of the world, and takes account of the truth of original sin in general (the destiny of the sons of Atreus extended to the whole of humanity) emerging in the personal subject of destiny. But it also takes account of the truth of God's providence (a providence shrouded in obscurity) in the sense of grace, to which the sufferer can surrender himself. At the same time the barriers fall which in tragedy had obscured the ultimate metaphysical transparency of the situation: the barrier of thinking that God cannot suffer and must disappear when the one who suffers in his mission goes into the extremes of dereliction and death, for Christ is himself a divine person who suffers as man. The original barrier made the destiny decreed by God seem senseless and unjust and provoked man into Titanic defiance of God, and that made the sufferer seem greater than the one who inflicted the suffering upon him. In Christ suffering took on meaning because it was substitutionary; in the night, in which God hid himself, there was the darkness of an extreme love, which could still be affirmed even in non-vision and the naked faith of indifference. This theology was in a new way an elevation and fulfilment of metaphysics, because explicitly and for the first time it knew how to explain ontologically the ontic (historical) event of salvation. It was historical inasmuch as it revealed to concrete man (in his condition of guilt and death) where and how transcendence is to be found. It was personal inasmuch as only one concrete man (and not abstract neutral human nature) could be the subject of this self-abandonment and agony, in personal love for a personal God. At the same time it was universal inasmuch as his unique self-giving and suffering opened up for all access to concrete transcendence in the form of salvation. It is possible to measure the progress made in this period by this assertion in the Theologia Germanica, which takes up and expounds the Dionysian formula of pati Deum: 'Whoever wants to suffer God must suffer All in the One and not resist any suffering whatever. But this is Christ.'[1]

In the Eckhart school, with a clear choice of the Master's Christian life and rejection of his speculative extravagances, we have the foundation of the 'Metaphysics of the Saints',[2] which has left its mark on the whole of Christian thinking right up into the modern era, including Ignatius, Francis de Sales, Fénelon and Newman, and has drawn them all together into a single spiritual family. To see in all of this a phenomenon of mere 'spirituality', separate from so-called rigorous or scientific theology, would be foolish and quite mistaken. On the contrary, theology or theological metaphysics is the central phenomenon, whether we consider it theoretically or in terms of its impact on intellectual history.[3] This impact is to be judged in terms of the concept, fundamental to this work, of a distinctively Christian glory, which we deal with thematically in the final volume. For the present, in the foreground must stand the transcendental aspect, and then it becomes clear that the brief sketches which now follow are on the pinnacle and at the axis of authentic metaphysical investigation. This Christian metaphysics goes back beyond Plato to Greek tragedy and enters into dialogue with the existential situation of real man. And dialogue with Asian metaphysical ways of redemption becomes possible, too, starting with the Christian Eckhart, indeed only with him. The 'abandonment' found in Christian Neoplatonism (in its most rigid form in Evagrius Ponticus) may introduce this dialogue but cannot conclude it. Only when despicere becomes despici, and gnosis therefore becomes love, does the West have something of its own, something to offer the East that surpasses it in the same line.[4] The different configurations of this metaphysics are innumerable; we must content ourselves with presenting a few in brief sketches.

---

[1] Eine deutsche Theologie, ch. 46, translated by J. Bernhart (Insel, 1920), p. 177.

[2] The expression comes from Henri Bremond, who takes this 'metaphysics' into consideration (vols. 7 and 8 of his Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France) in the major figures in the spirituality of the Grand Siècle. But classical French spirituality, as Bremond himself clearly sees and shows, descended from the late medieval spirituality of Germany and the Low Countries.

b. Abandonment (Gelassenheit) and Imitation

TAULER, SUSO, THE AUTHOR OF THE THEOLOGIA GERMANICA

JOHN TAULER, both directly and through the Latin translation of the Carthusian Surius, was to have a very great influence on Europe. He vigorously opposes the Christian spirit to free-wheeling reason. 'Here they come now, the reasonable people with their natural light. Look how they turn inwards upon that natural light, their bare, empty, unspoilt "ground".

---

[3] See my essay 'Theologie und Heiligkeit', in Verbum Caro. Skizzen zur Theologie I (1960), p. 195f.; ET, 'Theology and Sanctity', Word and Redemption. Essays in Theology 2 (New York, 1965), pp. 49–86.

[4] Above all: Henri de Lubac, Aspects du Bouddhisme I (Seuil, 1950), La Rencontre du Bouddhisme et de l'Occident (Aubier, 1952), Amida, Aspects du Bouddhisme II (Seuil, 1955).

They possess their natural light there as if it were their own property, precisely as if it were God, and yet it is no more than mere nature. The pleasure they take in it is greater than all the pleasures of the senses.' False light and false freedom seduce them into extreme arrogance, while the just, in contrast, are distinguished by their 'humility, fear, abandonment, meekness';[5] they reckon themselves 'the smallest, the most contemptuous, the weakest, the most blind'.[6] But while the latter have springs of living water within them, the former have only 'cisterns, for all their lofty intellect'.[7] The criterion that distinguishes the two is the fact that the reasonable people see in Christ only a way which one passes through and out of. 'But I say: no, no one can get beyond the image of Our Lord Jesus Christ'.[8] 'You can be certain of this: a good man never thinks he has got beyond anything'.[9] Anyone who fails to remain on the way of Christ, who is always also the door, 'in the end goes astray'.[10] For this reason the metaphysics of indifference, as is the case already in Eckhart ('Discourses on Discernment') and will be true in the Baroque age (Ignatius: 'Rules for the Discernment of Spirits'), has to be essentially a doctrine of discernment: between abandonment to the personal decrees of the Holy Spirit and the empty impersonal transcendence of one's own spirit.

In true abandonment everything is directed towards the supreme activity of worship, which 'the Son of God offered on earth to His beloved Father', and which 'completely surpasses all reason'.[11] Everything else happens for the sake of worship; the mighty work of building a cathedral, for example, ultimately only has one purpose: to make it a house of prayer, a place for worship.[12] False abandonment is prayer-less, whereas God wants to be prayed to.[13] It is above all love-less and stands merely 'in the light of its reason and in false interior freedom'.[14] While true abandonment is directed at an infinite liquidity of the heart, false abandonment leads to a petrification of the heart; its 'ground becomes as hard as a millstone', incapable of confession, blind and coarse.[15] In the Church there are well-informed people, spiritual persons especially, who inflict real martyrdom on the others, those who are genuinely indifferent.[16]

---

[5] Tauler's Sermons in the translation of W. Lehmann (Diederichs, 1923), Bd. 1–2, Nr 40 I 176–177.

[6] Nr 19 I 82.

[7] Nr 60b II 92.

[8] Nr 15 I 74–75.

[9] Nr 54 II 53; cf. Nr 48 II 18.

[10] Nr 55 II 62.

[11] Nr 15 I 70.

[12] Nr 39 I 164.

True abandonment means constantly giving back to God all He has given us and 'returning it all to the ground and source whence it sprang'.[17] 'The man who with gratitude returns all things to God is a reliable and genuine witness'.[18] Christ always performed this restitution, because he 'sought the Father's glory alone'.[19] It is the acknowledgement of our essential poverty with respect to every spiritual good: 'Children, all our holiness and righteousness is absolutely nothing, and our righteousness is unrighteousness'.[20] Thus our act of restitution is not the noble ascent into the darkness of God as maintained and described by Denys;[21] no, it is merely letting go of all that is one's own, and of the things which are not God, as a sign that one prefers God. 'For God is a lover of hearts, and what matters to Him is not what is exterior but an interior living benevolence, which involves a predisposition to be ready for anything . . .'[22] 'Benevolence', 'predisposition': the offering of the heart to God, 'the calm peace of the man who is ready for anything to which the [13] Nr 50 II 25–26.

[14] Nr 54 II 53.

[15] Nr 60a II 85–86; Nr 60b II 90.

[16] Nr 56 II 69.

[17] Nr 8 8I 35.

[18] Nr 21 I 92.

[19] Nr 13 I 66.

[20] Nr 56 II 69.

[21] 'Yet, on account of his littleness, he must not think that he is approaching the noble darkness, of which a saint (Denys) writes: "God is a darkness despite all the light". He is approaching only the darkness of his unknowing, in which he may give himself to God in simplicity without asking or demanding anything' (Nr 56 II 67–68).

[22] Nr 55 II 57.

Lord might lead him and for what He wants to do with him, like a slave, who stands before his master's table, just looking at him, waiting in readiness to do what is wanted of him'.[23] The Christian understanding of indifference is to be seen in the two sets of three virtues: 'humility, meekness and patience; faith, confidence and love'.[24] Tauler underlines (against Eckhart) the creature's capacity for autonomous activity. God made the creature, in its nobility and likeness to God,[25] capable of activity, but even this activity actively transcends itself in abandonment to God: 'Now faith goes and robs and takes away all of reason's knowledge and makes it blind; it must renounce its knowledge. Then comes confidence and takes away security and possession. Finally comes love and robs the will of all self-awareness and all property'. And likewise with the other three virtues: 'Humility sinks totally into an abyss and loses its name . . . and knows nothing of humility. Meekness has robbed love of its own will, so all things are the same for it and it encounters no resistance. It is not therefore conscious of having virtue. The virtue has lost its name. The same is true of patience.'[26]

However, the point of all this expropriation of all possession of virtue is simply to make the soul ready for God, and this is where Tauler's great experience begins. God works in our not-working.[27] When we fall silent, God calls us and invites us back to our source. These 'calls' from God take a variety of forms: he calls us through admonition and punishment, through providence from within and without, through joy and sorrow, through calls both sweet and bitter.[28] When man seeks God, God is long before in search of man, and like the woman looking for her lost coin, God turns the house of man upside down.[29] Man may hunt for God like one pursuing a deer with bloodhounds through fire and water, against lance and pike,[30] but God's hunt for man is even wilder. 'St Paul says: "I find within myself an eternal struggle. My inner nature contends with the eternal hunt of the spirit, and I do what I do not want, and I do not do what I do want." So these two hunt one another, and in between them comes God from above and hunts them both, and likewise grace, and where this hunt is truly understood, it is a very good thing, for "all those hunted by the Spirit of God are children of God"'.[31] He hunts the deer through its thirst for the water's source, but he acts like the huntsmen: 'When they are sure that they have the deer in the forest, they leave it to recover its breath for a little while, about an hour. In that way it regains its strength and can endure the hunt so much better for a second time'. So it is with the consolation and sweetness God gives man only to pursue him the more later on through desolation.[32] The emphasis is placed thus on darkness, on on 'trials and strange and peculiar ways which no one knows except the person who experiences them'.[33] No one 'can ward them off with wisdom', nor can they be 'avoided by force and natural adroitness', even if he does not want to stay there and what he longs for he cannot attain.[34] The stronger the previous feeling of consolation, the more intolerable is the present deprivation and bitterness.[35] It is 'winter', the same state Christ was in when He was abandoned by the Father,[36] in 'abandoned dereliction'.[37] It is 'the deepest misery', in which man understands the words of St Paul: mihi absit gloria . . .[38] It means being endlessly thrown up and down from the heights to the depths, from being in God to being in a situation where one no longer knows 'whether one still has a God',[39] where God acts as if he knew nothing

---

[23] Nr 54 II 55.

[24] Nr 55 II 57.

[25] Nr 39 II 165.

[26] Nr 55 II 59–60.

[27] Nr 43 I 191.

[28] Nr 53 II 43.

[29] Nr 37 I 151.

[30] Nr 20 I 86.
[31] Nr 9 I 41.
[32] Nr 11 I 52.
[33] Nr 3 I 14.
[34] Nr 41 I 181.
[35] Nr 39 I 170.
[36] Nr 13 I 63.
[37] Ibid., 64.
[38] Nr 50 II 31.
[39] Nr 39 I 170.

of all our torment,[40] where he 'behaves as if he heard nothing'.[41] 'Thus man hangs suspended between heaven and earth: with his higher powers he is raised above himself and above all things and dwells in God; with his lower powers, on the other hand, he is darkened down below all things in the depths of humility and is like a man who starts at the very beginning—he can stay in the lowest exercise of all . . . And so he is an important witness to Our Lord, because He is the one who came down from heaven and went back to heaven'.[42] In these men 'the greatest and the least are one. God has in fact so ordained it in nature that the highest is coordinated with the lowest. Heaven is the highest and earth is the lowest. Now heaven works nowhere so fruitfully as in the depths of the earth. And so the height of God works nowhere so fruitfully nor so divinely as in the deepest abyss of man.'[43] Man tossed about in this way can in the final analysis only seek 'joy in sorrow, simplicity in multiplicity, consolation in bitterness',[44] and press on between knowing and unknowing in faith, between certainty and uncertainty in hope, between peace and un-peace in self-abandonment and humility.[45] And so, with all that he possesses, he is shipwrecked on God: 'God has respect for such men. They have steered their ship on to the high seas, they have cast their net and had a big catch. When the net too comes to the heights and into the depths in this way, the ship with its net sinks, and everything is smashed to pieces . . . Everything sinks. Created nothing sinks into uncreated nothing. But this is something one cannot understand and grasp in words'.[46] Such self-surrender to God and his 'tempests',[47] when 'God out of great fidelity often shatters man to pieces',[48] is the imitation of God in the imitation of Christ. 'Then man can

[40] Nr 40 I 178.
[41] Nr 9 I 42.
[42] Nr 21 I 93.
[43] Nr 54 II 55.
[44] Nr 21 I 90.
[45] Nr 47 II 12.
[46] Nr 41 I 185.
[47] Nr 23 I 98–99.
[48] Nr 21 I 91.

say: "Lord, who are you that I must follow you thus into the depths, into the wilderness, into solitude?" And then the Lord may reply in this way: "I am man and God and I am far more than God". Man then might answer him out of his essential, recognized ground: "I am nothing, therefore, and much more than nothing." Children, that would be a beautiful reply, because the only real place for the activity of God, whose name is above every name, is in the ground of deepest self-abnegation.'[49]

For Tauler, the man who has thus abandoned and surrendered himself to God is the pillar of the Church and of the world, for with Christ he performs the one work that conditions and sustains all others.[50] His prayer will always be heard.[51] In a wholly contemplative manner he exists in an inward movement towards God, and in a wholly apostolic manner he exists in an outward movement towards sinners and the holy souls in Purgatory, and this 'in and out' movement is the fruitfulness of love.[52] As in Eckhart, he is abandoned in another sense; he lets himself be sent from prayer to his suffering neighbour.[53] As in Eckhart, he performs the interior work of letting God have his way, of letting him be born, the work which transcends action and passion and includes them both.[54] It is a work which corresponds to the Eucharistic life of Jesus: to eat God and be eaten by God; God's will as food, oneself as food for God.[55]

HENRY SUSO[1] does not add many new stops to the mighty organ of Tauler. In his 'Little Book of Truth' he defends his master, Eckhart, and he too clearly distinguishes between true and false reason, true and false freedom. 'Inflated reason', when it 'begins in part to understand eternal and non-begotten reason', imagines itself to be 'full of God and that there is nothing that is not God'; the real nature of things vanishes from its sight; it despises heaven and hell, angels and devils, even the humanity of Christ, because all contours disappear from its view and are lost in God.[2] But 'God's essential light permits only order and distinction': the irreducible opposition of Creator and creature, and the 'magnificent light of nature' does not count against it.[3]

---

[49] Nr 55 II 60.

[50] Nr 5 I 20; Nr 19 I 84 end.

[51] Nr 15 I 72; Nr 40 I 179: 'These are they upon whom Holy Church rests, and were they not to be found in holy Christendom, Christendom could not last another hour. For their mere existence, the simple fact that they are, is of greater worth and utility than all the world's activity.'

[52] Nr 25 I 107–108.

[53] Nr 56 II 68.

[54] Nr 54 II 49.

[55] Nr 60c II 98–99.

[1] Deutsche Schriften, ed. K. Bihlmeyer (1907). LS = Leben Seuses; BWe = Büchlein der ewigen Weisheit; BW = Büchlein der Wahrheit; BB = Briefbüchlein, with chapter and page numbers.

Suso pledges himself, as in marriage, to divine Wisdom, who (in a not entirely credible vision) appears to him in sensible form,[4] and whose 'radiant splendour' breaks forth as 'pure light' with 'powerful beauty' from his devoted heart.[5] Immoderate asceticism forms a long preparation for his final initiation into the 'higher school' of 'abandonment' (Gelassenheit).[6] This abandonment will immediately express itself as 'dereliction',[7] especially in the form of human calumny, contempt, torment, but it can also become an interior feeling of 'eternal damnation'.[8] God's will for man in general is quite clear from revelation, 'but no one can say with certainty what the best would be, according to his deserts, for any one person in particular'.[9] There is no rule for this except self-surrendering abandonment to God's inscrutable personal will. There is only the offer of and preference for suffering 'for the sake of conformity' to the suffering Christ, for 'love conforms itself and makes itself pleasing to love whenever it can and wants to'. However, the one who is ready for suffering is repelled by the distance between the 'unique sufferer' and the sinners who claim to

[2] LS 47; 158, 159.
[3] BW 6, 356.
[4] LS 3, 11–14.
[5] LS 4, 17.
[6] LS 19, 53.
[7] LS 20, 57.
[8] LS 21, 62.
[9] BB 9, 388.

imitate Him. There is no imitation on an equal footing. All we can do is place ourselves in a 'great wide circle', with the Crucified at the centre, 'and widen our thirsty veins, opening up ourselves to you with great longing, O gushing fountain so rich in grace!'[10] Christ's suffering belongs to God's side: it is the best, the most exact, most exhaustive revelation and representation of his most extreme, most exalted, most hidden love.[11] 'My unfathomable love showed itself in the great bitterness of my suffering, like the sun in its radiance, like the beautiful rose in its scent, and like the blazing fire in its fierce heat'.[12] Suso's most sublime idea is, therefore, the praise and glorification of Wisdom streaming forth and offering itself for worship.[13] And precisely because God's suffering is the manifestation of his glory, those who suffer have 'so much glory in the will of God that everything that God decrees for them fills them with so much joy that they neither want nor desire anything else'.[14] They offer themselves so that the unfathomable, obscure and hopeless pain of the world may, through oblation, be transformed into a hymn of praise to the glory of God. Yes, all the world's pain, 'the groans of all the sick, the sighs of all sorrowing souls, the insults heaped upon all the oppressed, the tears of all poor and needy widows and orphans, the breaking of the will of joyful youth when it is in full bloom, every deed that gives pain to the friends of God . . .'[15]

Suso perceives that the wisdom of God reveals itself fully in the folly and weakness of the cross. This great insight discloses to him the two great mysteries of suffering and self-sacrificial abandonment: the Eucharist[16] and, pre-eminently, the compassionate soul of the Mother of Christ. The place where metaphysical transcendence reaches its highest fulfilment, where God's Wisdom is manifested, has distinctly

---

[10] LS 31, 92.

[11] BWe 2–4, 206–19.

[12] BWe 1, 209.

[13] The whole of ch. 24 in BWe: 'How one must always praise God in an unfathomable way', 308–314.

[14] LS 32, 95.

[15] LS 31, 91.

[16] BWe 23, 290f.

Marian characteristics for Suso.[17] As in the liturgy, the texts about Wisdom take on this creaturely significance, which is only possible because the abandonment bestowed by grace ('Behold the handmaid of the Lord') becomes the chosen place and womb for the manifestation of the Son's giving up of himself to suffering.

The THEOLOGIA GERMANICA was written about 1370 by an anonymous member of the Teutonic Order from Frankfurt. It is an independent continuation of the Eckhart/Tauler tradition and was edited by Luther, first in 1516 and for a second time in 1518, with a preface that proves incontrovertibly, despite all later indications to the contrary, the reformer's dependence on the 'Friends of God'. It was translated into Latin by Castellio and Sebastian Franck, and then, in more than seventy editions, spread the spirit of German mysticism throughout Baroque Europe.

Its essential doctrine is one of differentiation: between self-sufficient reason and reason belonging to God. The greatest danger is 'where lofty natural reason is to be found, for it ascends so high in its own light and into itself that in the end it imagines itself to be the eternal true light'.[1] 'Now take heed how from the beginning it is deceived. It does not will and choose the good absolutely, for the sake of the good; no, it wills and chooses itself and what is its own as the best. This is false and is the first deception. Moreover, it imagines itself to be what it is not, for it imagines itself to be God, but in fact it is only nature . . . It likewise says and imagines that it has passed beyond Christ's bodily sufferings and that one is meant to be impassible and invulnerable (ἀπαθής) like Christ after the resurrection . . . In short, this false, deceived light flees everything that is arduous and repugnant to nature . . . It is of course true: he who can attain his best, that is the best. But that does not happen so long as man seeks and strives after his best. For if he is to find and attain his best, he must lose his best . . . and pursue, not his own will, but the commandments of God and of his superiors, and should in no way at all seek what is his own, neither in spirit nor in nature, but in all things only the praise and honour of God'.[2]

---

[17] LW 8, 26; 10, 29; 18, 49.

[1] Cited from the edition of Josef Bernhart in the Dombücherei (Insel, 1920). Numbers refer to chapters. –20.

God is the 'being of all beings, the life of all the living, the wisdom of all the wise',[3] since he is the selfless Good, which 'loves itself not as itself but as the Good',[4] and he is only tripersonal in order to surmount the principle of self-hood in total self-giving prodigality.[5] Self-hood is the centring of freedom on a point which belongs to the self in its own right.[6] It is thus presumption. The essence of freedom in contrast, is to belong to no one, because it is absolute and universal.[7] Freedom and property is a contradiction: 'In heaven there is no property'.[8] Freedom is poverty with respect to coveting and the will to possess, since even the eternal freedom of God does not want itself but the Good, love. For this reason enlightened men give up 'all desire and choice, and commend and surrender themselves and all things to the eternal Good'.[9] 'The more "mine", "I", "me", i.e. self-hood and egotism, decrease in man, the more the "I" of God, i.e. God himself, increases in man.'[10] This growth of God in man is seen when man's love is 'pure and unalloyed', when he 'loves everyone and everything, when he wishes well of all men and all things and in purity favours and does the good.' It is the love of enemies that we see in Christ, who addressed his betrayer as friend, 'as if he wanted to say, "You hate me and you are my enemy, so I have love for you and I am your friend"', and on the cross he prays for forgiveness for all.[11] In the life of Christ, therefore, there appears the pure essence of the goodness of God.[12] Christ's (anhypostatic) human nature is in an attitude of pure acceptance of the activity of the divine nature; God and man 'are one and the same', and in the pure acceptance by Christ's humanity God acquires a place in the world where he can be completely himself as love and at the same time experience, by suffering, the anti-godly, the sinful. That is the central doctrine of the Theologia Germanica.

---

[2] 40.

[3] 36.

[4] 43. Cf. 32: 'God loves himself not as himself, but as the Good'.

[5] The author expresses this, as does Eckhart, in such a way that he does not want to attribute either selfhood or self-identity to God 'except in so far as he requires them in order to be personal' (32, cf. 43).

[6] 3.

[7] 'To be free is to be nobody's property, and he who makes it his own property does wrong. Now among all that is free there is nothing more free or as free as the will, and he who makes that his property, and does not allow it to exist in its noble freedom, does wrong indeed . . . But he who allows the will to exist in its own free manner has contentment, peace, repose and happiness both in time and in eternity' (51).

[8] Ibid.

[9] 10.

[10] 16.

The work can be defended against the charge of Theopanism, which would allow the creature no ontological reality of its own: 'This must be known, that no creature is in conflict with God, or causes him pain or woe, in so far as it exists or lives, knows, has skill or power, or whatever. None of this is in conflict with God'.[13] 'In truth: conflict with God is neither a creature nor a work of the creature, but only disobedience'.[14] Nonetheless, the absolute abandonment of Christ to the will of the Father remains the model for every authentic relationship with God,[15] even though the author of the Theologia knows that the mystery of Christ 'is inexpressible, and has never been, and never will be, fully fathomed'. In other words, he sees that the humanity of Christ 'did not arrogate to itself the divinity whose habitation it was', because in it 'there was neither presumption nor claim nor demand, but only the claim and demand that the divinity should have what it deserved'.[16] In this sense the humanity of Christ is the place of God's manifestation, 'for in God without creation there is nothing except being and source; there is no operation. But the One who is all of this (that is, will and love and justice and truth and every excellence) takes a creature to himself and makes it his own, and it obeys him. It seems good to him to reveal himself, in [11] 33.

[12] 18.
[13] 36.
[14] 16.
[15] 45.
[16] 15.

all that is most proper to him, in that creature. And behold, since there is a single willing and loving, it is instructed by him himself in so far as it is light and understanding: it shall then will nothing except the One which it is itself'.[17] Eckhart had maintained that as long as the creature is in God, it does not have a God; it must be distant from God so that God may be God above it. Here it seems as if God needs the creature beneath him in order to reveal himself in that which is most proper to him. And so the speculative idea emerges of the diffusive goodness of God needing the world in order to prove itself as love. Ought that which is most divine about God 'remain idle: What would be the good of that? Thus it would be just as good, indeed better, for it not to exist at all ... If there were no doing or happening or the like, what then would God Himself be, or what ought he to be, or of whom would he be God?' The speculative temptation that continues right up to Schelling and Hegel is beaten off, though it is already almost too late: 'At this point you have to turn round and stop. For if you were to go on and investigate further, you would not know where you were and how to find your way out again.'[18] And yet: ideas cannot be revoked. He wants to incorporate the speculation he has pursued, following Eckhart, at least in his Christology. Since he emphasises the anhypostasia to the verge of Monothelitism, Christ's submissive human nature really becomes the place in which God suffers, though Christ's soul, transcendentally turned towards the Father, rests beatifically in the Father's will.[19] The place where Christ is abandoned is the place where the sin of the world dwells, and so God's dwelling in this place becomes suffering. 'God is grieved by man's sin. Since this cannot happen in God without the creature, it has to happen when God is man or when God is in a divinised man', for this man, for God's sake, suffers because of the offence done to God: 'And this is the source of Christ's secret suffering, of which none but Christ says or knows anything . . . It is also a state of God, which he wants to have and which pleases him in man, and is God's own'.[20] 'And the more the will is free and unhindered so much the more painful is the not-good to it . . . This can be seen in Christ',[21] where through the mediation of the human nature the absolute Free and Good comes into direct contact with sin. It is plain to see: the sinner is a murderer of God.[22]

---

[17] 32.

[18] 31.

[19] This is especially noticeable in the formulations in ch. 51, where the absolute character of freedom, its belonging to no one as his own property, is emphasised.

The abandonment of Christ means that he freely lets God's freedom be free in him. In Christ, therefore, humanity participates in the why-lessness of God. 'Were someone to ask the sun, "Why do you shine?", it would say, "I have to shine, I cannot do otherwise, for it is my characteristic and . . . in this shining I am completely unencumbered and do not arrogate it to myself. And the same is true of God and Christ in everything . . . willing, working and desiring nothing except the good precisely as the good and for the sake of the good. Apart from that, there is no why."'[23] This also applies to the Christian life: 'When man in this way cannot reach any further nor achieve any advantage, what else should he do? It is not practised for the sake of achieving some advantage or of attaining something, but out of love and for the sake of its nobility and because it is so dear and precious to God . . . For the man who does not do it out of love does not have it at all. He may imagine that he has it, but he deceives himself. Christ lives his life not for reward but out of love.'[24]

Here we are looking into the very heart of the theological aesthetic. We are looking at a 'why-less' ray of light from the sun of the good (as understood by Plato and Plotinus), which is given a deeper Christian meaning when it is seen to be absolute love. Eckhart thinks of it as a why-less freedom, and so it is passed on to Luther (who does not want it to be given a goal in works), to Francis de Sales and Fénelon (who speak

[20] 37.
[21] 51.
[22] 54.
[23] 26.
[24] 38.

of amour pur), and to Spee, Scheffler, Tersteegen, Zinzendorf and Hölderlin. We can also see now why all of Christian ethics depends upon this theological aesthetic of the saints: because the imperfect (the ethic for sinners) derives its inner form from the perfect, from the love of God in Christ, which is its own (original) ground and its own reward and goal. It is form alone which makes all emulation truly Christian.

The author of the Theologia Germanica knew how to interpret the theological opinion that in his Passion Christ enjoys beatitude in the highest powers of his soul, while in his lower powers he is in the night of dereliction.[25] For him the only happiness here below is to be found in resting in the will of God, who himself in the Passion of Christ descends into the night. When man makes no claim to anything, 'neither existence nor life, neither knowledge nor ability, neither activity nor passivity, nor anything else' and instead 'becomes completely poor and makes himself nothing, and in him and with him everything that is something, all created things', it can also happen that 'God himself becomes man, so that there is no longer anything which is not God or of God'.[26] Then man is 'penetrated and shot through with the eternal and divine light and enkindled and inflamed with eternal and divine love'.[27] But this 'becoming nothing' means descent into hell for the sinner (Christ, as our example, went through the experience of that). If he is to understand himself, the sinner must 'mark who and what he is: vile, wicked and unworthy of all good and consolation'; he must 'bear in mind that he deserves to be eternally lost and damned, which would be right and just, it would in fact be too little in comparison with his sins. And so he does not want or desire consolation, nor redemption, and as long as man is in hell, no one can console him, neither God nor creature'.[28] 'The soul of Christ had to descend into hell before it went into heaven . . for this hell passes, while heaven remains.'[29] Although hell is the awareness of selfhood, the experience of it takes place out of abandonment, and this is 'pure submission and obedience to eternal goodness',[30] which elects the sinner in grace.

---

[25] Cf. 6.

[26] 53.

[27] 41.

[28] 11.

[29] Ibid.

c. In the Whirlpool of Glory

RUYSBROECK

The work of Ruysbroeck the Admirable, though partly influenced by Eckhart, is nonetheless original and stands on its own.[1] Through his own personal example (as prior of his foundation at Groenedal) and his instructions to Gert Groote, he gives the impetus to the Brethren and Sisters of the Common Life (who will help to shape the Renaissance), and he will make an impression on Tauler. Hendrik Mande, Rulman Merswin and Hendrik van Herp will draw upon his writings; Blosius, the reformer of the Benedictines, regards him as a supreme authority, and through Blosius he will have an influence on Francis de Sales. Like the Rhineland mystics, but more forcefully than they, he vigorously opposes the misuse of Eckhart in the sense of a 'liberty of the spirit':[2] 'Whosoever then would know and study what God is—which is not permitted—he would go mad'.[3] Everywhere the firmly-maintained background is Christological, [4] ecclesial, sacramental spirituality, and any suggestion of an essential deification of the creatures is energetically rejected.[5]

---

[30] 10.

[1] Critical edition of the Ruysbroeck Society (Antwerp, 1931f.). [Tr-Balthasar quotes from German and French translations. For 'The Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage' (= A), 'The Sparkling Stone' (= S), and 'The Book of Supreme Truth' (= T), we shall make use, with occasional modifications, of the English translation of C. A. Wynschenk Dom (London, 1916).]

2 Represented by the false mystic, Bloemardine, and her circle. He writes his first work against her, 'The Kingdom of Lovers'. He continues the struggle in his second book, the 'Adornment' (II, chs. 74–77) and takes it up once again in 'The Book of the Four Temptations', where the gravest temptation is idle speculation, 'dumb cowering in oneself, vain self-examination'. Then again in T 4:'(They) are turned in upon the bareness of their own being . . . the simplicity which they there possess they take to be God . . . But in fact they have lost God' (ET, p. 230).

[3] A I, 21;ET p. 35.

[4] On Christ's humanity and his Passion, see: S, II; A I, 21; II, 65, 77.

The situation in which Ruysbroeck's central experience of God takes place is different from that of the Rhineland mystics. It is not the abandoned poverty of the sufferer which becomes for him the key to the fathomless depths of God; no, instead, at the point of Christian indifference, which seeks to live only for God's honour and glory, the luminous glory of god itself erupts and overflows, burning with Old Testament vehemence.[6] Perhaps nowhere in the history of Christian spirituality is the experience of kabod and shekinah more direct and personal.

At first sight there is much in Ruysbroeck's work that seems backward-looking. The longest treatise, an allegory, worked out in minute detail on the tabernacle and its furnishings, belongs to the world of Hugh of St Victor, and the four degrees, stages and steps of self-purifying love are reminiscent of Richard. The eternal, insatiable hunger of the soul of God, its 'eternal craving and continual yearning in eternal insatiableness',[7] looks like a passionate Augustinianism. And yet the fundamental experience—a very personal, solitary experience (which is however expressed, as in John of the Cross, with a claim to universal validity)—is quite different. It is the experience of a super-rational contact with God, which not only gives meaning and fulfilment to spiritual nature, and is consequently the centre of metaphysics, but is also the supremely free bestowal of God's grace and thus the centre of theology. From man's point of view this synthesis presents itself thus: 'A threefold unity is found in all men by nature, and also in all good men according to a supernatural manner.' The first is the unity of man in God, on whom he depends for being, life and preservation. In God is our archetype, which belongs to the divine essence; there we are 'without selfhood' and possess our ultimate unity 'within us in our depths and yet at the same time high above us, as the ground and the preserver of our being and of our life'. The second unity is 'really the same', though now considered as the centre of our spiritual life with its faculties and acts. The third is the heart in the sense of the centre of the unity of embodied spirit. This threefold unity of man is now 'as one kingdom and one eternal dwelling place . . . adorned and taken into possession in a supernatural way' by God.[8] For Ruysbroeck, this supernatural life exists for the simple reason that the spiritual soul is grounded on the personal God and thus on an eternal Thou. In him alone it can realise itself, though the possibility of this realisation depends on its free opening up of itself.

---

[5] This forcefully reappears in the final, programmatic work, T, chs. 2–3, 8. 'The creature feels distinction and otherness between itself and God even in its most inward vision' (ch.II). 'Through his own power no man ascends into heaven, save the son of Man, Jesus Christ' (ch. 14; ET, p. 249f.) 'we are one with God, yet we must remain eternally distinct from God' (S 10).

[6] For example, the twelfth 'Book of the Beguines' and most forcefully of all in the 'Book of the Spiritual Tabernacle'.

[7] A II, 53; p. 121.

This becomes evident when one looks, not in an ascendant manner from the soul up to God, but in a descendant manner from God down to the soul. In the eternal generation of the Son from the Father 'all creatures have come forth in eternity, before they were created in time. So God has seen and known them in himself, according to distinction as the living Cause, and in an otherness from himself . . . This eternal going out and this eternal life, which we have in God eternally, and in which we are without our self-hood, from the beginning, is the origin of our created being in time. And our created being abides in the Eternal Essence and is one with it in accordance with its essential existence.'[9] In this way the dialectical ethic of relationship with God is given: 'And therefore God wills that we shall go forth from ourselves in this divine light (of the idea of ourselves in God), and shall strive ourselves in a supernatural way after this image, which is our own life, and shall possess it with him in action (actively) and in fruition (passively), in eternal bliss.' This notion of the archetype in God can be called Platonic metaphysics, but it can also be interpreted in Biblical terms as election 'before the foundation of the world' (Eph. 1.3). Indeed, since this election is accomplished 'in Jesus Christ' (ibid.), it can be interpreted theologically, with Bonaventure and Eckhart, as grounded upon the generation of the Word in the inner life of the Trinity. Ruysbroeck states this explicitly. Man's whole philosophical self-understanding is thus inevitably transformed into a theological, dialogal understanding. By doing this Ruysbroeck succeeds, even more clearly than Eckhart, in overcoming Fichte's fundamental premise, the anchoring of the empirical in the absolute subject. Not only does he take up Augustine's idea: 'Grace flows from within . . . for God is more inward to us than we are ourselves',[10] but he also sees that the reflection of the finite subject on and in its own unity enables it to perceive that 'the foundation of his being is without ground, and he possesses it only in this manner'.[11] Looking into his own ground, he sees beyond it into the eternal I, which for man is both the source of his own I as well as his eternal Thou, and in the final analysis this is because the eternal I is already in itself I and Thou in the unity of the Holy Spirit. Therefore the finite subject finds there also 'all creatures as yet without distinguishing selfhood as one being in their eternal cause'.[12]

---

[8] A II, 2; p. 52f.

[9] A III, 3; p. 173f.

Using an image taken from the old cosmology, Ruysbroeck writes thus: 'God has created the highest heaven, a pure and simple radiance, which encloses all the heavens and all bodily and material things that God has ever created . . . The sphere which is nearest to this glowing heaven is called the First Movement'. Similarly, 'the essence of the soul is a spiritual kingdom of God, full of divine radiance, transcending our powers . . . At a level lower than this essence of the soul, where God reigns, the self-awareness of our spirit is like the sphere of the First Movement; for, the spirit is driven and moved from above in the power of God, both naturally and supernaturally.'[13]But the sphere of movement or reflection draws all its energy from the surrounding sphere, of which we are not conscious, of the depth of God, which discloses itself, to those who believe and love, as the place of

[10] A II, 3; p. 56.
[11] S 3; p. 184.
[12] T 10; p. 241.
[13] A II, 50; p. 116.

eternal beatitude. All the activity and teaching of Christ is meant to lead us into this depth, and 'whoever wishes to understand this must have died to himself, and must live in God, and must turn his gaze to the eternal light in the ground of his spirit, where the Hidden Truth reveals itself without intermediaries. For the Heavenly Father wills that we should see; for He is the Father of Light, and this is why he utters eternally, without intermediary and without interruption, into the hiddenness of our spirit, one unique and unfathomable word, and no other.'[14]

The originality of Ruysbroeck is that he experiences as an encounter, indeed as a 'nuptial encounter', the relation between the I that seeks its own ground and the God who discloses himself. His major work, 'The Adornment of the Spiritual Marriage', is an exposition, in three stages, of the verse, 'Behold, the bridegroom! Come out to meet him'. 'In this meeting lies all our bliss, the beginning and the end of all virtues; and without this meeting no virtue has ever been fulfilled.'[15] But 'every meeting is a coming together of two persons, who come from different directions . . . The coming of Christ to us is from within outwards, and we go towards him from without inwards'.[16] The virtues play a great role for Ruysbroeck, but they are developed purely out of the New Testament, without regard for the philosophical systems of antiquity, and all of them together revolve round loving indifference. Serial order has no importance. They are in 'seven steps': willing what God wills, voluntary poverty, purity of soul and body, humility (a river into which flow four tributaries—obedience, meekness, patience, the reincarnation of self-will), seeking God's honour in all things, finally the vision of the ground and the union beyond all knowing.[17] In the 'Adornment' humility is the foundation stone of all the virtues, then comes obedience (to the Church as well as to God), abandonment, patience, meekness and kindliness, compassion for those in need of any kind and [14] A III, I; p. 168f.

[15] A I, 25; p. 43.
[16] A II, 56; p. 125.
[17] 'The Book of the Seven Steps', 95–149.

generosity in giving help, zeal, temperance and sobriety, purity. Faith, hope and charity appear above all as a letting go of everything that is one's own, as a bold entrusting of oneself to God.[18] Because the nuptial meeting is experienced above all as the shining forth of divine glory, the soul is prepared for it by an abandonment which seeks and sees in all things the glory of God. Ruysbroeck's formulations are a direct anticipation of the fundamental principle of the Spiritual Exercises. The recollection of the heart in interior unity leads to a 'devotion to God and to his glory . . . Devotion impels a man . . . towards the service of God . . . We should praise God by means of everything that we accomplish. To praise God means that all his life a man is devoted to, reverences and venerates the Divine Omnipotence . . . in humble service.'[19] This self-forgetful humanity is rooted in the unbounded humility of Christ, whose 'soul with all its powers bowed down in reverence and adoration before the most high might of the Father' and for his sake also 'was humble and subject to the old law, and to the commandments, and also to customs of the country as necessary'.[20] It is rooted ultimately in this consideration, that as 'God has served [man] so humbly, so lovingly, and so faithfully', so it seems to the Christian that 'his worship of God and his lowly service are always falling short',[21] The awareness of this unceasing 'falling short', which can never be made up, is very typical of Ruysbroeck. On the metaphysical level, it establishes the idea that 'man remains constantly beneath himself',[22] an aspect which will continue in the infinite dynamism of the Idealists and Neo-Kantians. But the metaphysical level rests here on a theology of dialogue, and so, in the final analysis, it is the humanity of the lover before the ever greater glory of the beloved, which arouses this feeling of constantly falling short. And then again it is a lover's humility (not a Gnostic light-mysticism) which is the motive for the beloved God's coming to meet man so much as overwhelming kabod, doxa, gloria, majestic splendour.

---

[18] S 6, 8.

[19] A II, 12–13; p. 64f. This is a very common theme. For example, S I, A I, 20, I, 25: 'at all times and all places to recall God and his glory and honour'; AII, 3; 'with all the other virtues to have in mind the praise and honour of God and to submit ourselves to him beyond things, opinions and ourselves'; A II, 65: 'to seek only the dear will of God and not ourselves, but to seek at all times the honour of God', and so on.

[20] A I, 3; p. 13.

[21] A I, 12; p. 429.

[22] A II, 15.

God gives himself through the mediations of nature as well as those of grace (as gratia creata), but he flashes forth through all the veils of mediation and touches as the Unmediated, as gratia increata. Ruysbroeck soars, swings, dances throughout his life through the veils towards what is immediate and glorious, that touches him and again and again eludes him. This is the encounter with Christ, his advent and parousia, '(His) inward touch or stirring . . . in his divine brightness'.[23] 'And above this touch, in the still being of the spirit, there broods an incomprehensible brightness. And that is the most high Trinity whence this touching proceeds'.[24] The soul's reflection on this point and act of touch transcends itself: 'By means of the enlightened reason the spirit . . . beholds and observes the most inward part of itself, where this touch occurs. Here reason and every earthly light fail and can go no further. For the supernal brightness brooding over all, which gives rise to this touch, blinds in its coming every earthly sight; for it is unfathomable . . . Yet the spirit is continually invited and urged anew by God and by itself to sound out and to discover what is stirring these deeps, and who God is, and what this touch is.'[25] In such an 'investigation', however, in the face of so much glory, as Ruysbroeck says, the spirit becomes 'impotent'.[26] 'That measureless splendour of God, which is full of incomprehensible brightness, is the cause of all gifts and of all virtues, that same uncomprehended light transfigures and penetrates the fruitive (passive) self-giving of our spirit in love, with the non-form and incomprehensibility of its light. And in this light the spirit immerses itself in the enjoyment of rest, for this resting is without form and without limit . . . And the abyss of God calls into the abyss (of the self-giving creature) . . . and this inward call is an inundation of the essential brightness . . . (which) causes us to be lost to ourselves, and to flow forth from ourselves into the wild darkness of the Godhead.'[27] Ruysbroeck interprets this inundation by the glory of God, which 'renders us impotent', as the finite consciousness 'being taken in' to the idea in God (which is God himself). It is, however, only one aspect of the supreme experience of God; the other is a renewed sense of being sent by God into self-consciousness, so that the life of love is an eternal oscillation between resting in God and acting with God's help, between systole and diastole. This image is perpetually repeated with variations: 'The Spirit of God blows us outwards, so that we can cultivate love and the practice of the virtues, but He also sucks us inwards, so that we can give ourselves up to rest and enjoyment. And this is eternal life. It is the same as when we exhale the air that is in us and again inhale a new breath . . . To go inwards in an unrestrained enjoyment, to go outwards with good works, and in both at all times to remain united with the Spirit of God.'[28] The one is 'death to oneself' and an 'inward-drawing transformation', and the other is 'sending out by God' of the 'faithful servants', who are at once 'called inside as friends'.[29] 'In moving inwards we have to be completely empty', in order to belong only to God, 'yet in the steaming forth he wants to be completely ours'.[30] But the Father utters the eternal Word in those who have been drawn in to God: it is the 'inundation of his light and grace' into the single ground of the soul. Moved by this Light/Word, 'the higher powers flow out to become active in all the virtues',[31] so that the two movements are once again one. 'This streaming of God into us demands of us a flowing out and a flowing back . . . into the same source from which that torrent has flowed.'[32] For 'God is a sea that ebbs and flows, pouring without ceasing into all his beloved according to the needs and merits of each, and ebbing back again with all those who have been thus endowed both in heaven and on earth, with all that they have and all that they can.'[33]

---

[23] A II, 51; p. 118.

[24] Ibid.

[25] A II, 52; p. 119f.

[26] Of the angels it is said: 'They lose the power to act and fall powerless before the abysmal height of God' ('The Book of the Seven Steps', 12); 'Their flame is burnt out, they are liquefied and lost in their super-essence' (ibid., 14). They are consumed and swallowed up in the abyss of the infinity of God, 'where all spirits lose the power to act and become impotent out of enjoyment' ('The Book of the Four Temptations' (German translation of F. M. Huebner, Dombücherei, 1924, p. 208).

---

[27] A II, 54; p. 149.
[28] 'The Book of the Seven Steps', 14.
[29] S 9; pp. 201ff.
[30] S II, as also 12.

Man, however, who in loving abandonment surrenders himself completely to God and his glory, can, when he goes out, 'no longer think of and seek himself, but the honour of him, who has sent him out . . . He has a rich, generous core, rooted in the richness of God, and so he must uremittingly flow outwards and spend himself on all who have need of him . . . And so his life is an all-embracing life';[34] he has attained to the true Catholicity of love. 'He shall go out . . . with overflowing love towards heaven and earth . . . towards God and towards all saints . . . towards sinners and towards all perverted men, towards Purgatory.'[35] He puts his trust in the immensity of the love of God: 'Now, since this man is at home in such a universal love, he prays and beseeches God that his love and mercy may flow forth towards pagans and towards Jews and towards all unbelievers',[36] and for that intention he offers himself to God, as well as all the interior devotion of the saints and angels, of the Church and of Christ.[37] He takes 'as a model Christ, who was, and is and eternally shall remain, common to all . . . [who] had nothing of his own, but everything in common, body and soul, mother and disciples, cloak and tunic. He ate and he drank for our sake; he lived and he died for our sake . . . And the glory of his merits shall be common to all in eternity.'[38]

[31] A II, 3; p. 55.
[32] A II, 6; p. 58.
[33] A II, 40; p. 103.
[34] S 14; p. 220f.
[35] A II, 39; p. 102f.
[36] A II, 41; p. 105.
[37] A II, 63; p. 146.
[38] A II, 45; p. 109f.

Thus as Christ in His loving poverty is the common, Catholic outflow of God into the world and the world's flowing back into God, so the truly Catholic man 'gives himself away' 'in generous participation of love towards heaven and earth, and swells out and flows back . . . into the ground . . . from which all things proceed' with 'the fruits of his apostolate',[39] He is 'in constant activity and constant rest'.[40]

Considered speculatively, this rhythm of being swings round this narrow central point of indifference. Indifference, for the Christian, means Catholic love, which lets itself be robbed of form in the movement from the world to God and transformed in the movement from God to the world. Through being rooted in a personal ('mystical') experience of God, this Catholic love illuminates the rhythm of life common to all Christians—contemplation and action. Psychologically, it illuminates the oscillation of life between the three centres of man: super-ego, mind (consciousness)and heart (active potencies). Metaphysically, it illuminates the cosmological schema common in Indian philosophy, Plotinus, Erigena and Thomas Aquinas (the egressus of God to the world, the regressus of the world back to God), but it elevates it Christologically: the departure of the Son from the Father into the world and His return to the Father (John 16.28). But Ruysbroeck's understanding of Catholic love further elevates the cosmological schema by placing it in a Trinitarian context, since for Ruysbroeck God is not only rest (in his essence) but also activity (in the processions of the divine persons). This is not so much Eckhart's idea of the ultimate ground of the divine essence lying unattainable 'behind' the persons and the movement of their processions;[41] it is more the idea that the divine essence is the resting ground in the processions of the persons, the essential love which they are together.[42] Indifference, understood as Catholic love, holds everything together, even the apparently pantheistic aspect (the dissolution of self-hood as it flows back into the idea in the divine mind and thus into God), by making it just one pole in an absolute disponibility. From the very beginning Ruybroeck repeatedly took energetic precautions against the absolutisation of this aspect. His final experiences and words lie more in the experience of the everlasting flow, which occasionally appears (here there is affinity with Tauler) as a hunt for God and through God.[43] In certain states it is 'a fierce hot flash of the divine rays', which makes the heart 'frantic with love' and torments it with the unattainable excess of glory'.[44] It can mean floating through, wandering through every level of the world-order.[45] It can be a 'whirlpool', a 'whirlwind', and finally a 'loving strife' in the 'storm of love', in which 'the two spirits . . . sparkle and shine one into the other, and each demands that the other give what it is' and the finite spirit 'is burnt up in the fire of love'.[46] And yet this happens in such a way that the sun (which is God) shines over the lover in a complete zodiac: as Spring—summoning and enticing, as Summer—burning, as Autumn and Winter—cooling, until finally the lover is left in forsakenness.[47] All this is so personal and so colourful that, through a much more substantial relation with God, it makes credible the rejection of all forms of Quietism and places man outwardly in a tension, between the world and God, home and abroad, combat and crown,[48] which in turn, most unexpectedly for

---

[39] A II, 50, p. 117.

[40] A II, 75.

[41] Though many expressions here show themselves to be influenced by Eckhart.

[42] T 9; p. 240: 'And there we may behold how the persons give place and pass away in essential love, that is, in their fruitive unity, and yet they dwell for ever, according to their personal modes, in the working of the Trinity'. In the same work (ch. 10; p. 240f.) Ruysbroeck explains how the world is created out of the common contentment of love of the divine persons and how this bliss pours itself out over the natures as the lordship of grace. Cf. also ch. 12 and A II, 37, where the person's unity of essence and love becomes the object of mystical experience. The divine essence is often described as 'twilight' and 'night', but this is the traditional (Dionysian) expression for the superluminosity and invisibility of the divine unity.

---

[43] A II, 5, 8.

[44] A II, 25.

[45] A II, 41.

[46] A II, 54; p. 122f.

[47] This whole progress is described, with consummate poetical power, in A II, 16–33.

[48] A II, 73.

the philosopher, but most correctly for the Christian, places him inwardly before God in God.

d. Espousals in the Night

THE WOMEN

Ruysbroeck's experience remains personal. Once schematised, it will have a certain influence, but in this depersonalised form it cannot claim general validity, any more than John of the Cross's personal way can. Human abandonment is not a sufficient basis for systematically anticipating the different ways in which God will reveal himself. In Christian terms it is Tauler rather than Ruysbroeck who is the central figure, the one who points the way forward. Let us now look at some of his specifically Christian themes. These already existed, of course, in the Patristic period and the early Middle Ages, but only now, with the emergence of abandonment (Gelassenheit), do they attain a properly metaphysical status by illuminating the essence of spirit—as quodammodo omnia—in the analogy of finite and infinite spirit. For as long as spirit was interpreted by the standards of 'eros' as the divine wisdom, its own characteristically dynamic and orientating light dwelt within, where it 'suffered divine reality'. As already mentioned, the historical mysteries of Christianity appeared chiefly as indispensable means of finding and keeping to this way. But when finite spirit found itself confronted with the unimaginable revelation of the personal God, its ultimate attitude (with all the 'longing' that might and must inhabit it) became one of open and defenceless expectation. It became an attitude of apatheia, which is no longer a self-generated ethical or mystical transcendence of the finite forms of what is into the all-embracing formlessness of being, but a 'passive' readiness to accept every positive impression made by God. The element of 'glory' no longer consists in the ascent of eros, which gazes upon the eternal, but in the encounter of the spirit, disponible and humbly ready to serve, as the 'handmaid of the Lord' with the Son who descends.

These themes had been adumbrated in the commentaries on the Canticle,[1] where they revolved round the central mystery of Christian theology, Only now, however, do these themes attain their historical kairos.

1. First and foremost there is the Passion of Christ, the dimensions of which are amplified. From being a particular event in history (of universal validity because of the dignity of the God-Man who suffers) it is amplified to become the concrete, normative and defining attitude of the historical creature in general, the creature, that is, which is sinful and alienated from God. Christ's substitutionary death on the cross now displays openly in the openness of his experience on behalf of all what, at the point of transcendence, the sinner's remoteness from God truly means. It is night. But it is no longer the metaphysical night of the Areopagite, based upon the ever greater being of God and the dazzling glory of his essence. No, this is the night in which God in judgment turns away from the sinner. This night has a fourfold depth into which we may sink. First of all, there is the consciousness of the sinner, who has lost God within himself, and who, emerging from the obscurity of being, can only experience existence as sinister and destructive. Secondly, there is the growth in awareness of the paradoxical presence of God, who is present as the one who is absent, who abandons, forsakes and judges. Thirdly, there is the assumption of this experience of the night into Christ's sinless experience of suffering. This alone brings the real content of the 'night' to 'light', by transforming the 'infernal' difference between God and the sinner into a modality of the difference of love between the Father and the (incarnate) Son. Fourthly, there is the participation by the engraced member of Christ in the experience of the Head. This participated experience can rest primarily on any one of the three other levels of the night. The experience of night can begin by simply revealing the reality of the sinner's situation before God (and will normally do so), before the Christological dimension as a presupposition of grace enters in any way into the experience of faith. The pedagogical aspect of the night, which John of the Cross almost exclusively brings out (weaning away from the world, initiation into the nakedness of faith, which is as such pure surrender to God in the night), is hardly mentioned at all by name at this stage, but is there on the side, as an outcome of the night for those who suffer it. Transcendence thought of as night is primarily a Christian insight and was long experienced by Christians in the abyss before, in secularised form, it became a modern experience of existence. As a Christian experience it remains—in all the darkness and opacity that it is for the one who undergoes it—a function of the experience of the cross, where passio was extreme human actio and the supreme locus for the manifestation of the glory of divine love.

---

[1] Above all: H. Riedlinger, 'Die Makellosigkeit der Kirche in den lat. Hohelied-kommentaren des MA', BGPhThMA xxxviii/3 (1958); and F. Ohly, Hohelied-Studien. Grundzüge einer Geschichte der Hoheliedauslegung des Abendlandes bis um 1200 (1958).

2. The attitude of abandonment (Gelassenheit) is feminine. On the purely creaturely level, it is handmaidenly, and on the level of the revelation of God's love, it is bridal. The entry of the idea of abandonment into the realm of transcendence becomes the occasion for women to express themselves in a Church that thinks of itself as womanly. The theological commentaries on the Canticle had all been written by men. From the Gothic period to the Baroque, women are prominent in spirituality. Of course, occasionally, the sensibility slips down from its metaphysical sublimity to the level of the private and erotic, but it is not the deviations that must be taken as the standard but the pure realisations. Loving, handmaidenly service is imprinted with the marks of the Lord: after Francis, almost all the stigmatics are women. And the hallmark for understanding and experiencing this suffering love is not (as it was in the mysticism of men in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries) the self-transcending mind but the defenceless and open heart. It is women above all who establish devotion to the pierced Heart of the Redeemer[2] and to the Mother of Sorrows. In its best representatives it becomes clear that this devotion is essentially ecclesial, that is to say, brings to our awareness the universally normative attitude of humanity before God.

---

[2] K. Richtstätter, Die Herz-Jesu-Verehrung des deutschen Mittelalters (1924^2); A. Hamon, Histoire de la dévotion au Sacré-Coeur, 5 vols. (1923–40).

3. A third aspect not only characterises the hidden heart of Christian piety, as do the first two, it also has a further effect, through its symbolic imagery, on general culture. All the spirituality of Christian antiquity and the early Middle Ages was a passionate quest for the Wisdom of God, a Wisdom that was hidden but revealed in Christ, and in this sense philosophia.[3] However, when, as in classical tragedy, the ultimate human attitude became one of abandonment and exposure to the night, then 'wisdom' assumed anew the traits of folly. And then this night of suffering transcendence reached a deeper level: it became the night of that folly which is sin and the night of God's Wisdom broken in folly on the cross. At that point the fool, the buffoon, became straightway the representative image of man. The fool is continually contradicted, as is obvious, by images of man preoccupied with wisdom, and this is more than ever true once antiquity's and Christianity's concept of the tragic is displaced and obscured by the Platonist Renaissance, the Enlightenment and classicist criteria of beauty. Nonetheless, the fool remains the 'classical' image of man in the West in the modern era: from Parzival to Prince Myshkin. The 'glory' that surrounds him is greater and more mysterious than the contours of the figure of the classicist ideal man. A special chapter must be devoted to the fool, because here a vital gleam of Christian faith becomes perceptible in the domain of art. It is precisely this mysterious and paradoxical flash of 'glory' which for the poets becomes a pure manifestation of man.

The history of spirituality from the Gothic age to the Baroque can only be outlined by means of certain representative figures. Important people such as Gertrude, Bridget, Joan of Arc and Teresa have to remain unmentioned; all that matters is that we bring out the common characteristics of this European spiritual family. The common factor is an interpretation of man based upon the transcendence of abandonment in the sense of a loving disponibility for God, upon the primordial being and absolute elective will of love, whose glory (major gloria) appears for and in this indifference.

---

[3] Jean Leclercq, 'Pour l'histoire de l'expression "philosophie chrétienne"', MelScRe ix (1952), 221–226; E. Curtius, 'Zur Geschichte des Wortes Philosophie im Mittelalter', Rom. Forsch. lvii (1943), 290–309.

ANGELA OF FOLIGNO, who precedes the Rhineland mystics in time, is the direct daughter of the Poverello.[4] But through the particularity of her vision the understanding of poverty is expanded, in Angela, to metaphysical dimensions. She 'sees' God as the 'supreme being',[5] 'while everything else exists only to the extent that it derives its existence from Him Who Is'.[6] She sees God as 'the one who is being' and sees also 'in what manner he is the being of all creatures'.[7] But Angela sees this in an inexplicable non-seeing. Not only does the 'object' (of her vision) transcend all objectivity, so does the mode of experience which in its positive elevation arrives at the necessarily negative statement: 'In the end you attain the fulness of light and comprehend that you cannot comprehend'.[8] Having seen 'God in great clarity and fulness', she sees him later 'in total darkness, because he is a good greater than man's devising or understanding . . . And then the soul was given a most certain faith, a sure hope, an unshakeable trust'.[9] And were she to lose all perspicuous knowledge, all 'God's many and indescribable attestations of friendship', her constancy, says Angela, would not be shaken, that constancy produced in her by the 'All-Good who is seen in great darkness'.[10] For 'the soul receives more from what she does not have than from what she does have, more from what she does not feel than from what she does feel, and more from what she does not recognise than from what she does recognise.' The reason for this is that everything which even the most perfect soul, such as 'the soul of the holy Virgin, knows of this uncreated God, a God of such immeasurable governance, is nothing in comparison with that of which the soul sees, perceives and recognises that she cannot comprehend it, nor perceive it, nor see it, nor recognise it'.[11]

---

[4] In one of her visions Francis calls her 'the only daughter to whom he ever gave birth'. Angela's works cited from the edition of M. J. Ferré, Le livre de l'expérience des Vrais Fidèles (Paris, 1927). Numbers refer to those in Ferré.

[5] 200.

[6] 123.

[7] 121.

[8] 130.

[9] 105.

[10] 106.

This recognition comes to her in the presence of Christ, for she 'sees and feels and recognises the lesser in the greater and the greater in the lesser; she finds the God who has not come into being in the God who has become man.'[12] 'And what shines (resultat) from these eyes and this face is precisely that of which I said I saw it in that darkness, breaking out from within'.[13] But what breaks out there is the incomprehensible identity of eternal, majestic 'fulness', charged with glory, and the eternal 'humility of God',[14] which shines forth with irrefutable clarity in the 'humility of Christ', in his poverty ('for poverty is the root and the mother of humility')[15] and humiliation for the sake of the 'miserable nothing' that is the sinner. Christ's humiliation, his infinite, 'indescribable, manifold and hidden' pain on the cross, is habitual, being rooted in the 'eternal saving decree which is ineffably conjoined with Christ from eternity and which evokes in him this supreme pain'. It is a 'pain which sprang from the ineffable divine light given to him'.[16] This 'incessant and immoderate pain', in the word from the cross about abandonment by God, bursts forth out of hiding so that it can be seen and heard by men.[17] But it began in the first moment of Christ's conception and lasts until his death.[18] 'For on the cross Christ began, on the cross Christ had his mid-point, and on the cross Christ had his end',[19] and so 'his pain was . . . without relief'.[20] It is the foundation of the mode of his human existence, and this foundation is the mode in which the humility of God is manifested.

---

[11] 166. Cf the similar formula in Anselm: comprehendit incomprehensibile esse. See The Glory of the Lord, vol. II, p. 228 (Eng. tr.).

[12] 167.

[13] 107.

[14] 63.

[15] 95.

[16] 127.

[17] 129.

[18] 140.

[19] 194.

In the face of the humiliation of God Christian love is enkindled, and every kind of particular eros, about which Angela issues harsh warnings, is transcended.[21] Not only will the soul 'love every creature with all her powers, because in every creature she sees, recognises and discerns God . . . who humbled himself for this miserable nothing'.[22] Through God's grace she will transform herself into the properties of the humble love of God himself.[23] But in so doing she falls into that terrible dialectic which is characteristic of Angela: seeing herself in the humility of God, she will understand that she is 'nothing but pride'.[24] In order to come to the truth about herself, she will thirst for humiliation and reckon herself unworthy of it.[25] All that she does and says seems radically false to her.[26] She despairs of herself and feels and knows herself to be damned.[27] She lives like a hanged man dangling on the rope and unable fully to choke.[28] She is 'nothing but rage, despair, bitterness, arrogance and torment'.[29] Angela did not by any means describe these states simply as a participation in the cross of Christ, but chiefly as the most just lot that could befall her. Only through a grace that is incomprehensible to her are these experiences anchored firmly in the deeper transcendental experience of the God-Man. Then they coincide with the first experience that God is and accomplishes all the good in the creature, 'while we ourselves accomplish all the evil. And this is true annihilation: to see in truth that we are not the authors of a single good. Only those who acknowledge the aforesaid truth possess the [20] 112.

[21] 130, 190, 199.
[22] 181.
[23] 187.
[24] 63.
[25] 44.
[26] p. 494f.
[27] p. 499.
[28] 97.
[29] 103.

spirit of truth'.[30] Then can the soul be shown the goodness of God's entire creation together with the sin contained therein.[31] Then she becomes capable of loving God, the all-inclusive being, for his own sake and all things for God's sake alone,[32] without expecting any reward.[33] Then the soul, beyond its total perversity, becomes in God 'completely little, dangerous to no one, troublesome to no one',[34] because she has been 'swallowed in the throat of humility',[35] but she is also 'completely true, completely just' and 'in possession of all the truth in heaven and hell and the whole world'.[36] However, because all is God and belongs to God, all this is real poverty and at the same time perfect Marian handmaidenliness.[37] And because love is the absolute principle of all action (whether acting with or without external works),[38] the soul that has thus gone beyond itself into God is at the same time both supremely free and supremely obedient.[39] She has gone 'beyond the abyss of her self-knowledge . . . and sunk into the infinity of divine goodness'.[40] This is, accordingly, duplex inabyssatio divinae immensitatis et cognitionis propriae vilitatis, a double descent into the abyss, which for Angela bears the definitive name of humility.[41]

JULIAN OF NORWICH[1] is a connecting link between Angela and Catherine of Siena. For her, too, contemplation of Christ's suffering on the cross stands face to face with contemplation of the absolutely universal goodness of God, which, as with Catherine a few years later, is also seen chiefly as the sovereign providence of grace. There is a complete absence of literary tradition and dependence, yet nowhere do we see more clearly the objective accord between the great metaphysical tradition (as represented, for example, by Plotinus) and Christian transcendentality. Julian sees everything in the perspective of the bleeding crucifix: 'God is everything which is good, and the goodness which everything has is God.'[2] But this vision can only be attained if one recognises that 'he has made everything which is made for love, and through the same love is it preserved'. This is shown to Julian by the 'plentiful shedding of his precious blood' and by 'the virgin who is his beloved mother',[3] and who is 'more worthy and more fulfilled than everything else which God has created, and which is inferior to her'—the universe.[4] Julian is initiated into the Catholic love of Jesus and Mary by a perpetual alternation between consolation and desolation, from which she has to learn that 'he keeps us safe all the time, in joy and in sorrow',[5] and that 'any man who voluntarily chooses God in his lifetime may be sure that he too is chosen'.[6] In Christ God loves all that he has created, and man, in faith elevated above himself, attains the same indivisible unity of love. 'If any man withdraws his love from any of his fellow Christians, he does not love at all, because he has not love towards all. And so in such times he is in danger, because he is not at peace; and everyone who has general love for his fellow Christians has love towards everything which is. For in mankind which will be saved is comprehended all that is, all that is made, and the maker of all; for God is in man, and so [31] 67.

---

[30] 203.

[32] 197f.

[33] 'I do not desire to serve and to love for the sake of any reward; no, I would like to love and serve for the sake of the goodness of the incomprehensible God', 160.

[34] 157.

[35] p. 494.

[36] 121.

[37] Cf. 95, 131.

[38] 202.

[39] 165.

[40] Ut in hac profunditate vestrae cognitionis profundemini . . . inabyssemini in immensitate divinae bonitatis, 182.

[41] 182.

[1] Tr. Balthasar makes use of a German translation of the short text of The Revelations of Divine Love. In what follows we shall quote from the modern English version of Edmund College OSA and James Walsh SJ, Julian of Norwich: Showings (Classics of Western Spirituality, New York 1978). Numbers refer to Julian's chapters and the page references of the translation.

---

[2] 5; p. 133.

[3] 5; p. 132.

[4] 4; p. 131.

[5] 9; p. 140.

[6] 20; p. 161.

in man is all'.[7] Julian clearly thinks of this 'Christian humanism' in transcendental and Christological terms. Only in this light do we understand why her anxious question about evil and sin can be answered so calmly by gazing at the cross and dereliction of Jesus.[8] 'Sin has its meaning'. It can be understood on the cross as initiation into the self-dispossession, into the love, of the forsaken Son, who is accused of no offence.[9] There is not the slightest question of pecca fortiter.[10]

Julian's vision is concerned with the universality of redemption. She does indeed say: 'I may not and cannot show the spiritual visions to you as plainly and fully as I should wish',[11] she distinguishes 'two portions': the first is 'clear and fair and bright and plentiful, for all men who are or will be of good will are comprehended in this portion'; this is, so to speak, the good thief aspect. The second is 'closed to us and hidden', for 'it is fitting to God's royal dominion to keep his privy counsel in peace', and even 'the saints in heaven wish to know nothing but what our Lord wishes to show them'.[12] But light shines through even this hidden portion in the vision of immense mercy when the Lord says: 'I will make all things well, I shall make all things well, I may make all things well, and I can make all things well; and you will see that yourself, that all things will be well',[13] namely, 'the union of all men who will be saved in the Blessed Trinity'. And in Christian simplicity Julian adds: 'It is God's will that we should know in general that all will be well, but it is not God's will that we should know it now except as it applies to us for the present, and that is the teaching of Holy Church.'[14] What was shown her in her visions she had always understood in a Catholic and universal way: she sees everything as the representative of all, in the name of all,[15] her visions belong

[7] 6; p. 134.

[8] 10; pp. 141ff.

[9] 13; pp. 146ff.

[10] 17; p. 154.

[11] 7; p. 135.

[12] 14; p. 150.

[13] 15; p. 151.

[14] 15; p. 152.

[15] 6; p. 133.

to all.[16] For this reason she has to surrender her anxiety about the salvation of a particular person to God's universal providential love: 'It is more honour to God to contemplate him in all things than in any one special thing.'[17] Perfect prayer unites the two: one prays not for something definite but that God's will be done and his honour respected—and one asks in faith, hope and charity for that definite thing, of which one knows that it corresponds to God's will and honour. 'So Our Lord wants us both to pray and to trust.'[18] In our own time such a wide and generous attitude of loving glorification of God has been seen perfectly in Elisabeth de la Trinité.[19] Julian's insight into universal redemption will be once again granted to Marie des Vallées, with whom John Eudes, the theologian of the hearts of Jesus and Mary, was closely associated.[20] But the insight will be granted together with terrible experiences of (mystical) night.

THE CLOUD OF UNKNOWING. The anonymous fourteenth century treatise, The Cloud of Unknowing,[1] stands at a complex point of intersection. Its source is the classical theology of Denys, the school of Bernard and the Victorines, and it flows into the world of the Devotio Moderna, but at the same time it unintentionally offers a side-glance into late scholasticism's understanding of spirituality. For the contemplative monk who experienced it and described it as the principal characteristic of the way to God, the 'cloud of unknowing' is not the 'darkness of God' as he presents himself to the finite intellect, nor is it the incapacity of the sense-bound intellect to comprehend God; no, the 'cloud of unknowing' means exposure, in an attitude of transcendent indifference, in the 'no-man's-land' between the world and God. 'Thou must, as this cloud of unknowing is above thee, betwixt thee and thy God, right so put a cloud of forgetting beneath thee, betwixt thee and all the creatures that ever be made.'[2] The context of this experience is the same as the passive night of John of the Cross, except for the latter's hell-like abandonment:[3] it is a love that ardently stretches upwards in naked faith, beyond all sensation, even of the spiritual senses.[4] 'Smite upon that thick cloud of unknowing with a sharp dart of longing love'.[5] 'And mean God that made thee, and bought thee, and that graciously hath called thee to this work (of contemplation)'.[6] On the other hand, every thought about 'what is', such as particular attributes of God, the angels, Mary, the saints in heaven,[7] or even the mysteries of Christ's passion and one's own earlier sinful life,[8] every such thought must be pushed aside as distracting. All clearly-defined concepts and judgments are (as in John of the Cross) quietly and calmly to be discarded[9] in favour of a 'blind beholding unto the naked being of God himself'.[10] We are required to 'look [at things] as it were over [our] shoulders, seeking another thing', and if they annoyingly besiege the imagination and intellect, 'cower then down under them as a caitiff and a coward overcome in battle',[11] passing under them if we cannot pass over them. We are required, as it were, to 'hide from God' and 'conceal'[12] even our passionate longing for God. Now this perseverance in a state of emptiness before God is, in the final analysis, to be understood in Christian terms as the quintessence and supertemporal distillation of that love of God with which man, through grace, responds to God's temporal economy of salvation. This striving after the 'naked being of God' means, in fact, 'a naked intent directed unto God for himself',[13] and thus a 'meek stirring of love' for God the Creator, Redeemer and Sanctifier,[14] a stirring which is itself pure grace. 'And yet there is no soul without this grace, which is able to have this grace: none, whether it be a sinner soul or an innocent soul'.[15] The passivity of the 'work' of contemplation—'Let it be the worker, and thou but the sufferer'[16]—means in all seriousness that man cannot arrive at contemplation by means of exercise and training of the spirit. 'All good means hang upon it, and it on no means; nor no means may lead thereto'.[17] For the Christian this means 'humility' in view of one's own sinful weakness, and especially in view of the 'overabundant love and the worthiness of God in himself'.[18] The single thought of 'praise' ought to characterise this state and so pervade it[19] that even the thought of one's own sin gives way before it.[20]

---

[16] 7; p. 136.

[17] 16; p. 153.

[18] 19; p. 158.

[19] Hans Urs von Balthasar, Elisabeth of Dijon. An Interpretation of her Spiritual Mission, ET (London, 1956).

[20] Emile Dermenghem, La Vie admirable et les Révélations de Marie des Vallées (Roseau d'Or 9, 1926).

[1] Critical edition by Phyllis Hodgson, Early English Text Society, Original Series, ccxviii (Oxford University Press, London, 1944). [Tr. We shall make use of the modern version of Abbot Justin McCann, 6th and revised edn. (The Golden Library, London, 1964). Numbers refers to the Cloud's chapters and the page references of the modern version.]

---

[2] 5; p. 13.

[3] Cf. the indication of place in ch. 21.

[4] Explicit mention is made of the incapacity of 'our ghostly wits' to lay hold of God, and precisely in this connection appeal is made to 'Saint Denis'. But it is clear from the context that by 'ghostly wits' all is meant is the reason, which cannot ascend to any 'unmade ghostly thing'. Cf. ch. 70; p. 95.

[5] 6; p. 15.

[6] 7; p. 16.

[7] 5; p. 14.

[8] 8; p. 17f.

[9] The 'sharp and clear beholdings of thy natural wit' (ch. 8; p. 18) are not rejected as bad in themselves, but because they impede contemplative transcendence. 'And therefore purpose thee to put down such clear beholdings, be they never so holy nor so liking' (ch. 9; p. 21).

[10] 8; p. 20.

It is possible to see in the 'cloud', in this no-man's land of indifference between the world and God, a parallel to contemplation in the Indian and Arabic traditions, with its formless void that nonetheless hides within itself an inconceivable fulness. However, while it is true that the Cloud can accommodate this kind of non-Christian contemplation, the indifference it describes nonetheless remains also a function of humble Christian love, which preserves within itself the 'spirit' of Christ and his cross. Then again one might to want to find a parallel in the Cloud to the abstract 'univocal' concept of being to be found in Avicenna, Scotus and Suarez, which remains in suspense between absolute and finite being and represents the true state and content of transcendence or metaphysics. However, the Cloud explicitly forbids any kind of metaphysical reduction of its doctrine and consequently avoids, through its simple attitude of love, the contradictions of which a philosophy built upon the concept of being necessarily runs the risk.

---

[11] 32; p. 48.
[12] 51; p. 71.
[13] 24; p. 40.
[14] 7; p. 15.
[15] 34; p. 50.
[16] Ibid.
[17] Ibid., p. 51.
[18] 13; p. 26.
[19] 7; p. 16f.
[20] 16; p. 29. There is an uninterrupted transition in the author's thought from Mary Magdalene's being the 'sinner' to her being the pure contemplative, Mary of Bethany. Cf. chs. 16–17.

It is true, however, that the Cloud presents that universality and Catholicity of love which is the real heart of the Christian doctrine of indifference, and which also enables it to incorporate at a higher level the entire positive content of the Buddhist ethic of compassion: 'And that in this work . . . charity unto thine even Christian is verily and perfectly fulfilled. For why, in this work a perfect worker hath no special regard unto any man by himself, whether he be kin or stranger, friend or foe. For all men seem alike kin unto him, and no man stranger. All men, he thinketh, be his friends, and none his foes. Insomuch, that he thinketh all those that pain him and do him hurt in this life, that they be his full and his special friends: and he thinketh that he is stirred to will them as much good as he would to the dearest friend that he hath.'[21]

CATHERINE OF SIENA. The 'metaphysics of the saints', in the sense of an aesthetic of Christian transcendental reason, attains perhaps its purest and most exhaustive form in the Dialogue of Catherine of Siena (1378), where it becomes evident that the 'mystical' in her Christian experience is simply an elucidation of what is contained in every genuinely evangelical vision. The 'dialogue' that takes place here is the dialogue between infinite and finite reason, in Christian terms, between the triune God (whose voice resounds from the heights as the voice of God the Father) and the completely universalised soul, which has been broadened out to become the anima ecclesiastica. The attitude of this soul is at once both total indifference with respect to the will of the personal God of love and a totally urgent love, which identifies itself with this universal saving will. It is an attitude of self-offering and disponsibility for the plan and work of all-embracing mercy, not out of presumptuous self-determination but out of pure obedience to the Word of God, which seeks people to imitate the Son's work on the cross. As an attitude of self-offering in obedience, it is at the same time an earnest supplication that God's will may be done in the world and that, accordingly, one may be made use of to that end. This prayer of passionate indifference is penetrated and imprinted by the expository, explanatory utterance of God the Father, who speaks in his Son and through the Son's words and deeds, and who with His Holy Spirit expounds the Son in men's hearts. It is, in fact, the utterance of a three-fold Father: 'of me, God, your Father, the eternal Trinity'.[1]

---

[21] 24; p. 41.

In those words resounds a voice that has never before been heard in Christian literature, a voice that will ring out again only in Péguy's Mystères. And yet it is a voice with a thoroughly credible ring, because it is nothing other than the echo of the Biblical Word in, as it were, the resonating chamber of the Holy Spirit and the ecclesial soul. Here the circumscribed Word of the Gospel is heard for what it is: the self-verbalisation of the depth of infinite being itself. In the process, the Biblical Word loses none of its precision or definition: it is a Word which clarifies, instructs, which relentlessly exposes things to the light and judges. Where need be, it is threatening, but equally it is a Word of comfort and promise, a strengthening and creative Word. It does not fail to accuse sinners, especially Christians, but without the slightest compromise of its absolute supremacy. Everything takes place in the atmosphere of familiarity made possible by the Christian revelation: the familiarity of the 'most beloved daughter' and the adored, truly 'idolised' Father, with the bridal relationship with the Son as the invisible presupposition. For Catherine, 'betrothal' and 'marriage' with the Word, the wedding ring that is visible to her alone, belong eleven years in the past, so do the 'crown of thorns' and the stigmata (which at her request remained invisible). As with Joan of Arc, her contemplative Passion was to be only the dim background for her active Passion in the world and the Church. By means of her life God the Father expounds his Son to the Church, an act that presupposes suffering and that can lead only to suffering. Catherine's church-political mission logically involves this exegetical aspect: in her very heart God—Father, Son and Holy Spirit—expounds himself, just as her life must become the exposition of God to men.

---

[1] Italian text: S. Caterina da Siena: Dialogo della divina Provvidenza, a cura del P. Innocenzo Taurisano OP (Rome, 1947). [Tr. We shall quote from the English translation of Suzanne Noffke OP, Catherine of Siena: The Dialogue (Classics of Western Spirituality, London, 1980). Numbers refer to chapters and the page references of the translation.]—135; p. 278.

It is crucial that we appreciate that such exposition can take place only where there exists an attitude of total ecclesial indifference. This is constantly presupposed and inculcated. God's 'servants' (as consecrated souls, especially members of religious orders, are called) 'are stripped of their own will and clothed in mine';[2] they 'want nothing but what I will'.[3] 'Because [their will] is not their own and has in fact become one with me in love, they can neither will nor desire anything but what I will'.[4] They 'go by this way of the will immersed in and subjected to my gentle will',[5] 'bowing humbly to Yes or No, whichever pleases my divine goodness'.[6] Catherine has a predilection for describing this indifference as 'desire', 'longing', 'thirst', but this should not arouse the suspicion that we are dealing here with desiderium, in the Platonic and Augustinian sense of the ontological love of the creature for the absolute God. What matters here is not attaining and possessing God, but the ardent desire to correspond with God's requirements and expectations. In the very first sentence of the Dialogue the object of desire is the manifestation of God's glory in his work of salvation.[7] Indeed, it is called desiderio infinito,[8] fuoco del desiderio,[9] infinito affetto d'amore,[10] dolorosi desideri,[11] even downright spasimato desiderio.[12] This longing is compared to tears of fire, 'and if you open your mind's eye you will see that the Holy Spirit weeps in the person of every one of my servants who offers me the fragrance of holy desire and constant humble prayer'.[13] But this longing is Catholic and universal: she longs for the salvation of all, for the coming of God for all. And if so many sinners escape the net cast by the soul, 'the net of desire had certainly been held out to all, because the soul who is hungry for my honour is never content with a fraction but wants them all. She asks the good to help her get the fishes into her net . . . She would have the imperfect become perfect. She would have the bad become good. The darksome unbelievers she would turn to the light of holy baptism. She wants them all, whatever their condition, because she sees them all in me, created by my goodness in such burning love and redeemed by the blood of my only-begotten Son, Christ crucified'.[14] And so, like Peter, she casts her net in obedience to the Spirit and will of God.

---

[2] 48; p. 98.

[3] 84; p. 93.

[4] 84; p. 154.

[5] 104; p. 196.

[6] 91; p. 169.

While it seemed at first that her urgent petition must be directed at the 'renewal of the Church', now the soul 'stretched out her prayer, like one starved, to the whole world, and as if (God) himself were making her ask it'.[15] The bold venture of widening out her prayer in this most [7] The first sentence begins: 'A soul rises up, restless with tremendous desire for God's honour and the salvation of souls' (1; p. 25).

[8] 3.

[9] 4.

[10] 11; affetto di desiderio, 66.

[11] 129.

[12] 167.

[13] 91; p. 169.

[14] 146; p. 308.

[15] 16; p. 55.

audacious manner is itself obedience and presupposes the revelation of God's boundless mercy, and God's self-revelation is essentially the self-disclosure of this boundlessness: 'Know that my mercy toward you is incomparably more than you can see, because your sight is imperfect and limited, and my mercy is perfect and without limit. So there can be no comparison except that of the finite to the infinite'.[16] 'My mercy, which you receive in the blood, is incomparably greater than all the sins that have ever been committed in the world'.[17] 'My mercy is incomparably greater than all the sins anyone could commit'.[18]

However, the finite as such cannot penetrate this infinity of love. Man's works, all that he has to offer, are of themselves finite. But 'I who am infinite insist upon infinite works'.[19] 'I ask you to love me with the same love with which I love you. But for me you cannot do this, for I loved you without being loved. Whatever love you have for me you owe me, so you love me not gratuitously but out of duty'.[20] Is there a solution? The solution is to be found in the God-Man, whom the Father has made the 'bridge' between heaven and earth.[21] He 'became our justice'[22] and has given us the capacity for infinite love when we imitate him. While our love for God is out of duty, to our brethren we can extend, in the God-Man, something of this 'infinite love'.[23] It happens in this manner: 'The soul cannot live without love. She always wants to love something because love is the stuff she is made out of, and through love I created her'.[24] And since the Creator made human beings as a race, in which no single member has everything or is or can be everything, he has given them 'reason—necessity, in fact—to practise

[16] 31; p. 72.

[17] 129; p. 260.

[18] 132; p. 268.

[19] 11; p. 42.

[20] 64; p. 121.

[21] 20ff.; pp. 57ff.

[22] 13; p. 50.

[23] 'You have nothing infinite except your soul's love and desire' (92; p. 170).

[24] 51; p. 103.

mutual charity'.[25] 'In this mortal life, so long as you are pilgrims, I have bound you with the chain of charity. Whether you want it or not, you are so bound'.[26] 'So the cleric and religious have need of the lay person, and the lay person of the religious; neither can get along without the other. And so with everything else . . . In my providence I wanted to make each of you dependent on the others, so that you would be forced to exercise charity in action and will at once'.[27] Now, however, only love for God is infinite and without measure, while love of neighbour, by nature, remains measured.[28] This order is, nonetheless, breached when God becomes man, for his 'longing for humankind was infinite'.[29] With God, in the crucified Son, it becomes possible for man to love his neighbour too infinitely, since he can place himself, infinitely and limitlessly, at the disposal of the work of God in Christ. This love is the heart of every fruit and every work that man can achieve. But because it is an imitation of Christ even unto the cross, it is also, therefore, essentially a humiliated love, a love exposed to insult, mockery, persecution.

Catherine is thinking here along simple, direct lines. The creature is nothing in two senses: created out of nothing, it is of itself nothing,[30] and through the nothingness of sin it is a reinforced nothing.[31] The root of all true love is necessarily in the self's acknowledgment of this nothingness and thus in self-humiliation. Out of love Christ humbled himself to our nothingness, for he did not distinguish between himself and the sinner. The imitation of Christ means, therefore, sitting down 'at the table of the cross' (or as Catherine also puts it, at the 'table of souls') in order to continue the work of love in a humiliation that does not make distinctions. 'When you think you discern vice in others, put it on your own back as well as theirs, acting always with true humility'.[32] 'If you reprove, in humility include yourself in the reproof. You should have compassion for one another and leave judgment to me'.[33] The one who loves 'prays to me for the sinner ... saying with perfect humility, "Today it is your turn; tomorrow it will be mine unless divine grace holds me up"'.[34] At the 'table of the cross',[35] however, the one who loves enjoys the food of suffering reserved for sinners in the fundamental virtue of patience, which bears all things and is 'the mark of love' and the criterion for the truth of all the other virtues.[36] The high estimation of patience, that 'queen' who is always accompanied by her handmaids, fortitude and perseverance,[37] shows that what Catherine means by love is above all unconditional steadfastness and generous disponsibility.

---

[25] 7; p. 38.
[26] 148; p. 311.
[27] 148; p. 311f.
[28] 11; pp. 42ff.
[29] 75; p. 138.
[30] 'I am she who is not' (134; p. 273 and frequently).
[31] 131; pp. 262ff.
[32] 102; p. 194.

It is, therefore, Christian love in the self-evident form of the evangelical counsels, at least in spirit, where possible in fact. The whole book culminates in praise of the counsels, for which Christ is the norm.[38] Poverty means choosing to await everything from God alone and to let ourselves be dispossessed of all that is our own.[39] Virginity, for Catherine, is profoundly rooted in the dignity of our flesh established by God becoming man, in exclusive attachment to Christ the bridegroom, in the eschatological incorporation of our body into his glorious flesh so that we can see the Father together with Christ.[40] Finally, obedience, with which the book concludes, is the incarnation of disponsibility for God in the Church, and in this connection Catherine constantly emphasises that the full measure of perfection does not consist in the counsels as such, but in love. But obedience, rightly and spiritually understood, quite certainly is this full measure.

[33] 104.

[34] 100; p. 190.

[35] chs. 76, 78, 95.

[36] 95; p. 177f.

[37] Ibid., p. 178, cf. 119; p. 227.

[38] 151; pp. 318ff.

[39] 149, 151; pp. 313ff., 318ff.

[40] On the estimation of the body: chs. 113, 126; p. 212f., pp. 244ff.; on bodily incorporation into Christ at the resurrection: chs. 41 (conclusion), 42, 62; p. 5, pp. 85ff., pp. 116ff.

'Each of you will be rewarded according to the measure of your love (of your obedience)'. 'There are many who hold this obedience so ready and have so incarnated it within their souls that they not only want to see the rightness of the intention of those who command them, but they scarcely wait for the words to come out of their mouths. By the light of faith they understand their superior's intention. Thus the truly obedient obey the intention more than the word, assuming that their superiors' will is within my will, and that they give their commands by my permission and will. They obey the word because they have first obeyed their superiors' will with their own'.[41] Without this mystery of divine-ecclesial obedience, the indifference of love would never be unconditionally realised. Ignatius of Loyola will add nothing new to Catherine's formulation.

For Catherine the concreteness of love has its culminating point in the 'blood'.[42] Whereas, for Mechthild, the Godhead is streaming light, for Catherine of Siena, in Christ, it is streaming blood. Blood—which is at the same time fire and spirit. Blood—which gushes out ever afresh from the wound in the Saviour's heart as an unceasing and living stream of eternal love. Why the wound in the side? 'The actual deed of bearing pain and torment was finite and could never show all the love I had, because it was infinite. This is why I wanted you to see my inmost heart'.[43] The blood cannot fail to renew even the most degenerate Church and clergy. The blood forbids even the one dying in mortal sin to doubt at all, for such doubt would itself be the real and utterly unnecessary sin against God's mercy.[44] The blood makes the glory of God in all creation visible to the believer. God the Father describes it thus from his lofty height: 'Whether the world wills it or no, it offers me glory. True, the people of the world do not offer me glory in the way they ought, by loving me above all things. But I for my part draw from them glory and praise for my name. For my mercy and the fulness of my charity are reflected in them because I lend them time and do not order the earth to swallow them up for their sins. No, I . . . order the earth to give them a share of its fruits, and I command the sun to warm them and give them its light and heat . . . I give to sinners as I give to the just—and often more to sinners than to the just, because the just are ready to suffer, and I will deprive them of earthly goods in order to give them abundantly of the goods of heaven . . . By offering constant humble prayer my suffering servants turn (persecutions) into glory and praise for my name. So whether the wicked will it or not, they offer me glory in this',[45] for 'I always pluck the rose from your thorns'.[46]

---

[41] 165; p. 357.
[42] 14; p. 50f.
[43] 75; p. 138.
[44] 132; pp. 266ff.

CATHERINE OF GENOA and the Path to Luther. One hundred years after Catherine of Siena we have her namesake of Genoa (1447–1510).[1] She was born into the Fieschi family, which was soon after ruined in the Fiesco conspiracy. Her experience of God she described with the radical categories of Eckhart, the ancient categories of hylemorphism, which we have encountered repeatedly, in Erigena and in Chartres, in Grossteste, Alexander, Angela and Eckhart himself. God is Being and the self-diffusive Good who gives form to all things. The creature, of itself, is nothing, indeed sin (just as in Plotinus it was matter that was objectionable).

'All the glory is God's, all the malice is man's.'[2] The tone is set in the very first assertion. 'I see clearly that all the good that is in me or in any other creature and even in the saints is God's alone'.[3] 'There was shown to me a living fountain of [45] 80; p. 150.

[46] 143; p. 297.

[1] Vita ed Opere di S. Caterina da Genova, 13th edn. 1887. V = Vita (with the chapter numbers); P = Trattato del Purgatorio (with the chapter numbers); D = Dialogo (in great part inauthentic, though use is made of sayings of the saint. Even in the so-called authentic works or sayings it is difficult to determine the extent of the interpolations from other sources.) The major work on Catherine is F. von Hügel, The Mystical Element of Religion, 2 vols. (London, 1908). Cf. L. Sertorius, K.v.G. Lebensbild und geistige Gestalt ihrer Werke (Munich, 1939).

[2] V 40.

[3] V 9.

goodness in God, which was entirely in itself, without participation by any creature. Then I saw how he began to distribute himself to creatures . . .'[4] 'All along I have seen, and more and more clearly, that all that is good is in one place only, namely in God. All other good things below are only good by participation'.[5] This means that the sun, beauty, the sweetness of God become, 'through admixture with the creaturely, darkened, bitter, rotten'.[6] Hence we have the tendency in Catherine to turn back from all that is created to the absolute and original creative principle by means of self-negation and clothing with God,[7] by means of consumption from within and from without by the power and the goodness of God,[8] until the creature 'is led back to that pure Being from which she originated'.[9] Thus existence in the world becomes a torment for Catherine,[10] and the body is experienced by her as a prison.[11] This means, it must be admitted, that love appears in her works not so much as 'indifference' and more as the passionate transcendent impulse of eros: could there be a connection between Genoa and the Florence of Marsilio Ficino? It is a thrust into the absolute, and consequently it means going beyond all the powers of the soul together with its experiences, 'Because love climbs higher than the powers of the soul, these powers feel best under the influence of love . . . If someone were to ask me, 'What do you want? What are you striving for? What do you remember?' I would answer: 'Nothing except what love wants and strives for and remembers. For love has so filled me that I do not have to beg any more to nourish those powers. Rather it seems that if love did not exist, they would be bound to die of starvation and want'.[12] Because God is uncreated love, 'for that reason I say that I do not want created love . . . I want no love that passes through the intellect, memory and will. Pure love goes through all this and goes beyond it'.[13] 'Man must become outwardly blind, deaf, dumb, without taste, without the action of the intellect, memory and will. He must be so lost that he no longer knows where he is. He must be deprived of himself and appear foolish to other people'.[14] However, in this pure ascent he encounters eternal love as a judgment of the utmost severity: love is jealous of her absolute purity and fiercely burns up whatever at any point still clings to the finite or to itself.[15]

---

[4] V 13.

[5] V 14.

[6] V 9.

[7] V 9.

[8] V 14.

[9] P 9, likewise V 35.

[10] V 9.

[11] P 17.

[12] V 40.

In this perspective we can understand the emotional dialectic so fundamental to Catherine's thought, which she repeatedly describes in the Vita, and in the treatise on Purgatory projects into the hereafter:[16] the infinite attraction exercised over the soul by the absolute love of God, and at the same time the torment of seeing oneself unworthy in the light of this love and consequently of having to plunge oneself, of necessity, into a purifying fire of judgment. The simultaneity of satisfaction (in fact the beginnings of glory) and intolerable torment[17] is not imposed upon man from outside but expresses the state of his self-consciousness. If he realises the co-existence of God's glory in him and his own sinfulness, then he must reply: 'I do not want this glory with such an adjunct; no, rather send me into hell'.[18] For the way through hell seems to be the nearest, indeed the only, way to go out and meet God. The experience Catherine has of God's contact with her soul are 'blows' from God's glory. They are very like the toques of John of the Cross and at the same time refer back to Ruysbroeck: 'From the presence of God flare up the jets of flame and scorching lightning-flashes of divine love',[19] 'sparks of that glory to which the soul is already near'.[20] They express the 'consuming' element in love, the fact that the soul, which rushes away from this fire in order to purify itself, in fact rushes straight into it, because there is only one flame, and only this one flame can purify it.

---

[13] V 14.

[14] V 35.

[15] The whole of ch. 41 of the Vita depicts this remorselessness of the love of God, which brings to light the most hidden imperfections of the creature which it does not know itself.

[16] As she herself says at the beginning of chs. 1 and 17 of P.

[17] P 12 and the whole treatise, passim. Likewise in V, chs. 30, 39.

[18] V 39.

[19] V ibid. Likewise P 10.

Catherine presents us with the simultaneity of worthiness and unworthiness, of love and judgment. Metaphysically, it is the simultaneity of the fullness of God's glory and creaturely poverty and shame, which Eckhart in particular had expressed in the philosophical language of form and matter. This two-sided experience, which is characteristic of the whole of late medieval spirituality, leads uninterruptedly to Luther's simul justus et peccator. If we add to creaturely poverty the fact that man of himself—according to Ockham—is incapable of thinking of God, while the omnipotent God, on the other hand, has every capacity, by a decree of his will, to declare man to be whatever seems good to him, then Luther's fundamental doctrine appears in its continuity with the way that leads, in western thought, from Eckhart to Fénelon. We shall have to investigate this later.

e. Ignatius of Loyola and 'Representation': Glory in the Age of Baroque

Like all the great founders of religious orders, Ignatius derives his vision directly from the Gospel. With Benedict he sees the love of Christ as reverence and humility, with Francis as a cleansing poverty, the giving up of all personal possessions for the sake of total receptivity to the mystery of the cross. Indifference (indiferencia),[1] the central concept in the 'Principle and Foundation' of the Spiritual Exercises, shows how much Ignatius stands in late medieval tradition. It is in direct continuity with the Christian apatheia of the Fathers and the Gelassenheit of the Rhineland mystics, and in the grand siècle it will appear in its final form as abandon. The basic structure of the Exercises shows their historical roots even more clearly.

---

[20] D 11.

[1] Exercitia spiritualia (Spanish-Latin text of Roothaan, Marietti, 1928) with the usual numbering of paragraphs; ET, J. Rickaby, second edition (London, 1936), p. 18f.; n. 23.

At every stage the principle of indifference means detachment from all created things for the sake of immediate union with God; it thereby places man in the transcendent 'neither God nor the world' situation of The Cloud of Unknowing. Similarly, the First Week of the Exercises involves the purgative and preparatory 'hell of self-knowledge' (Theologia Germanica), which strips the sinner, as he stands before the cross of Christ, of any consciousness of his own goodness. This enables him, dispossessed of any self-constructed pattern of life, to enter into the imitation of Christ, to which he is introduced in the Second, Third and Fourth Weeks of the Exercises by means of contemplation of the life of Jesus. Now this imitation is decided for the individual in a personal call from Christ himself. According to Ignatius, this call will ring out loud and clear during contemplation of the life of Jesus if that is being done in an attitude of 'indifference' and readiness for anything God may ask. It will imprint and bestow on each person a form of life which descends from above as a gift of grace. In that form of life the Christian, as matter totally receptive to being conformed to God, can conform to his will and so attain the perfection of the Christian life. There is a parallel here with Catherine of Siena. In the 'indifference' and readiness of her love, she was endowed with the stigmata of God's loving will and instituted in her mission. Similarly, the Jesuit receives his mission in that school of abandonment and contemplation which is the Exercises and is thereby enabled to fulfil a particular task without any mental reservations and from a disposition of transcendent universality, being basically ready for anything.

The continuity from German and Dutch spirituality to Ignatius is proved by his meditative reading of Ludolf of Saxony (who, in the introduction to his book, summarises the imaginative affective method of meditation in Pseudo-Bonaventure's Meditationes); he treasured that classic of the Devotio Moderna, the Imitation of Christ;[2] also the Ejecitatorio de la vida espiritual of the Benedictine, García de Cisneros,

---

[2] This is the most widely read book in Christendom after the Bible, and yet, for all its sobriety and forcefulness, there is something strangely opaque about it. It rejects and eliminates every speculative element not only of

Abbot of Montserrat (the book was printed there in 1500 and doubtless became familiar to Ignatius during his stay in the monastery).[3] (More will be said later of the influence of the knightly and crusader ideals mediated through his upbringing and reading.)

What is absolutely decisive, however, is that, though Ignatius continued the idea of abandonment in all its Christian radicalism, he did not adopt the metaphysical formulation given it by the German mystics, most notably Eckhart. Christian abandonment does not imply, even when conceptualised and lived in an uncompromising way, the ancient hylemorphic model whereby God is form and the creature is matter. The practice of indifference, as understood by Ignatius, does not therefore mean the inevitable annihilation of man's own being and will. That interpretation, which is to be found in varying degrees of strength in spirituality from Eckhart to Fénelon, is the symptom of a latent monothelitism, not to say eastern-style pantheism. No, scholasticism but also of mysticism, and yet, at the same time, it abstracts from the colourful multiplicity of the Bible and—since it is written for those who have turned from the world—disregards the world, in all its richness, as a field for Christian activity. This really leaves only the personal-ethical order as a field for contemplation. The Imitation is a Christian Epictetus. In place of the openhearted readiness of a Catherine of Siena, a subdued and melancholy resignation runs through the book. Admittedly, there is love of the crucified love of Christ (II, 11–12), and desolation (II, 9; III, 50) and folly (I, 17, 5) are accepted for the sake of Christ. It is true that the idea of dispossession of all one's own good (I, 22; III, 40) and of total trust in the grace of Jesus is worked out thoroughly. But there is an excess of warnings about the world, the illusions of egoism, the dangers of speculation and of the active apostolate. In this way, even 'the idea of the imitation of Christ does not become the dominant perspective . . . There is no mention of the mediation of the God-Man, of access "through Christ, in the Holy Spirit, to the Father". The mystery of the Church, therefore, does not come into view either'. The individual 'is unaware that his love of God can only be fulfilled if it expands into love of neighbour and into the apostolate'. All the remains is a flight from the world, a world that has not been brought home in Christ' (E. Iserloh in LThK (1962) vii 764. Cf. by the same authork 'Die Kirchenfrömmigkeit in der Imitatio Christ', in Sentire Ecclesiam (1961), 251–267.

---

[3] For these sources, cf. J. de Guibert SJ, La Spiritualité de la Compagnie de Jésus (1953), 142–148.

the true mystery of Christian revelation is this: the perfection of the kingdom of God ('God all in all', 'it is no longer I who live, but Christ who lives in me') can be pursued as the universal operation of God in the active co-operation of the creature—in abandonment, surrender, service. This co-operation can no longer remain at the level of indifference in the sense of merely letting things happen; no, the particular will of God, which is to be actively grasped and carried out, must also be actively pursued. For the Rhineland mystics, abandonment came in at the end; Ignatius transfers it to the beginning. In the Second Week of the Exercises it moves to a higher level through the central process of 'election'. Election means that a person, in the analogy of freedom between God and the creature, chooses 'what God our Lord gives us to choose', spontaneously and voluntarily cooperating in that particular choice which, in the eternal freedom of God, has been chosen for us. Progress is clearly made here beyond the concept in Eckhart, Suso and Ruysbroeck of the creature's returning to its eternal idea in God. Man's self-surrender to God is thereby accepted by God; he is 'honoured' to participate, in grace and freedom, in the elective act of God himself.

It is, however, precisely in this way that Eckhart's vision of the groundlessness and 'why-lessness' of God and of his entire self-revelation in generation and creation is fulfilled. When man's responsive act of freedom is taken up into God's free and why-less self-giving, it transcends all simply teleological ethics and enters the pure sphere of disinterested adoration and love. The essential definition of man is that he is created for the adoration and praise, the veneration and worship, the selfless service, of God, and 'thus' (as if to say, 'it goes without saying' or 'by the way') he will 'save his soul', find his salvation. As with Ruysbroeck, to be a true Christian is to exist purely for the 'ever greater glory of God', to be immersed in that glory, to be at its disposal, to radiate it through grace. This is the innermost religious kernal of Baroque culture.

Ignatius lays aside the metaphysical (hylemorphic) shell and concentrates on its theological kernel. This enables the spirituality of the modern era to survive, when Fénelon is discredited, the abrupt end of so-called 'mysticism' with more than a banal and enlightened Stoic moralism. The process demonstrated moreover how the fundamental evangelical attitude of receptive contemplation could survive inwardly and authentically, without involving strict monasticism, in an active apostolate in the Church and the world. Models for this had already been provided not only by Francis and Dominic but also by such influential figures as Ramon Lull, Catherine of Siena, Bridget, Angela Merici and Joan of Arc. In these cases the contemplative act itself was regarded as a work of the greatest fruitfulness, for both world and Church (an idea which continues from the Rhineland mystics through Teresa of Avila to Thérèse of Lisieux). But that is not all. This fundamental act, this fundamental work, of contemplation could also now be translated, without compromising its Christian integrity, into specific deeds in an active apostolate of service to neighbour.

Ignatius was the first person to justify and to propagate boldly this understanding of contemplation; in the age of Baroque it quite logically took the form of 'representation'. The imitator of the Lord places himself, in total 'indifference', at the disposal of his Master's will and command, without ceasing, for all that, to be a spontaneous and free human subject. For himself and for others he is still only the agent, the representative, of his Lord, like a viceroy, who more perfectly represents the king the more absolutely he places his personal, intellectual and creative powers at the service of the thought and will of his monarch. He remains a person, but his own person becomes as it were completely transparent to the person who sends him. Self-abnegation is no less radical in Ignatius than in Francis or Eckhart, but he avails himself of the Thomist metaphysical doctrines of secondary causality and the analogia entis, which is now at last taken seriously. By so doing, Ignatius achieves the inner synthesis of the two major parallel currents of the middle ages—scholasticism and mysticism. Baroque culture, in those aspects which from a Christian point of view are the most positive, builds upon the idea of representation. It underlies not only the apostolate of a man like Francis Xavier and of the entire Jesuit mission, including the experiment in Paraguay, but also the theatre, both secular and sacred, where a man—Calderon!—plays the 'role' entrusted to him in the 'costume' lent him and consequently makes present, re-presents, a fragment of eternal knowledge. The idea of representation thus brings about a new awareness of the manifestation of divine glory in the world. For now this glory finds a receptacle, in and by which it manifests itself, not, as with Eckhart, Ockham and Luther, a receptacle it has to smash to pieces in order to reveal itself in its uniqueness. No, this is a receptacle in which it can stand out clearly as the real glory of the Lord, the manifestation of absolute sovereignty. This deep level of Baroque consciousness deserves to be considered first of all in its own terms, independently of any connection with the Church's Counter-Reformation, on the one hand, or with political absolutism, on the other.

This living source of the idea of the 'ever greater glory of God' (ad maiorem Dei gloriam) is only a simple gaze directed, through Christ, at the Triune God;[4] in the loving and chivalrous service of this God Ignatius wants his life to be consumed. To the gaze of Ignatius God appears—as he does to the Fathers and to Anselm—as the one who is inexhaustibly 'ever greater'. The dynamic comparative conveys much more than any exclusive superlative, and yet he does not faithlessly regard it as impossible for God's grace and mission to find a form for expressing that glory in the Christian life. Luther's dialectic of law and grace, which never allows any kind of obedience to arise but constantly and consciously represses it, appears from this perspective as a defective faith.

---

[4] The Trinitarian dimension of Ignatian spirituality is firmly established from the time of Manresa, where the Trinity in the image of an organ's three keys resounds forth into his heart and soul 'for the whole of his life' (The Autobiography of St Ignatius Loyola, ET, J. F. O'Callaghan (New York, 1974), p. 38). It again comes clearly into view in the fragment that has been preserved of the Spiritual Journal dating from the years 1544–45 (ET, W. J. Young (Woodstock, Maryland, 1958)). He 'prayed daily to each of the Three Persons' as well as to the Trinity as a whole, and he asked himself 'why he said four prayers to the Trinity', but immediately dismissed the question as 'totally irrelevant'. And in all this one discerns a total lack of interest in Eckhart's speculations about the one essence beyond the Trinitarian processions. As in the version at La Storta (Autobiography, p. 89;

Even prescinding from the idea of serving the Church, the mutual relationship of God and the world has a cosmic comprehensiveness, which, in the concluding meditation of the Exercises, begins to sound thoroughly Dionysian.[5] Already at the time of his conversion 'the greatest consolation he received was to look at the sky and the stars, which he often did and for a long time',[6] and later on he went off as a pilgrim, barefoot in Franciscan style, 'jubilant and loudly singing across the fields'.[7] It is the same Ignatius who deepens this vision of the world to a fourfold contemplating of the immanence of God in all created things. First, he is in them as the Creator, the bountiful Giver who draws near and offers himself through all his gifts. Secondly, he is in them as the Indweller who is present in and governs all things—in being as the source of being, in life as the source of life, in sense as Spiritual Journal, p. 16), mediation through Mary and Jesus to the Father is what matters most and is experienced with the utmost intensity (Journal, p. 1ff.). This is not contradicted by the fact that Ignatius also has visions which show 'very clearly the very Being or Essence of God under the figure of a sphere', or reveal 'from this Essence the Father [seeming] to go forth or derive' (ibid., p. 27). At other times he sees 'sometimes the Being of the Father, that is, first the Being and then the Father . . . sometimes [the Father] in another way' (p. 31), or 'a partial revelation of the Being of the Father, and likewise of the Being of the Most Holy Trinity' (p. 34), or the indwelling of the other two persons in the Father (p. 15). These changes of aspect have nothing to do with speculation; they simply enable Ignatius to vary the direction of his devotion (p. 31), until he reaches the point where 'I am united, beyond all measure, with the love, so bright and sweet, [of the Trinity]'. Very often Ignatius's visions are accompanied by phantasms of luminous splendour, of the Holy Spirit (p. 4) and the Trinity as a whole (p. 19) as well as of the humanity of Christ (p. 20) and of Mary, of the process of creation, of the Eucharistic miracle (ibid.), as if the mysteries of the faith were being presented to him as they exist in their supreme form in divine glory. The glory of God, as it breaks in upon Him, can, however, also manifest itself as an 'interior word' (pp. 16, 44) accompanied by a corresponding 'loss of exterior speech', and this 'interior speech' possesses an 'interior inexpressible harmony' and stands in an immediate relation to the 'heavenly language of music' (cf. p. 44).

---

[5] The parallel with Denys has been shown in detail by E. Przywara at the end of his commentary on the Exercises (Deus Semper Maior III (1940), 369–407).

[6] Autobiography, n. 11.

[7] Ibid., n. 79.

archetypal sense, in thinking and willing spirit as primordial Spirit. This indwelling of God exists at the natural level but takes a special form at the supernatural, where the creature is consecrated to be the temple and monstrance of God. Thirdly, he is in all things as 'the one who labours'. His tireless work in the world, at every level of reality and at every moment of history, supremely in the Passion of the God-Man, puts an end to any suggestion that God is uninterested in the world. Fourthly, as both James and Plotinus maintain, he is the good Father of lights, from whom every good thing comes down, so that in the end all spiritual subjects who harden their hearts against God are softened afresh so that they flow with the eternal fountain and shine with the eternal sun.[8] And so God is in all things; in everything the glory of Triune love shines and pours itself forth. In the concluding prayer, the creature who grasps this glory in faith offers itself up to God and asks to be made one of glory's rays: 'Take, O Lord, and receive all my liberty', the sum total of my existence, both as an individual and in relation to others, 'my memory, my understanding and all my will', the Augustinian imago Trinitatis in the created spirit is thus referred back to its archetype, 'all I have and possess', in love's freely-chosen poverty; 'you have given it me, Lord; to you, Lord, I return it', in the epistrophê of Plotinus here given the higher meaning, in the spirit of Old and New Testaments, of the return of all beings and all hearts to the God of love, 'all is yours, dispose of it entirely according to your will. Give me your love and grace, because that is enough for me'.[9]

Obedience only became prominent in the thinking of the founder and his first companions at a later stage, that is, when, with their new Christian disposition of being ready for anything, they began to offer themselves openly to the visible hierarchical Church as instruments at her disposal. The Pope became the administrator of this store of 'readiness', the real 'general' of the new society, which became the outstanding instrument of the Counter-Reformation. The universal

[8] Exercises, nn. 234–237; Rickaby, pp. 208–210.

[9] Ibid., n. 234; Rickaby, p. 208.

'device'—'To find God in all things'[10]—is not denied, but now these things become par excellence the things of the Church Militant. The Exercises first of all centred round the 'discernment of spirits', which was intended to help me make the right decision about what God's will was for my life; but the final word of the Exercises is alabar, praising, affirming and consenting to the things of the Church.[11] Ignatius 'praises' them just as Francis, in his 'Canticle of Brother Sun', praised the elements of nature as transparent to God. Ignatius praises them with perfect simplicity in an act of filial and chivalrous fidelity to 'the true Spouse of Christ our Lord, which is our holy Mother the Hierarchical Church'.[12] There is a slight touch of humour, or, at any rate, of wise patience, about Ignatius's love of the Church—in contrast to the impatience of Luther's reformation with its violent attack on dogmas, structures and images.

Give me my good old religion,
It's good enough for me . . .

Nevertheless, as was typical of the times, deductions came to be made, in the style of the Counter-Reformation, that Ignatius had not made, and the positive ecclesiastical structures and institutions were made into the definitive form of manifestation of divine glory. Bellarmine did this in ecclesiology, and Baroque art, with its tendency towards extravagant glorification, extended it to all the phenomenal aspects of the Catholic Church. It is true that this theology and art first of all inherit the forms of worldly beauty recovered from antiquity during the Renaissance, forms which are now as such reinvigorated and become forms of divine glory. It is also true that theology and art accomplish all this in a conscious act of faith and loyalty to mother Church, in a conscious rejection of the Protestant rejection of the idea that divine revelation can have any real visibility in the time of the Church's history or in the charisms of sanctity, which the Holy Spirit so richly poured out on the Church in this very century, and which the art of Tintoretto, El Greco, Zurbaran, Rubens and many others tried to represent visibly as the splendour of grace.

---

[10] Joseph Stierli, 'Das Ignatianische Gebet: Gott suchen in allen Dingen' in Ignatius von Loyola. Seine geistliche Gestalt und sein Vermächtnis 1556–1956, Echter Verlag (1956) 151–182.

[11] Exercises, nn. 352–370; Rickaby, pp. 220–225 (Rules 'for the true sentiments which we ought to hold in the Church Militant').

[12] Exercises, n. 353; Rickaby, p. 220.

And yet not everything has been said. However high the light of antiquity may have risen above the natural world and made it into a theophany, the crisis of the late middle ages could not be undone. The spirit of critical philosophy, of empiricism, of the positive natural sciences, spread itself out beneath the Baroque ceiling, and men realised the precariousness of trying to summon Plato or even just Denys back to life. Luther was a fact. And so, despite their radiant power, there was something contrived about triumphantly celebrating ecclesiastical forms as revelatory icons of the eschatological Jerusalem, as anticipatory glimpses of a gorgeous Pozzo and Tiepolo kind of heaven, full of saints and angels. Despite its radiance it was unbalanced, it did not correspond to the equilibrium of the Gospel, and whatever the subjective sincerity of those who made this profession of faith, there was something objectively untrue about it. Not only do all boundaries disappear between natural revelation and redemptive revelation as proclaimed in Bible and Church, but even the scandalous form of the cross and the humble form of the Church are treated as if they were, without qualification, forms of worldly beauty, with nothing to radiate but the eternal power and glory of God. Cosmic glory breaks out from the cross, and from Bernini's Chair of Peter there shines anew an immediate form of the glory of the Christ who is raised on high. But there is an even greater paradox. The Church and salvation history have been fitted into the framework of a cosmos that manifests God, and yet now the Church has to restore to the world the light of glory, the very thing the world was in danger of losing, and which ultimately the Church had borrowed from it; both Church and world are now reflections of a borrowed glory. This dialectic was not to be guaranteed by the concept of representation in the Ignatian sense, and so Ignatian spirituality could survive unharmed the downfall of Baroque.

The substitutions and hidden exchanges reach their climax when political absolutism is transfigured in the religious lustre of ecclesiastical Baroque; in fact, the concept of representation to a certain extent embraces both spheres. Even imperial and royal representation could be understood, with the utmost Christian seriousness, as a service of the Kingdom of God—as can be seen in the cases of Charles V and Philip II. Pomp, sacred and secular, could be justified on the same grounds. The Escorial could be half palace and seat of government and half church and monastery; St Peter's basilica and piazza were the two things in one: the homage of all man's worldly art to the Church and the brilliant display to the world, by means of art, of the Church's ideals. The centre of unity and gravity in this kind of monolithic Baroque culture is to be found, of necessity, chiefly in its theatrical aspect and in the role played more than in the realities of life which act it out. The part can only be played in an existentially valid and credible manner if it can be accepted and carried off with total Ignatian 'indifference' and in the analogical process of election. If there is any deviation from this, the role, the business of representation, will be confused with the essence of glory, and men will cease to persevere in pursuit of the greater glory of God (AD maiorem Dei gloriam). What makes the Baroque so ambivalent, what makes the 'discernment of spirits' (the starting-point for Ignatius and the Rhineland mystics) so indispensable, is that there can be countless gradations from genuine pursuit of the greater glory of God to pseudo-religious self-glorification.

The principle of an active indifference, as understood by Ignatius, was a steep summit and a constant challenge for his numerous spiritual successors to climb. However, it concealed in itself the danger of two kinds of spiritual deviation, quite distinct from the deviation, already mentioned, in Counter-Reformation ecclesiology.[13]

The idea of an 'indifferent' opening up of oneself to the God who elects could very easily be interpreted regressively in terms of the received 'mystical' tradition, which was very much alive everywhere. Ignatius had already had to struggle hard against this tendency in his own lifetime (P. Araoz and the Spanish contemplatives and Quietists), and later on it attained the height of subtlety in the teaching of P. Balthazar Alvarez (P. de Ponte was his biographer) and, dependent on him, in the Doctrine spirituelle of P. Louis Lallemant and his school. These teachers quite rightly stress the importance of truly hearkening to God's inspirations, to the impulses and gifts of the Holy Spirit. But the onesidedness of the approach is betrayed by an anxious preoccupation with personal contemplating and a withdrawal from active apostolic involvement. As in ancient monasticism and German mysticism, action and contemplation are once again dualistically split up, and the primacy of (passive) contemplation is defended in a literalist sense. Suspicions and condemnations, on the part of the order's authorities, of the 'mystical' tendency gave an impetus to the opposite extreme, which, with relative correctness, emphasised the spontaneity of human action in the analogy of freedom and election, and thereby brought active asceticism to the fore (represented by P. Rodriguez' Manual of Perfection); in consequence, unexpectedly but inevitably, Ignatian 'indifference' was mistakenly interpreted to mean 'achievement' in the Stoic or Buddhist sense. This distortion becomes recognisable in the studied aloofness of its attitude to the world as creation and in the pseudo-ethical superiority that follows from it, where one's fellow human beings are regarded as illusory, irrelevant, perhaps even dangerous, which compromises the authentic Christian idea of the encounter of I and Thou. These two possible deviations are both forms of flight from the steep and narrow charism given to Ignatius.

---

[13] And equally irrespective of the confusion of Christian indifference with metaphysical indifference, which creeps into Suarez, a confusion for which Ignatius himself never gives the slightest pretext.

The dangers show how exposed a peak is Ignatian transcendence. It can be baptised with the name 'obedience' provided one preserves an unrestricted sense of all its paradoxical implications. It is first and foremost obedience to God, beyond passivity and activity: an act which completely purifies all the powers of intellect, will and emotion and stretches them to the limit in order to place them at the disposal of God's eternal, free and loving will. Obedience, in this form, is faithful adherence to the will of Christ, to his obedience to the Father, and by the same token adherence to the faithful obedience to Christ of the Church, his Bride, who, in her spirit of faithful obedience, is our mother and educator. It is an obedience that transcends the oppositions of light and darkness, blindness and sight, for obedience, is 'blind' only in relation to what I can see;[14] in itself, as 'the holocaust of private judgment', it enables me to see, with the Church, what I do not see on my own.[15] This, then, is what the adventure of transcendence really comes down to, this is true metaphysical action: identification with the action of the Church (concretised in the superior recognised by her) as a Christlike obedience incarnate in the here and now.

f. The Final Systems

FRANCIS DE SALES. The spirituality originating in the Germanic countries spreads through a wide variety of channels. It goes as far as Spain and then reaches its climax in France during the Grand Siècle. Here it affects everyone: Francis de Sales, Jane Frances de Chantal and Camus; pious humanists like Louis Richeome SJ; the Capuchin, Ives de Paris; the Englishman, Benedict Canfeld, who passes on the radical mysticism of abandonment; the blind organist, Jean de Saint-Samson, who anticipates and propagates it; the 'French School' of the Oratorians and the Jesuit school, already mentioned, of Lallemant; the ardent spirituality of Vincent de Paul and Pascal; the apostles of devotion to the Sacred Heart; the great and untainted figure of the Ursuline, Marie de l'Incarnation; finally, Bossuet and Fénelon. These are just a few of the best-known names.[1] The tradition is of such an overwhelming richness that the common factors are easily lost sight of. And yet they are there: distinguishing characteristics, negative as well as positive, are at hand. The positive characteristic is that these are all systems of dialogue and transcendence: mind and heart are thoroughly purified and illumined to prepare them for a definitive and transcendent openness and readiness for God, which leads, through God's free and loving self-revelation, to loving union with Him. Abandonment or indifference, understood and practised as a humble love ready for suffering, is man's ultimate act in relation to God. God alone can lead man to union with Him: man does not really 'strive' for it (abandonment is not a religious form of eros); he just leaves it to God. The negative characteristic is the way the general religious fervour of the age expresses itself in a constant tendency to discursiveness, making comparisons and refinements, mutual observations, 'spiritual direction', and thus psychologising. This imperceptibly and very easily shifts the emphasis from a pure Godwardness (as in Ignatius) to reflections on transcendence. The devout mind is self-conscious and paradoxically takes self as its object in the very process of transcending and escaping from self. In still ardent faith the French write a critique of religious reason without noticing that they are anticipating the critique carried out by the Enlightenment in unfaith. The most fruitful impulses of the Reformation, which destroy this kind of introspection at its roots, did not come to anything, even in the spirituality of Port-Royal, which mostly remains at the moral and ascetical level. People automatically tend to look at themselves in a mirror. To justify herself, Teresa of Avila has to observe herself, consider herself, describe herself. Even a simple and straightforward person like Marie de l'Incarnation is compelled to write reports, in minute detail, about herself and her mystical experiences. This tendency to introspection rests upon the celebrated spirituality of the Grand Siècle like mildew (or should we say, like talcum powder?). In the case of Pascal there is the added factor of Jansenist brooding about predestination: 'Am I one of the [14] 'The white that I see I would believe to be black, if the Hierarchical Church were so to rule it' (Exercises, n. 365; Rickaby, p. 223).

---

[15] Letter on obedience to his confrères in Portugal, in: Ignatius von Loyola: Geistliche Briefe, with an introduction by H. Rahner (Benzinger, 1956), p. 248.

[1] See above all Henri Bremond, Histoire littéraire du sentiment religieux en France, 12 vols. (1916–1936), the fundamental work despite its idiosyncratic interpretations and choice of texts. Cf. L. Cognet, Crépuscule des Mystiques, 1958.

elect?' The result of all this is that, in the midst of a great flowering, one has a sense of decline and fall, which pervades all the glory of the Baroque age, a glory which spreads out, legitimately enough, half aware, half unaware, of its own fragility.

The crowning masterpiece among the works of St Francis de Sales is the great Treatise on the Love of God.[2] The title itself poses a problem: is it God's love of us or our love of God that is meant, or are the two combined, univocally as it were, in a higher concept? This problem is immediately and unequivocally resolved by the fact that the central theme of the book is our love of God as a response to His supernatural providence and as the perfection of all the virtues, powers and potentialities of man. Beginning with a summary psychology (Book One), Francis describes the 'Progress and Perfection of Love' (Book Three), its decline (Four), its fundamental acts (gratifying love and benevolence, Five) and prayer (Six). Certain liminal situations (rapture in love and dying of love) are brought in (Seven), and only then does he deal with love as conformity to the will of God, His commandments, counsels and inspirations (VIII), as perfect indifference (Nine). Finally, he speaks of the chief commandment (Ten), the chief virtue (Eleven), and, as a kind of appendix, practical methods (Twelve). This leaves only Book Two to recount 'The History of the Generation and Heavenly Birth of Divine Love', though this is mainly concerned with 'supernatural providence', 'divine inspirations' and the three theological virtues. This means that the most important thing of all—the whole objective history of salvation, Incarnation, Redemption, Justification, the Church and Christian life in the world (obviously because it belongs to dogmatic theology)—is excluded, and so all that this 'spiritual theology' is left with is an anthropocentric point of view. This naively unintentional anthropocentrism of a spirituality that imagines itself to be totally theocentric, and indeed excessively presents itself as such, characterises many of the systems of the seventeenth century and at least infects several others. The spirituality that knows everything about love and perfection secretly presupposes a univocation which compromises the analogia entis. It alligns itself with Baroque scholasticism's speculative univocation of being and, in conjunction with it, gives birth in the next century to pietistic rationalism. The regular, unctuous grandeur of the Salesian style, with all its superlatives, is the unconscious expression of this univocation in contrast to, say, the Ignatian style, which is sobered down to the point of dryness by the comparatives of analogy (with the ever-greater God).

---

[2] Traité de l'Amour de Dieu. Cited from the Oeuvres complètes de St François de Sales, 4 vols., Paris, 1836.

Within these limitations Francis de Sales can say very beautiful things about love—as, for example, in the famous parable of the deaf minstrel whom a prince appoints to sing before him. Some of the time he listens to him attentively, but occasionally he leaves him playing his lute and goes off to hunt. 'But the musician's desire to do his master's will made him continue his music as carefully as if his prince had been present, even though he had no pleasure in singing, since he was deaf and his prince absent'.[3] 'The human heart, the true chorister of the love of God, usually enjoys listening to itself and delights to hear the melody of its own song'. Those who do this 'are deceived without noticing it. Instead of loving God in order to please God, they begin to love Him for the pleasure they feel in exercising holy love . . . for though this holy love is called the love of God, because God is its object, yet it is also ours, because we are the lovers . . . and this deceives us: we love the love because it comes from us, the lovers'.[4] 'It is difficult, I admit, to enjoy looking at a beautiful mirror for very long without catching sight of ourselves in it, even when one does not feel any particular pleasure in seeing oneself . . . Our aim ought to be to love God for His beauty, not to enjoy the beauty of loving Him. At prayer, if you notice that you are praying, you have not given yourself up completely to prayer'.[5] The person who prays for the pleasure of praying will abandon prayer in times of aridity.

[3] Book IX, ch. 9.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Book IX, ch. 10.

But in this instruction to love God solely 'because He is beautiful' is there not concealed the opposite danger? Does it not look as if the disinterestedness of Christian love has been now confused with aesthetic disinterestedness? Is the Christian contemplative act not identified, in a new kind of univocation, with this-worldly contemplation of the beautiful in general? Perhaps the very first sentence of the Treatise is relevant here: 'Introduce unity into diversity, and you create order; order yields harmony and proportion; harmony, where you have perfect integrity, begets beauty.' Beauty, not the glory of the Lord, is the dominant concept in this often very severe and ascetically demanding doctrine of love.

Another factor points in the same direction. It is more remote, but it strongly influences the spirituality of the Grand Siècle. The transcendence being strived for touches what Eckhart calls 'the spark of the soul', Ruysbroeck 'the deepest unity', the French la cime et suprême pointe de l'esprit[6] (or la fine pointe), which has all the appearances of a natural organ for contact with God, though, of course, it goes far beyond all sensory or categorical knowledge: you 'see without seeing, meet without recognising'. Bérulle will speak here of a 'state' beyond acts, of 'a zone of our soul unknown to us', which is 'the proper seat of grace'.[7] Here lies the danger of real transcendence being replaced by a kind of transcendental psychology, which, under another form of illumination, will be continued by German idealism.

Francis de Sales does not want to be tied down to the metapsychology of the fine pointe. What he is really getting at is the mystery of how the human will, by love and indifference, enters the divine will. One can speak of the will 'passing away' (the trépas of the will). 'Although the will cannot really die, sometimes it departs from the limits of ordinary life, to live entirely in the will of God.' 'The heart embarked on doing God's good pleasure (embarqué dans le bon plaisir divin) should have no other desire than to be carried along by God's will (se laisser porter).' 'The will that has died to self in order to dwell in the will of God has no particular wishes of its own. It is utterly self-obliterated and transformed into God's will, like a little child still unable to exercise his will to want or love anything except the breast and the face of his beloved mother.'[8]

---

[6] Book IX, ch. 12.

[7] Bremond, op. cit., vol. VII, ch. 3, points out the identité foncière between the Salesian philosophy and Bérullism.

g. The Metaphysics of the Oratory

PIERRE DE BERULLE,[9] who founded the French Oratory in 1611, was also responsible for a spiritual synthesis of great significance, which developed in a variety of ways in his disciples, of whom only Charles de Condren can be discussed here. Our concern has to be with 'metaphysics'. Now in the Oratory all theological is rooted once more in the fundamental relation of the analogia entis, which, for the creature, is expressed by religio: the realisation of the infinite grandeur and majesty of God over and above the essential nothingness of the creature. In his beautiful introduction to Bérulle's works, the third General of the Oratory, Bourgoing, describes this fundamental attitude: 'To honour means to consider and esteem some perfection and excellence in another together with a respect and self-abasement proportionate to the degree of that excellence. Now since all excellences are divine and infinite in God, and are divinely human, and of an infinite dignity, in Jesus Christ Our Lord, by reason of His divine person, they are worthy of a like esteem, reverence and submission . . . Christ's pains and sufferings too deserve the same honour . . . So there is nothing in Him that does not deserve homage, honour, profound reverence . . . It is the essential act and exercise of religion, the creature's first obligation towards his God, the principal duty of the Christian towards Jesus Christ Our Lord.'[10] This primordial act does not originate in the creature's free deliberation and self-reflection, but is the response of homage to God's will for glorification. God 'wants to glorify Himself in us' and holds sway in us through His Holy Spirit in accordance with that will. He 'makes our soul adore the divine majesty, not only by its own thoughts and affections but also by the operation of His divine Spirit, who acts in our spirit, and makes it bear and feel the power and sovereignty of His being over all created beings by the experience of His grandeur applied (appliquée) to our littleness and by the experience of our littleness incapable of bearing His grandeur; for it is infinite and infinitely distant and disproportionate to all created being.' So 'this divine Being, adorable in all His attributes, has attributes that are apparently contradictory. He is infinitely present and infinitely distant, infinitely exalted and infinitely applied (appliqué) to created being, infinitely delightful and infinitely severe, infinitely desirable and infinitely insupportable'.[11] [8] Book IX, ch. 13. Cf. Book V, ch. 2.

---

[9] Works in the edition of Migne (Paris, 1856). In the 1960 facsimile of the first edition of 1644 Migne's page numbers have been inserted.

[10] 86.

Bérulle does not entrust the performance of this primordial metaphysical act to man's spontaneous deliberation; no, he makes it clear that it involves the co-operation and collaboration of God the Holy Spirit. In the analogy of being the analogy of the finite and infinite subjects is permanently in force. And in the concrete order of the world, as the supreme miracle of divine grace, the God-Man Jesus Christ is like the bridge between infinite and finite, between absolute glory and absolute adoration, the mediator of the religious act. Ontologically and psychologically, He is the full reality of analogy. One or two decades later, Pascal, in great turbulence, in a state of Jansenist shock at man's spatial and ontological disorientation (the Oratory has some influence here), will make this discovery for himself:[12] Christ is the definitive proportion between God and man, a proportion not found anywhere else. Bérulle had already established this truth by the simple contemplation of Christ and without prior consideration of man's sinfulness and incapacity for adoration. In Christ 'God incomprehensible makes Himself comprehended . . . God ineffable makes Himself heard in the voice of His Word incarnate, and God invisible makes Himself seen in the flesh that he has united with the essence of eternity, and God terrible (épouvantable) in the magnificence of His grandeur makes Himself felt in His gentleness, in His kindness and in His humanity.'[13] [11] 1417–1418.

---

[12] Cf. vol. III of this work, pp. 205–218 (Eng. tr.).

Both in His being and in His consciousness Jesus Christ is the point where glory is transformed into worship; indeed, since He is personally God in human nature, the transformation is total and perfect: 'You alone serve God as he deserves to be served, that is, with an infinite service, and you alone adore Him with an infinite adoration . . . From all eternity there was an infinitely adorable God, but there was still not an infinite adorer . . . O grandeur of Jesus, precisely in His state of abandonment and servitude . . . since from now on we have a God served and adored without any kind of defect and a God adoring without a [selfish] interest in His divinity.'[14] This precision is not just ontological, because it is expressed by Christ's own act of adoration; and yet it is not just functional either, for the particular act totally corresponds to the ontological situation of the God-Man. To express the unity of the two aspects Bérulle invents the idea of 'state' (état). This denotes the psychological and existential dimension of Jesus' ontological reality; constantly and precisely, His actions reveal His being. Now man is historical and goes through various states of life—the state of being in his mother's womb, the state of childhood, of maturity, of joy and sorrow, of living and dying. In Jesus all the states of a truly human existence are experienced and shaped into a precise expression of His eternal adoration of God. According to Bérulle, all Jesus' particular states (les états) are integrated in His general state as God and man, which, in precisely this integration, is the place of man's true transcendence towards God. In fact, here finite being's perfect act of homage to God (the foundation of all authentic knowledge of God) is performed with divine validity.

The integration of the states of human life in the state of the God-Man is familiar to us today through Odo Casel's 'theology of the mysteries', which is concerned with the question of how what is essentially temporal in Jesus becomes eternal. Bérulle provides a prudent and circumspect answer to this question. He sees that both the temporal acts and the temporal states of Jesus (e.g., His Infancy, Passion, pierced Heart, His Burial etc.) emerge primarily from His permanent and fundamental attitude as the 'perfect adorer' and are then contained again within that same attitude, not just as a permanent disposition of mind but as the harvest of all the real achievements of Christ in time. Like Eckhart, Bérulle especially emphasises the fact that the incarnate love of God is always Now, grounded in the eternal Now of the Trinitarian procession.[15] In this eternal Now of the God-Man 'the actual enjoyment, the living disposition, by which Jesus effected any given mystery [of His earthly life] is always living, actual, present for Jesus'; 'the interior condition of the exterior mystery, its efficacy and power, which make the mystery alive and effective in us', transcend time. If Jesus could take the scars on His body into glory, 'why can He not preserve something of his suffering in His soul, in the definitive state of His glory? . . . But what he takes with him in body and soul of his passion is itself life and glory . . . what remains in Him of these mysteries of his life forms on earth a kind of grace, which pertains to those souls chosen to share in it.'[16]

---

[13] 217.

[14] 183–184.

This 'kind of grace' is Bérulle's central preoccupation. He does not dispute the dogmatic fact that sanctifying grace as such cannot be directly experienced at the conscious level, but can only be grasped by faith. Nevertheless, because of his christological orientation, he is bound to think of the life of faith as a transcendent participation in the fundamental state, at once both ontological and psychological, of 'the perfect Adorer', whose entire state has been opened up to all mankind and above all to the believing members of His Mystical Body. For Christ as Mediator and Substitute possesses in Himself 'two wonderful capacities (capacités)': one for the fullness of God, 'the other for souls, whom He contains in Himself, and has in His authority, in His power . . . a capacity that contains, conserves and protects'. For those with faith and love it is a capacity which 'in Christ gives them life and subsistence, strengthens them and makes them grow', a space which enables them to live more in Christ than in themselves.[17] One can see here how Bérulle gives a metaphysical foundation to the Pauline concept of the indwelling in Christ by faith and thus surpasses and removes the poison from the Platonism of Eckhart and Ruysbroeck, the Platonism which taught that the creature lives more in its divine idea than in its own existence outside of God. Existence in Christ, integrated by the integration of His human states in his fundamental state as the God-Man, is an existence which explains our spiritual capacity (capacité in the sense of the possibility of existing spiritually in another, the world or God) in terms of Christ's capacity for us.[18] 'For Jesus alone is our fulfilment, and we must bind ourselves to Jesus as to the one who is the ground (fond) of our being by His divinity, by His humanity what binds our being to God, the spirit of our spirit, the life of our life, the fullness of our capacity.'[19] At the same time, this potentiality of our faith is of necessity realised by our grace (always Christological in form) becoming conscious in a transcendent manner (according to Karl Rahner, 'non-categorically', to be precise). To partake of the divine life means to participate in the fundamental state and attitude of the 'perfect Adorer', Jesus, who in His freedom chooses us for a particular place within His states: one person shares with Him specially in being the Father's child, another shares in His contemplation in the wilderness, a third is incorporated into the agony in Gethsemane, a fourth in the dereliction of the cross.[20] The experience of one's own existence is the understanding of one's destiny; Christian experience of existence is the interpretation in faith of all that happens as a modality in the sphere of Christ's life, which therefore trains one in his perfect adoration of God's glory.

---

[15] 921.

[16] 1052f.

The perfect example of someone incorporated into Christ

[17] 968–970.

[18] 916.

[19] 1181.

[20] 940–941. This idea was used impressively by Bernanos. Cf. my book, Bernanos (Hegner, 1954), p. 433 and passim.

and His states is the life of Mary in her unlimited fiat. The Oratorian school unites Jesus and His Mother in the closest possible way (as does St Ignatius, who speaks of 'the mediators'). St John Eudes, with his devotion to the hearts of Jesus and Mary,[21] also depends on Bérulle, for Bérulle, for all his inclination towards integration, never neglects the sensible and historical formation of the interior sentiment; on the contrary, he lovingly emphasises it.[22] The fundamental mystery for him is abasement (abaissement), which he contemplates above all in the infancy of Jesus (this devotion too and the 'spirit of infancy' are revived and promoted by the Oratory), and more precisely still in the act of the Incarnation itself, when the Word sinks into the womb of the Virgin. Bérulle's work, entirely directed towards transcendence in the sense of the Christological act of adoration, delineates in clear, vertical style the foundation of Christian metaphysics, though not without neglect of the ethics of love of neighbour.[23]

CHARLES DE CONDREN, the second General of the Oratory, had, at the age of twelve, a totally Old Testament kind of experience of God, which radically and decisively affected his life and thought.[24] While at work, he suddenly found himself surrounded by a luminous splendour, in which 'the divine Majesty appeared to him so immense and so infinite that it seemed that nothing but this pure Being could subsist, and that the whole universe must be destroyed to His glory. He saw that God had no need of any creature, that even His own Son, on whom His entire good pleasure rests, had to offer Him His life; that only the disposition of offering, of oneself and of all things, with Jesus the Victim, was worthy of His grandeur; and that it was not enough to love Him, if you were not willing to annihilate yourself, with His Son, for love of Him. This light was so pure and so powerful that it made an impression of death upon him, which was never effaced. He gave himself with all his heart to God, in order to be reduced to nothing in His honour and to live for ever in that disposition. At that moment he knew that the whole world was to go up in flames for the sins of men, to which the divine purity, holiness and justice had an extreme aversion, and that God looks with joy only on Christ and His Spirit . . . And the force of this divine light had such a powerful effect on him that he would have desired to be immolated, that very hour, in the presence of the glory that filled his spirit . . . He felt a special joy when he saw that the Son of God was always His Father's Victim . . . He realised that the sacrifice of Jesus Christ was the fulfilment of the zeal of all those who wanted to be sacrificed themselves but knew they were incapable of honouring God worthily by their sacrifice.'[25]

---

[21] Bremond, vol. III, pp. 629–671.

[22] Texts in Bremond, vol. III, pp. 57–59.

[23] Ibid., pp. 511–582. This meditation represents the largest part of the Cardinal's unfinished major work, Discours de l'Etat et des Grandeurs de Jésus.

[24] Detailed biography and doctrinal exposition by Denis Amelote (1643). Among his own works the following stand out: L'Idée du Sacerdoce et du Sacrifice de Jésus-Christ (edited by Quesnel, 1677), and Lettres (first edition 1642, later enlarged, quoted here from the fourth edition of 1644). See also Bremond (III, pp. 283–418); and Molien in Dict. Spir. II, 1373–1388.

Once again the root of this experience is a radical, Eckhartian analogia entis. Though saturated by an Old Testament image of God's kabod as a consuming fire, it is of philosophical origin. God, in His being all, is so inexpressibly glorious that beside Him everything else not only is as nothing but, truly speaking, wants to be as nothing. 'God's rights oblige us to accept that God is more in us than we ourselves are . . . and to perform for Him not only the duties of a slave'—obedience to His will and law—'but the duties of a creature, namely, adoration and the sacrifice of ourselves.'[26] As creatures we owe God not just individual actions but our very being. The central idea of sacrifice has an ontological foundation; it is not primarily soteriological. Condren refers back to sacrifices in classical antiquity (such as that of Iphigenia), to the Old Testament sacrifices; he could have [25] Amelote I, 41f. Bremond observes correctly that the biographer has projected into this experience of Condren's childhood the whole of his later theology.

[26] Letter 25, p. 117.

quoted Philo and (even more so) Origen.[27] Franz von Baader will develop his ideas.[28] In sacrifice he sees the will to represent the truth (that God is all), but, of course, only in so far as the action comes from the creature: being assumed and transformed by God into God is something the creature no longer has the power to represent. Man can throw himself, for better or worse, into God's consuming fire; how the sacrifice is consumed is the affair of God alone.

But in Christ we can see what God does with the victim wholly consumed. 'Of Him, the perfect holocaust, nothing remained that had not been consumed (consommé) in the glowing furnace of the Godhead'. This annihilation (exinanitio) was, however, His surrender to the Father; His intention was to be 'consumed (or completed, consummated, consommé) into us, that is to say, to be all in us'.[29] Here Condren's idea of transcendence becomes clear: the total 'liquidation' of the sacrificed Christ in us is the presupposition of our own 'liquefaction' or annihilation into Him, but because Christ is God, His own burning up is also the creaturely mode of the divine incandescence itself. This is how God 'consumes/fulfils (consommant) His creatures into Himself, without being anything other than Himself'.[30] So what is consumed/fulfilled in us is the Christ who lives in us. Our effort must be to allow Him to live in us as much as possible, to hand ourselves over to Him, 'to the One who raises the dead to live in His divine power'.[31] From our point of view, this passing over is death, so it is not something we can become conscious of 'through any interior experience';[32] no, it is the entry into 'divine, incomprehensible life', to which pure faith alone is the appropriate response. It is the adhaerere Deo of the Psalmist, Augustine and John of the Cross, which voluntarily renounces any kind of comfortably reassuring comprehension.

[27] Cf. my anthology, Geist und Feuer, second edition 1951, texts 814–825.

[28] In Vorlesungen über eine künftige Theorie des Opfers (1836), Fermenta Cognitionis (1825), Vierzig Sätze aus einer religiösen Erotik (1831).

[29] Considérations sur les mystères de Jésus-Christ (1882), p. 74f.

[30] Letter 21, p. 108.

[31] Letter 30, pp. 139–140.

[32] Letter 32, p. 235.

FÉNELON. After such radicalism we find it strange and certainly unexpected that the very words of Fénelon about 'pure love' (amour pur) scandalised Bossuet so much that he set in motion an ecclesiastical condemnation. The radicalism of the analogy formulas quoted above is not very far behind Eckhart at his strongest: for Bérulle, the creature had to become 'pure relation' to God or to relate to Christ in a way analogous to the relation of His anhypostatic human nature to His divine person. Condren's annihilation-formulas in a way went even further than that by comparing sacrificed man to the accidents of bread and wine in the Eucharist: 'So Christ must be our substance too.' This identification of God with being, inherited from the medieval German mystics via Benedict Canfeld, as an influence on the Oratorians Olier, Gibieuf and Bourgoing, on Renty and Bernières, and later on Madame Guyon,[33] through whom it reaches Fénelon. If one surveys the path taken by the 'Metaphysics of the Saints' since the late Middle Ages, one is struck by the fact that, though it was always primarily a theology of contemplation for contemplatives, at the same time it clearly perceived in its beginnings the active, soteriological and apostolic efficacy of the attitude of abandonment to God. For Eckhart and his disciples the 'essential work', the birth of God, was the origin and form of all external works that have as their goal the diffusion of Christian life on earth; the most perfect example of this quality is to be seen in Catherine of Siena. Ignatius strove to achieve a balance between contemplation and action, indeed, so far as was possible, the integration of the two: the Christian should be in actione contemplativus by dying to all earthly love and then 'loving the Creator in all His creatures and all them in Him'.[34] The French, though, seem so preoccupied with their personal encounter with God that Catholic openness to the world recedes into the background, or remains alongside contemplation as an isolated external factor.

[33] L. Cognet, Crépuscule des mystiques (1958) and 'La spiritualité de Mme Guyon', Revue XVII siècle, special number (11–14) devoted to Fénelon. Fénelon's works are quoted from the Paris edition of 1852 (10 volumes).

[34] Constitutiones, pars 3, c. 1, n. 26.

Thus, for Fénelon, who had, of course, studied in detail the poetry and philosophy of classical antiquity,[35] indifférence acquires certain autonomous and therefore pre-Christian and aestheticising features. When he and Mme Guyon refer, with all their historical knowledge, to the universal Christian tradition of apatheia/abandonment/indifference,[36] they see in it a kind of 'secret tradition' of true perfection.[37] For the majority of Christians, with their more modest pretensions, ordinary Church doctrine is sufficient; indeed, it would be imprudent to try to lead the imperfect by force any higher.[38] Fénelon's fundamental vision, concealed behind this doctrine of apatheia, is the necessary overcoming of Eros by Agape. Eros is the creature's love of God, in so far as the creature is a 'nature', which necessarily strives for its perfection. Eros is not egotistical in the sinful sense (though original sin tragically puts its seal on love's fall into egocentrism and for man makes that fall definitive), and yet, considered simply as a function of created nature, it is incapable of loving God purely for His own sake. Nevertheless, Fénelon demands that 'pure love' at all costs, the love that gives God absolute preponderance over the loving 'I'. This preponderance is not based primarily on the supernatural grace of Christian Agape, but (as with the Oratorians, but with St Thomas Aquinas as well)[39] is ontological. It is the act of man, not in so far as he is a nature, but in so far as he is spirit. For as spirit man is open to the analogia entis; as spirit he is capable of realising God's absolute preponderance over the creature and thus the absolute necessity of His being preferred above all things. As spirit-love the act of love is a clear choice: it chooses the beloved without second thoughts or secret self-concern.

---

[35] The following were written for the Dauphin: the pedagogical Homeric novel, Aventures de Télémaque; the translation of part of the Odyssey (Books 5–10, and a summary of the other books); a 'Sketch of the Lives of the Ancient Philosophers with an Anthology of their Most Beautiful Sayings' (from the pre-Socratics to the Stoics), the amazing Dialogue des Morts, with characters both from the Iliad and from history from the Romans to modern times; a book of Fables.

[36] At the end of the three volumes of Madame Guyon's Justifications (Cologne, 1720) there is a 'Collection of Some Quotations from the Greek Fathers', the authors quoted covering the whole of Christian tradition. Cf. on this: Jeanne-Lydié Goré, La notion d'indifférence chez Fénelon et ses sources (Presses Universitaires de France, 1956), p. 75f. Fénelon was, typically enough, dependent on Clement of Alexandria and wrote a book about him (Le Gnostique de S. Clément d'Alexandrie: opuscule inédit de Fénelon. Publié avec une introduction par le R. P. Dudon SJ, Paris, Beauchesne, 1930). In fact, Clement was the first person to try to explain the transcendental dimension of Christian agape in terms of the ancient concept of apatheia. Cf. Theodor Rüther, Die sittlichen Forderungen der Apatheia in den beiden ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten und bei Klemens von Alexandrien (Herder, 1949).

[37] Dudon, 125f.

[38] Instructions sur la morale et la perfection chrétienne 20 (VI, 117a).

Now, since God as beloved is Himself absolute love and 'the glory of God', He can act only for Himself and His glory. He is necessarily jealous of this immediate glory; indeed, as He Himself says (Is. 42.8), He can give it to no one. On the other hand, the lowliness and dependence of the creature is such that—unless it wants to make itself an idol and infringe the inviolable law of creation—it can do nothing, say nothing, want nothing for itself and its own glorification.' As the absolute, however, God is not 'Something Else' outside and alongside us. If we really love, we do so only in virtue of His absolute love in us: 'You yourself love yourself in me ... you are more present to me than I am to myself. This "I", on which I lavish so much care and attention, ought to be a stranger to me when compared with you. You have given it to me, without you it would be nothing, so it is your will that I love you more than it.'[40] Since God created all things for His own glory, 'to attain the essential goal of our creatureliness, we must prefer God to ourselves and strive for our happiness only for the sake of His glory, otherwise we would be turning his order upside down'. 'To the objection that God has given us a natural inclination to the happiness that He Himself is, perhaps we can say that He did so because He wanted our union with Him to be realised with greater ease . . . the motive of our own beatitude is not forbidden, but it has to take second place to that other motive: we must want God's glory more than our own happiness.' 'We would have to love Him just as much, even if (we are supposing the impossible!) He did not want to be in us as our beatitude', even if—and this really is something God could do[41]—'He annihilated our soul at the moment of death.' 'If one accepts these presuppositions as real possibilities, there is no longer any promise for me, no reward, no happiness, no hope for the life to come . . . but could I therefore exempt myself in this ultimate moment from the love of God?' What is more, if God were compelled to promise me eternal life, in other words, Himself, without fail, on the grounds that I am His creature, then he would be dependent on His creature, 'He could no longer exist without it, it would become a necessary being.'[42] [39] On this see Pierre Rousselot's detailed work, Pour l'histoire du problème de l'amour au moyen-âge. BGPhMA VI, 6 (1908). But Rousselot shows clearly how St Thomas unites the two forms of love, the natural and the spiritual aspect, inseparably, whereas Fénelon unhappily and abstractly tears them apart.

---

[40] Instructions etc. 18 (VI, 101a, 101b–102a).

So, then, an absolute love of God even without any promise of eternal life. Are we coming close here to the heroic love of the Old Testament, where eternal fidelity to God is sworn ad tempus, in the clear knowledge that 'in the underworld no one praises Him any more'? Or are we to see in this Old Testament fidelity the coming into play of a paradoxical Messianic hope, incomprehensible to the Old Testament itself? If we do, then perhaps we are coming close to the amor intellectualis of the Jew Spinoza, for whom this hope no longer exists. And does this not lead logically to Hegel, according to whom there is likewise no hope of eternity for the individual spirit, which is just one passing moment in the infinite ascendancy of Absolute Spirit? It is then a short step to materialism. Mysticism and atheism in a strange way look one another in the eye,[43] for common to both is disdain for human finitude in the interests of an all-embracing Whole in which the little 'I' disappears.

---

[41] A supposition which St Thomas Aquinas could never have made, presupposing as it does post-Thomist voluntarism. Once created immortal by God, the soul has immortality because of its nature and thus as the presupposition of all its spiritual acts in itself. God cannot, therefore, annihilate it without contradicting himself.

[42] Instructions 19 (VI, 109ab; 11b–112b).

[43] Cf. Karl Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik I/2 (1939), 344–356.

Fénelon is an impatient educator; monotonously he demands 'emptying, annihilation of my own limited being' in order to enter God's infinitude,[44] 'external mortification . . . for then God takes it upon himself to take hold of the ground of the soul . . . and he does all that is necessary to detach man from himself, and though the coat is costlier than the shirt, you feel the loss of the shirt more than the loss of the coat. In the end all that is left is bitterness, nakedness, shame.' 'You realise you depend on something, only when it is taken away from you.'[45] One would like to be spiritual, great in virtue, but that means 'letting oneself become small' (se laisser apetisser).[46] Everything must serve the loss of self, which must not be content with resignation, but must press on to real self-abandonment (abandon). 'It is sufficient, when suffering, to be little and abandoned (abandonné). That does not mean courage, but something less and more: less in the mediocre eyes of virtuous people, more in the eyes of pure faith. It is a littleness in itself which transfers the soul into all the greatness of God.'[47] The philosophy of abandonment has its deep roots in Christ abandoned on the cross. For us this means: 'The night of pure faith, in which everything is agony . . . Not only does God hide Himself from us, He also hides us from ourselves.'[48]

And yet Fénelon's doctrine lacks a Christological emphasis; instead it remains spiritually idiosyncratic with its abstract idea of indifference; abstract, because it comes from a dissociation of nature and spirit. It is a mysticism in the state of scholasticism and thus, as in the case of Francis de Sales, in constant danger, through sheer 'theopanism', of turning into a pantheist univocalism. The state becomes more important than the object, for if someone really does want to rise above hope, must he not also get beyond 'I and Thou'? Once again

[44] Manuel de Piété (VI, 54a).

[45] Instructions etc. 22 (VI, 121b).

[46] Ibid. (VI, 124b). Cf. Correspondance (VII, 266a): 'Laissez-vous donc apetisser par vos propres défauts . . . Le grand point est de vous mettre de plein-pied avec tous les petits les plus imparfaits.'

[47] Instructions 37 (VI, 151b).

[48] Correspondance (VII, 263a).

speculative idealism seems to have been anticipated by a pious idealism. Once again everything is to be worked out in terms of the glory of God, with direct reference to the total gratuitousness of God's love, the centre of an 'aesthetic theology'. And yet in Fénelon's work the glory of God fails to shine as it should: the search for selflessness is far too self-concerned.

True, Fénelon's tedious trial and final condemnation are muddied by an odious political background and by the conflict of personal ambitions.[49] True, it is not difficult to vindicate Fénelon[50] and to promote him to be a patron of the authentic spirituality of our century. Nevertheless, he brings something to a close, and the sentence against him—the last in a series of condemnations beginning in Spain against the Alumbrados, continuing in France against the 'mystical Jesuits' (B. Alvarez, Lallemant, Surin), the verdicts against Port-Royal and the beginnings of the Enlightenment coming out later—historically speaking represents an abrupt termination.

The 'Metaphysics of the Saints' was a procession of widely differing figures, presenting at every stage a penetrating insight into essential truths, but leaving out, in the historical period covered here, other attributes that must be taken into account if a complete theology of glory is to be achieved. The theopanist aspect from Eckhart to Fénelon offers an open flank to Idealist speculation. All in all, only Ignatius of Loyola had the balance right. And so it is one of his sons who gives us a final synthesis to draw this period to a close.

CAUSSADE. Forty years after Fénelon's condemnation, in the middle of the Enlightenment, in a commentary on Bossuet's treatise on prayer 'against the false mystics of our time', Caussade[51] succeeded in expounding, in intact form, the heart of Fénelon's doctrine. What is more, he summed up the entire 'Metaphysics of the Saints', from the Rhineland mystics to St John of the Cross and the French School, in a unity of persuasive simplicity.

---

[49] R. Schmittlein, L'aspect politique du différend Bossuet-Fénelon (Baden, 1954).

[50] Henri Bremond's Apologie pour Fénelon (1910), later frequently endorsed, for example, in the fine book by François Varillon SJ, Fénelon (Aubier, 1954).

[51] On Caussade, see Dict. Spir. II, 354–370. Works: Instructions spirituelles . . . suivant la doctrine de M. Bossuet (1714), new edition with an introduction

Once again the main idea is indifference[52] or abandonment (abandon), understood as love—'L'art de l'abandon n'est que celui d'aimer',[53] and thus as unconditional self-surrender, being at God's disposal in transcendent openness to His provident will.[54] In every situation of life abandonment is a unique, sustained act, passive and universal in relation to God, to be terminated in every case by Him in active and finite conduct and behaviour.[55] The all-important thing is the 'inner work' (Tauler) of absolute openness, like the fiat of the Mother of God, and proves itself in the act of obedience. This fiat sums up 'the entire tradition of Old Testament spiritual theology'.[56] It means 'receiving everything and letting God act'.[57] The fiat is the pure, naked, undefiled faith which does not want to decide for itself and so does not want to know anything; it is thus 'faith in darkness'.[58] Or rather: this total faith (John of the Cross) is the indissoluble unity of faith, hope and love, which are together 'just one single by H. Bremond (1931). P. Ramière composed the central work out of Caussade's letters: L'Abandon à la Providence divine (1861). The 5th edition (1867) includes numerous letters to the Convent of the Visitation in Nancy. We shall quote from the 20th edition (Gabalda, 1928) and use its page numbers. 'II' refers to the second volume. [Tr.—Kitty Muggeridge has published an English translation of Father Olphe-Galliard's 1966 reconstitution of the original text under the title The Sacrament of the Present Moment (London, 1981).]

---

[52] 72.

[53] 134.

[54] L'être propre étant livré au bon plaisir de Dieu, ce transport fait par le pur amour s'étend à toute l'étendue des opérations de ce bon plaisir (64–65).

[55] Un même acte universel et général, [qui] n'est point du tout limité par le terme ou par l'ordre spécial. The termination of the act is then no longer humanly limited, but derives from the will of God, 'who terminates Himself in it' (65). Accomplissement actif de la volonté divine . . . et acceptation passive de tout (79).

[56] 2.

[57] 49.

[58] 114.

virtue', though in an infinite variety of possible gradations, all making up the personal richness of Christian life.[59] 'One can just as well call it pure love (pur amour) as pure hope, pure faith', since 'the darkness and the shadows of the night are totally pure'. The Christian rests in this holistic act: God's 'mercy leaves me, instead of certainty, pure hope, which in value immeasurably outweighs certainty, without depriving me of the merit of my surrender . . . And on what is this firm hope founded? On the treasures of the infinite mercy and infinite merits of Jesus Christ.'[60]

By understanding the act of faith universally and transcendentally, Caussade rediscovered not only the content but also the act of Biblical revelation. He saw the importance of the (Kierkegaardian) category of the 'moment' (le moment présent, which contains the 'one thing needful'),[61] and thought of this as the Holy Spirit's exposition of the Word of God in our hearts, an exposition which always takes place in the here and now, indeed, as the continuation of the one revelation in Christ through all the ages: 'The Holy Spirit holds His pen in His hand, and holds His book open before Him, in order to continue the history of salvation, which is still not closed, and the content of which will be exhausted only at the end of the world.'[62] All the mediation of the Church comes in only at a secondary level: 'God still speaks today, as He spoke to our fathers, where there were no spiritual directors or methods. it is fidelity to God's order which constitutes the whole of spirituality.'[63] 'The beautiful book of the Holy Spirit is currently being written, is just being printed.'[64] With all the passion of the Devotio Moderna, Caussade warns against the decadence of a compartmentalising theology and invites his readers to follow God, as Abraham did, as Israel did, without knowing where the journey will end. 'If you have neither map nor path, neither wind nor tide, you are bound to have a successful journey'.[65] 'Let us abandon ourselves to God without thought of the vain and futile systems of sanctity.'[66] 'March off in the direction you are sent, and without knowing the map, walk blindly on.'[67] 'The doctrine of pure love can only be experienced through God's action, and through the effort of reason.'[68] 'Come, I want to teach you a mystery, to outwit all these clever minds . . . Come, not to know the map of the land of spirituality, but to possess that land.'[69] Lucifer was an enlightened and beautiful spirit (le plus éclairé de tous les beaux esprits), 'but dissatisfied with God and with His order'.[70] [59] 59–62.

---

[60] II, 263.

[61] 43–44, 88ff.

[62] 133.

[63] 1.

[64] 35.

If man, abandoned man, sets sail 'on the vast ocean of the will of God',[71] and if he accepts from Him, at every moment, the bounds[72] and the order[73] established by Him, he must, if he is to attain these standards, lose all standards of his own. 'Tear, like threads, all the soul's notions, all the soul's standards! You must lose the very ground on which you stand.'[74] The ability to do what at any given time is 'the best', to do God's will in the present moment,[75] is an unmysterious mystery, an artless art'.[76] For it is not the art of man, but of the Holy Spirit, who inspires him. A good musician, even in half-unconscious improvisation, plays everything according to the laws of his art, 'which cramp the spirit when followed too conscientiously.' So the person trained in surrender is no longer able to preface his action with cautious deliberations: 'All he can do is act at random (à l'aventure), since only then is he able to give himself up to the genius of grace, with whose guidance nothing fails.'[77] But it is precisely this initiation into the total docility of naked faith which demands (as John of the Cross showed) that God hide Himself: He dresses up in strange masks (déguisé),[78] appears (as Kierkegaard says) incognito. 'The life of faith is nothing other than an unceasing pursuit of God through all that disguises Him, disfigures and, as it were, destroys and annihilates Him'.[79] Then God no longer stands before the soul, but 'behind it and propels it in front of himself: since he is no longer the clearly-perceived object of its perception, he is the invisible ground of its activity.'[80] Thus Joseph 'deceived' Benjamin and 'allowed him to weep';[81] thus God plays a game of 'tricks' and 'impostures' (tromperies), and the soul glides 'dreamlike' through the veils.[82] A dream full of 'anxiety, despair, fear',[83] because the 'infallible means of darkness' demands it.[84] The soul really must learn to do without support both in and outside itself, to be 'sheer weakness'[85] precisely in the endurance of suffering,[86] to consider itself completely useless, humiliated[87] like a 'shattered jug, no longer of use to anyone',[88] to 'hold itself in such low esteem that it disappears before its own eyes'.[89] In short, 'the soul is as light as a feather, as fluid as water, as simple as a child, as mobile as a globe, in order to receive and obey every movement of grace.'[90] For 'God wants to dwell in us in a poor way (pauvrement) and without all the accessories of sanctity (accessoires de sainteté) which make souls a cause of wonder'.[91]

---

[65] 69.
[66] 104–105.
[67] 90.
[68] 77.
[69] 51.
[70] 139.
[71] 29.
[72] 65.
[73] 78.
[74] 111.
[75] 85.
[76] 93.
[77] 124.

[78] 25, 123.

[79] 27.

[80] 120.

[81] 120.

[82] 119–120.

[83] 117.

[84] 114.

[85] 105.

[86] Qu'il est avantageux de souffrir faiblement . . . plutôt que grandement, fortement et courageusement! (II, 264).

[87] 105f.

[88] 56.

[89] 158.

[90] 88. On being a child (56).

[91] 104.

In this night of faith, whenever God's will meets the readiness of the soul, at that moment the act of revelation, the act of nuptial union, the act of communion, can take place: 'O festin, ô fête perpétuelle! Un Dieu toujours donné et toujours reçu, dans tous ce qu'il y a sur la terre d'infirmité, de folie, de néant!'[92] This is the 'communion de tous les instants'[93] and the adoration through all things and situations of life. 'For things proceed from God's mouth like words. At each moment what God does is a divine idea, signified (signifiée)[94] by a created thing.' Everything is consequently a 'sacrament'.[95] God's 'water surrounds me. Everything becomes bread to feed me, soap to wash me, fire to purify me, a chisel to sculpt in me heaven's outlinc'.[96] 'Everything is God's hand. Everything is divine earth, air, waters. His action is more extensive, more present than the elements of the world. He penetrates you through all your senses, provided you use them in accordance with God's commandments . . . All bodily states under His influence become effective mediations of grace.'[97] 'Everything is full of meaning, everything makes perfect sense. This line ends here, because it has to; no comma is too much, no full stop redundant.'[98]

What a strange aesthetics in the midst of the night of faith! It is like the back of a piece of embroidery, where only tangled threads can be seen, and yet everything is done, 'stitch by stitch', for the sake of the perfect sample, which will only be turned round and become visible in eternity.[99] Occasionally, as if by chance (when God wills it), rays break forth from this invisible beauty, revealing accidentally the hidden substantial glory: 'Everything extraordinary that we perceive in the saints—visions, revelations, interior locutions—is but a reflection of the sublimity of their state, which is guarded and concealed in the exercise of faith. For faith guards everything in itself, since it knows how to see and hear God in everything that occurs from moment to moment. When this is perceptibly and externally revealed, nothing is happening that faith does not already contain within itself; only the grandeur needs to be made visible and the soul stirred to exercise. Thus the glory of Tabor and the miracles of Christ were, not an increase of His grandeur, but lightning flashing out from time to time from the dark cloud of His humanity in order to make it venerable and lovable for others.'[100] So God makes His grace visible in some of His saints for the salvation of many. 'But there is a multitude of other saints in the Church who remain hidden; destined to shine only in heaven, they spread no sort of light in this life, but live and die in deep darkness'.[101]

---

[92] 40.
[93] Ibid.
[94] 44.
[95] 46.
[96] 49.
[97] 50.
[98] 36.
[99] 37, 122.

Now this darkness is at the same time the light of the Word of God. 'God speaks. He speaks a mystery, so it is a death for my senses and for my reason, for it is proper to mysteries to sacrifice senses and reason. The mystery is life for the heart by means of faith; for the rest, only contradiction reigns. The divine action kills and quickens at the same time, and the more deeply aware you are of death, the more you believe that there is life; the darker the mystery, the more light it contains.'[102] Faith is the way to God; it always has been: 'Faith is the spirituality which sanctified the patriarchs and prophets, long before people made so much fuss about it (avant qu'on y eut mis tant de façons) and long before there were so many experts in it.'[103] Faith still sanctifies today, but 'not through studying books . . . for what instructs is what happens from moment to moment: it educates us in the science of experience, which even Christ wanted to acquire before He began to teach'.[104] This experience of faith is the real presence of revelation, for the work of the Holy Spirit is [100] 63.

[101] 64.
[102] 38–39.
[103] 8.
[104] 41.

'an inexhaustible source of ever new insights, new sufferings, new actions, new patriarchs, new prophets, new apostles, new saints, who do not need to copy the life or writings of their predecessors, but merely to persevere in constant surrender to your work'.[105] Caussade regards it as self-evident that this surrender should demand Fénelon's amour pur: 'Were we to love God a little for the sake of His gifts, He would be loved for His own sake when the gift was no longer noticed.'[106] And 'if the divine goodness does not require us to despise the happiness for which we are destined, it surely has the right to be loved for its own sake without any regard of our own interests'.[107] That is well said and corresponds to the metaphysics of the saints in every century.

One can see how Caussade, protected by the sound doctrine of his order's founder, avoids the snares of Quietism—indeed, he explicitly attacks it.[108] He does not express total surrender with the kind of ontological concepts that deny or paralyse the proper activity of the creature, and yet he does not abandon the radicalism of the tradition discussed in this chapter; he just reconnects it more closely with Biblical revelation. In this form Christian transcendentalism is unsurpassable and the proper partner in dialogue with every form of Asiatic or Sufi mysticism (Al Hallaj). Caussade clearly saw that every attempt to give created reason more than the surrender of the perfect fiat (more in the sense of a speculative or mystical idealism) would in reality deprive it of its noblest act and clearly turn it into something less.

Nevertheless, this Christian transcendentalism from Eckhart to Caussade cannot yet be proposed as the definitive form of Christian 'metaphysics' (there can be no such thing). However precise his comprehension of Christian transcendence as such, he remains within it—it is after all a spirituality predominantly of contemplatives—and does not exhaust the complementary act of conversio ad phantasma, of the Ignatian hallar Dios en todas las cosas. To reflect on this act without [105] 42.

[106] 121.
[107] 176.
[108] 85.

throwing away the results of transcendental spirituality is reserved to our own times. Just as Eckhart said you should give up contemplation in order to take broth to a sick man,[109] so Caussade demands: abandonner cet abandon même.[110]

---

[109] Discourses of Instruction 10.

[110] II, 157.

3. FOLLY AND GLORY

a. Holy Fools

The classical art of antiquity took its canon of beauty for the human figure from the gods; our study began with this derivation of beauty from glory. What image of man should be canonical for Christian or post-Christian art, when the 'Metaphysics of the Saints' just described, intentionally or unintentionally, gains validity? This question must at least be posed, even though we cannot be expected to provide a detailed, art-historical answer to it. Poetic art offers the best outline of an answer. Antiquity's influence on architecture and music was much more neutral and inconspicuous; painting may well have been dominated by the cultic icon in its abstract and heavenly dignity: but literature is meant to reveal what the living man of flesh and blood is and the standard by which he is measured. There is a constantly recurring attempt to reassert antiquity's canon with or without its gods (or with its gods reduced to ideals), and there is a typically Germanic version of this: the man of chivalry's ideal of mâze (measure), of relative originality and susceptible of stylisation in a Christian direction as well as in a classical pagan one. And yet, astonishingly, very little by way of an image of the living human being has come down to us intact from this late classical and classicist art. Only the original myths themselves are intact—Antigone, Oedipus, Alcestis, stimulating new emulation in every generation. In addition, there is the small contribution of the Germanic myths—the achievement of Hebbel and Wagner in their Nibelungen, and possibly also Roland, Gudrun and others.

For a long time, in countless Latin and vernacular legends, the saints were the canonical image of man, but the heart of sanctity, abandonment in transcendence to the open will of God, cannot be put into epic or dramatic form; only the indirect, accidental effects—miracles, heroic achievements, strange behaviour—offered narrative material capable of gripping a reader. But the saint as hero was a mistaken interpretation, and the more clearly this was seen—the history of this kind of discernment lasts well into the last century, perhaps into our own—the more sharply were the genres distinguished.

But if the saint disappeared into intangibility (though no less dear to pious hearts), how was living art to measure man? The simple adventure story—from the Alexander novel to Amadis—is indeed entertaining, but does not answer the metaphysical question about the nature of man. And in the Christian world all the lustre of mighty deeds was always outshone by the unsurpassable deed of the Redeemer's Passion. The saints stood beside the emperors, restraining, guiding, directing: Athanasius beside Constantine, Ambrose beside Theodosius, Maximus beside Heraclius, Benedict face to face with Totila. The great encounters of worldly power and sanctity in medieval and modern times have been described by Reinhold Schneider:[1] dramatic situations exposing the rift between earth and heaven, a rift which in a Christian context deepens still further the rift between ethos and power (Plato and Dionysius of Syracuse, Aristotle and Alexander, Seneca and Nero). But a rift is still not a figure.

However, when literature from the Middle Ages to the present day is examined straightforwardly in terms of what has an immediate affinity with us, what concerns us, touches us, moves us, then one figure does stand out. In the world of chivalry it is Parzival, in the age of humanism it is The Praise of Folly, in the Baroque it is Don Quixote and Simplicissimus. And once this gallery of representative fools and buffoons has come to our attention, it is joined by an immense band of dubious characters from the wandering clerks and François

---

[1] Cf. my book, Reinhold Schneider (Hegner, 1953). Among others, the following pairs are considered: Anselm and William the Conqueror, Louis XI and Francis of Paola, Francis of Assisi and Innocent III, Celestine V and Boniface VIII, Charles V and Las Casas, Henry VIII and Thomas More, Pius VII and Bonaparte, etc.

Systematically: Macht und Gnade (1940), Weltreich und Gottesreich (1946), Macht und Gewissen in Shakespeares Tragödien (1947), Herrscher und Heilige (1953), and numerous other writings.

Villon through Brant's Ship of Fools to Quevedo and Goya, but also from Shakespeare's comic and tragic fools (Hamlet, Lear with Edmund) to Kapellmeister Kreisler and Dostoievsky's Idiot and to Rouault, to Hofmannsthal, Chesterton and Unamuno. What is the meaning of this ostinato?

The classical hero without his gods may still be 'beautiful', but he is no longer glorious and soon seems boring. But there is a gleam of unconscious, unintended sanctity about the real fool. He is the unprotected man, essentially transcendent, open to what is above him. In the post-Christian era 'classical man' in his beauty is always somewhat melancholy. The real fool never is. Since he is never quite 'in his right mind', never quite 'all there', he lacks the ponderousness that would tie him down to earth. He stands nearest to the saint, often nearer than the morally successful man preoccupied with his perfection. The Russians knew that the fool belongs to God, has his own guardian angel, and is worthy of veneration. And yet the fool is not the saint. He is not in any danger from purism or exclusiveness, which, especially during the final days of the 'Metaphysics of the Saints', separated candidates for sanctity from the existence of ordinary mortals. Thus even the pure fool, Parzival, is convicted of being a great sinner, Simplicius is self-evidently one, and Don Quixote never sees himself for a moment as anything else.

There is also a transition. The saints follow in the footsteps of Jesus, who was despised, abused, thought to be mad (Mk 3.21) and possessed (Mt 12.24; Jn 7.20; 8.48) and yearn, for the sake of Jesus, to be regarded as fools. In their abandonment to God's every command, the finger of their yearning points in this direction, and they know that, as the imitation of Christ, it could be pleasing to God. They may not strive after it, but they rejoice when the grace is given to them. The extreme gestures which they have to perform, such as when the Poverello strips himself naked, can be interpreted this way. 'The madman, il pazzo', children called after him. At the Portiuncula chapter, in the presence of the Cardinal of Ostia, he informed the friars that the Lord had told him he was to be 'a fool in this world', and that Christ wanted to lead them along no other path than that of this wisdom. Angela of Foligno shrieking outrageously at the church door, is regarded as insane although she does not will this; and many others shared the same fate. But it is not just a matter of the saints doing what is in human terms abnormal, and which leads to their being decried as foolish. In the self-surrender of the saints there are transcendental possibilities which they do not foresee. Some saints, who like Paul offer themselves to be accursed by God in place of their brethren (Rom 9.3), are plunged into the depths—not only of abandonment by God, but also of explicit experiences of Hell, even to the point of being handed over for a time to demons, whether in the form of physical torment or as a deep spiritual experience of what the anti-divine spirit is. These experiences lie in the realm of Christological (soteriological) a priori of Christian transcendence. As an example it is sufficient to mention the tribulations of Blessed Christine von Stommeln.[2] St Ignatius Loyola's words can count as definitively valid. In the first contemplation of the life of Jesus he at once emphasises that we must imitate the Lord 'in putting up with all injustice, all abuse, all poverty',[3] and at the climax of his introduction to the making of a truly indifferent choice of a state of life, he demands 'the most perfect subjection'. This consists in desiring 'to be poor along with Christ in poverty rather than rich, to be insulted along with Christ who was so grossly insulted, rather than to be well thought of: I would rather be thought a helpless fool for the sake of Christ who was so treated, rather than to be thought wise and clever in the world's eyes'.[4] Novices are to be examined to see whether they 'accept and desire with all possible energy whatever Christ Our Lord has loved and embraced. Just as the men of the world who follow the world love and seek with such great diligence honours, fame, and esteem for a great name on earth, as the world teaches them, so those who are progressing in the spiritual life and truly following Christ Our Lord love and intensely desire everything opposite. That is to say, they desire to clothe themselves with the same clothing and uniform of their Lord because of the love and reverence which He deserves, to such an extent that where there would be no offence to His Divine Majesty and no imputation of sin to the neighbour, they would wish to suffer injuries, false accusations and affronts, and to be held and esteemed as fools (but without their giving any occasion for this)'.[5] This final clause has not held true of all Christ's disciples, as will be shown, and yet it seems necessary to add it if the call to folly is to be accepted with complete indifference and not rashly anticipated.

---

[2] A detailed account can be found in Theod. Wollersheim, Leben der ekstatischen und stigmatisierten Jungfrau Christine von Stommeln (Cologne, 1859); Acta SS Juni IV (1707), 270–454. Many examples, nowadays forgotten, in J. Görres, Christliche Mystik.

[3] The Spiritual Exercises of St Ignatius Loyola. In a New Translation by Thomas Corbishley SJ (London, 1963), n. 98, p. 44.

[4] Ibid., n. 167, p. 59f.

Such naive anticipation is reported of the Byzantine saints.[6] Simeon the Fool makes his way from the world into the monastery, from the monastery into the desert, from the desert into the most extreme form of humiliation, with the intention at the same time of winning souls for Christ: from now on he will 'play the fool for Christ's sake', in the 'loneliest of struggles'. It really is a 'game' for Simeon—as it is for Andrew the Fool as well—and so they live a consistently double life: foolery by day so as to 'expose, by ever new forms of foolish provocation, the folly of the world, everything speaking and acting in a way that goes against the grain of the world';[7] by night an unexpected visitor witnesses the outbreak of glory from behind the carefully guarded mask: 'The fool appears to him in a radiant, regal form, his face shining like the sun . . . the glory of the Lord gushes out of him.'[8] The incognito can be kept up only by annoying behaviour, and only in an utterly indirect way through symbolic gestures (as in the case of the prophets), through miracles, albeit still shrouded in madness, through preaching the Word of God in disjointed parables and scarcely intelligible hints. But under the protection of his folly's freedom, the Christian can approach people unreached by official churchmen or no longer moved by fossilised forms of piety. This form of life is explicitly described as lying beyond apatheia, indeed as a crossing of the frontier of the measure proper to human nature.[9]

---

[5] Examen Generale c. 4, n. 44; St Ignatius Loyola, The Constitutions of the Society of Jesus. Translated with an Introduction and a Commentary by G. E. Gans SJ (St Louis, 1970), p. 107f.

[6] St Symeon the Fool (PG 93. 1669f.) and St Andrew the Fool (PG 111.611f.). On the latter: Sara Murray, A Study of the Life of Andreas the Fool for the Sake of Christ, (Munich, 1910). On both: Ernst Benz, 'Heilige Narrheit' in Kyrios 3 (1938), 1–55. On Symeon: Water Nigg, Der christliche Narr (1956). On the fools' forerunners among the Desert Fathers, see Stephan Hilpisch, 'Die Torheit um Christi willen', Zft f. Asz. u. Myst. 6 (1931), 121–131.

[7] Benz, op. cit., p. 10.

The only true penitent fool in the West,—apart from the Russians, is JACOPONE DA TODI (+ 1303), doctor utriusque iuris and advocate, follower of the Poverello. Having discovered a hairshirt on the body of his dead wife, he decides spontaneously to live henceforth as a fool. His ecstatic leap beyond reason gave birth to his unprecedented poetic inspiration; songs to God's foolish love were given to him of a kind that had never been heard in dialect. He accomplished this before Dante, whose power on occasions he anticipates, and before Eckhart, whose understanding of the 'whylessness' of God he possesses because of his own folly:

Goodness knoweth no why,
Why doth outward fly.
Seek not healing balm,
In thy sickly sinful harm.[10]

The frailty of all that is earthly taken as far as the danse macabre; the glory of the love of God taken as far as the Franciscan embracing of all God's beloved creation; the plunge into the bottomless depths of the divine essence, and then, on the other hand, after his entry into the Franciscan order, the hard earthly struggle to maintain the purity of the order's original spirit taken as far as the horrendous five years of incarceration in the castle of the intensely hated Boniface

---

[8] Ibid., p. 14.

[9] Texts cited in Nigg, pp. 38–41.

[10] Federmann, Lauden des Jacopone da Todi, 57.

VIII, whom he cursed in his songs and whom to the very end Jacopone resisted to his face; the desire to go to hell, when he dies, to take the place of all the damned and suffering: these are the hallmarks of the fool who, like Angela of Foligno, was hurled to the heights of heaven and into the depths of hell. Italian poetry owes its origin to him. Other names can be added: Giovanni Colombini (+ 1367), founder of the Jesuati, John of God, founder of the Hospitallers, and shortly afterwards Philip Neri; men famed for going to the limit and beyond. In fact, Philip Neri was the only saint to sneak into the heart of Goethe. And it was only thanks to his voluntary madness that John of God was able to gain Christian access to the inner world of the mentally ill, being exposed like these to horrific treatment with chains and blows.

b. Gallows-birds and Duellists with Death

The saints fly so high, soaring above even apatheia in their holy folly, that they discourage sinners. It is not surprising that the voice of Archilochus can be heard in the Middle Ages, but the way it sounds in a Christian age is remarkable. The indifference of the holy is an act of all-embracing love. For good or for ill, the indifference of the unholy, in fact of absolutely everyone, exists too: it is death. In the Christian world this death is not quite the same thing it was before. For every human being it is the brutal leveller, the ravager of all things, and yet death itself inescapably confronts one with a mystery: God's death, the death He died out of love. For the sinner expecting judgement this can make death doubly hateful and threatening: but it silently demands his love, for it reminds him of love, of everything in his wasted life that was intact, immaculate: this he will encounter anew. The songs about the fleetingness of life may sound cynical, even blasphemous: the tunes of the wandering scholars are travesties of sacred chants: hymns to Our Lady provide the elements of drinking songs and love songs. Yet behind all this stridency and bitterness, all the defiance and provocative arrogance, can be heard quite unmistakably the humble voice of the Prodigal Son, certain in his knowledge of grace. About the middle of the twelfth century it can be heard in the 'Archpoet'; a hundred years later in poor Rutebeuf, dissolute yet so tenderly devout; in the time of Dante in Cecco Angiolieri in Siena, drunkard author of a sacrilegious psalter; and finally in the most brilliant member of this clan, FRANÇOIS VILLON, baptised in 1431, Bachelor and Master of Arts, felon, recidivist, and jailbird, missing presumed dead at the age of thirty, author of the immortal 'Great Testament' and of a dozen poems, which, with perfect formal control, build up an extreme tension in much the same way as Jacopone does, but precisely from the criminal's point of view. For years in prison this man must have stood facing death. At the end he distributes the possessions left over from his life of mendicancy among his friends and among his enemies, for whom he wavers between bitter hatred and universal forgiveness. To his old mother he bequeaths, as a prayer for her to say, the most beautiful Marian hymn in French literature.[11] Alongside this are the crudest of brothel songs, as crude as they are because Villon is constantly measuring the distance in himself between Heaven and Hell, between baptism and sin:

> We love filth, filth pursues us;
> We flee from honour, it flees from us,
> In this brothel which is our home![12]

But he also writes about his own death, his long hanging on the gallows. From the vantage point of non-existence he surveys the great failure that was his life. He intensifies the contradictions of this situation in a 'Ballade of Contraries', in which he goes far beyond Qoheleth in experiencing and expressing the self-dissolution of finitude:

> I die of thirst beside the fountain,
> Hot as fire and trembling with chattering teeth;
> When in my home country, I am in a far land;
> When beside a fire, I tremble though quite warm;

---

[11] The Works of François Villon. With Texts, Translation, Introduction and Notes. Edited by Geoffrey Atkinson (London, 1930), pp. 126ff.

[12] Ballade de la Grosse Margot, p. 175.

Naked as a worm, I am dressed like a Peer;
I laugh when weeping and wait without hope;
I find comfort in sad despair;
I rejoin and find no pleasure;
I am mighty without strength or power;
Well received, I am rebuffed by everyone.
For me, nothing is sure but an uncertain thing;
Nothing is obscure except what is clear;
I have no doubt in a certainty . . .[13]

In the 'Ballade of Unimportant Matters' is the refrain: 'I know all things except myself'. In the 'Ballade of Untruths' he sets out the complications and paradoxes that make impossible any tranquil knowledge of self and of existence: 'Only the coward is courageous, only the traitor is true'. In the 'Argument Between Villon's Heart and Body' the split runs right down the middle of man: when Heart tells him to remember, Body says he remembers well enough, but does not let it bother him. In the 'Epitaph' Villon addresses his frères humains: he asks them not to be hard of heart towards us (the hanged), but instead to beseech Lord to forgive us all. What is more, they should not despise the gallows-birds for daring to address them as brothers. They were justly condemned, and yet all men lack an accurate view of the good, so, as a precaution, the guilty should be pardoned. Hanging there, they are dried black and hard by the sun, chilled by the rain, tossed about by the wind as it pleases, and remain a strange kind of brotherhood:

Do not, therefore, join our confraternity,
But pray God that He may forgive us all![14]

At the beginning of the Great Testament there is a simple, honest confession of sin, based on what Scripture says about God not wanting the death of the sinner, but rather that he repent and live: 'Although I die in sin, God lives, and His mercy gives me pardon by His grace, if I repent in my conscience.'[15] And then, despite all the bitter complaints and curses:

[13] Des Contraires, p. 213.
[14] Epitaphe, p. 239.
[15] Grand Testament, p. 79.

If, through my death, the public good
Should be in any way advanced,
I should judge myself fit to die as a pernicious man,
So help me God![16]

For the salvation of others he is gladly willing to be hanged. We are all, every single one of us, 'deluded fools', fous abusés, démis du sens, comblés de déraison,[17] for, in oblivion of our birth, we all submit 'out of cowardice to a shameful death' instead of 'taking heart and placing our trust in God.'

One final challenger of death deserves to be mentioned here. He too calls death a fool, an imbecile, though he himself is not to be included among the especially 'unholy'. In 1400 JOHANNES VON TEPL held his vehement debate with death.[18] Death had robbed him of his young wife, loved by him above all things, and thus had confronted him with nothingness. True, Boethius is referred to,[19] Seneca, Aristotle, Plato are mentioned by name. But the situation is completely changed. Although mighty Lord Death approaches the wretched mortal with arguments similar to the ones Philosophy uses on the prisoner in the condemned cell, this is a book, not of 'consolation', but of bitter struggle and disputation. Not without compassionate irony, Death defends only his standpoint. Without him, the world would have been filled up long ago.[20] The 'workings of nature' demand that species constantly change and renew themselves.[21] It is part of being a mortal, finite creature that pain comes out of love,[22] for 'End is Beginning's sister'.[23] So wisdom consists in entrusting oneself to the great law of change: 'Break off, let go . . . he who will not drive past love from his heart must bear present pain all the time. Drive the memory of love from your heart, and you will soon be out of sorrow's reach.'[24] Nature herself advises such detachment: 'Love not too lovingly, sorrow not too sorrily.'[25] Keep your distance from man, he is only frail flesh, 'a latrine, a rotten carcass; a greedy gullet, a whited sepulchre', 'if you could see through to his interior, it would horrify you. Let love flow past, let sorrow flow past, let the Rhine run like any other water . . .'.[26] All that is earthly is mere concupiscence of the flesh: lust; concupiscence of the eyes: avarice; the pride of life: honour. Sheer vanity. 'The earth and all it contains is built on transience.'[27]

---

[16] Ibid., p. 79.

[17] Ballade du Bon Conseil, p. 201.

[18] Der Ackermann aus Böhmen. Edited by A. Hübner in Altdeutsche Quellen, edited by Ulrich Pretzel 1 (1954^2). Cited by chapter numbers, 30.

[19] 29.

[20] 8.

[21] 10.

[22] 12.

[23] 20.

[24] 22.

But man has a countercharge. Death is not pure nature. It is first and foremost a vile and merciless enemy. It cannot destroy true love in its humble glory. It is the most hideous, the most unjust thing in God's creation.[28] It only mocks, it does not comfort; it only robs, does not repay. When asked for honest advice, it advises disloyalty. It annihilates, ill-treats, dishonours noble man, God's dearest creature, and thereby denigrates the Godhead. 'Now I know you are a liar and were not created in Paradise as you maintain.'[29] Man is capable of being faithful, and thus he gives the lie to death. He proves the contradiction: Death had said he would survive all mortal life, but once all life is dead, what can it mean to die? In the final analysis death is just a way of life; life is not a way of death. Life is eternal, death cannot be.[30] Man appeals against death to God.[31] And God as judge of both resolves the controversy: death is a mere servant of God, but that is all man is too; both have 'fought a good fight', but both have to restore what has only been lent them. 'So let the plaintiff have the honour; let death have the victory.' That looks like a decision against man, because what is the use of honour if death is victor? Nevertheless, the philosophy of death is no longer, as it was in Boethius, the philosophy of God. Death is the instrument of glory,[32] not an integral part of it. Glory towers high above created being and its passing, and to glory rises up the magnificent final prayer:

'Light sempiternal . . . founder of Hell's abyss . . . Creator of all the elements—of thunder and lightning, of mist, hail, snow, rain, rainbow, mildew, wind, hoarfrost, and of all their [25] 24.

[26] 24.
[27] 30, 32.
[28] 15.
[29] 25.
[30] 31.
[31] 19.
[32] 16.

effects, the one and only Master Builder; Captain of all the heavenly hosts; Emperor whose fealty none can forswear; mildest, mightiest, most merciful Creator, have mercy upon me and hear my plea! . . . Well-spring whence all pure streams flow . . . of all beings, ephemeral, temporal and eternal, the almighty quickener, preserver and destroyer, whose nature, what thou art in thyself, none can fathom, fancy, see, or comprehend, Supreme Good above all goods, most noble, eternal Lord Jesus, graciously receive the spirit, in thy goodness receive the soul, of my dearly beloved wife. Rest eternal grant unto her, bathe her in the dew of thy grace, hide her in the shadow of thy wings. Take her, O Lord, into thy perfect contentment, that contentment which is for the least as for the greatest. Grant her, Lord, a dwelling-place in thine everlasting kingdom whence she came'.[33] As in Dante, the love of man and woman overcomes death and hides, praying, in the bosom of eternal life. In this masterpiece, for the first time, the New High German developed in the Bohemian Chancery of Charles IV entered German literature. It is 'a monument of the German language without equal before Luther'.[34]

c. The Transformations of the Fool

WOLFRAM

The theme of the fool, which receives its first metaphysical treatment in the poetry of Wolfram,[1] is not really a tragic theme. Tragedy dominates the ancient world of Eros and its Christian continuation. In Wolfram and Grimmelshausen the fool emerges from the protection of the forest, the forest of Paradise, one might almost say. He makes his way into, but also through, guilt and pain, shielded by the angel wings of his folly. The Parzival theme ('Parzival' comes from perce à val, 'pierce through')[2] originated in the world of fairytale—the fool who, by means of a question, is supposed to set an enchanted king free and attain the object of his desire. Behind the fairytale there may well be an ancient myth of a pure saviour who delivers a kingdom from sorrow and decay. In the Christian world there is only one true saviour; all the myths and fairytales become transparent to Him and consequently lose their weight. It is no accident that, in Christian literature, comedy on the whole outweighs tragedy. In Shakespeare the two are finely balanced, but in the English novel, right up to Chesterton, it is humour which increasingly has the upper hand. Molière has more penetration than Racine, Goldoni more weight than Alfieri. In Austria, with Mozart, Raimund, Nestroy, Hofmannsthal, Christian light triumphs again over the bogus gravity of Germany, though there too Jean Paul had more readers than even Goethe. From the margin (Hebel, Reuter, Keller, Timmermans) humour penetrates and transfigures the Kantian realm. We are talking now about the light of humour, for irony presumes to take on the perspective of God, and satire exposes pharisaically (accusingly or leniently) the faults of one's neighbour. Moral faults, notice, not sins; when sin is involved, only God is competent to judge the foolish man. The Christian humorist, though, knows about the mysterious relationship between engraced wisdom and sinful folly and about the abyss, at once open and closed.

---

[33] 34.

[34] Wolfgang Golter, Die deutsche Dichtung im Mittelalter (1922²), 531–532. On the late medieval experience of death: Johan Huizinga, Herbst des Mittelalters, ch. 11, 'Das Bild des Todes' (8th ed., Kröner, 1961); W. Stammler, Die Totenänze (Leipzig, 1922); L. Spitzer, 'La danse macabre' in Mél. A. Dauzat (Paris, 1951).

[1] We are taking the Parzival material at the stage of evolution it has reached in Wolfram, although the fundamental conception of folly (nicetė), which changes from rustic uncouthness into the recognised folly of sin in the elect, and even the individual episodes of the story, are to be found in the unfinished epic of Chrétien de Troyes, Li Contes del Graal (ed. W. Roachs 1956). Wolfram gives the material not only its exterior and interior rounding off but also, and chiefly, its theological depth and its touching human cordiality, even if at times the story's themes lose their sharpness of outline.

WOLFRAM creates an epic of chivalry, but the values that underlie its conventional ethos come from beyond the world of chivalry: the lay Christian wisdom he calls mâze, which is almost the equivalent of Aristotle's meson,[3] the equilibrium between extremes, between body and soul, heaven and earth, with staete and triuwe as Germanic-Christian constantia, with kiusche as temperantia (discipline) and schame (sensitive appreciation of what is noble). Wolfram's epic is above all based on a transcendant folly (tumpheit), which, having been first a deficiency (the mother gives the boy a rustic upbringing in the forest), passes through full measure before becoming an excess (Parzival struggles to attain the symbolic Gral of the mythical tale and finally becomes King of the Gral). Chivalry, with its ideal centre in the round table of King Arthur, is the balance, hard won after much sacrifice, to 'an ethic and aesthetic of measure'[4] and, in this sense, the archetype of a beautiful world. This idea is indisputably valid for Parzival too (and behind him for Wolfram): it is the absolute unity of God's grace and the world's. Like Dante, Wolfram's hero strives to attain, as his ultimate goal (for him, it is a conditio sine qua non), faithful love of God and faithful love of his beloved lady. 'My desire has always been for both.'[5] The two loves are graded: 'great is my longing for the love of (Condwiramur), but greater still for the goal sublime.'[6] 'My greatest need is for the Gral, after that for my lady.'[7] But the loves are never separated: his 'great fidelity' to his lady is by his own will inseparable from fidelity to God. 'If I am to strive for the Gral, the thought of your chaste embraces must also drive me on'.[8] And so finally there appears on the Gral stone the inscription electing Parzival as king together with his wife and son, Lohengrin.[9] The knights of the Gral are religious men fighting an earthly battle for a sacred relic. They are all virgins, except for the king, who has a wife. Only 'lofty servitors' are chosen,[10] yet what is decisive is not 'stock' but pure grace. Thus the kingdom of the Gral is a symbolic and eschatological anticipation of the perfect unity of religious and secular, renunciation and fulfilment, pure availability (diemuot: willingness to serve—for the knights may be sent to rule over any land)[11] and earthly wealth.[12] From a modern Christian perspective, chivalry seems to be moulded and illuminated by one idea, which cannot as such be fully realised in time: as a reality at the end of the epic (though polarizing the entire action) it is 'fairytale' which, in so far as it is polarised, gives the whole chivalry a Utopian quality. Much later Cervantes will expose this Utopianism, but it also harks back in a way to the eschatology of Irenaeus, which was expounded in the second volume of The Glory of the Lord.[13] [2] 'Your name means "Pierce-through-the-heart"', Wolfram von Eschenbach, Parzival (ed. Lachmann), 140, 16; 81. [Tr. The number following the Lachmann references is the page number in the Penguin English translaton by A. T. Hatto (Harmondsworth, 1980)].

---

---

[3] For example, the way Gurnemanz introduces the young fool to knightly virtue, the right measure between meanness and generosity, poverty and riches, loquaciousness and taciturnity, between courage in battle and mercy for the conquered (171, 7–30; 95f.).

[4] E. Köhler, Trobadorlyrik und höfischer Roman (Berlin, 1962), p. 22f.

[5] 389, 12; 200.

[6] 441, 11; 226.

[7] 467, 26–27; 239.

[8] 732, 19–21; 364.

[9] 781, 13f.; 387.

Thus Wolfram's chivalric ideal is in a strange tension between the immanent (which has the transcendent in and above it as an 'ideal')—the Kingdom of Arthur—and the transcendent (which raises up the immanent along with itself as its inner form)—the Kingdom of Gral. The tension can be seen in the fact that the story has two main heroes, Gawan for the Kingdom of Arthur and Parzival for the Kingdom of the Gral. But Gawan too is in quest of the Gral (he finds instead a magic castle from the Thousand and One Nights: Schastelmarveile and the Duchess Orgeluse), and Parzival strives for acceptance at the Round Table and succeeds. The two kingdoms are intertwined by all manner of familial and social relations. The desire for a totality of religious and secular (Péguy's ideal of the temporel-spirituel)[14] does not stop at the borders of Christianity. The ideal of the 'aristocratic man' spans the divide between Christian and pagan. White Christians travel to pagan and Moorish lands, and there they marry black queens and have children, who then—like [10] 493, 22; 251.

---

[11] 494, 7f.; 252.

[12] 796, 24–25; cf. 395.

[13] Volume II, pp. 92ff.

[14] Volume III, pp. 465ff.

Parzival's half-brother, Feirefiz, spotted black and white like a magpie—return to the Christian world and even find entry into the Kingdom of the Gral: a beautiful, humanist, ecumenical, lay world.

Behind this there is a corresponding awareness of the ambiguity of all that is earthly and human: God created 'the crooked and the straight', and he alone can divide them.[15] All things are inwardly double: 'Were one to place a love story on the scales and weigh it, one would never find anything but love and sorrow.'[16] 'With Adam's race there began both sorrow and joy.'[17] Thus Gramoflanz tells Gawan that he 'both gladdens and saddens' him.[18] Itonje cherishes 'both love and hate'.[19] And in a recognition scene: 'All who wanted to saw both joy and sorrow. Love drove them to it. Tears and laughter in one moved their mouths. It came from a greater love.'[20] And after Parzival has fought with his brother and the two have recognised each other, Feirefiz 'secretly laughed and wept'.[21]

And yet no picture of the world is as untragic as Wolfram's. However ambivalent the world and man and the kingdom may be, however easy it is for even the heart to become sinfully dual in zwîfel (ambiguity), there is still, at every level of human existence, the cohesive force of einvalt.[22] This key notion, which provides the foundation of Parzival's folly, is primeval in both the Bible and general human culture (antiquity). In human terms it is the heart's capacity manfully to withstand the world's contradictions, which is turned philosophically into the late Platonic ideal of uniformity, simplicity (ἑνιαίως). In Christian terms it is the 'simple eye' which finds light and vision in everything and leads, in the poor and emptied-out heart, to the vision of God (Mt 11.26; 5.8; 6.22f.; 10.16). Thus, in the history of spirituality, simplicity is almost a synonym for apatheia, Gelassenheit, indifference; but whereas these are closer to the mind, simplicity is closer to the heart. As sancta simplicitas, holy simplicity, the concept dominates the Christian world from the Fathers to St Bernard.[24] In antiquity and the Middle Ages, while mâze (μέτρον μέσον) is the basis of beauty, simplicity is surrounded by glory. This simplicity may be interpreted more philosophically or more theologically, or more in the direction of 'wisdom' (beyond 'science') or more in the direction of 'folly' (beyond 'wisdom'). Folly itself may wear a great diversity of colours: from the proud philosophical folly of, say, the Cynics to the mystical folly of the (docta) ignorantia of Denys, a theme which continues through the whole Dionysian tradition of the Middle Ages as far as the learned idiota and laicus of Nicolas of Cusa and the, by contrast, more self-conscious folly of the non-clericals, the 'unlearned' (illiterati),[25] who in fact are well-educated knights and courtiers; Wolfram counts himself as one of these. However, all this is very far short of the real Biblical 'folly of the cross', which theologians, especially of the early Middle Ages, are only too glad to interpret in terms of a folly of the 'higher wisdom' kind mentioned above.[26]

---

[15] 264, 25–27; 139.

[16] 272, 15–18; cf. 143.

[17] 465, 1–2; 237.

[18] 609, 30; 306.

[19] 636, 5; 319.

[20] 672, 15f.

[21] 752, 23; 374.

[22] Just the term: 689, 27. In its content, the word diemüete covers the field of the concept. R. Gruenter, 'Parzivals "einvalt"', Euphorion, 52 (1958), 297–302.

Whatever the place of Wolfram's fool in this network, the whole poem is in any case immersed in an all-pervasive light.

---

[24] Jean Leclercq, Sancta Simplicitas, Coll. Ord. Cist. Ref. (1960), 138–178; P. Lehmann, 'Die heilige Einfalt' in Erforschung des MA, Bd III (1960), 213–224; further literature in Alois Haas, 'Parzivals tumpheit bei W. v. Eschenbach' in Philol. Stud.u.Quellen Heft 21 (1964), 295f.

[25] H. Grundmann, 'Litteratus-illiteratus. Der Wandel einer Bildungsnorm vom Altertum zum MA' in Arch.f.Kulturgesch., 40 (1958), 1–65, and the admirably documented article of Fr. Ohly, 'Wolframs Gebet an den Heiligen Geist im Eingang des Willehalm', ZfdA 91 (1961), 1–37; A. Haas, l.c., 232–235.

[26] The texts, for example, which A. Haas (296f.) cites as instances of the folly of the cross theme in the circle of St Bernard (William of St Thierry especially), in so far as they are not just paraphrases of 1 Cor 1–2, show this very clearly. In the Victorines the preoccupation is with the 'follies' of ardent love and desire, a theme of classical and Augustinian origin, and not primarily with the imitation of Christ.

The courtly poets delight in colour and light, but Wolfram goes further: the words lieht, liuhten, blanc, clâr are omnipresent. It is not primarily nature that is lieht[27] but human beings; the beauty of the human beings is experienced as the radiance of light, as schîn and glanz. Arthur has luminous eyes.[28] After his cure the face of Anfortas has the lustre the Frenchman calls fleur.[29] We hear of 'bright sweet boys' (clâren süezen knabn).[30] The young fool meets a knight who is 'brighter than anything he had ever seen' (ern hete so liehtes niht erkant).[31] Gawan's eyes are reht ein meien glast.[32] Beakurs 'was of dazzling appearance' (pflac varwe lieht).[33] But it is above all the women who are described as lieht and clâr, pre-eminently, Parzival's wife, Condwiramurs. A 'blaze of light' (ein liehter glast) emanates from her;[34] her face has a 'lovely radiance' (ein minneclîch antlützes schîn);[35] she is a spouse of light (diu lieht gemâl).[36] But Orgeluse too is pure radiance.[37] Of her it is said that she is so lieht that, even if no candles had been furnished, there could have been no night around her because of the shining of her eyes.[38] Similar things are said of Itonje and of Repanse de Schoye, where it is stressed that there is a correspondence between purity of heart and bodily radiance: 'Great purity dwelt in her heart. The flesh without was a blossoming of all brightness.'[39]

But the divine world shines no less brightly. When Parzival as a boy asks his mother, Herzeloyde, what God is, she replies: 'brighter than the sun'.[40] And because she has told Parzival that what distinguishes God is light (unterschiet den liehten

---

[27] 516, 21.
[28] 661, 22; cf. 331.
[29] 796, 5–6; cf. 395.
[30] 74, 16; cf. 370.
[31] 122, 1; 73.
[32] 374, 24; cf. 186.
[33] 722, 9; 360; cf. 721, 21.
[34] 186, 20; 103.
[35] 186, 17; ibid.
[36] 619, 9; 742, 28.
[37] 612, 16; 624, 12 and passim.
[38] 638, 16f.; 320.
[39] 809, 13–14; 401.
[40] 119, 19; 72.

schîn), the boy thinks the brightly shining knight is God.[41] Later Trevrizent teaches him that God is 'a light that shines through all things' (ein durchliuhtec lieht)[42], because He 'shines through' (glestet durch)[43] even the walled darkness of our secret thoughts 'with an unseen leap', God as durchliuhtec, the light that shines through all things, is 'serenity'; even a radiant human being, like the dead Cidegast, can be given that name.[44] Thus Wolfram's world is an infinitely illuminated one (both naturally and supernaturally). Long before Claudel he discovered the analogy of transparent water and the eyes and light and baptism. On the occasion of the baptism of Feirefiz, he says:

> Trees have their sap from water.
> Water fecundates all things made that are called > 'creature'.
> We see by means of water.
> Water gives many souls a splendour
> Not to be outshone by the angels.[45] (Simrock)

One must not overlook the fact that these attributes together constitute the beauty of this world seen as the glory of God raining in upon this world. So that glory is not, first and foremost, a hidden glory. It is significant that Parzival is constantly and loudly praised for being beautiful, radiantly beautiful, indeed as the most beautiful human being of all.[46] 'He bore the marks of God's handiwork' (God's kunst [or gunst] lac an im).[47] He is like a wingless angel that has blossomed out on earth.[48] He 'brings the vigour and beauty of youth with him'.[49] He is 'the glorious hero'.[50] As such his 'victory is innate to him'.[51] Indeed, he is infallibly and perpetually victorious, even against the Knight Templar, even against triumphant Gawan. He has supreme werdekheit,[52] which can mean dignity, reputation, as well as glory. This must be borne in mind in considering Parzival's Christian life, his 'humiliation'. The fact that when the accounts of God's grace and the world's guilt are drawn up, the books can be balanced, indeed—in the fairytale and in its eschatologically proleptic significance—they must balance, is a real problem for the existential formulation of the question. And yet Wolfram is able to set forth purely the kernel of his maere, free from all ambiguity.

---

[41] 122, 24; cf. 73.

[42] 466, 2; 238.

[43] 466, 21; ibid.

[44] 613, 1–2.

[45] 817, 25–30; 406.

[46] 727, 21; 362. Cunneware laughs when she sees him, having made the vow to laugh only when she saw the most splendid hero of all (151f.; 86).

[47] 123, 13; cf. 73.

[48] 308, 1–3; 160.

[49] 311, 16; cf. 162.

[50] 331, 24; cf. 173.

[51] 717, 22; cf. 358.

The starting-point is the boy's simplicity. This simplicity is 'supernatural' in the sense that it is the unaffected openness to God of someone who later on will be called and has already been chosen for a purpose. His 'natural' simplicity has two forms: first, it is something inherited from his parents, the good knightly 'breeding' which is bound to assert itself; secondly, it is the ignorance, artificially produced by his mother, of all courtly things, of the upbringing befitting his station. After meeting the knights in the forest, the knightly part of him awakes, and he becomes desperately keen to go to King Arthur. His mother lets him go but makes him dress in fool's clothing, and after his departure dies of a broken heart. Next come a few scenes of stupidity: the naive embracing of Jeschute, who has to do bitter penance for it, and who will later be reconciled with her jealous husband by Parzival; the naive slaying of Ither with the little javelin and the stripping of his corpse in ignorance of the fact that he is related to the red knight. Gurnemanz instructs him in courtly manners and thereby removes his natural foolishness. Now Parzival can look back knowingly on his former folly as a thing of the past.[53] But this cessation of folly for the purposes of chivalry is not enough to rid him of his folly for God's sake. It is precisely his training in mâze (which means, inter alia, not talking too much) that makes him miss the opportunity to ask suffering Anfortas in the castle of the Gral the question that would have redeemed him. True, a typical fairytale situation, but a Christian one too: it would have meant showing a mercy that lay beyond the ethics of mâze. This inadvertent omission earns him Sigune's double curse of the world of chivalry[54] and Cundrie's curse of everything to do with the Gral,[55] which in its turn triggers off desolation in his relationship to God. The simplicity of that relationship disintegrates in zwîfel and discontentment with divine providence, the repercussions of which are such in his knightly spirit that he is prepared bravely and defiantly to bear the weight of God's hatred of him, which he thinks he feels.[56] On the other hand, with an unselfconscious sense of election, he strives for the Gral, even though it can only be found 'unsuspectingly'.[57] He wants to wring it out of God, but in this respect too he is rent asunder, for no one can force anything out of God through anger.[58] That is what he is taught by Trevrizent, who has to admit, though, at the end: 'A greater marvel never occurred, in that, after all, with your defiance you have wrung the concession from God that His everlasting Trinity has given you your wish.'[59] Even when defiant: 'God will appoint me [through the Gral inscription]',[60] he speaks as someone who is still an undoubted sinner but already called by God.

---

[52] 169, 2 and passim.

[53] 'I was a young fool—no man—not yet grown to years of discretion' (269, 24; 141). 'If ever I stripped a corpse, it was because I was dull of understanding' (475, 6; 242). '. . . as befitted his youthful folly' (744, 18; cf. 371).

This subtle Christian situation—there is a parallel here with Dante[61]—must be resolved, not just by explanatory instruction, but, over and beyond that, by a Christian confession. The central Good Friday scene (just as Dante goes through Hell on Good Friday) demonstrates Wolfram's supreme mastery. No human being can open himself up to God's grace by unconscious simplicity alone; there also has to be a conscious and free decision or choice. However, man affected by Original Sin, when he chooses God in this way, necessarily encounters his fallenness, which becomes evident to him in its depths in concrete actual sins. It is precisely this falling away from God which is his supernatural folly, his simplicity or stupidity in the bad sense. By disclosing to Parzival the absolute fidelity of God's grace, the Grail hermit, Trevrizent, Anfortas' brother, shows him at the same time that man's only response can be an equally unconditional fidelity to God (in the form of faith, hope, love, surrender), and that this is the only appropriate and wise attitude, the rebel against God being therefore simply stupid. Trevrizent's view of confession is what every modern homme révolté fails to see: the realisation which dawns on you only when you are at confession that the person who does not trust in God is 'out of his senses'[62] and 'sick in his wits' (an den witzen kranc).[63] 'God is named and is Truth', because 'God Himself is faithful and true'.[64] He who is not faithful and true falls from all truth. Originally the earth was created virginal in fidelity and truth (Wolfram takes over the Patristic theologoumenon of terra/virgo/mater), but through Adam and Cain's 'discontent and vainglorious greed' (ungenuht, gîteclicher ruom),[65] 'wrath' (nît)[66] has invaded mankind and still persists. Man has fallen away from God, but God becomes man, and 'His faithful humanity fought faithfully against unfaithfulness'.[67] 'In His divine love he that is highest of all released us in Hell'.[68] [54] 249f.; 135f.

---

[55] 312f.; 164f.

[56] 332, 8; 172.

[57] 250, 29.

[58] 'You can gain nothing from Him by anger' (463, 1; 236).

[59] 798, 1–4; 396.

[60] 472, 9; 241.

[61] Gust. Ehrismann, 'Dantes Göttliche Komödie und Wolframs von Eschenbach Parzival' in Idealistische Neuphilologie, Festschrift K. Vossler (1922), p. 191: 'Parzival's confession in the presence of Trevrizent corresponds to Dante's confessio before Beatrice'.

Parzival's 'sins' certainly pose problems for moral theology which do not need to be dwelt on in detail here.[69] (Individual) guilt, which the sinner is conscious of, is dovetailed with objective sin, which, through some kind of culpable ignorance (ignorantia), he remains unconscious of, and when he does become aware of it, he discovers the abyss of original guilt and, precisely in that, the lack of supernatural love for God and neighbour. This whole catastrophe Wolfram grasped and described with intuitive accuracy, and so all the glorious light of his poem streams from the convergence of humble confession with descendant grace in the hero's lay shriving.[70] This convergence constantly underlies everything that follows: Parzival's permanent awareness of his sin,[71] his humble and resolute fidelity to God, and following from that his view of human courtly love (Minne) as 'great fidelity'[72] and his distinguishing of love's true fidelity from the amorous insanity that grips the Arthurian heroes[73] and—even worse—Gottfried's Tristan. True, 'Frau Minne' makes every man 'a fool', and Parzival, when he falls in love, 'loses his reason' and is 'beside himself' when he sees the three drops of blood in the snow which remind him of his wife.[74] But, for Parzival, human falling in love is safely contained within fidelity; it is part of creaturely simplicity and does not endanger it. To absolutise this 'folly', as Gottfried does, is, to Wolfram's mind, the reversal of all truth, which consists for him solely in the ecstasy of fidelity. After confession Parzival is now only one who serves, so the second chance to ask Anfortas the saving question (this time consciously and for that very reason as one who has been humbled) is given to him out of pure grace. And so the all-pervasive quality of Wolfram's poem is joy. Towards the end it goes from celebration to celebration, from reconciliation to reconciliation. What in the beginning was 'care' melts away into the simplicity of joy:

---

[62] 461, 27f.; cf. 236.
[63] 463, 3; ibid.
[64] 462, 25; 236.
[65] 463, 25, and again 782, 23, gît is greed, avarice.
[66] 464, 21.
[67] 465, 9–10; 237.
[68] 465, 28–29; ibid.

---

[69] Alois Haas, following the careful study by Jul. Schwietering, 'Parzivals Schuld', ZfdA, 81 (1944), has produced sufficient evidence from contemporary Scholasticism to justify Wolfram's ethics (l.c., 247–276).

[70] 501, 17; 255.

[71] 783, 7; cf. 388.

[72] 732, 8; 364.

[73] 532, 17–21.

[74] The long episode, 281–305, 6; 147ff.

You raised a brood of cares in tender years:
But the happiness which is on its way to you has dashed their expectations.
You have won through to peace of soul
And outlived cares to have joy of your body.[75]

d. The Analogy of Folly

ERASMUS

Wolfram's poem, dating from about 1200, still just about belongs to a world of intact sacrality: the mutual symbolic reflection of sacred and secular is not regarded as Utopian caricature but as an adequate résumé of reality. A hundred years later we enter the age of Dante, Ockham and Eckhart, none of whom can develop the theme of folly, nor can their immediate successors. One more century and Villon is singing of the gallows and the Bohemian ploughman is quarrelling with Death. The theme of the danse macabre, already audible in Jacopone, places—with brutally constrained indifference—all existence under the sign of vanity, all idealism under suspicion of eccentricity. Only the artful humorists—Eulenspiegel, Reinke de Vos, the sturdy characters of Wittenweiler—seem to stand out against this gloomy background. Neither they nor the great band of fools assembled by Sebastian Brant, with bitter moral earnestness, in his 'Ship of Fools' of 1494, to attack them and even perhaps to reform them, have very much to do with our theme of 'the Glory of the Lord', still less 'The Exorcism of Fools' (1512) and 'The Guild of Knaves' (1512) written by the disputatious Franciscan Thomas Murner against the decadence of the Church and used later as confessional polemic.

Erasmus of Rotterdam's Encomium Moriae (1509),[1] in which Dame Folly boasts of being the all-governing cosmic principle, elevates the theme once again to metaphysical heights. The fixed point among all the shifts of Erasmus' thinking about folly (he was everything but a philosopher), the point from which an analogous unity can be seen is the position of the 'wisdom' against which his polemic is directed: the 'gloomy' wisdom of scholastic philosophy,[2] the 'gloomy worthiness of the male mind'[3] (by which doubtless he means the earnest triviality and scientific bustle of the humanists), and also the gloomy moralistic wisdom of 'the frogs of the Stoic ilk',[4] who, for the sake of pure apatheia, condemn all passions. The hallmark of reality, in contrast to the dreary 'truth' of philosophers and moralists but also of theologians, ascetics, ecclesiastics and monks, is everything that goes by the name of 'folly': everything that lies beneath the mind and in which it is rooted: all that is vital, passionate, irrational about love's and friendship's choices, the 'splendour of youth' in its perishability, even the self-love and self-contentment of a life of isolation, for that inevitably means some kind of illusion (when someone acts as if he were the be-all and end-all), in a word all 'the splendour of life'.[5] On the other hand, folly is also everything that lies above the mind: all that is gratuitous, unfathomable, playful, grace-ful; it is because of all this that folly is a goddess and at home in the world of the gods.[6] The deeper, Christian meaning of this supra-rational folly is the incomprehensible making straight of the crooked and ultimately the outplaying of sin by grace, the interpretation of evil on the cross as 'not knowing what they do', foreshadowed in Aaron's prayer for his sister, 'I beg you, Lord, do not hold us responsible for this sin, which we have committed in our folly', and in David's plea, 'I beg you, Lord, to take away the inquity of your servant, because I have acted in my folly.'[7] [75] 782, 27–30; 388.

---

[1] In the translation by Clarence H. Miller (New Haven and London, 1979). References are to page numbers.

[2] 22.

[3] 32.

[4] 57.

[5] All these themes are dealt with in close connection with one another (31ff.).

[6] 18, 24f.

[7] 131.

Stretching the meaning of folly to include both the highest level of grace and the lowest level of animality gives Erasmus unlimited scope in the game of connections. On the one hand, there is no doubt that the realities of human life, including its noblest values, are rooted in the sub-spiritual realm, which usually cannot stand up before the bar of pure spirit. Examples of this are heroism in a reprehensible war,[8] determination in hazardous and horrifying competition, the theatrical excitement of life in its multifarious masks and disguises,[9] the cleverness of life based on silly 'aggression and grappling with things' and on an irresponsible forgetting of earlier situations of guilt, a general immersion in things of the moment, a rejection of that 'high standpoint', from which 'human life in all its immense misery can be seen'.[10] Needless to say, such directness has to accept the dialectic intrinsic to it: 'What appears "at first blush" . . . to be death, will, if you examine it more closely, turn out to be life; conversely, life will turn out to be death; beauty will become ugliness; riches will turn to poverty; notoriety will become fame; learning will be ignorance; strength, weakness . . . success, failure . . . what is helpful will seem harmful; in brief, you will find everything suddenly reversed.'[11] The wandering scholars of the Middle Ages knew that, as did Villon in his prison cell.

On the other hand, all these relativities tend to get taken seriously and to be sanctioned before the tribunal of reason. The result is that reason, in the presence of the higher 'folly' of grace, not only makes itself ridiculous but proves its guilt as well. And then, as in Brant's 'Ship of Fools', all the states of human life, secular and religious (especially the latter), are bitterly exposed: huntsmen and insatiable builders, diceplayers and miracle-seekers, merchants and pilgrims, lawyers and philosophers, theologians and monks, kings and princes of the Church. Where ecclesiastics are concerned, Erasmus uses the sound criterion of the Devotio Moderna, in whose spirit he [8] 35.

[9] 42.
[10] 49.
[11] 43.

was brought up.[12] At this point, when the idea of 'simplicity' becomes central,[13] the great tradition—of classical antiquity and the Bible, of Bernard and Wolfram—is brought in. For does not Paul attribute 'a certain folly' to God himself when he says that 'the foolishness of God is wiser than men'?[14] In the critique of the Church the 'analogy of folly' shifts more and more to the divine pole, so that, through the playful tone, unambiguity breaks through with Christian seriousness: 'The life-style of princes has long since been diligently imitated . . . by popes, cardinals, and bishops . . . to teach the people is burdensome; to interpret Holy Scripture, academic; to pray, otiose . . . poverty is embarrassing, obedience humiliating and unseemly . . . and finally, dying is disagreeable, death on the cross, disreputable.'[15] Erasmus shines light into the depths when he exposes Christian existence as an 'evasion' of reality and thus a betrayal of, and flight from, the truth: 'If there is some responsibility, they prudently shift that on to someone else's shoulders and pass the buck down the line from one to another. In fact, just as lay princes parcel out the duties of ruling to deputies, and the deputies pass them on to subdeputies, so too [ecclesiastical office-bearers] leave the practice of piety, in their modesty, to the common people. The people foist it off on those whom they call ecclesiastics, for all the world as if they themselves had nothing to do with the Church, as if their baptismal vows had had no effect whatever. Then the priests who call themselves secular—as if they were united to the world rather than to Christ—pass on the burden to the canons regular, the canons to the monks, the laxer monks to the stricter ones, both groups to the mendicant orders, the mendicants to the Carthusians . . .'[16]

---

[12] Albert Hyma, Renaissance to Reformation (Eerdmans, Michigan, 1951).

[13] 'The privilege of simplicity and of truthfulness is the striking attribute of folly' (195). 'The pious strive with all their hearts to reach God Himself, who is purest and simplest of all' (269).

[14] 128.

[15] 110–112.

[16] 115.

At this point Dame Folly breaks off and concludes with a kind of bibliography: a few quotations from classical authors, many texts from Sacred Scripture. They are chaotically thrown together—it is after all the 'lower folly' which they are also meant to corroborate—and yet the great evangelical folly of Jesus does not fail to rise resplendent: the folly of the Incarnation itself,[17] revelation communicated to the simple, the foolishness of the evangelical counsels, the proclamation of the folly of the cross 'by simple, rough and ready heralds', the ass as a mount (instead of the noble stallion), the dove (and not a hawk or eagle) as the bird of the Holy spirit. 'Consider also that he calls His own followers, destined for immortal life, sheep. No other animal is more stupid.'[18]

Equally great is the folly of the life and theology of St Paul. To sum up: 'It seems to me that the Christian religion taken all together has a certain affinity with some sort of folly.' This can be seen in the fact that 'children, old people, women, and retarded persons are more delighted than others with holy and religious matters', and finally that 'no fools seem more senseless than those people who have been completely taken up, once and for all, with a burning devotion to Christian piety: they throw away their possessions, ignore injuries, allow themselves to be deceived, make no distinction between friend and foe . . . In this light, it is not at all surprising that the apostles seemed to be intoxicated with new wine and that Paul seemed mad to the judge Festus.'[19] Here Erasmus shakes the hand of the knight of La Mancha.

Erasmus would not be Erasmus if he did not end—inexplicably!—by committing the folly of fleeing from the folly of world and Church in a Platonic flight into the realm of pure spirit. The ecstatic flight of spirit from body, of the mind from the world up to God—that is the illogical conclusion of his treatise, which in the end closes its eyes before the radiant glory of true folly.

[17] 130.

[18] 129.

[19] 132.

e. Ridiculousness and Grace

CERVANTES

Cervantes' ageless masterpiece,[1] turgid life in fable's brightest hues, cannot be reduced to any formula or theory. Many-layered like all genuine humour, the world that is Don Quixote is deliberately susceptible of a multitude of interpretations. On each storey the light falls differently, yet top floor and ground are clearly part of the same building: at one level unintentional absurdity and burlesque, at another the light of grace descending from the heights of the Christian revelation of love, eluding all the textbook interpretations, even the various philosophical ones, e.g. Don Quixote and Sancho Panza as the ideal and the real, the tragic unreality of the ideal woman (Dulcinea de Toboso), and thus the illusoriness of every great human life. In the first place, we have to come to terms with the author's constantly and clearly expressed aim: to ridicule the ideology of the heroic and gallant Christian knight. This Utopian, fairytale eschatology marked Parzival and a hundred other epics and romances, the idea being that the Christian knight in his armour was the living analogy of the saint in his supernatural struggle for the Kingdom of God. Cervantes regarded this analogy, in the sense of a seriously attempted form of existence, as pure folly, totally out-of-date, and yet at the same time he was fully aware that it would be precisely in his hero that this out-of-date existence would survive as immortal foolishness. A travelling companion says at one point to the knight: 'Heaven be praised, for that history of your noble and authentic chivalries, which your worship says is printed [Don Quixote in the second part knows about the publication of the first], will consign all the innumerable stories of imaginary knights errant, of which the world is full, to oblivion, such harm they do to good manners, and such damage and discredit to genuine history.'[2] 'I'll bet', says Sancho, 'that before long there won't be a wineshop or tavern, an inn or a barber's shop where the history of our exploits won't be painted up.'[3] 'It is . . . so familiar to all sorts of people that whenever they see a lean horse go by, they cry: "There goes Rocinante!" . . . in fact, this story is the most delightful and least harmful entertainment, . . . for nowhere in it is to be found anything ever resembling an indelicate expression.'[4] If ever in the Christian era a myth was created, this is it: the merry myth of the ridiculousness of the Christian fighting as a knight for the Kingdom of God. In no way should Quixote be taken as a symbol of Christ Himself. However, by way of ingenious counterpoint, the novel provides many other examples of madness of a purely human kind, especially scorned erotic passion—crazy Cardenio,[5] Anselmo in the table of stupid curiosity,[6] Eugenio and Leandra,[7] Basilio.[8] This commonplace madness, provoked by particular incidents, is far removed from Quixote's constitutional folly, which is not 'psychological' but purely ideological. His folly closes the gap between the 'ideal' of God's redemptive grace in Christ and the 'reality' of the earthly, allegedly world-transforming actions of Christians. In his 'simple' faith and his well-intentioned conduct Quixote sees the gap bridged, but as he approaches his fate and failure, it is laughably evident to everyone that it is yawning wide open. Quixote thus becomes the true patron saint of Catholic Action. He is a bit of dogmatics neglected by Catholic theologians, a tract that can be written on the Catholic side only with and by means of humour, whereas Luther tried to express

---

[1] [Tr.: von Balthasar uses the classical German translation of Ludwig Braunfels, Der Sinnreiche Junker Don Quijote von der Mancha (Büchergilde Gutenberg, Zürich o.J.). We shall follow, wherever possible, the English translation of J. M. Cohen, The Adventures of Don Quixote (Penguin Books, Harmondsworth, 1950). On occasions, a direct translation from the citations of Braunfels has been necessary in order to capture von Balthasar's sense. References will be given to part and chapter.] On the origins of the work and the reasons for its composition: Menendez y Pelayo, Cultura literia de Cervantes y elaboración del Quijote in Estudios de critica literania, 4th series, Madrid 1905. Philosophical commentary by M. de Unamuno, Das Leben Don Quijotes und Sanchos, German trans; no date, Phaidon-Verlag.

---

[2] II, 16.

[3] II, 71.

[4] II, 3.

[5] I, 23f. Cardenio has only moments of insanity in his interludes of rationality.

[6] I, 33. 'I am . . . inclined to abandon you to your folly', his friend Lothario tells him.

[7] I, 51.

[8] II, 19.

it tragically in the contradictory dialectic of sola fide and simul iustus et peccator.

Quixote is simple. As Sancho says, 'He has a heart full of simplicity. He can do no harm to anyone, only good to everybody. There's no malice in him. A child might make him believe it's night at noonday. And for that simplicity I love him.'[9] He constantly preaches and practises love of enemies.[10] He scolds Sancho for being a bad Christian. because 'you never forget an injury once done to you, though you should know that a noble and generous heart sets no store by such trifles.'[11] He preaches love on every occasion, presumes the best in other people[12] and instructs Sancho, when he takes over the governorship, to be always gentle and kind, as a judge to show mercy to the accused and the tears of the poor,[13] and in all this to ascribe nothing to his own merits. He sees his chivalry as pure service of God[14] and as faith's answer to the call and mission of God.[15] For him, the last knight in the 'strict order'[16] of chivalry, this means 'protecting those who need protecting and coming to the aid of the afflicted',[17] 'stumbling here, falling there, flung down in one place and rising up in another . . . succouring widows, protecting maidens, and relieving wives, orphans and wards.'[18] And when they do this, 'it is no concern . . . of knights errant to investigate whether the distressed, chained and oppressed persons they meet on the roads are brought to that pass . . . for their crimes or their whims. Their only task is to succour them because they are in distress, taking account of their sufferings and not of their villainies.'[19] And if monks 'in all peace and quiet, pray Heaven for the well-being of the world', then 'we soldiers and knights carry out what they pray for, defending it with the strength of our arms and the edge of our swords, beneath no roof but the open sky, exposed to the intolerable beams of the sun in summer and the biting frosts in winter. We, therefore, are God's ministers on earth, and the arms by which His justice is executed here.'[20] [10] Cf. the author's prologue [24], where 'love your enemies' is tackled thematically.

---

[9] II, 13.

[11] I, 21. Sancho will later say to his master: 'There is no reason, sir, to take revenge on anyone, for it's not right for a good Christian to avenge his injuries' (II, 11).

[12] For example, I, 17.

[13] II, 42.

[14] Ibid.

[15] After the adventure with the flock of sheep: 'God, the provider of all things, cannot let us want, especially as we are engaged in His service' (I, 18). 'God who has put it into my heart to embark on this unparalleled adventure [which comes to nothing, because the sound is merely the swish of windmills] will take care to watch over my safety' (I, 20). Quixote is 'sent to earth' (I, 28).

[16] 13.

[17] II, 27.

[18] II, 16, and other very frequent descriptions of the mission: I, 1; I, 2; I, 14; I, 52 etc.

Quixote goes on to say humbly that he does not mean that the vocation of the knight errant is as virtuous and meritorious as that of the monk: 'I only want to argue from my own sufferings that it is most certainly a more painful and belaboured one, hungrier and thirstier, more miserable, ragged and lousy.'[21] Having taken his leave of the castle of the Duke, where he had been so cruelly mocked, he comes across some peasants transporting statues of the saints for an altarpiece. Quixote looks upon them with reverence as his unattainable models: St George ('one of the best errants in all the heavenly Host') and the Dragon, St Martin, on horseback, and the beggar ('he gives him half of his cloak. No doubt it was winter at the time, otherwise he would have given him the whole, since he was so charitable'), St James the Moor-Killer, and St Paul, hurled from his horse. 'These saints and knights professed, even as I do, the calling of arms. But the difference between us is that they were saints and fought in the heavenly fashion, and I am a sinner and fight in the human way. They conquered Heaven by force of arms, because Heaven suffers violence, but up till now I do not know what I am conquering by the force of my labours.' In any case, 'the wise Christian should not pry too curiously into the counsels of Heaven.'[22] So these four saints bridge externally the gap between spiritual and worldly chivalry; all that is left is the one between the holy and the sinful. In all sincerity Sancho thinks that 'we should set about turning saints. Then we shall get the good name we're aiming at rather sooner . . . A couple of lashings have more effect with God than a couple of thousand lance-thrusts, even against giants, or hobgoblins, or dragons.' To this Quixote replies: 'All that is so, but we cannot all be friars, and many are the ways by which God bears His chosen to heaven. Chivalry too is a pious order, and there are sainted knights in heavenly glory.'[23]

---

[19] I, 30.
[20] I, 13.
[21] I, 13.
[22] II, 58.

He thinks of himself as an 'establisher of peace' (and in this role delivers an anti-militaristic speech),[24] the restorer, to the best of his ability, of the Golden Age (as he explains in his wonderful discourse to the goatherds), the last 'real knight' in a world of flunkeys.[25] He was prepared to make war all alone, against Islam[26] (very like Claudel's Marie de Sept Epées),[27] just as, all alone, he went into combat against the circus lions, though, admittedly, they were disdainful of battle with him.[28] The result of his interference in most cases is that things go from bad to worse. The whipped boy, Andrew, is afterwards beaten even harder, ending up in hospital, and begs Quixote not to defend him any more.[29] He causes havoc among a flock of sheep.[30] The liberated galley-slaves show their gratitude by pelting him with stones[31] and bring him into conflict with the 'Holy Brotherhood'.[32] 'I was born a very pattern for the unfortunate, and to be a target and mark for the arrows of adversity.'[33] 'Observe, Sancho, that virtue is persecuted wherever it exists to an outstanding degree.'[34] That was the way it was for Alexander and Caesar, for Hercules and Sir Galaor, brother of Amadis of Gaul. But for the Christian knight 'the path of virtue is narrow cramped and hard', [35] indeed, 'the narrowest path of all'.[36] Although Quixote himself is unaware of it, this superlative applies exactly to the ridicule which all his schemes, his incompetence, and the world's appetite for a joke conspire to produce.

---

[23] II, 8.

[24] I, 37. Cf. his remarks against firearms, which make heroism impossible (I, 38).

[25] I, 11, a theme to which he frequently returns (I, 20).

[26] II, 64. 'I was just going to say that I should have been delighted if everything had turned out otherwise, for then I should have had to cross to Barbary, where by the force of my arm I should have liberated not only Don Gregorio but all the Christian captives in Barbary' (II, 65).

[27] The Satin Slipper, ET J. O'Connor (London 1932), 4th Day, 8th scene.

[28] II, 17.

[29] I, 4.

[30] I, 18.

[31] I, 22

[32] I, 45.

St Ignatius Loyola in his early life filled his head with the romances of chivalry and his autobiography shows some strange affinities with Quixote. On a solitary journey from Genoa to Bologna he loses his way and only escapes death after much toil and tribulation, but then, as he enters the city across a narrow wooden bridge, he falls into a ditch full of mud and extricates himself amidst the great laughter of a crowd of onlookers.[37] This kind of thing happens constantly to Don Quixote. As he climbs from his horse in the presence of the Duke, he falls headlong, while Sancho hangs by one leg from the stirrup of his pack-saddle.[38] On his solemn entry into Barcelona, mischievous boys put furze under the tails of Dapple and Rocinante, with the results that horse and ass rear up and rid themselves of their riders.[39] At great moments it is always like this, without mentioning the many thrashings, bruisings, pinchings,[40] the herds of wild bulls[41] and dirty pigs[42] unexpectedly rampaging over them as they sleep on the ground. In fact, the knight clearly quoting St Theresa of Avila can say to his squire: 'I was born, Sancho, to live dying, and you to die eating.'[43] The first part of the book closes with the knight in great humiliation, being imprisoned in a cage and then hauled back on an oxcart into his native village. The second part, on the whole the more subtle of the two, is even more extreme with its story of the cruel happenings at the Duke's court, where, beneath a façade of the highest honours, Don Quixote and Sancho become the butt of foolish quips and jokes, to the huge amusement of Duke, Duchess, and courtiers. Called a fool by a priest, the knight gently reproves him for it: Can it be right to censure me so harshly in public and without knowledge of the sin, to proclaim the sinner bluntly a blockhead? . . . I always direct my purposes to virtuous ends . . . whether he who so acts deserves to be called a fool, let your Highnesses decide.'[44] And so the author is of the opinion that 'the mockers were as mad as their victims, and the Duke and Duchess within a hair's breadth of appearing fools themselves for taking such pains to play tricks on a pair of fools'.[45] Don Antonio, who leads Quixote through the streets of Barcelona without his knowing that he has a placard on his back, exclaims: 'You have the knack of turning everyone who has to do with you into madmen and dolts.'[46]

---

[33] II, 10.

[34] II, 2.

[35] II, 6.

[36] II, 18.

[37] The Diary of a Pilgrim, n. 91.

[38] II, 30.

[39] II, 61.

[40] Cf. I, 4; II, 11; I, 24; II, 27: II, 48.

[41] II, 58.

[42] II, 68.

[43] II, 59.

But what is the point of these humiliations, which our hero bears 'so silently and patiently',[47] so as to become 'the example and model' for every knight 'in the centuries to come'?[48] The answer is that he bears within him an ideal, embodied in the beautiful virgin[49] and lady, Dulcinea. He has never seen her, and yet he loves her and dedicates himself to her, as is proper for a true knight. For him Dulcinea is the 'sum of all beauty',[50] 'superhuman,'[51] so much so that he can pray to her.[52] He believes in her after he has pictured her in

[44] II, 32.
[45] II, 70.
[46] II, 62.
[47] I, 47.
[48] Ibid.
[49] II, 59.
[50] I, 43.
[51] I, 13.
[52] II, 22.

his mind ('in imagination I draw her as I would have her be'),[53] and for the sake of her greater glory he undertakes everything.[54] When people express their suspicion that she might be 'an imaginary mistress', the knight evasively replies: 'God knows whether Dulcinea exists on earth or no, or whether she is fantastic or not fantastic. These are not matters whose verification can be carried out to the full. I neither engendered nor bore my lady, though I contemplate her in her ideal form.'[55] Meanwhile she has been changed by a magic spell into an ugly and malodorous peasant woman, and only thus, in the form of her 'abasement', can Sancho make her visible to the knight.[56] But, in fact, Quixote serves her for her own sake with 'the kind of love', says Sancho, 'I've heard them preach about. They say we ought to love Our Lord for Himself alone, without being moved to it by hope of glory or fear of punishment':[57] the doctrine of pur amour on the lips of Sancho Panza and applied to the Knight of Sad Countenance. But Quixote still hopes for an eschatological dis-enchantment: 'when least we expect to, we shall see her in her proper shape'.[58] The foolery involves Sancho subjecting himself voluntarily to 3300 strokes of the lash on his 'wonder-working flesh', all for the sake of the dis-enchantment, though he only succeeds in whipping the trees.[59] At the end, when the knight has been defeated in a duel and compelled to return home, hope, because of the fatal blow, is slowly extinguished and vanishes into intangibility.[60] Only the watchword remains true: 'at every step to attempt the impossible',[61] and the conclusion has its own nobility. 'I did what I could.'[62]

[53] I, 25.

[54] '. . . since she will see that everything serves the extolling of her glory and her fame' (I, 31).

[55] II, 32.

[56] II, 16.

[57] I, 31.

[58] II, 33.

[59] II, 71, his power is gratis data (ibid.).

[60] II, 73.

[61] II, 17.

[62] II, 66.

The knight sees earthly things in the most exalted light; he alone knows them in their true worth.[63] He alone knows who the ladies and gentlemen here assembled 'really are'.[64] So he is aware of his own dignity: he knows the 'rules [of chivalry] better than any knights who have ever professed them in the world.'[65] Moreover, the ancient romances and epics 'do not paint or describe [their heroes] as they were, but as they should have been, to serve as examples of their virtues for future generations'.[66] However, if the historicity of these idealised figures is called into question, Quixote instantly rallies to their defence: he knows them, bears them all in himself,[67] so much so that 'I might almost say that I have seen Amadis of Gaul with my own eyes'.[68] In other words, Quixote is really the archetype, representative and successor of them all in this age so poor in the spirit of chivalry. It is almost as if his folly were the penance for all that was unconsciously foolish about the old chivalry, in his rationality demonstrating his superiority to it. In the first part the exterior foolish deeds predominate whereas in the second the author demonstrates more and more the interior supernatural rationality of his hero, so that at the end, after his final defeat, all his foolishness, like a light garment, falls unresistingly from him. Quixote's folly is 'systematic folly, if in folly system there can be,'[69] in a much deeper sense than Hamlet, who has method in his madness. One can even ask oneself 'which is the madder, the man who's mad because he can't help it, or the man who's mad by choice.'[70] This is why his associates are all reduced to 'amazement' (thaumazein), because his reason is so foolish, and yet his foolishness is so sensible.[71] The proportion of folly and rationality in him is constantly under investigation. At all events he is a 'noble fool' 'a fool garnished with intelligence',[72] a finely-educated fool.[73] When he gives Sancho instruction in wisdom, he 'raises his sagacity as well as his folly to the highest level'.[74] If Quixote is all chivalry's representative, one of his obligations is also to take on, in his own madness, the madness of a 'raving Roland', to imitate his 'desperation' and his 'penitential exercises', or rather to make them real in his own time.[75] And all of this he does out of pure magnanimity: 'The real test is to be mad without cause, for then my beloved is bound to think, "If this happens in the green wood, what will become of the dry?"'[76]

---

[63] Thus he recognises the cheap barber's bowl for what it is: Mambrino's helmet made of finest gold (I, 21), and 'since the people see only a shaving bowl, they are not interested in pursuing it' (I, 25).

[64] I, 37.

[65] I, 25.

[66] I, 25.

[67] II, 1. Cf. I, 49.

[68] II, 1.

[69] I, 50.

[70] II, 15.

[71] II, 16.

Cervantes is the scourge not only of ancient chivalry but also of all the nonsense of the modern pastoral style and pastoral verse (a more harmless and yet often no less tragic madness). This runs through the whole novel, and Quixote constantly weaves it into his own adventure. The sickness that infects the whole of Europe from Renaissance to Revolution, with its own ideal of beauty, is handled here with a smiling indulgence, and yet also with savage and merciless medicines. Cervantes and Quixote are so far removed from these feeble imitations of the Alexandrines as Virgil was in the Georgics. The whole idyllic, erotic, tragic world of pastoral beauty is weighed and taken into account from a higher vantage point, but found to be too light in itself.

The main theme of the book is the virtue of Quixote (to which Sancho Panza is not really a dialectical counterweight but a positive complement, for his chief quality too is simplicity[77]. Quixote himself shows how the life of the knight is the integration of all the Christian virtues.[78] He lives a life of real and hard poverty (this is humiliatingly thrown in his face in the luxurious court of the Duke).[79] He lives a life of absolute chastity, which is attacked in a variety of ways, yet always in vain.[80] He lives in perfect obedience to his exacting, humiliating, all-consuming ideal. He preaches against litigiousness and the useless bearing of arms, and for the love of enemies which comes hard only to those 'who partake less of God than of the world, and more of the flesh than of the spirit'.[81] He knows magnanimity when he see it even in the roguish morality of the robber chief Roque, and does not fail to deliver a speech to his gang about the dangers for body and soul of their way of life.[82] On his death-bed he proclaims that 'God's mercy knows no bounds, nor can the sins of men ever limit or hinder it'.[83] In short, Don Quixote is so much better a Christian because subjectively he makes no claim to sanctity, and because objectively it is never possible, at any moment or in any respect, to count his ridiculous doings among the solemn deeds of God and Jesus

---

[72] II, 18.

[73] II, 59. Cf. II, 33; II, 34.

[74] II, 43. He leaves 'Don Juan and Don Jerónimo in great amazement at the mixture of intelligence and folly shown by the knight' (II, 59).

[75] I, 25.

[76] I, 25.

[77] 'Sancho was one of the solemnest blockheads of our age' (II, 7). He himself speaks of 'the broad cloak of my simplicity—which is always natural and never artificial' (II, 8). When his master scolds him as an ass: '. . . all I need to be a complete ass is a tail. If your worship would care to put one on me, I should reckon I had deserved it, and would serve you as an ass for all the remainder of my life' II, 28). The Duchess is surprised 'at the greatness of Sancho's simplicity. For he had now come to believe that Dulcinea's enchantment was the infallible truth, although he had himself been the enchanter and the trickster in that business' (II, 34). His simplicity resembles Quixote's: 'Sometimes his simplicities are so shrewd that it gives me no small pleasure to consider whether it is simplicity or shrewdness that prevails' (II, 32).

---

[78] II, 18.

[79] 'Here Benegeli [the author's supposed Moorish source] exclaims in his writing. 'Oh, poverty, poverty! . . . Moor though I am, I know very well by the commerce that I have had with Christians that holiness lies in charity, humility, faith, obedience, and poverty. But, for all that, I declare that anyone who grows content with poverty must have much of God in him, unless it is that kind of poverty of which one of His greatest saints says: 'Possess all things as if you possessed them not', and this they call poverty in spirit. But that other poverty . . .' the righteous poverty that makes the poor ridiculous, that is admirable (II, 44).

[80] Quixote's extreme modesty: II, 30; II, 48, the ball scene (II, 62), the final temptation scene with Altisidora (II, 70).

[81] II, 27.

[82] II, 60.

[83] II, 74.

Christ. He recognises the absolute distance between God and man, between Christ and the Church (in so far as he, Quixote, embodies it). In a truly Christian way it is the good and nothing but the good that he wants, and yet, as he leaves this world, he has to see all his Christian chivalry as foolishness: 'I know my folly now . . . Now, by God's mercy, I have learnt from my own bitter experience . . .'[84] It is precisely in this way that Quixote's life becomes a permanemet monument of Christian existence and a reflected ray of the glory of God.

f. The Fool as Rogue

GRIMMELSHAUSEN

Simplizissimus (1668–1669) is 'the only great literary monument of the German Baroque to have retained its vitality into our own times'.[1] Kosch considers it 'the most important [German] literary monument between Wolfram's Parzival and Goethe's Faust'. Once again, though differently from Cervantes, the Christian fool is at the centre. While the contemporary romances of heroism and gallantry continue to spin out the ideology of chivalry, even after the horrors of the Thirty Years War, Grimmelshausen laughs in the face of this dusty old dream-world and does not even need his foolish hero to play the part of that world's judge and gravedigger. Like Parzival, he is brought up as a pure fool in the solitude of the forest—first of all in 'the most ancient office of shepherd . . . with all its glorious dignity',[2] 'perfect and complete in ignorance'.[3] Then, after the robbers' raid on the farm and the boy's flight, he is introduced by the hermit into pure Christianity, when the holy man inscribes 'on the tablet of [his] heart, soft and smooth as wax',[4] prayer, the love of

---

[84] Ibid.

[1] A. Kelletat, Epilogue in the Buchklub Exlibris Zürich edition, 628.

[2] I, 2. Simplizissimus is cited by book and chapter from Die Simplicianischen Schriften des Hans Jacob Christoffel von Grimmelshausen, edited by F. Riederer (F. M. Hendel-Verlag, Leipzig, 1939).

[3] I, 1.

[4] I, 9.

God, 'honest service'. After the hermit's death, this natural and supernatural fool is thrown out into the wild world of war, which is not only cruel and brutal, but full of unimaginable wickedness, such as the soldiers who 'first cruelly torture' [the country people] and then make them solemnly renounce God before killing them, because 'that is the best way of getting their revenge, ensuring their punishment both in time and eternity'.[5] The foolish boy first of all becomes a page; he has 'nothing more precious than a pure conscience and . . . a noble innocence and simplicity'.[6] That is why he does not understand the first thing about the world that surrounds him and calls itself Christian: 'Christ says: "Love your enemies, bless those who curse you, do good to those who hate you . . ." But I found not only did no one want to comply with this command of Christ, but that everyone did the exact opposite . . . Things became blatantly clear to me, and I was forced to conclude that because of this public sinners, tax-collectors and prostitutes, who were vehemently hated for their wickedness and godlessness, were far superior to us modern Christians in their practice of fraternal charity.'[7] And when he hears sinners 'boasting of their sin and shame and vice' and begins to rebuke them, he is laughed at and written off as a fool. He decides to keep silent, but 'out of Christian charity he could not maintain it.' The pastor, when consulted, replies: 'Of course they are Christians, and I wouldn't advise you to call them anything else', though, mind you, if the apostles and the first devout Christians were to come back today, they too would be 'regarded as fools by everyone'.[8]

This question of the contradiction between God and the world (already the dominant theme in Grimmelshausen's first works, Der satyrische Pilgram (1666) and the Histori vom keuschen Joseph (1667)), as well as the gravity of the appalling chaos of war which Grimmelshausen experienced, makes the problem of the book's literary form seem of secondary importance. It is certainly influenced by the Spanish picaresque novel. The translations of Lazarillo de Tormes and Guzman de Alfarache (artistically superior to the German comic novels and adventure stories such as Herzog Ernst and Fortunatus), and not Don Quixote (also available in translation), were the ones taken as a model and provide the literary form for the story of Simplicius' life and military adventures. At first, like Quixote, he is the fool, a butt for the amusement of the officers and soldiers; indeed, they even contrive to 'make a fool' of him.[9] Yet, even at this rascally stage, he is the one who holds the reins. He enjoys the fool's freedom to tell his superiors the truth, even Christian truth.[10] This old theme allows writers, especially in times of absolutism, to speak the truth to their princes and the powers that be (e.g. Shakespeare and Molière). Yet, unlike Quixote, who to the very end remains the pure ideal fool suspended above reality, Simplicius the fool gradually becomes Simplicius the wily rascal; the one 'who could not adapt himself to the world'[11] learns to adapt remarkably well. While still a lad, he becomes the 'famous huntsman of Soest', successful, ambitious, haughty, pampered, and yet lacking any spiritual admonition or direction, something he frequently regrets. Like Parzival he is very handsome, and so, led astray by novels of chivalry,[12] on a trip to Paris, he falls prey to women and becomes a kind of gigolo until 'eventually, in sheer exhaustion, he grows weary of foolish pranks'.[13] Robbed of his physical charms by an attack of measles, he becomes a quack and charlatan, regarded in a new sense now as a fool. Next he becomes a musketeer, 'a real savage who cared nothing for God or His Word.[14] No wickedness was too much for me, since all the graces and benefits I had ever received from God were completely forgotten, and so I didn't pray for anything, neither temporal nor eternal . . . I was

---

[5] I, 14.

[6] I, 24.

[7] I, 25.

[8] I, 25–26.

[9] II, 5ff.

[10] II, 7–14.

[11] II, 13.

[12] III, 3.

[13] IV, 5.

[14] IV, 8.

threatened with the gallows and the whip, but that made no difference. I carried on my godless way, and it began to look as if I was playing at despair and running on purpose towards hell.'[15] In all his ups and downs he is 'a ball of changeable luck, a model of mutability, and a mirror of human nature's inconstancy'.[16] And so in the religious sphere too he is tossed between remembrance of God and forgetfulness of God. When he is literally drowning, he prays fervently. Having been dragged to the bank, 'I should have just fallen to my knees and thanked the divine goodness for my rescue'. Once it is all 'behind him', everything is forgotten again, and yet not so forgotten that the memory of innocence, of the 'oath sworn',[17] of the 'natural law',[18] does not constantly break through. He remains suspended in the middle: in the company of the crafty villain Olivier,[19] he feels totally alien and strives by every means to escape. After this he joins up with the pious Brother of the Heart and accompanies him on pilgrimage to Einsiedeln, but cooks the peas in his shoes and follows the brother 'mournfully like someone being led to the gallows'.[20] At the shrine he is frightened by the devil as he comes out of the possessed person during an exorcism. He makes his confession and is converted to the Catholic faith, but the change does not last for long, 'because my conversion had its source, not in love of God, but in fear and dread of damnation, and so gradually I became quite half-hearted and lazy'.[21]

Grimmelshausen, with his unerring psychological perception, looks, not just at his hero's outward inconstancy, but at the inward quality of his virtue, which is again and again shown to be calculation. Simplicius 'has learnt' how to win people over to his side:[22] by playing the part of the generous benefactor, distributing gifts,[23] overlooking insults, praising everyone but himself.[24] So 'everywhere I went, I took care to make friends with those who otherwise might have had cause to hate me'.[25] 'I saw clearly that my own arrogance might inflict masses of enemies on me, so I decided I had to pretend to be humble, whether or not I really was.'[26] And later on: 'I became at once again a fellow who looked like a brave soldier.'[27] In his final judgment about himself, when he is trying to practise the principle of nosce te ipsum: 'I took care of my honour, not for its own sake, but for my own advancement.'[28] In the continuatio, he does not persevere in his chosen hermitage; instead of praying he looks out at the countryside and gets himself given alms in abundance. In fact, one might almost call him 'a hypocrite or holy joker'.[29] Grimmelshausen himself, like his hero, converted to Catholicism, but both retain a deep-seated Protestant mistrust of virtue, especially their own: there is no guarantee of its stability, nor of the purity of its motivation. The great goddess of the picaresque novels, as earlier of the medieval vagabonds and gallows-birds, is Fortuna.[30] Grimmelshausen turns her into a new metamorphosis of 'old Proteus'[31] and gives her the name 'Baldanders',[32] her nature being demonstrated by the cosmic transformations of a piece of lavatory paper.[33] This goddess rules not only the external lower world, but also the spiritual and religious. That is why no conversion of Simplicius' is absolutely definitive. After the superb conclusion of Book 5—'Adieu, world!' (taken from Guevaro)—a sixth book is added in which Grimmelshausen writes the first great German equivalent of Robinson Crusoe, transporting his hero off to an inaccessible South Sea island, where by rights he should become the perfect pious hermit. But then further Simplicius stories are added—Courage, Springinsfeld, Vogelnest, and above all the calendar stories spread round the country by Simplicius himself, which clearly show that the author's final word is not a contemplation that turns its back on the world but a wisdom that is hectically active in this changing world; not a wisdom that induces temporary madness as a prelude to the regaining of sanity in heroic disillusionment, but a wisdom whose final garb is the mantle of the fool.[34] Having become a calendar seller again, Simplicius addresses his public thus: 'Dear sirs and present good friends of mine![35] Not unjustly does that most scholarly and excellent of men speak of the likes of me: Saepe etiam sub sordido palliolo latet sapientia. A revolting mantle often hides a splendid wisdom.'[36]

---

[15] IV, 11.

[16] VI, 15.

[17] III, 15.

[18] IV, 15: 'You may or may not be permitted to rob and steal. All the same I know that it is against the law of nature, which says that you should not do to someone else what you don't want done to yourself.'

[19] IV, 14–24.

[20] V, 1.

[21] V, 2.

[22] II, 31.

---

[23] III, 13; III, 14; III, 16.

[24] III, 19.

[25] III, 8. Cf III, 11: 'I began to behave somewhat more reputably than before, since (!) I had such magnificent hope to have a little banner in the near future.'

[26] III, 14; cf. III, 19: 'I could behave so humbly it seemed I had never known arrogance.' In ch. III, 20 an old clergyman is taken for a ride.

[27] IV, 13.

[28] V, 28.

[29] VI, 1.

[30] The treacherous luck that is something like the Sirens (III, 16).

[31] VI, 9.

[32] VI, 9: 'I make you, more than other people, now big, now small, now rich, now poor, now high, now low, now happy, now bad, now good. In a word, now this way, now that.'

[33] VI, 11–12. At the end the paper says to Simplicius: 'The way you treat me now is exactly how death will deal with you.'

On his South Sea island the hermit fastens 'biblical texts and other lovely quotations' on to the trees to spur himself to devotion. The 'noblest' of these quotations, the only one recorded, runs as follows:

> O highest and greatest Good! dwelling in a light so >   dark!
> That for very brightness we cannot see the greatness >   of the gleam.[37]

This quotation, which Grimmelshausen derived from a polyhistorical source (Garzoni's Piazza Universale) and which Vittoria Colonna placed at the beginning of a sonnet, simply encapsulates the fundamental doctrine of Denys the Areopagite: Dazzling Darkness—which now appears to Simplicius as the foolishness, the roguishness, of divine glory.

---

[34] As Paul Gutzwiller rightly argues in Der Narr bei Grimmelshausen, Diss. (Basel, 1959), 70–81.

[35] Cicero.

[36] First Continuatio, Simpl. Schriften I, 554.

[37] VI, 24.

There can be no doubt about the sincerity of the author's conversion to the Catholic faith; at the end even his hero ratifies his own conversion, compelled as it was in the first instance by the fear of Hell. Yet both of them are very pensive and reserved about the multiplicity of Christian denominations. The only real madman in the book, a man who thinks he is Jupiter and professes to govern and judge the world, is also the only one to consider a unification of the Christian Churches. He wants to dispatch a great German hero to restore universal peace to the world; he will abolish the 'exceedingly harmful divisions' and by 'his lofty reason' bring about unity.[38] Simplicius himself has a more modest vision. He admits he is 'neither Petrine nor Pauline' (Protestant); he just 'believes simpliciter what the twelve articles of the universal holy Christian faith contain', but he does not see why it should be 'unfitting for a Christian' to venerate the Mother of his Redeemer. In any case, are not all other religions of the opinion that they are the only true one? Faced with the mutual denunciations of the denominations, he must be allowed temporarily to postpone his decision until he can see things more clearly.[39] That is an almost Lessing-like point of view,[40] and was very common in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries among those who could only see disobedience to the Gospel in the divisions of Christianity and consequently nothing of God's glory. Grimmelshausen manages to be a faithful Catholic and at the same time completely tolerant because of what he believes about God's unlimited mercy—at the time this was a rare achievement.

[38] III, 5.

[39] III, 20.

[40] 'One religion must be right, and the other two wrong. Were I to announce my allegiance to one of them without mature reflection, I might end up with the wrong one instead of the right one, and then I'd be regretting it for eternity. I would rather stay on the main road than get lost down a side-street. What's more, there are other religions besides the ones we have in Europe . . .' (III, 20).

So everything remains eschatologically open. The world is unbearably strife-torn, and man constantly has to look for the right way out of the labyrinth, but only God knows the door. Behind the vanity of the world the great struggle between Heaven and Hell is being played out. Hell, together with its strategy and tactics, is familiar territory, and in the final book it is again graphically described.[41] In the case of heaven there is nothing comparable, just a wide-eyed glimpse of the incomprehensible mercy of God embraced by faith. In the world the devil is glaringly visible everywhere, but God is not his opponent, but inconceivably transcends position and opposition. The meaning of the hermit's wonderful night song at the beginning of the story, 'Come, night's consoler, O Nightingale', is that, though we have to live in the dark, no night can prevent us from singing God's praises, and that it is not just beautiful sounds that harmonize in this praise:

Even the owl, which cannot sing,
Shows by its screeching
That it too wants to praise God.

And this 'harmony' sounds so lovely to the boy that he wants to join in.[42] In the course of his life the owl's screech becomes the screech of all the dark powers of this world and of the abyss, and the harmony dies away into inaudibility. Just occasional snatches of the melody can be heard later and are carefully recorded. There is the sweet music of the universe as represented by the spirits of Mummelsee, who are endowed with reason and mortal, though sinless, and can serve as an example to men, who have been chosen for something so much higher.[43] Simplicius hurls himself into this cosmic centre like a new Empedocles leaping into the crater of Etna.[44] There are the pure communities of Hungarian Anabaptists, who, like the 'Jewish Essenes' in Josephus, thought they could achieve a 'lovely harmony' of the kingdom of this world and the Kingdom of God, 'so much

[41] VI, 2–8.
[42] I, 7.
[43] V, 12–17
[44] V, 12.

so that it seemed to me it surpassed even the monastic life'.[45] At the novel's beginning and end there is the possibility of a total detachment from the world in the eremitical life, and in that perhaps a definitive anchoring of the heart in God,[46] though here too it 'could be necessary to proceed with caution, as if we were still living among people in the midst of the world'.[47] Finally, there is perseverance in foolish and roguish wisdom 'in the midst of the world' and in the incomprehensible contradiction between the wisdom of eternal love and the cleverness of the devil. The defenceless heart is exposed to both. Like Homer long ago, but now with a Christian intensity, man explains himself in terms of the ascent to the God of mercy.

g. The Christian as Idiot

DOSTOIEVSKY

The period in which classical antiquity was transmitted, the age of speculative theology, did not raise or develop the theme of folly, at least not in the deeper, metaphysical sense. Classicism confined itself undialectically to the beauty of the finite natural and human form. It went in for the evolutionary novel, in which the hero does indeed begin in relative folly or naivety but is then educated into wisdom, usually by a providence more human than divine (for example, by a benevolent secret society as in Goethe's Wilhelm Meister). Idealist romanticism, however, lives in the tension between the finite and absolute subject. The Absolute can inspire the man of genius to the point of foolish and farcical behaviour (e.g. Kreisler, E. T. A. Hofmann's conductor), and yet in the process he only proves his superior intelligence. On the other hand, the Absolute Spirit can also use as its base a spirit-less finitude or materiality—in other words, a non-ground of non-sense (cf. Baader and Schelling). Again, for Jean Paul, the hall of mirrors of the absolute 'I' can produce insane persons, but their insanity is merely a punishment for misunderstanding reality, not an expression of being exposed to it. When Idealism, fatigued by thinking, falls back into its Indian origins, as happens in the case of Schopenhauer, the whole world of the intellect becomes madness, a madness which aesthetics unmasks. This fatigue then teams up with the absolutised Eros of Gottfried's Tristan to produce the hybrid art of Wagner, who nowhere—neither in the revival of the myths of the Nordic gods nor in Tristan or Parzival—confronts real existence.

---

[45] V, 19.

[46] As the conclusion to Book 6 describes it.

[47] VI, 21.

Then, quite unexpectedly, the folly motif reaches its climax in a work that surpasses all previous forms—Dostoievsky's Idiot (1868). With instinctive self-assurance the author discards triviality and frustration and roots the world of beauty in the sphere of glory. For here we have moved beyond the two great attempts in the modern age to reduce glory to beauty, to regard (classical) beauty as glory enough: Classicism and Romanticism. Classicism provided the images, while idealist Romanticism—the real creator of modern aesthetics—constructed the theory. However, once Marx and Tchernischevksy (1855) have left behind Hegel's philosophy and aesthetics, once God and the spiritual have been banished from the universe and its laws, the only choice left is between materialistic and atheistic aesthetics. Dostoievsky[1] had contacts with the early Communist circles and, along with many others, was condemned to death. In the bitter cold he was led out to the place of execution to be shot. He had expected certain death and had anticipated it in his mind, but instead he was sent off to the 'house of the dead', Siberia, where he was humbled into naked Christianity. On his return home appeared (after the Raskolnikov prelude) the three novels with a universal vision: The Idiot, The Brothers

---

[1] [Tr. von Balthasar uses the German translation of The Idiot by E. K. Rahsin (Sämtliche Werke I, 3–4). We shall use the Penguin translation by David Magarshack (Harmondsworth, 1955). References will be to the page numbers of this version]. A general interpretation of the work of Dostoievsky can be found in my Apokalypse der deutschen Seele, Bd II (1939), pp. 202-419. On the 'Idiot', cf. the study by Walter Nigg, Der christliche Narr, pp. 349–403, with bibliography.

Karamazov, and The Devils. The Idiot the author's favourite book and his child of pain, contains all that follows in kernel.

'The fundamental idea is the portrayal of a truly perfect and beautiful human being. And that is a very difficult thing to do, especially these days. Every writer, not just our Russian ones but foreign writers too, every writer who has attempted to describe positive beauty has proved unequal to the task, because it is incredibly hard. What is beautiful is what is ideal, but the ideal, here just as much as in civilised Europe, has not been secure for some time now. There is really only one positively beautiful figure: Christ. This infinitely beautiful figure is without doubt an eternal miracle (St John's gospel is full of the idea: John sees the miracle in the Incarnation, in the appearance of the beautiful). I have gone too far in my explanations.'[2] Dostoievsky wanted to show, not the miracle itself, but the reflections of the miracle in a figure who can be called a Christian. The sphere of 'miracle' is superior to the sphere of worldly beauty. Prince Myshkin, last of his race, epileptic, spends his youth in the Valais Alps and is given a partial cure from a degree of self-alienating idiocy by a sensible doctor. In Switzerland he experiences the beauty of nature, which in the main causes him 'terrible depression'.[3] Later, after his return to Russia, fate places him between two very beautiful women. When he has to make a judgment about Aglaya, he says: 'It is difficult to pass judgment on beauty. I'm afriad I am not ready yet. Beauty is a riddle.'[4] For Dostoievsky, what that means is this: beauty is in no way a straightforward transparency for the divine: it can just as easily be a mask and sacrament of the devil. While the mountain landscape leaves Myshkin with the impression that he can 'hear some mysterious call to go somewhere',[5] the consumptive and mortally ill youth, Ippolit, is only irritated by it: 'What do I want with your nature, you Pavlovsk park, your sunrises and sunsets, your blue skies, and your smug faces, when all that festival, which has no end, has begun by refusing admission to me and me alone?'[6] Even if one accepts that 'my worthless life, the life of an atom, may simply have been needed for the completion of some universal harmony, for some sort of plus or minus, for the sake of some contrast, etc., just as the lives of creatures are daily required as a sacrifice because without their deaths the world could not exist', I Ippolit, must still confess that such cosmic harmony neither interests nor concerns me. For 'how can man accept responsibility for what he cannot understand', namely, that the harmony of the universe is built on pain and death? And so, as Ivan Karamazov will do later, Ippolit refuses to agree with this cosmic harmony and gives back his 'entry ticket' to eternal blessedness by means of the only action with which he can disturb the harmony or at least protest against it—suicide.[7] The great aesthetic argument from Plato to Augustine and Boethius, from Erigena and Bonaventure to Bruno, Hölderlin and Hegel, has lost its force. For the nineteenth century hardly anything divine shines through the beauty of this world.

---

[2] Raskolnikov's Diary, ed., Fülop-Miller (1928), p. 168.

[3] 82.

[4] 105.

[5] 85.

But Myshkin is not a prince for nothing, a prince of ancient lineage. He shows he is conscious of this in his last great speech to the distinguished, partly grand-aristocratic gathering at the Yepanchins (he speaks in the shadow once again of his illness, which this time takes definitive hold of him): 'You think that . . . I am . . . a democrat, an upholder of equality? . . . I am afraid for you, for all of you, and for all of us. For I am a prince of ancient lineage myself, and I am sitting among princes. I am saying this to save you all, so as to prevent our class from vanishing for nothing into utter darkness, without realising anything, abusing everything and losing everything.'[8] He is one of Parzival's race, naive,[9] simple,[10] though his simplicity is not of the natural primitive kind that would need to be transformed slowly into Christian humility. No, by virtue of a mysterious deficiency, conditioned by his illness, he is, as it were, by nature inserted into humility. Like Don Quixote, he is a 'virgin knight errant'[11] and a ridiculous one at that, because in his naivety he lives by an ideal which contradicts all conventional experience of the world. Aglaya puts his letters into a copy of Cervantes' novel,[12] and recites to him, half jokingly, half in earnest, Pushkin's 'Ballade of the Poor Knight', in which the poet describes a medieval knight of Our Lady, who, in penitence, turns away from all earthly women and fights for Christendom. Finally he dies, 'ever silent, sad, and cheerless, of reason bereft', and is exalted by his Mistress to the paladin of the eternal Kingdom.[13] Cervantes/Pushkin now rises from the dead in the person of the prince, who listens to the ballade 'as embarrassed as a ten-year-old boy'. For Aglaya he is a person who has 'devoted his whole life to an ideal. This does not always happen in this age'.[14] In fact, in Christian times there was 'an idea stronger than any calamity . . . Show me anything resembling that force in our age of liners and railways . . . There is more wealth, but less strength; the binding idea is no more; everything has become soft, everything is flabby.'[15] Myshkin in the end is close to Simplicius in the sense that he moves, as it were naturally, in the world of sinners, and yet he is totally different from Simplicius, because he does not have the will to sin, but only the will not to distance himself in any way from the sinner, to be, simply and unreflectively, alongside him.

---

[6] 451.

[7] 455f.

[8] 595.

[9] 'Prince, you're so naive' (306).

[10] 571ff.

From several starting-points the author moves on to the mysterious point of identification, which is the point of absolute reality, though ordinary awareness never makes contact with it.[16] Dostoievsky draws on his own experience: those five minutes before the execution. What enormous intensity, pregnant with eternity, what fullness they had! Myshkin has seen an execution and thinks his way into the condemned man's awareness of the time.[17] The moment is intensified by the feeling of absolute dread, by the 'absolute certainty' of what is approaching: the very moment nothingness appears, being totally disappears. At this boundary, one realises what it means to say: 'There shall be time no longer'.[18] In a quite different way, the tremendous sense of light and elation which is the prelude to an epileptic attack takes one beyond the bounds of time. Dostoievsky realised that this experience was ambiguous and made literary and philosophical use of the ambiguity; indeed, it was only as work on the novel proceeded that the humble figure of Myshkin began to distinguish itself in the author's mind from the proud figure of Stavrogin (the character in The Devils who thinks he has experienced identity with God). Myshkin himself knows about this ambiguity. True, it means a massive increase in 'direct self-perception' and, as a consequence (!), an awareness of a 'higher being'; but ultimately, it is an 'interruption of normality', because it is 'just an illness'. But 'what if it is a disease and abnormal?' and 'what does it matter to me that it is normal or not normal?' The 'fact' remains, 'it awakes in me a feeling undivined till then, enables me to experience greatness, fullness and eternity . . .' The fact that the consequences are 'stupor, spiritual darkness, idiocy' does not invalidate the first truth.[19] And then there is a third, omnipresent motif: the Holbein picture in the Basel museum, which Myshkin and Ippolit encounter again as a reproduction in Rogozhin's hall—the cadaver of Christ, lying horizontally, putrid blue. This is the death of Him who is priceless. His real death, not His apparent death. It is the victory of nature, which 'as some huge engine of the latest design . . . has senselessly seized, cut to pieces, and swallowed up—impassively and unfeelingly—[this] great and priceless Being'; on the day when God Himself is dead, eternal life coincides with eternal death.[20] For Dostoievsky this picture is the symbolic diacritical point between faith and unbelief, between Christianity and atheism: twinned to the point of identification in the most extreme differentiation.

---

[11] 623.

[12] 219.

[13] The Ballade scene, 285f.; cf. 383.

[14] 282.

[15] 417. Cf. 563: 'In those days people seem to have been animated by one idea, but now they are much more nervous, more developed, more sensitive . . .'

[16] '. . . life [is] . . . the continuous and everlasting process of discovering it—and not the discovery itself' (433).

---

[17] 46–49, 86–93.

[18] 421f. Cf. also Lebedev's prayer for the Countess Du Barry, who in her fear of death screams beneath the guillotine: '"Wait one more moment, Mr [Executioner], just one little moment!' And for that little moment the Lord will perhaps pardon her, for a greater misère than that it is impossible to imagine for a human soul' (228).

[19] 259.

There are three improbable ways into the depths of reality: 'the more real it is, the more improbable it sometimes appears to be'.[21] These ways allow at the same time both an insight into human hearts and a communication with them. This insight has nothing in common with 'depth psychology', and the communion has just as little to do with tout comprendre c'est tout pardonner. Psychology 'establishes' things, whereas Myshkin understands by overlooking or forgetting or, if you like, forgiving. But he does not forgive because he 'understands', but because he loves. Everyone else 'understands' well enough the fault, the sin; it is clearly exposed, an objective reality. Myshkin forgives it by overlooking it, and thereby makes himself look ridiculous, an idiot. Indeed, the young nihilists subject him in a most offensive way to calumny and mockery in a pamphlet that is read out to him: 'The article . . . never mind, let's forget it. I just think—it is totally untrue', so there is no point in talking about it.[22] The fact that Myshkin does not bear any grudges, that, in so far as it concerns him, he forgives everything, means that he is all the more shamelessly deceived. 'The prince will most certainly forgive him, if indeed he has not forgiven him already. He may even have thought of an excuse for him. Haven't you, prince?'[23] 'To know that you have been deceived and yet to trust! That was all we needed! But then, what else could we expect from you?'[24] It is 'naivety, blind trust, unsuspicious of derision or ridicule',[25] and precisely that is the ultimate absurdity. That fact is not lost on the prince: 'You know, in my opinion, it's sometimes quite a good thing to be absurd. Indeed, it's much better, it makes it so much easier to forgive each other and to humble ourselves.'[26] [20] 85, 93, 250ff., 446f.

---

[21] 414.

[22] Cf. 301.

[23] 326.

[24] Cf. 356.

[25] 372.

Myshkin's love is frequently given the name 'compassion', but basically only to distinguish it from any kind of erotic love: 'Compassion is the chief and perhaps the only law of all human existence.'[27] Only an ignorant person could raise the objection: 'Even compassion must have a limit. Why, an exaggeration like that is—is quite incredible!'[28] Myshkin himself explains that he loves the dubious character Nastasya Filippovna 'not out of love but out of compassion'.[29] That is why he can say of her straight out: 'No, I don't love her.'[30] And yet 'his heart is pierced through' by her.[31] Nastasya, abused by a wealthy rake while she was still a minor, feels—in Hölderlin's meaning of the word—to the deepest fibres of her being, that she has been 'insulted'. She has an 'insatiable need for contempt',[32] 'a conscious delight in her misfortune'.[33] She plays the part of the 'shameless woman', the 'reprobate', to which she has been reduced.[34] She enjoys giving the 'theatrical performance' of a 'fallen angel'.[35] The prince loves her with a non-erotic love and so can see through the tragic game she is playing to delude herself and the world,[36] with the result that she finds herself in the hopeless situation of returning the prince's love in all simplicity (and that she does) but in the process having to give up the game she is playing (and that she cannot do). And so, on the one hand: 'The prince . . . is the first man . . . in whom I can [26] 595.

[27] 263.
[28] 624.
[29] 244.
[30] 472.
[31] 473, 615.
[32] 69.
[33] Cf. 74.
[34] Cf. 201f.
[35] 613.
[36] 147, 196, 173f.

believe as a true and loyal friend. He believed in me at first sight, and I believed in him.'[37] On the other hand: 'And when I offered to marry her, she told me that she did not want condescending sympathy or help from anyone, nor did she want anyone to "raise her up to his level".'[38] Rogozhin, who loves Nastasya erotically to the point of madness, is savagely humiliated by her. He draws his knife, first against Myshkin, and then against Nastasya, and has the last word. At the last moment, she flees from Myshkin into the arms and on to the knife of Rogozhin.[39] She flees from the honour in which the prince held her[40] to the dishonour which she so obstinately maintains: 'I am incapable of self-humiliation from purity of heart.'[41] She is right about one thing: Myshkin's nature, his love, cannot be kept within the limits proper to marriage, which he offers each time only under constraint.[42] Just as unjustifiable from the worldly point of view is his attitude to money. He lavishes it upon rogues, despite dire warnings; gives away his lawful inheritance to lawless creditors; consciously lets himself be deceived; purchases the old liar Ivolgin's release from the debtors' prison; gives money to his slanderers; in short, he commits every conceivable kind of folly. And he lives these evangelical counsels in a totally unconscious way, without any awareness or intention of doing anything connected with perfection; on the contrary, he gladly gives heed to every criticism of his stupidity, indeed, to every pronouncement of his guilt: 'Yes, yes!' the prince said again, in terrible distress, 'you're right. Yes, I'm to blame'.[43] 'Oh, I feel that it was all my fault.'[44] Although at the same time he knows that 'it isn't that at all—it's something quite, quite different!'[45] And so he says with unsurpassable precision: 'Oh yes, I'm to blame all right! Most likely it's all my fault! I don't quite know how—but it's all my fault . . .'[46] That is the only way identification becomes possible. During the last minutes before condemnation, when I am quite alone, I think to myself: 'There are ten thousand of them, and none of them is being executed, but I'm going to be executed!'[47] Similarly with Rogozhin, the man who wants to murder Myshkin: the prince exchanges crosses with him as a sign of fraternity; he knows that he is involved with Rogozhin in a common sin;[48] they are both in a similar situation (the erotic obsession of the murderer and the ecstasy of the epileptic).[49] In the end, after the murder of Nastasya, Myshkin catches up with Rogozhin, caresses him in his delirium as if he were a little child, shares a bed with him on the floor, and sinks with him into fever and final illness.[50] In a similar way he had caught up with Nastasya at the moment of crisis, 'stroking her head again and passing his hands tenderly over her cheeks, comforting and soothing her like a child'.[51] The same is true of his relationship with Ippolit: he praises his 'confession' (the expression of his revolt against God and the cosmic order), and defends it against the criticism of both Ippolit himself and other people. 'I'm sorry you repudiate that confession of yours, Ippolit. It is sincere and, you know, even the most absurd parts of it—and there are many of them—. . . are atoned for by suffering . . . That idea that inspired you had certainly an honourable basis.'[52] This resembles the way Alyosha in solidarity listens to and defends the revolutionary manifesto of his brother Ivan—the 'Grand Inquisitor'. Being called 'a democrat, who has gone crazy over the modern nihilism' is a matter of indifference of Myshkin.[53] To the very end his conversations with Ippolit are conducted in a spirit of serious communication. Execution, epilepsy, the Holy Saturday picture: the three states of absolute isolation in which he unselfconsciously lives (there is never a word, never a thought, about the 'perfection' of this habitual abandonment, this transcendence and indifference). Only rarely is he asked about the Christian character of this state;[54] it suffices that people feel there is something disconcertingly unique about it—'the first honourable man I've come across' (Ganya),[55] 'the first man . . . in whom I can believe as a true and loyal friend' (Nastasya),[56] 'You're more honest than any of them, better, kinder, cleverer than any of them' (Aglaya).[57] The others say the same. And yet the prince does not live this condition in an unconscious dream-world; on the contrary, he is highly conscious and can be very decisive, as his sudden vehement outburst against Catholicism and for Russian Christianity proves. Catholicism is 'worse than atheism', because its use of 'the sword of Caesar' makes nonsense of Myshkin's state of life. It thinks it has to prop up the Church with 'universal temporal power', which immediately opens the way to socialist atheism. Both Catholicism and socialism are 'begotten of despair'; both seek to 'quench the spiritual thirst of humanity' without that one 'word of Christ' on which everything depends,[58] the last word Myshkin utters, in extreme excitement, before his epileptic attack in the Yepanchins' salon: love.[59]

---

[37] 186.

[38] 473.

[39] 249, 498, 638.

[40] 624. Myshkin is not only willing to 'take [her] just as [she is]' (195), he also thinks that she will be doing him an honour, not he her (cf. 196).

[41] 495.

[42] 'And how can one love two persons at once? With two different kinds of love?' (627).

[43] 622.

[44] 625.

[45] Ibid.

---

[46] 627.

[47] 91.

[48] 'If you hadn't raised your hand against me then (which God averted), what would I have seemed to you now? For I did suspect you all the same. The fact is, we were both guilty!' (402).

[49] 258. 'Almost all' they talk about together is the epileptic experience, and Rogozhin says that at that time Myshkin was his brother.

[50] 640–657.

[51] 616.

[52] 562.

This word expresses 'the whole essence of Christianity', the 'whole conception of God', the 'fundamental idea of Christ',[60] if we understand love in its deepest sense: as [53] 617.

[54] 420.

[55] 152.

[56] 186. Cf. 207: 'Rogozhin, come along! Goodbye, Prince. You're the first human being I've seen!' And 494: 'You alone are capable of loving not for yourself.'

[57] 378. Cf. 467: 'I think you're the most honest and truthful man I know.'

[58] Cf. 587f.

[59] 597.

[60] 253.

communication with the sinner, as communion with his guilt without the will to distinguish oneself from him and as the exchange crosses with him, as Holy Saturday, when Love died the death of sin with sin and for sin. The idiot knows for certain that no atheism, no revolutionary anti-Christian protest, ever touches the depths of this Holy Saturday mystery; it cannot, nor does it want to touch them. They will never talk about that.[61] Here all the rest is left behind. Here love always conquers in silence. But the person who dares to build his life on this scandal for all philosophy, theology and secular culture is destined to be ridiculed with such intensity that even Dostoievsky does not stand by his idiot, but takes flight in a naive, nationalistic chiliasm and puts impossible words into the mouth of Myshkin: 'Show [the Russian] the renaissance of the whole of mankind in the future and, perhaps, its resurrection by Russian thought alone, by the Russian God and Christ, and you will see into what a mighty, truthful, wise, and gentle giant he will grow before the eyes of the astonished world.'[62] So he is powerful, wise, a giant after all! It is true that 'humility is a terrible power',[63] but it cannot be used to drive the turbines of humanity. Myshkin's uncalculated destiny is to remain the ridiculous idiot. That is what everyone constantly calls him, whether sotto voce or unintentionally aloud; he is the man who is there, as it were by chance, to receive furious slaps in the face.[64] He is called, for want of a better word, a 'lamb'.[65] He is and remains 'a complete child',[66] and can be at his best with children.[67] He is practically incapable of loading a pistol,[68] and refuses a duel of honour ('There's nothing for us to fight about. I'll apologise to him, and that's all').[69] This humility provokes ridicule everywhere, but, almost incidentally, it also proves that pride is no less ridiculous. Thus, in the case of Ippolit's pathetic suicide, which is treated in a very comical way ('. . . in your place I should . . . make a point of not shooting myself just to show them'),[70] and which, at the decisive moment, completely fails, because 'purely by chance' the firing-cap had been forgotten.[71] 'That is just like him', comments Aglaya. [72]

---

[61] 250, 253.

[62] 588.

[63] 434.

[64] 146.

[65] Ibid.

[66] 101.

[67] Myshkin's story of the children and poor Marie (94–104).

[68] Cf. 392.

[69] 398.

Myshkin's idiocy eludes all psychological explanations, precisely because part of it—though only a part—is caused by his illness. On no account can it be said that his illness is a psychological stroke of luck in the sense that it transfers him to a state in which he can understand the state of his fellow men better, since he can share their experience without the dividing wall of individuality. Moreover, even the sinners play at confession and revelation as a party game; each tells the worst thing they have ever done, the idea being that 'the game loses its point as soon as anyone deviates, even in the slightest, from the truth'.[73] It is not hard to imagine the fun Dostoievsky would have had with depth psychologists and Freudians had he encountered them in his own lifetime. The chief function of Myshkin's illness is as a veil; it veils the Christian mystery from himself and from others. It is the mystery of the glory of absolute love descending from above, the love whose magical power lies beyond both disclosure and concealment, memory and oblivion, objective and creative interpretation. It also lies beyond idiotic simplicity and the most penetrating clarity of mind. Aglaya tries to explain the force of this mystery in Myshkin by distinguishing higher from lower mind; though the latter may be faulty, 'the most essential part of your mind is much better than in any of them'.[75] That is true, for Myshkin quite obviously possesses the gift of discernment, a knowledge of hearts that is often little short of prophecy; he knows people's hearts

[70] 456.

[71] 459.

[72] 464.

[73] Cf. 175f.

[75] 467.

better than they do themselves. And yet this charismatic aspect is not the most important thing about Myshkin, not even the most conspicuous. No, the most important thing about him is without doubt that simple love which is not really at home, cannot settle down or be classified, here below—Aglaya describes it as 'medieval Platonic love'.[76] Certainly, it is clearly distinct from original transcendent Eros, for that is wise, but Christian love is foolish and, in its earthly form, ridiculous.

Dostoievsky was able to expound the Christian theme of the fool with such discretion and at the same time such precision that he remains its master. True, Gérard de Nerval in a unique way had handled the theme of a Spirit-impelled madness practically and with artistic skill, but in the sphere of medicine and human ethics. True, Bernanos in his Diary of a Country Priest (1936) will deepen it theologically and ecclesially. He paints a vivid picture of a priest closely conformed to the Christ of Gethsemane, a man exposed to humiliating ridicule, and suffering vicariously, as Myshkin does, from an inherited illness, though losing thereby something of the delicacy and lightness of the Russian figure. Graham Green's 'whisky priest' (the novel's very title lays claim to the word 'glory'—The Power and the Glory, 1940) continues more the line of Simplizissimus than that of Myshkin; if the author's claim is to show the same truths as Dostoievsky, in Christian terms he is wide of the mark.

h. Christ in the Clown

ROUAULT

One more name must be mentioned, though it is not the name of a writer: Georges Rouault. At first, he attempted to represent Christian things in the language of beauty—until 1903 he was painting angels and other religious subjects, but then the prophet Léon Bloy with his Femme pauvre opened his eyes, and in order to express the vision of glory that had burst in upon him, he smashed the canonical form. The inconceivable light breaks from the 'humiliated and offended' alone; the caricature of the bourgeois brings to light the truth about him, the truth hidden from him; prostitutes need to be depicted only as they appear to the straightforward Christian eye. But it is in the clown that the most open image of human existence is to be found: wanderer without a homeland, unarmed and exposed, in the very ridiculousness of his costume revealed in all simplicity.

[76] 283.

In his pictures of clowns Rouault perfects a theme that made its first gentle appearance in Watteau's portraits of the italian comedians. In his enchanted Mozartian world, where music is in the air, Pierrot is at first only one charming character among many (the London 'Masquerade' and Italian 'Serenade', the Berlin 'Love at the Italian Theatre').[77] However, in the comedian picture of Althorp,[78] he is in melancholy isolation, and in the late 'Gilles'[79] he is totally dissociated from the hectic goings-on behind him and stands motionless before the beholder as a man of mystery. From Daumier and Baudelaire right up to Beckmann, Picasso, and Rilke (in the fifth Duineser Elegie), 'gypsies', the 'children of the ever-rolling wheel', 'knowing well all the routes to Heaven', 'far removed from the gurgle of lofty classicism or the last secret arms manufacture for world peace' (Rouault),[80] become an increasingly eloquent image, which receives its most powerful eloquence in the work of Rouault. The 'Tragic Clown' of 1903, whose features are scarcely distinguishable because of the sheerly disfiguring way in which they have been sketched, and the unfathomable 'Head Of A Tragic Clown' (1904), looking terribly through a veil of dark grey-blue, introduce the long series of portraits, in which it becomes almost irrelevant where the disfiguring element, the sinful element, wells up from: from this particular human being's cesspool or from other people's, those who deposit the ordure of their own ugliness on the person portrayed. In any case, what is comic and grotesque is tragic, and the artist's revolt against the disfiguring of men, like Dostoievsky's, increasingly becomes compassion. If the clown is the representative and summing up of all that is humanly grotesque, his portrait is bound, imperceptibly and in a continuous process, to turn into the image of Christ. The early 'Christ With The Crown of Thorns' (1905, New York), with His face streaked and contradicted by bright colour, is very close to the clowns; conversely, a picture like the 'Old Clown' (1917) has an affinity with many a portrayal of the face of Christ. It takes the eye of faith to see in Christ the humiliation and offending of eternal love and in one's disfigured fellow human beings the glimmer of the grace of Christ. Rouault's interest shifts more and more to producing this glimmer by means of hitherto unknown methods of painting. Colour, in the service of the eye of faith, receives a luminous power, indeed, a transparency and phosphorescence, which glows through even the late landscapes, making them holy ground. The effect is the same whether the scene is enlivened by a Christ with women or by ordinary poor people, whether it is called Galilee or some quite other place. And this is a poor, almost desolate world as far as its forms are concerned—the exact opposite of a classical landscape of Claude Lorrain or of one of the Impressionists. The glory that nevertheless fills it is not vegetative or atmospheric; it is more immanent and at the same time more transcendent; it is the same glory that streams from the face of despised and dying love. So the same interior style can hold sway over the two dark 'Miserere' series as well,[81] where the indictment of bourgeois society, sharpened by the horrors of war, changes into a profound fellowship in suffering with trampled, disfigured mankind. Only one clown, sorrowful unto death, still silently poses the question: Qui ne se grime pas?[82] Now identical gestures, by means of imperceptible modifications, express apparently contradictory things, in a kind of coincidentia oppositorum. 'The same throwing back of the head conveys, in one case, a Virgilian sense of sadness' (the wonderful picture in question has the subscript: Sunt lacrimae rerum),[83] in another case, the hope of a man condemned to hard labour,[84] somewhere else the resignation of a dying man,[85] and then immediately afterwards the odious complacency of a conqueror,[86] finally the regal suffering of the Virgin of the Seven Swords,[87] and then again the fixed gaze of a blind man consoling and guiding one who can see.[88] Man can also appear, as in the late Middle Ages, as a skeleton; indeed, to the eyes of this visionary it matters little whether he is clothed with flesh or not, whether the human condition is expressed by a tender feeling for the presence of Christ ('Seigneur c'est vous, je vous reconnais')[89] or by a mouldy sepulchre with piles of skulls to left and right and the black cross in the middle ('Celui qui croit en moi, fut-il mort, vivra').[90]

---

[77] H. Zimmermann, Watteau (1912), p. 24, cf. 183, 165, 35, 36.

[78] Ibid., 57 and the copy 139.

[79] Ibid., 96–97.

[80] Le Cirque de l'Étoile filante (Paris, 1938), p. 10.

---

[81] 58 etchings, printed 1927, published in Paris, 1948; a book edition in small format appeared at the same time.

[82] Plate 8.

Here the clown image and the whole metaphysics of that 'principal reason' (Myshkin), which in this chapter we have seen as honest, foolish, indeed idiotic reason, is superseded. The games of the fools from Parzival to Don Quixote and Simplicius were a merry prelude to the seriousness of the Idiot, but now the destiny of that lonely individual has become the destiny of mankind, a destiny which, at the point where human existence was proclaiming its senselessness and idiocy, has been taken up by the gentle divine Idiot on the cross. He silently contains everything in himself and imprints on everything His form, the form of the divine mercy, for which it is a matter of sublime indifference whether its glory is manifested invisibly in earthly beauty or in ugliness.

---

[83] Plate 27.

[84] Plate 6.

[85] Plate 47.

[86] Plate 49. From the introduction by Abbé Morel (p. 12).

[87] Plate 53.

[88] Plate 5.

[89] Plate 32.

[90] Plate 28.

4. THE KNOT. NICOLAS OF CUSA

a. The Remaining Themes and the New Beginning

After we have traced in rapid brush-strokes two lines which have their origin in the Middle Ages and reach out into the modern age—the 'metaphysic of holy reason' which begins with Eckhart, Ruysbroek and Tauler and continues without a break to Fénelon, and its reflection in the literary realm which as the 'metaphysic of foolish reason' reaches into the present, it is a matter of tracing both lines back to their source and—which is relevant to our problem—considering the whole intellectual scene at the beginning of the modern age. But first one thing is clear: neither the indifference of the saints nor the thrown-ness of the fool can raise any claim to conquer as a whole the world and existence therein. On either line human totality is not visible or only insufficiently so: the prevailing passivity before God (as the fashioning creator spirit) only with Ignatius of Loyola found an inner synthesis with active spontaneity; the fools on their side are only effective either as a stimulating contradiction (Jacopone), as a rebel (Villon), as a timeless and rootless utopian (Don Quixote), or they stride out over an incipient realm of folly (Parzival), often to become cunning rogues (Simplicius); seldom do they achieve a lasting memorial (even after they have sunk: Myshkin, close to whom one could place Kierkegaard and Bloy), or something both concealing and embracing at the point where all worldly reason comes to an end (Rouault). But to mock this worldly reason as folly, a priori, from a higher vantage-point, as Erasmus did for example, is to cut the knot before it has ever been tied; it means, expressed more deeply, precipitately to identify the analogy between created and uncreated reason with the contradiction between sinful-fallen and divine-redemptive reason.

Both the 'metaphysics of the saints' and the theme of the fool attempted in their own way to short-circuit the problem: they skipped the reality of the world which was left as a nominalist-positivist scene of wreckage, and they sought the gleam of the divine glory in an immediate supernatural. A third line then needed to be drawn, that of the Reformation, which in its original impulse rejected the philosophical mediation just as much. Only its consequences can be mentioned here: the sundering of ecclesiastical unity, and all the theological and political consequences that flowed directly from it, contradicted the nature and the task of the Christian Church to such an extent that it—in so far as it was disunited—lost its credibility for the world and with it its role as mediatrix of divine glory. So the first great movement which originates at the end of the Middle Ages, the re-awakening of classical metaphysics (in all its breadth from myth through philosophy to religion), becomes not only an intrinsic philosophical necessity—as the sinking down again of a positivistically uprooted reason into the fruitful soil of origin and heritage—but even more, the vital necessity for the existence of a Christian culture, which has to secure an elemental enduring religious unity, beyond the destructive hostilities of the confessions. That thereby the great ecumenical outlines of the Middle Ages have to acquire a 'liberal', finally an 'enlightened' colouring, in the context of the modern age, belongs to the unavoidable consequences of the disunity of the Churches.[1]

The first major movement, which embraces humanism (fifteenth century), the Renaissance (sixteenth century) and further the baroque (seventeenth century), the Enlightenment and German Idealism from Winckelmann to Schiller and Goethe, and to Schelling and Hegel (eighteenth–nineteenth centuries), can therefore be recognised as a cry to the mediation of antiquity for help by the Christian community, threatened by the loss of the world. There is something paradoxical about that, in so far as the whole of Christian intellectual history from Origen and Augustine through Boethius and Erigena to High Scholasticism was a perpetual dwelling in the thought-world of antiquity, and indeed with preference for the Platonic-Plotinian realm, which now once more—in the highest degree traditionally—was entered with rapture (after Dante and Petrarch) by the Florentine and the other Italian natural philosophers, and was made fruitful for metaphysics, art and religion. The darkening of human existence in the later Middle Ages, and also the darkening of the Christian realm of thought in late scholasticism, sufficed to give the impression to young eyes who beheld afresh the divine glory in the beauty of the cosmos, that they saw this for the first time since the Greeks. And because the Platonic-Plotinian view of the world understood itself as 'revelation'—an event in which the distinction of natural and supernatural becomes questionable, as the theology of the Fathers of the East and the West clearly indicates—it cannot be long before, for a further time in the long Christian tradition, the revelation of Christ is understood as the pinnacle, summation and synthesis of the whole divine revelation in the cosmos. Now more than ever are Plato and Plotinus 'baptised' as Christians before Christ, more than ever can the ancient gods be interpreted as partial aspects of God (as they seem to us in Homer) and be incorporated into Christian art and literature, more than ever the doctrine of the Logos spermatikos is seen to be valid not only in the case of the philosophies but in the religions inseparable from them, more than ever will the distinctively Christian be regarded as the highest example of the universal bridge between God and man.

---

[1] As Friedrich Heer has again and again convincingly shown.

But the wheel of history never turns backwards; on its spiral the point of the Renaissance lay higher than the point of antiquity, and so one or a few turns higher in either a Christian or a post-Christian realm in which no way lay open for a return to the naivety of the classical relationship to God. The passage of time becomes visible in the second major theme which will hold sway over the same period of the modern age and entwine itself with the classical theme, complementing it by a dialectic of contradiction: it is the theme, already familiar to us from Eckhart (where it had been broached, but was then abandoned), of the speculative doctrine of God, proceeding from the (Christian) experience of immediacy between the infinite and the finite I. A theme which was certainly already present in Plotinus and more strongly, because with a Christian edge, in Augustine, but which right up to Eckhart remained hidden under a double carapace: the theme of the classical 'shyness' before the divine and direct vision and utterance, and of the biblically deepened reverence before the unapproachable Doxa: qui scrutator est Majestatis opprimetur a Gloria (Prov. 25.27). And yet a friend of God like Eckhart was to tread the 'mysterious way inwards' which was reserved not for the slaves but for the friends, sons, heirs in Christ, immediately into the heart of the Father, indeed into the supra-trinitarian Ungrund of the still, dark Godhead. We heard the frightened cry of the 'Frankfurter' at the very edge of this abyss, his warning not to go further here, and saw at the same time how he succumbed to the fascinating temptation. For here too there was no way back, already the God of the Old Testament had been given up; Jewish Kabbalistic speculation invaded him, leading to Spinoza, to the Hasidim, to Salomon Maimon, to Hermann Cohen; it was rather the God of the New Testament that pointed the way from Boehme to Baader, from Fichte's speculation about the 'I' to the understanding of Christ in the young Hegel and to the pansophism of Rothe.

But decisive and characteristic of the age is the infinitely varied combination of both themes, something that constitutes both what is fascinating and kaleidoscopically ambiguous about the epoch and which finally, with Hegel, turns out to be a finished and done-with intermezzo. Where in antiquity the gods stood, there opens up now the realm of the relationship to the infinite I, a realm which will finally be controlled in different ways—ethically (Schiller), aesthetically (Schelling), erotically (Novalis), speculatively (Hegel), whereby, if not indeed the categories of the beautiful, yet certainly those of glory understood in either classical or biblical terms will pale.

Out of the combination of these two themes there finally emerges by itself the third principal theme of the modern age: that of evolution, which was entertained speculatively for a long time before experiment supported it. The world can come to lie nowhere else now than in the gap between the finite and the infinite I, and because, as long as pure materialism is avoided, the infinite I, even if simply as an idea, has the primacy, the world and man can in the end be nothing more than the goal of its Odyssean voyage of self-discovery. With the insertion of God into the world-process, however, his sovereign freedom over man is lost; speculatively, man emerges as an absolute standpoint, and consequently remains—in Feuerbach—the unique divinum in the landscape of thought.

At the point of departure of this double theme—classical mediation and speculation about God and Spirit—there stands, as almost an erratic block, NICOLAS OF CUSA,[2] who with a mighty hand ties together in a knot the threads of the great Western tradition—Hellenism and Christianity, past and future. Again, and with remorseless energy, fissiparous thought is plunged again into the primal philosophical act, as it achieved its finite and (as we said above) formally unsurpassable, classical form with Plotinus. This primal act, which enfolds all and can ever only posit itself and reflect itself, is the analogy of being: God is all in all, because he is inescapably all over all. So—as was noticed apropos

---

[2] The works fundamentally from the Paris ed. by Lefèvre d'Etaples (1514) cited (reprint 1962) by page (folio) recto and verso. The critical edn. of the Heidelberg Academy, so far as it has appeared, has been drawn on (in vol. XIII De Non-Aliud, ed. by L. Bauer, which is missing in the Paris edn.), similarly edn. by Petzelt (Philos. Schriften, vol. I, Kohlhammer 1949) and the translations with commentary of the Philos. Bibliothek in the Meinerverlag. The 'Cusanus-Texte' in the Sitzungsberichte of the Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften will be cited passim, also the 19 Predigten 1430–1441 (Kerle 1952) and the old translations by Scharpff (N. v. C., Wichtigste Schriften 1862).

Abbreviations: DI: de docta ignorantia, A: apologia DI, C: de conjecturis, DA: de deo abscondito, QD: de quaerendo deo, F: de filiatione Dei, DP: de dato patris luminum, G: de genesi, IS: idiota de sapientia, IM: idiota de mente, SE: de staticis experimentis, VD: de visione dei, PF: de pace fidei, CA: cribratio alchoran, LG: de ludo globi, Pr: de principio, B: de beryllo, P:de possest, NA: de non-aliud, V: de venatione sapientia, ATh: de apice theoriae, S: sermones.

Erigena—his scheme of thought returns again at the end of the Middle Ages: the world as explanation of the inexplicable, or as Nicolas puts it: as explicatio of complicatio. Philosophy is always simply the view through the unfolded into the enfolded, which is shown in the unfolded to be non-unfoldable. If Plotinus and still more Proclus and Erigena provide the classical foundation, then Eckhart offers the counter-theme that points to the future. With Plotinus the nous was already an image of the One, in its moved identity of thinking and thought, of its clear and yet dynamic transparency to itself, in its uniform integration of all that will be unfolded in the realm of the psyche: but it is only with Eckhart that the theme—in the solitary bringing together of the infinite (paternal-trinitarian) and 'created' (filial-begotten) spirit—contains a virulence, which with Nicolas will be used again in the problematic of mens: human spirit so much a reflection of divine spirit that, at the same time, as a reflection, it takes over the divine features as a 'second god' and genuinely becomes the creator of a reflected world (that of numbers), just as God is creator of the real world of things. Nicolas himself never consciously steps over the boundary of the analogy to an idealism of identity, but for those who are determined to make such a transition, everything is ready prepared.

Therefore, looked at as a whole, Eckhart is interpreted in accordance with Plotinus; the proof of this lies in the totally sovereign role of desiderium (as intellectual-ethical eros for God), while the theme of abandonment (Gelassenheit), which determined the 'metaphysics of the Saints', finds scarcely an echo. Thus Nicolas signifies a renewed, energetic replanting of all the fundamental truths of positive Christian theology in the total, cosmic and metaphysical revelation which seems to it. As examples there could stand: De Dato Patris Luminum, a verse of the epistle of James (1.17) which will be commented on (certainly with little strain) completely in accordance with Plotinus,[3] De Genesi, where the biblical account of creation is allegorised in a traditional manner (with reference to Basil,

---

[3] DP fol. 193r–196v.

Ambrose, Jerome, Augustine, and with echos of Chartres) and interpreted in the spirit of the Timaeus and Plotinus,[4] or De Sapientia I, where the simile of scent from the Song of Songs is interpreted neoplatonically in the manner of the Fathers (Gregory of Nyssa).[5]

If Nicholas, who was brought up by the Brethren of the Common Life, is happy to designate himself in their sense as idiota, this can only be justified objectively as a polemical thrust against the school philosophers, and his way of speech which often reaches the limits of presumptuousness has nothing to do with the ideal of folly, manifest from Parzival to Myshkin; at most, it reflects the Plotinian-Areopagitical reduction of the philosophical act to its 'simplicity': for the rest, Nicolas makes no secret either of his learning or of his will to gather together the whole of the Western tradition and as much as possible of the Eastern tradition (The Sifting of the Koran) in a synthesis with power to shape future thinking. Later Scholasticism has fallen from the spiritual to what is merely of the understanding; with it there is no longer any salvation. 'Because they hold wisdom to be nothing else than that which can be grasped by the understanding, and blessedness as nothing else than what they can attain, therefore they are far from the true, eternal and limitless wisdom and have devoted themselves to the finite.'[6] Where true authority and its chief emphasis lies, becomes recognisable when one hears the praises that he bestows on Denys the Areopagite: he is 'the greatest among theologians',[7] the 'great' and the 'divine',[8] the 'holy',[9] 'our Denys';[10] florilegia from his works support the main scaffolding of Cusan thought.

This means too that for the last time in the Catholic realm—perhaps until the new and differently-fashioned beginning found in Blondel's Action—the fundamental articulations of the historical revelation remain enclosed within the parameters of the paradox of the analogia entis. This paradox is not simply the harmonious rhythm of 'contraries', but, as with John Erigena, the coincidence of opposites (coincidentia oppositorum), which lie side by side, unseparated, in the transcendent being of God. How else should the Incarnation of God, as the coincidence of God and the creature, of unlimited and limited, of election and reprobation; how else should the Church, as the coincidence of the historically particular and the humanly universal; how else should faith, as the coincidence of not-seeing and a transcendent seeing on the part of reason; how else should grace as the Absolute making itself accessible, without which no finite spirit could think; how else theology, as the emptying fulfilment of the philosophical act; how else even the Trinity, as an expression of the supremely living transcendent unity, not-otherness, almightiness of the Absolute, reserve here any fundamental surprises which are not already contained more hiddenly or more openly in the primal paradox? It must be noticed that Nicolas neither is not wants to be any kind of rationalist or liberal, that he wishes the understanding of faith (intellectus fidei) to be interpreted throughout in the Anselmian sense as intellectus fidei, and understands himself as a faithful son of the Church (in which as vicar-general of Rome he was the highest next to the Pope, his friend Pius II). But that is only so because he understood the act of faith itself in the classical sense as the pinnacle of the philosophical act, in an inner analogy (of philosophical and theological faith), which could endure no breach.[11] No breach, then, such as Luther will shortly maintain between the God of faith and the God of reason; but then is not Nicolas already prepared for that darkness, that paradox of the Lutheran God? Do these two Germans, the one starting from Denys, the other from Augustine, really stand so far apart? One can ask how far the Cusan analogical panorama of the utter otherness of the mystery of faith levels it down and renders it harmless-before all, the mystery of the cross, of the descent into hell and the resurrection, but also of the gracious leading of Israel and of the Christian people; one can ask how far Nicolas succumbs to the danger of sacrificing the distinctive glory of the living God once more to an aesthetic cosmic scheme; but one must on the other hand hold before one's eyes, what here once again, for the last time perhaps, makes possible a cosmic universal view of the glory of the living God as this is understood by the message and demand of St Paul. The God whom Nicolas encounters in all things is no dieu des philosophes, he is a God who combines the universal features of the Plotinian with the lights of Homer, the dark depths of Sophocles and the eternal longings of Virgil in the reconciling power of the biblical event. It is therefore right when Nicolas so often and in such prominent places goes back to Paul's utterances in Romans and the Acts of the Apostles about the hidden God being manifest in his creation, that he, transcendent over the world, is distant from no-one and wills to be sought longingly by all, always and through all things.[12] It can be said that here a German eye has been assimilated to that Greek vision which Paul appealed to in both places and pressed into service. That vision, for which the simplest was the most incomprehensible, as the idiota says: qui mecum inteutur absolutam facilitatem coincidere cum absoluta incomprehensibilitate, non potest nisi idipsum mecum affirmare.[13]

---

[4] G fol. 69vff.

[5] IS 1, 76r.

[6] IS 1, 76v.

[7] NA c. 14. Baur 29.

[8] A fol. 36r.

[9] A 40r.

[10] A 38r.

---

[11] K. Jaspers, Nikolaus Cusanus (Piper 1964), 58f.

So one can expect from Cusa a vision of the unity of what in the context of the vision of reality found in Plotinus, Eckhart and the Bible may be manifest as 'glory'. We set forth this vision here, and we shall unfold it subsequently stage by stage.

b. Total Glory

It follows from what has been said that the Christian elevation of Plotinus' vision of God and the world formally implies the most favourable opportunity for an aesthetic theology. For Plotinus, Proclus and Erigena the world is the manifestation of the unmanifest God, which brings the fundamental aesthetic plan of form-light (harmony-idea of the spirit) into its highest use; but Christianly (=according to Eckhart) the unmanifest (Un-)grund of God is absolute freedom, which therefore, when manifest, implies the non-necessity, and therefore the sovereignty, of its manifestation. Both, taken together, imply: the 'shining forth' of the incomprehensible in the world-harmony (and its Heraclitean tension of contradictions reduced to unity: war as peace) is the shining forth of absolute sovereignty in a tension governed by law. But the self-glorification of God in his world rests upon his freedom, and therefore on his unfathomable love; so the relationship becomes bridal: the heart of the aesthetics of Nicolas is on the one hand the Trinity—Spirit-Love as glory between Father and Son—and on the other the wedding of God and the world in Christ in the mystery of the Spirit and the Church.

---

[12] Introduction of QD (197r) and the taking up again of the theme at the end (200r), the same broadly in the introduction to P (174v–175r) with reference to Acts 17.28: 176r (bottom), and once again reflecting on the beginning: 183v.

[13] IS 2, 79r. [he who beholds with me absolute facility coincide with absolute incomprehensibility cannot but affirm the same with me.]

The words resplendere, relucere, are everywhere, as an expression of the hidden revelation of God in the world. To begin with, in a platonic way: 'As in every spoon only the one, most simple form of a spoon shines forth in different ways, in one more, in another less, in none exhaustively (praecise)',[14] 'thus the infinite form is only one, the absolutely simplest, and it shines forth in all things as the precise original of each and every individual thing that can be formed'.[15] And this divine 'original shines forth in the mind as the truth in the representation',[16] 'it shines forth in it as God, who is all', so that the mind can make use of itself to come to know everything.[17] And since the creative radiance of God can encounter nothing since nothing is outside him, 'the creature can be nothing else than this radiance (resplendentia) itself.'[18]

[14] IM 2, 82r.

[15] Ibid., 2, 82v.

[16] Ibid., 3, 84v.

[17] Ibid., 3, 87r.

[18] DI 2.2, 14r.

In God as the not-other 'all other things shine forth (elucescunt)',[19] as likenesses in the original: 'therefore the original is the standard and ground of the image: and thus God shines forth in the creatures as the truth in the image.'[20] So far, this is Platonic. But the original is eternally-living Person, and therefore his 'manifestation' is 'speech': the sensible world is language, is a legible book (libri mentis ejus expressionem continentes),[21] indeed precisely a 'voice, in which God causes his spiritual Word to shine forth in a manifold way, so that all sensible things may be a manifold speech of God the Father through the Son as Word in the Spirit of all, with the end result that through sensible signs the doctrine of the highest teaching office is poured forth into the minds of men . . . so that man is the ultimate purpose of the sensible world and the glorious God the beginning, middle and end of all his works.'[22] Particularly in the Beryl is this thought strictly followed through and demonstrated with supreme skill, viz. that the ancient philosophical quest for the essence (quidditas) of things in their distinctiveness and uniqueness was bound to founder so long as they could not be conceived of as intentions (intentiones) of a God who communicates himself in the creation freely and sovereignly. 'So I say with the wise that there is no basis for any of the works of God in the understanding, but to the question why the heaven is heaven and the earth earth and man man, there is no other reason to be given than that the creator wills it so. It is so, as Aristotle . . . says: to investigate further would be a foolish and arbitrary search for a proof of the first beginning, what it was or was not . . . The will of the creator is the final reason, and the creator God is simple Reason, which fashions out of itself, so that the will is nothing else than reason or intelligibility (ratio), indeed the ultimate source of any intelligibility.'[23] The Presocratics, Plato and Aristotle 'attributed necessity to the first cause', in order thus to lend a necessity derived from thence to intelligible unities in the world, but in vain, for the contingent could not be absolutely explicated from the Absolute.[24]

---

[19] NA c. 9 concl., Baur 21.

[20] A 36v.

[21] FD 66r. The whole Compendium revolves round the problem of the existent as the language and expression of Being. [books containing the expression of his mind.]

[22] FD 67v.

There is therefore only 'one unique possible solution. For what does the creator will, when, through the revolution of the worlds and the instrumentality of nature, he draws forth from a thornbush such a beautiful and fragrant rose? What else can be the reply than that that astounding reason intends (intendit) to reveal in this its word, how deep is its wisdom and its intelligible motive and how great the riches of its glory, that it so lightly places such a wonderful and symmetrical beauty by means of such a slight thing in the apprehending sense, arousing joy and enhancing man's whole nature with sweet harmony.' And from the rose thought rises up to the higher revelations: in the whole life of living things, in intellectual apprehension holding sway beyond the relatively intransient forms (Aristotle!) and transient individuals. 'And so the teaching of the Gospel becomes ever more manifest, which gives to creation the purpose that the God of Gods is revealed in Zion in the majesty of his glory, which is the manifestation of the Father in whom is all delight.'[25] Because created things correspond to God's intention, they are good, as God himself says in the story of creation, 'so that the universe is a perfect revelation of the glory and wisdom of God.'[26] He himself remains beyond any worldly structure of beauty: 'above all multiplicity and number and harmonic proportion', and only 'to be seen without measure, number and weight',[27] to which vision the world points, as Trajan's column points to the 'knowledge of the glory' of this Caesar and to the indirect 'experience of his fame'; 'the column itself is not different from his will, even if the column is by no means will . . . but in the will wisdom and ordering sense are made known . . ., and the costliness of the work, which someone powerless could not have fashioned, is a reflection of the power of Trajan.'[28]

---

[23] B 29, 189v–190r.

[24] B 36, 192r.

[25] B 36–37, 192r–v.

[26] NA c. 23, Baur 55.

[27] A 36r.

As a preparation for a sermon on the Song of Songs ('Behold, you are beautiful, my love') Nicholas excerpts freely from the treatise of Albert de Pulchro et bono and intersperses it with his own comments.[29] Albert's definition of beauty as 'the radiance of form beyond the proportionate parts of the matter' with the additional determinations, that the beautiful draws longing to itself and unites all things, could offer Nicolas a congenial starting-point: the double dimension—the material or horizontal one of consonantia, the formal or vertical one of claritas or resplendentia—could be applied in a transcendental manner to the relationship of God to the world, and render unnecessary for Nicolas any more than a merely formal separation between the beautiful and the good. More important for him (and going beyond Albert) is the relationship of the transcendental good-beautiful to the human mind: even if the higher senses pass an inchoate judgment on the beautiful, only the mind which is open to all being possesses it and can—from the transcendental idea of the beautiful which, as mind, it has and is—judge the degree of the concretely beautiful.[30] It is the simplified fullness of the beauty of the world: here Plotinus' concept of mind becomes decidedly more important than the eros of the Symposium, which strives after the beautiful because it does not possess it. Thus the mens for Cusa (Plotinus' νοῦς) is only a created copy of the divine primordial beauty, which—in contrast to Plotinus—has to know itself as beautiful, in order

---

[28] NA 9, Baur 20.

[29] Excitationes, lib. 8, vol. II fol. 139v–141r., in Jos. Koch, Cusanus-Texte I, Predigten 7. Untersuchungen (Sitz. ber. Heid. Akad. 1942), pp. 167–168 quoted as Predigt no. 240, without reference to Albert.

[30] Natura . . . intellectualis . . . boni et pulchri naturam intellectualiter participat, quia haec est forma ejus . . . Nisi judex qui est intellectus in se haberet speciem pulchritudinis omnem sensibilem pulchritudinem complicantem, non posset judicium facere inter pulchra, dicendo hoc esse pulchrum, illud pulchrius, quare intellectus est quaedam universalis pulchritudo seu species specierum, cum species sint contractae pulchritudines . . . sic intellectus est vis complicativa omnium specierum intelligibilium, . . . antecedenter in se complicat omnes naturales pulchritudines, quae per species in universo implicantur. fol. 140v.

(as the ultimate source of all self-conscious mind) to be spiritually beautiful: 'But when beauty beholds or understands itself, then it is impossible that infinite love should not be enkindled thereby. See here the trinity in a unity of the essence of beauty, where the source of the beautiful gives birth to an understanding of the beautiful from which love proceeds.' This self-mastered beauty is the intradivine glory whose authentic place is the Holy Spirit: 'omnipotens autem gloria procedit ex omnipotenti intellectu se intelligente, . . . for without infinite glory the begetting almightiness cannot contemplate the almightiness begotten from it', and the glory therefore proceeds in order that the infinite understanding might become infinite 'goodness or love or delight or blessedness or joy'.[31]

Here there branch off important doctrines of Nicolas of Cusa: first, the general doctrine that the world could be created only for the sake of this intradivine glory, for the sake of its communication and knowledge,[32] and that, correspondingly, 'the science of praise (scientia laudis) is naturally born' in beings capable of knowledge, because the creaturely mind, reflecting on its nature, must think of itself as a ray of the glory of God, and therefore indeed is called to imitation of what is praiseworthy.[33] More important, and for Nicolas more characteristic, is the fact that the intradivine glory, even if it shines forth essentially in the creation, remains incomprehensible and unapproachable for the creature so long as God Himself in his freedom has not unlocked for the spiritual creature his inner mystery.[34] For the view from heaven to earth is one thing: this view sees only order, harmony and beauty; the heavenly Jerusalem is, so far as it extends, the region of love and therefore of beauty.[35] To the view upwards from below, however, the eternal love must make itself accessible by grace in order to be caught sight of at all, and if it then needs the freedom of the creature to respond to this love, it is once for all excluded by divine love's nature as grace, that man should 'attribute to himself the glory [the renown] of attaining blessedness', something Nicolas, together with Augustine, powerfully establishes against those philosophers who think to ascend to God by their own strength. 'For they did not know that the blessedness of God is grace', that only God's incarnate Word and his Spirit breathed into our soul draws us into the kingdom of his inner glory.[36] 'Thus Jesus Christ is the medium without which God's glory cannot be communicated . . . and the gift of Christ, the Spirit, folds into himself the power of each gift.' But this means in the concrete order subject to sin: 'there where the Father did not spare his most beloved Son and his Son gave himself up to death, so that we might acquire through the merit of his blood the purification of our souls: there God revealed best the praise of his glory (laudem gloriae suae), so that we might praise his infinite love and see, beyond refutation, that he is the only one to whom glory is due.' Where we 'acknowledge that we are in need of the grace of redemption and implore it in all humility, there we give God the glory, as is fitting, and the more greatly, the more we acknowledge our depravity.' So it is glorification by faith alone, for 'faith alone (fides sola) is able to strengthen the weakness of our spirit by the Spirit of Jesus, who lives in us by faith. For it is not in its own power that our spirit can become speculator majestatis.'[37] So God draws his glory out of everything: 'He made me man to prove by means of me his great power, by raising me to fellowship with the angels. He made me frail and weak to prove by means of me his power, by accomplishing his mighty works in me. He allowed me to sin, to show by means of me the power of his mercifulness and grace, when I am converted to him. He let me go astray to show by means of me the power of his wisdom in which he can raise me up again to knowledge of the true . . . life. He let all men sin, so that all might need grace, in order to prove the riches of his grace in Jesus Christ the Saviour of all.'[38]

---

[31] Excit. lib. 6, vol. II, fol. 103v. (Koch no. 181).

[32] Apart from the two sermons just quoted, cf. also B c. 3, Letter to Albergati (Cusanus-Texte IV, Briefwechsel: 3. Sammlung, ed. by G. v. Bredow, p. 26): 'Nothing induced the Creator to raise up this universe, this most beautiful work, except his own praise and glory which he wished to show forth. So he who is its origin is also the goal of creation. And because no king is recognised without praise and glory, the creator of all things too willed to be recognised, so that he could show forth his glory.'

[33] Letter to Albergati, 377.

[34] Excit. fol. 104r–v.

---

[35] Excit. fol. 141r.

[36] Ibid. fol. 104v–105r. The gloria invisibilis is only perceived per auditum, only by faith, not by vision. Therefore all 'knowledge of the kingdom of God' is convicted of stultitia: Excit. lib. 6, fol. 109v (Koch no. 183).

[37] Ibid. 105v–106r.

And yet these intimately Christian sounds are inseparable from the universal concept that all being is a revelation of the 'beauty or glory of God': for both concepts apply to God identically, so that with Nicolas (as with the Victorines) philosophical longing and Christian love are of a single essence: desiderium enim sive amor immutat continue amantem . . . attractione pulchritudinis seu gloriae dei. Nam non est gloria nisi in regia pulchritudine.[39] But this eros is for Nicolas itself caritas, because the attraction exercised by God's beauty is the answer of grace to the revelation of grace: pulchritudo de se amabilis caritas est, et ideo sine caritate nullus videbit absolutam pulchritudinem.[40]

But a few years after this sermon (1456) there was founded in Florence the Platonic Academy (1462); and even Nicolas' knowledge of the beauty of God,[41] of the 'beauty of his countenance',[42] with which the beauty of the world 'bears no kind of comparison',[43] is essentially determined by a vision of the world. The light from above is refracted in the sweet harmony of the cosmic numbers, the knowledge and understanding of which is mankind's authentic heritage, and which form the visible ornament which, as is again and again emphasised, earns for the world the name of cosmos which at the same time expresses the fact that it has been 'adorned' from elsewhere.[44] But this cosmos is so little something at rest that it is only comprehensible as the confluence and harmony of two contrary movements: as 'a kind of coincidence (coincidentia) of the descent of the identical to the non-identical, and of the ascent of the non-identical to the identical'; for the act of creation is the 'calling-out of the non-identical to the identical (evocat Idem Nonidem in Idem)',[45] the pyramids of light and darkness interpenetrating one another,[46] whence develops conflict (oritur pugna);[47] aesthetically speaking it is again the appeal of the beautiful (kalos from kaleo), now more believable because things are understood as 'words' of God. Thus it is possible to think that, from the point of view of ascent, the proportion of the material can become a condition for the radiance of form: 'Proportion is the place of form, for, without a proportion suited and measured to form, form cannot radiate forth . . . Proportion is like the suitability of the surface of a mirror to the reflection of a picture; when that no longer offers itself, then the representation ceases. Correspondingly the infinite, original unity can shine back only when the appropriate relationship is at hand, and this lies in number. The eternal spirit is like a musician who wills to render perceptible his thoughts: he takes a multitude of sounds and brings them into a relationship corresponding to harmony, so that in the medium of proportion that music sounds forth gently and perfectly, when it comes across itself there as in its hereditary place.'[48]

---

[38] Ibid. lib. 4, fol. 58v (Koch no. 56).

[39] Ibid. lib. 8, fol. 141r. [For desire or love continually changes the lover . . . by the attraction of beauty or of the glory of God. For there is no glory except in the royal beauty.]

[40] Ibid. 141r. [charity is beauty lovable by itself, and therefore without charity no-one will see absolute beauty.]

[41] Cf., e.g., QD 198r–v.

[42] VD 101v.

[43] P 175v.

But for Nicholas there stands between God and the world of the senses the created mind (mens, νοῦς), which, as God is the uncreated light and principle of everything, so after God and as his image and likeness is the created light and complicative principle of the materially unfolded world. In this mediation 'the mind is a kind of divine number, suitably proportioned in the best way to let the divine harmony radiate forth and thus to gather together into singleness all sensible, understandable and rational harmony . . . in such a manner that each number and each relationship and each harmony which proceeds from our spirit itself lays hold of our spirit as little as our spirit lays hold of infinite spirit. For this is also a divine number, it is indeed so much number that it is one simple unity, which brings forth its (particular) number out of its power',[49] in other words: the unity of the created spirit remains derivative; even when it is itself a 'qualitative number' in God's creative intention, it is as a 'this', indeed already a real number, and therefore the substrate called upon for God's manifesting glory. Man is a 'creative' unity in his effect on matter, as mathematician, technician, artist, but for the uncreated unity he is the many, which holds itself open to the grace of the intradivine unity. Nicolas of Cusa therefore prepares the ground for the ethos of two-in-one of the developing Renaissance.

---

[44] P 183r–v; G 70v.

[45] G 70v.

[46] C 1.11, fol. 46r–v.

[47] G 70v.

[48] IM 6, 85v.

c. Training in Analogy

What we have just outlined needs depth if it is not to remain schematic. It will prove that Cusa certainly provides a provisional sketch for the structure of the period—from the Renaissance to Hegel—which is just opening up, but in the best elements of his foundation outlives its collapse. His renewal of antiquity is more than renaissance: it is a retraining in the lost primordial articulations of human thought; his sketch of a philosophy between spirit and God can (but need not) be judged transcendental in the modern sense. From the classical point of view (as philosophy of being) and from the modern point of view (as philosophy of mind and of freedom), Nicolas' effort of thought always serves the accomplishment of the analogia entis.

I. CLASSICAL POINT OF VIEW

It is renewal against a scholasticism blinded to the mystery of Being: 'Blind and without knowledge of their blindness they imagine they can see, and in their imagining they are hardened in their doctrinal positions, just as the Jews, missing the spirit, are in the letter.'[50] Renewal therefore of the esoteric character of all theology: of the classical-'natural' and a fortiori of the Christian theology. The true God is encountered in rapture (stupor), in the suddenness that comes upon one (quasi via momentanei raptus, Plato's 'εξαίφνης),[51] 'the true theology cannot be entrusted to books', 'it is discourse about the kingdom of God, and this our master Christ calls the hidden treasure', which is only found by the poor in spirit: 'while today most of the professors, who administer the field of Holy Scripture and have heard that the treasure of the kingdom lies hidden in it, prize themselves already as wealthy owners.'[52] There are writers who can lead the way to true theology, such as Denys and his commentators, Maximus, Erigena, Hugh of St Victor, Robert of Lincoln, Thomas Gallus;[53] and others like Marius Victorinus, Proclus, David of Dinant, who are not suitable for everyone, as the unhappy attacks of Johannes Wenck on Nicolas more than sufficiently demonstrate.[54] There is not a twofold doctrine of God: a mystical and a so-called 'scientific'. In the case of God, the scientific means understanding that all creaturely knowing about the being of the origin remains a 'mirroring and a parable',[55] speech in riddling images (aenigmatice)[56] and therefore in conjectural outlines (conjecturaliter). Hence the titles of two of his early works: 'Of learned (i.e., become conscious of this itself through thought)

---

[49] IM 7, 86v.

---

[50] A 40r.

[51] A 36v.

[52] A 35r.

[53] A 38r.

[54] Edn. by E. Vansteenberghe: 'Le de ignota litteratura de Jean Wenck de Herrenberg contre Nicolas de Cuse' in BGPhM VIII/6 (1910); Nicolas' answer is the Apologia doctae ignorantiae fol. 34vff. Rud. Haubst, 'Studien zu Nikolaus von Kues und Johannes Wenck', BGPhThM XXXVIII/1 (1955). Cusa was defended by his friend, Bernhard von Waging: Laudatorium doctae ignorantiae etc., in E. Vansteenberghe, 'Autour de la docte ignorance', BGPhM XIV/2–4 (1915).

[55] P 183v.

[56] P 177v.

Ignorance', and 'Of Conjectures' (as the basic philosophical outlines). To make serious metaphysical conjectures one must have attained the experience of metaphysical thinking.[57] For this the 'learned ignorance' becomes 'sacred' (sacra),[58] indeed 'most sacred' (sacratissima) ignorance.[59]

Each concept is finite and cannot contain the infinite, which it intends, and which announces itself and conceals itself in it. According to the formula of Proclus, it 'participates in that which is imparticipable'.[60] Thus the expressions of Erigena come back again: wisdom 'is known in no other way than such that it is higher than all knowing and unknowable, inexpressible in every expression, incomprehensible by every understanding, immeasurable by every measure, concluded in no conclusion, unlimited by any limit, brought into no relationship by any relation, comparable by no comparison, unformable by any form, . . . capable of being positioned in no positioning, undeniable by any denial, indubitable in any doubt, unsupposable in any supposition.'[61] Contrariwise that means that the nameless God can be called by many names, indeed by all names, for he is the object of all suppositions of naming: hoc autem modo ineffabilis est effabilis, imparticipabilis participabilis,[62] and there is 'the vision granted to us of the invisible God'.[63] 'Invisible are you, as you are; visible, as creation is, which it is in so far as it sees you.'[64] Thinking is the movement of this essential vision; so being created coincides with the eros that is drawn towards God, with the radical desiderium of the creature: in idem coincidit esse et

---

[57] Qui per doctam ignorantiam de auditu [by hearsay] ad visum mentis [to clear vision] transferuntur, ii certiori experimento scientiam ignorantiae se gaudent attigisse. A 34v, cf. IS 1, 77r. It is a matter then of tasting knowledge experimentaliter. Scire multas amoris descriptiones, quas sancti nobis reliquerunt, sine amoris gustu vacuitas quaedam est.

[58] A 38v.

[59] VD 107v.

[60] NA c. 10, Baur 21.

[61] IS 1, 76r.

[62] FD 68r. [in this way then the ineffable is expressible, and the imparticipable participable.]

[63] A 35v.

[64] VD 104v.

desiderare:[65] a movement like the ephesis of the Plotinian nous to the eternally transcendent One, which opens and lights up an intellectual space through an infinite longing after the spiritually infinite. 'Thus this holy unknowing of your greatness is the most longed-for nourishment of my understanding . . . How could desire not desire to be more? Whether our will desire being or non-being, the desire as such cannot rest, but reaches out ever further . . . Thus the more I conceive you, my God, as inconceivable, the closer I approach you.'[66] Thus Nicolas calls all his sermon-outlines excitationes: incentives, stimulants.[67] The eternal movement towards Being is philosophical (as Aristotle always demands to ask the question about Being), as a quest after quidditas, about which one 'knows', in order to be able to seek it, and which in endless approaching 'is seen from afar' (with Gregory the Great).[68] This indestructible stretching-forth is either fulfilled by God, and then is eternal blessedness, in which the spirit 'is ever moved in a most blessed longing, so that it may attain that of whose gracious closeness it never has enough';[69] or it is, if God does not fulfil it, 'eternal torture: to possess a rational nature and never to attain to reason'.[70] That is Gregory of Nyssa,[71] Augustine and his thirst 'as the hart desires the waterbrook';[72] it is universally Christian, without giving up the classical basis, because God, in revealing Himself, 'increases to fulfilment what nature denies us'[73] and thus does not give up the analogia entis (and therefore negative theology).

The explanation of the analogy of being proceeds inherently from the 'inconceivable' fact, that God is all (otherwise he would not be God), and yet the world exists, and this real world cannot be added to God's reality as an increment. God must be all the reality in the creature, and yet not be immersed (immersibile)[74] in it by this in-being, remaining unmingled (nec immisceri)[75] with it, he must indeed therefore be restlessly immanent in it[76] only because he is already in himself in simple totality everything that it is in its individuating unfolding. So the opposition between explicatio and complicatio becomes to begin with the 'best guide' to the intellectual ascent, especially when it is observed how already the resolutions in the world (of what is sensible and manifold in the Spirit) foreshadow the all-embracing mystery.[77] 'Just as what is sensible to sense is not sensible to the understanding, because it is not apprehended by the senses therein, but is intelligible and understanding itself, so [similarly] everything that is worldly in the world is unworldly in God, because here it is divine', or rather is the one God Himself.[78] For on the one hand 'If he were not truly himself the being of the totality and of every individual, how then could he bring it forth out of non-being?'[79] And on the other hand, he must 'really be all possible being', something possible only if he 'is everything in an enfolded way'.[80] If he is really the possible in the unity, then he does not need to be unfolded, in order to be really himself; not for a moment does Nicolas' intention run in the direction of Hegel. God as God cannot be unfolded or increased, he is 'simplicity before every root',[81] therefore attainable by no analysis or synthesis,[82] his unity has nothing to do with number (which would be capable of increase or division),[83] but if each thing in the world is a something in order to be able to be and be the image of God, then it is God and yet always an other over against the things that coexist with it, something that cannot be said of God. With the discovery of this 'divine name': the not-other (non-aliud), Nicolas belives that he has taken a mighty step beyond Proclus and Eckhart. For this name is not only negative in the sense of a simple negation of the finite-creaturely, but is so negative that in any context he is so *pre*supposed (because anything is 'not-other' than what it is), and therefore simply supposed before anything, because in the context itself the 'other', the thing's particularity, commands attention.

---

[65] G 73r. [to be and to desire coincide in the same.]

[66] VD 107v.

[67] Cf. IS 1, 77r: motus desideriosus in excitatione.

[68] ATh 219r.

[69] IS 1, 77r.

[70] Ibid. 76v.

[71] Cf. my Présence et Pensée (1942), first part: La Philosophie du devenir et du désir.

[72] QD 2000r.

[73] P 178v.

---

[74] DI 3.1, 24r.

[75] DI 2.2, 13v.

[76] On the in-being of God in everything: Possest, German tr. n. 112.

[77] IM 9, 89r.

[78] P 183r.

[79] Ibid.

[80] P 175r.

[81] DA 2v.

[82] FD 67r.

[83] IS 1, 75v.

Yet it could seem, in so far as the not-other is the cancelling of the other, that it is the coincidence of the worldly opposites—coincidentia oppositorum. But it is that only because it is more than that; otherwise God would be perceptible as the point of convergence of these opposites. Indeed this route is passable gnoseologically and methodologically: 'I look by means of the contradictions to the origin', but 'the origin lies before the contractions'.[84] Whoever therefore 'transcends every opposition, he alone beholds the infinite simple form'.[85] For 'as otherness is without otherness in unity, because it is then unity, so too the contradiction is without contradiction is infinity . . . In infinity there is the opposition of oppositions without opposition.' And the conclusion for the one contemplating God is: 'There is neither anything different from you or anything opposed to you . . . for if infinity did not include each being in itself, then there would be no infinity.'[86]

So Nicolas succeeds in expressing the relationship of God to the world through reduplications and therefore by way of Eckhart[87]—'God is Being'—passes beyond Eckhart: God is

---

[84] Pr, vol. II, fol. 10v; cf. A 37r: super coincidentiam contradictoriorum Deum esse declaravi.

[85] IS 1, 77v.

[86] VD 105v.

[87] In his Apologia he expressly supports Eckhart, of whom he says that 'the ordinary people are not fit to understand him, although the learned find much that is subtle and useful in his books' (A 39r). How much he owes to Eckhart has only recently become apparent through the researches of Herb. Wackerzapp: 'Der Einfluss Meister Eckharts auf die ersten philosophischen Schriften des Nikolaus von Kues', BGPhThM 39/3 (1962).

omnis formae formabilis forma,[88] he is 'not essence (essentia), but because he is the essence in essences, he is called essentia essentiarum'.[89] Therefore the transcendence of the Absolute should be expressed precisely in its immanence, he is omne ens non entiter,[90] as he is indeed in every other the (fundamental and therefore transcendental) not-other. With this reduplication Nicolas moves clearly beyond Eckhart and the immediate danger of pantheism and again back to Proclus and Denys, but in such a way that he cannot decisively transcend the classical, pre-Christian stand-point. He decisively wins back, through a firm anchoring in that very place, the analogical character not only of all worldly being, but of all worldly knowledge, and precisely metaphysical knowledge. For if God is the form of form and the essence of essence, then he establishes—as always—a creaturely form and a creaturely essence, and this is therefore not the pure 'nothing', which is ecstatically open to God-the-all (with the danger of a change into a man-the-all and God-the-nothing), rather is the fundamental experience the unlocalizable origination over against God of all world-being and world-thinking; while it is in God that the perfect reality and therefore exactness, precision (praecisio) consist, the derivatory thought can only be inexact, approximate, supposition, parabolic, and in the true sense of the word, 'reflective', speculative.

There is only one idea of everything, which is God,[91] and only in the idea have things their exactness, for any imitation could be other, infinitely more exact.[92] This thought, which is maintained from the beginning to the end of Cusa's work, is amplified and apparently modified only in so far as the mind, the reflected origin in the world, possesses an idea-character of its own, not however for the real, but for the unreality of numbers which unfold its simple essence. The [88] G 70r. So frequently: A 36r: forma omnis formae; P 176r: nec forma alicujus, sed omnibus forma quia causa efficiens, formalis seu examplaris et finalis; P 182v: formarum forma (is God as entitas) . . . ideo omnium formarum complicatio; NA c. 10; Baur 23; Natura naturarum omnium: VD 7, 102r.

---

[89] NA c. 10, Baur 22; VD 103r.

[90] A 37v.

[91] P 177r.

[92] IS 2, 79v; Pr, II fol. 10v.

'exact science' therefore, which mind unfolds from itself, is unreal and only approximately applicable to reality; its knowledge of reality, whatever it conceptually pretends to be, is only conjectural, something that applies to the 'philosophical' doctrine of God, as much as to the 'theological', in so far as this too necessarily makes use of human thought. The concept remains according to its essence image and likeness, something that in a certain way points back to Plato's mythological thought, but even more strongly foreshadows the artistic element in the philosophical thinking of the Renaissance. Yet while the latter is inclined to rest in the symbolism of the image, the enigmatic in all thought remains for Nicolas an occasion of perpetual unrest. Certainly he knows the blessed touch of God who is present to and in all things: 'the eternal wisdom is tasted in everything that can be tasted; it is itself the pleasure in everything pleasurable; it is itself the beauty in everything beautiful; it is itself the desire in everything longed for', but at once there is again the question of its ineffable fragrance which we are only pursuing in all these forms.[93] It can mean for the art of thought: 'through reason the spiritual sweetness is tasted in the essence of things, as an image of the sweetness of the eternal wisdom, quae est quidditatum quidditas.'[94] And for the senses: 'he who sees a beautiful woman and is moved in his spirit, pays God the glory and turns to admiration of the infinite beauty, a most distant shadow of the light of which stands here before his eyes . . .'[95] But it is, as the examples bear out, a renaissance of the platonic longing, and not of a glutted worldliness. For Plotinus and Erigena, as for Ficino, the manifold things of the world remain 'apparitiones sive lumina . . . unius Dei, who, although one, cannot be manifest otherwise than in manifoldness . . . These lights are called theophanies, and in all these lights he makes known the riches of the glory of his Light.'[96]

To this thought about analogy in the classical manner there remains finally the insuperable problem of the establishment of the many out of the One. If pantheism is to be avoided—and Nicolas dismisses it as an indisputable vulgarisation of philosophy, for the real problems for thought only begin when one has passed beyond it[97]—then there remains for the unfolding of the unity of God in the world only the notion of a 'self-descent': not as if God could communicate less than himself (communicat se indiminute), but 'he cannot be so understood, as he is given, because the receiving of the gift takes place by way of descent (descensive).'[98] Yet what does it mean to say that no receptive 'matter' can be posited over against God, i.e. that no one is there beforehand to receive God's communication? Thus the final outcome can only be negative: for otherness there is not positive cause, it has as such no being,[99] the finitude of the creature emerges by change, contingenter.[100] But if no reason for the finite can be assigned within the causalitas formalis, then the question—why a world at all?—becomes insoluble by consideration of the causa finalis and efficiens. Plotinus had philosophised from its being and—by looking through to the mind and the One—had concluded that it had equal eternity with God: it is self-radiating goodness, beyond freedom and necessity. Since Nicolas of Cusa repeats the system in a Christian way in the analogia entis, he can experience and think the world only as contingency and an enigmatic likeness of God, and sees himself thus forced, without giving up the classically-attained analogy—to which belongs God-in-and-above-all and God's being not-other—to deepen it in a Christian manner.

---

[93] IS 1, 76v.

[94] IS 1, 78r.

[95] Excit. lib. 7, II 119–120r.

[96] DP 4, 195rv, cf. 193v.

2. CHRISTIAN POINT OF VIEW

While De Non-Aliud (1462) contains the last radicalisation of the classical point of view, there lies in De Possest (1460) and finally (in the year of his death, 1464) in De Apice theoriae—

---

[97] DP 2, 194r.

[98] DP 2, 194r.

[99] VD 14, 106r.

[100] DI 2.2, 13v; IM 6, 86r. This problematic is very clearly worked out by H. Wackerzapp, esp. 81ff.

after the Augustinian attempt of De Visione Dei—the Christian solution. Although it is close philosophically to Plotinus and further already prepared for by him, theologically it causes difficulties.

To the contingency of the finite there corresponds freedom as an answering concept in the Absolute. Plotinus sees it as the One's absolute being for itself, and somehow positively in the aesthetic dimension—as the purposelessness of the radiance of the Good. As a Christian, Cusa could have passed over from there immediately to the personality and love of God as the creator and revealer; but he considered that the philosophical form of analogy must be carefully introduced into the Christian context. The incomprehensibility of the God of negative theology is interpreted in the deeper incomprehensibility of the God of groundless Love: 'if anyone loves something because it is worthy of love, then he rejoices, if he discovers in the beloved infinite and inexpressible occasions of love. And the happiest realisation for the lover is when he grasps the inconceivable love-worthiness of the beloved. He would not rejoice so much if the beloved were comprehensible to him, as when it is clear to him that the love-worthiness of the beloved is completely incommensurable, indescribable, limitless and incomprehensible. That is the happiest comprehension of the incomprehensible and the tenderest learned ignorance, when he understands this in its way and yet does not understand it in exactness.'[101] Thereby, however, everything enters a new climate of thought: the negative incomprehensibility of the ever-greater God, whose essence glimmers behind all the veils of manifestation, turns into the positive incomprehensibility, that one who is utterly without need wills to have need of me, although he in no way has to.

Augustine once described blessedness as videntem videre;[102] Nicolas sets out from one of those images, the sight of which follows the beholder from all sides, and even seems to change along with the traveller. God's being is the utterly simplest being-with-himself and therefore infinite eye and universal vision, so that he seems to accompany the moving, spatio-temporal creature and therefore continually to gaze just at me. The thought is biblical, the expression Plotinian, again in the form of reduplication: God is 'the countenance of countenances'.[103] It is a biblical thought too that God's seeing is characterised not only as his being, but also as his loving,[104] indeed as his being merciful;[105] and biblically grounded is the strange new consideration, that the absolute contraction of the divine Spirit into the power-centre of his eternally being eye makes him the infinite idea and original of every finite 'contracted' mode of being: 'everything that is finitely contracted together has its place in the Absolute, because the infinite beholding is the contraction of all contractions (contractio contractionum), it is thus an uncontractable contraction (contractio enim est incontrahibilis).'[106] God as a spirit-person is not only the infinite, but therefore also the transfinite. But then it is no longer an empty, pointless question—how multiplicity can develop out of unity—but the more perspicacious question of how the transfinite subject can be opposed to finite subjects. One sees (and much better than with Eckhart) that the analogy of being must in any event be also an analogy of freedom, that God's pure givenness can only be received, if man too has decided for God in a freely personal way, in a choice both of God and of himself. 'To that extent you compel my freedom, because you cannot be my own possession, unless I possess myself no longer; but because you have placed this in my freedom, you do not compel me, but wait, that I myself should choose to belong to myself,' and precisely 'because you do not restrict your limitless goodness, but pour it out freely to all who are receptive of it.'[107]

[101] IS 1, 76r (text as in Baur).

[102] Sermo 69.3; PL 38.441.

Nicolas does not want to let go of the first, Plotinian schematism: man's seeing of God is hidden in God's own vision, is a finite, creaturely participation in it, and because

[103] VD 6, 101r.

[104] VD 4, 100r.

[105] VD 5, 100v.

[106] VD 2, 99v.

[107] VD 7, 102r.

God is the not-other, this can mean: 'each face that is able to look into yours sees therein nothing other, nothing different from itself, for it looks into its truth.'[108] But this truth is not man himself, but God; man's vision reaches that which lies unattainably above him, 'and so I am conscious that what I see is not known by me and could never be known'.[109] It is precisely here that Nicolas recalls the Pauline thought that perfection consists not primarily in seeing God, but in being seen by God.[110] 'If I saw, just as I am visible, I would not be a creature.'[111] Even the vision of the creature is, although it is a true vision, an analogical and enigmatic vision, as the beautiful formulation makes perfectly explicit: 'Lord, illuminator of hearts, my countenance is a true countenance, because you, the Truth, have given it to me. And it is an image, because it is not itself the truth, but a reflection of the unconditioned truth which in itself is. I therefore embrace with my concept the truth as what is mirrored in my face, and see therein such an agreement of the likeness with the truth beheld by it, that my countenance is true to the extent that it is an image.'[112] It is therefore consistent that precisely in this treatise the image of the 'wall' (of paradise) should appear, in order to express the shattering of all direct concepts of God in the coincidentia oppositorum, behind which the beholding God unattainably hides himself.[113] In consequence both the classical concepts appear again, that there can 'be nothing different or opposed to' God,[114] and that otherness remains without positive foundation and therefore without being.[115]

In De Possest the spiritual being of God takes on more relief. The ruling intention here is that no worldly being is its own capacity to be ('and this implies the knowledge of our creation'),[116] but that there must be a place where (beyond itself) its being and its capacity to be coincide: this place is God.[117] Here without any doubt there lies for Nicolas that experience of being which for Thomas is manifested as a 'real distinction' between being and essence,[118] only that now the image of God through the power of being which is identical with being as act (cum esse sit actus)[119] becomes simply obvious (as the power-centre of each actio), through that omnipotence by means of which alone does something become thinkable as nothing and as possibility and (based on that) as otherness.[120] But the thought is only rounded out in the final treatise, De Apice theoriae, because only here do the created essences appear not to be derivable by any process of diminution on the part of the Not-other, but are posited only by a positive 'intention'.[121] If in the Not-other it is asked, 'why the sun is sun, the moon moon, the earth earth and why anything is what it is', and thereupon the answer follows: 'if I knew that, then I would not be a creature and part of the universe, for my understanding would be the creative fashioner of all and therefore the creator of itself',[122] then the reason for the formation of essences is already imputed to the creator spirit. One may not undervalue the effort of this step for a thinker in the Plotinian tradition for whom it is a matter of saving the classical form of metaphysics and the analogia

---

[108] VD 6, 101r.
[109] VD 13, 105r.
[110] Gal 4.9; 1 Cor 8.3; 2 Cor 5.11; Phil 3.12.
[111] VD 10, 103v.
[112] VD 15, 107r.
[113] VD cc. 9, 10, 12, 13, 17, 20 (also Jesus inside the wall).
[114] VD 13, 105v.
[115] VD 14, 106r.

---

[116] P 179r.

[117] P 175r.

[118] Omnia autem quae post ipsum (Deum) sunt cum distinctione potentiae et actus. Ita quod solus Deus id sit quod esse potest: P 175r. Cf. shortly before: God as actualitas absoluta.

[119] P. 180r. Cusa's critic, Gustav Siewerth (Das Schicksal der Metaphysik von Thomas zu Heidegger, 1959, 98–114) has paid too little attention to this transition when he says: 'In his thought there is no creation' (108). Of course, the mainlines of Nicolas' thought lie in the realm of 'essentialism'; a text like B 31–32 can convince one of that.

[120] P 182r. Cf. 177v: 'therefore because the not-being (of everything or of any particular thing) could exist through the Almighty, it is also thoroughly real, because in the Almighty unconditioned capacity is real.'

[121] As elsewhere already in De Beryllo (c. 23) it is said: 'So we see the whole creation as the intention (intentio) of the almighty will'; Baur 29. Similarly c. 9 and 31–32, and De Ludo Globi I, 154r–v; mundus . . . perfectus est valde quia secundum Dei optimi liberrimam factus est voluntatem.

[122] NA 9, Baur 19.

entis without loss in a biblical, Christian context. This effort forces us back to the thought-form of Aquinas: creation on the one hand as emanatio of God's fullness of being—indiminute, as Cusa says[123]—on the other, as receptio not by a nothing (something impossible), but by that which in the creature corresponds to the freely-apportioning possest of a possibility of receiving;[124] the first is the classical, the second is the Christian aspect of the analogy of being. Possest bespeaks much more than absolute simplicity of Being, even as the (easily misunderstood as 'neutral') not-otherness; it speaks of Being as an infinite over-mastering of itself and therein as the disclosure of the whole, infinite realm of Being in which God can be himself even outside himself. Without this dimension infinite Being would be restricted to itself. This intuition overwhelms the aging cardinal with renewed freshness: 'nothing is earlier, nothing stronger, nother surer, nothing more essential, nothing more glorious (gloriosius) than this capacity',[125] it is the ground of every ground, 'omnium quidditas et hypostasis, by whose power necessarily what is and what is not is embraced', 'nothing is more luminous, nothing clearer, nothing more beautiful'.[126] As the light is revealed in the visible, so is capacity (possest) in Being. Cusa here draws on to a Christian plane the vision of Plato and Plotinus, who raised the Good above Being so as to understand this (Being) as a manifestation (of the Good); he draws in too Eckhart's vision that God is Being because he is Spirit and Freedom; it is the metaphysical dimension of glory which appears to him as posse ipsum: the beholding spirit perceives it without exercising power over it: excellit posse comprehendere. Again it is the formula of Anselm,[127] which expresses the final implications of analogy and is consciously experienced here as a new, extreme formula: 'this ability of mind to see beyond any comprehensible power and mightiness is the ultimate capacity of mind, in which Capacity itself (i.e., God) reveals itself in an ultimate measure, and, on this side of Capacity-itself, is unlimited. For this capacity for sight is so much ordered towards Capacity-itself, that the mind can foresee whither it is striving, and as the wanderer runs towards the goal of his wandering, . . . so [can the mind] towards Capacity-itself which it sees from afar, and is able to comprehend the incomprehensible in the best possible way. For it is Capacity-itself, when it is manifested in the glory of its majesty, that is alone powerful to still the longing of the mind.'[128]

---

[123] DP 2, 194r.

[124] Certainly there is found in Cusa no explicit doctrine of a real distinction, yet his thought ever more strongly converges towards this.

[125] ATh 219v.

[126] 219v.

[127] Cf. vol. II, 233, 236.

While Nicolas in such a way raises the classical glory of God up to the glory of the almighty and sovereignly free[129] Christian God, and nevertheless causes the creature's intellectual capacity for sight to be transcendently established at the summit of his desire—beyond its capacity to comprehend—for this free glory, he necessarily finds himself in conflict with the positive theology. More consciously and more systematically than the Fathers of the Church he relates this creaturely longing and the free self-disclosure of the personal God to each other. Nicolas thinks within a sovereign and unbroken classical totality of philosophical theology in which the self-radiating light of the Good as it were automatically passes over to become the 'will to open up to each searcher on his quest and to reveal itself'.[130] On the one hand it remains, as far as man is concerned, within the classical dynamics of eros, for 'the dynamism (vis) of our reason is inexhaustible on this side of deification',[131] and with Nicolas this dynamism never for a moment yields to the 'indifference' which is at the heart of the 'metaphysics of the Saints'. On the other hand the dynamism of longing cannot attain its own inner target 'without the grace of the creator'[132] (just as a tree can flourish only in the warm light of the sun),[133] and [128] ATh 220r.

[129] Cf. propositions 5 and 7 at the end of ATh, 221r.

[130] QD 199v.

[131] FD 65r.

[132] DP 1, 193r–v.

[133] Ibid. 193v.

for the created reason this grace is necessarily the personal self-disclosure of God, that is Jesus Christ as the word of revelation of the Father.[134] To this personal word there corresponds the attitude of faith which for Nicolas is likewise derived directly from the faith of classical philosophy, and, where God is manifest as free and personal, must necessarily so proceed.[135] The Plotinian ἐπιστροφή becomes just as immediately 'humility' in the reception of Christian doctrine,[136] just as the ontological doctrine of God over all things and in all things was already interpreted as God's majesty and humility.[137] So the revelation of creation passes over without a break into the biblical revelation: 'Plato had . . . with his mind conceived of the origin of things on the way of revelation in a way of which the apostle says to the Romans: God has revealed himself to them.'[138] Other than in this light the book of the world could hardly be deciphered or read, something that is however man's task, 'just as little as anyone could recognise a picture of Socrates, . . . if he did not know Socrates'.[139]

If in this way the relative separation between philosophy and theology characteristic of Thomism is again annulled for the sake of a total metaphysic (fashioned after the classical model), then if the believing Christian wants to draw dogmatics immediately into it, there looms up the immediate danger of a mystical rationalism. Under the Anselmian slogan of intelligere, indeed of videre fidem,[140] Christology especially must take up once again its Origenist form: Christ as the presence of absolute reason in the created reason, enkindling faith through the latter and leading to the understanding of the mystery of God, as the Sun of spirits. 'The word of God has it [the human reason] in itself, so that it does not need to search outside itself, for the mind will find the Word within itself and can approach it through faith';[141] a faith which Nicolas describes equally as choosing love (dilectio) and as prayer: but just as easily here will the transition be made to the transcendental reason of Hegel. God is already 'the Spirit of spirits',[142] rather like Leibniz's central monad, indeed he is already that one who is interpreted in the world by means of man: 'You, Lord, who work everything for your own sake alone, have created this whole world with a view to the rational, spiritual nature, as if you were like a painter, who mixes the different colours and blends them one with another in order finally to be able to paint himself.'[143]

---

[134] VD 21, 110v.

[135] Cf. perhaps P 178v.

[136] P 178r.

[137] VD 13, 106r: 'How exalted you are, Lord over all, and equally how humble, because you are in all things!'

[138] NA 20, Baur 48.

[139] G 73r.

[140] VD 19, 109r.

d. Conjecture or Absolute Knowledge?

At one point Nicolas breaks through the Platonic schema: the human spirit does not appear as graded in an order hierarchically ascending towards the Absolute, it stands in a new proportion to the Absolute: as God (as originally simple unity) is related to the unfolded, real world, so the spirit (as reflected simply unity) is related to an unreal world, thought-out and sketched as a copy. The two relationships are related to reality as exact science and conjecture, because God has in himself the things he has created, while the spirit only looks up to them; but on the other hand, the spirit has its own exactness in so far as it develops the world of numbers out of its own unity, indeed beyond that unites complicatively the world of the senses in its world of spirit.

Here lies a momentous ambivalence. The created spirit, in so far as it is spirit, is incontractus; therefore it stands to God not in the relationship of subject and object, but—as De quarendo Deum shows—in that of the participation of a finite subject in the absolute subject that holds sway within it (in the speculatio or intuitio itself).[144] So Nicolas hesitates to class spirit (mens) with the rest of the finite (contracted) explications of the infinite God, rather the spirit is imago complicationis

---

[141] VD 24, 113r.

[142] VD 25, 113v.

[143] Ibid.

[144] QD 197v–198r.

divinae prima, in so far as both God and the spirit are complicatio complicationum; the spirit too has on the basis of its derived likeness to God 'the power to assimilate itself to any possible explication',[145] i.e., to use itself to make an idea of anything without recourse to (limiting) innate ideas, but simply through its openness to everything in virtue of its capacity for judgment.[146] In that, Protagoras was right: man is the measure of all things;[147] the sensible world is there for his sake and to be measured by him; 'man knows from the knowledge of the perceptive powers of his nature that the sensible is there on account of perception; so he measures the things of sense in order to be able to grasp in sensible form the glory (gloria) of the divine reason.'[148] So mens comes from mensura,[149] as 'a living measure which, measuring something else, displays its own ability; for the spirit does everything in order to measure itself, and yet it does not find its measure which it seeks in everything, except where all is one.'[150] 'As an image of eternal spirit it strives in this, like an image in the truth, to hunt out the measure of itself.'[151] And yet it is itself reflected all-exemplarity,[152] in which the truth 'radiates forth', and to this extent it is a 'second God',[153] representative of the divine countenance in the creation,[154] which is not only an explication of God, but of itself. For if man is complicative as spirit, as soul and body he is explicative.[155] This now almost means that man as spirit prescribes its laws for the world—in particular through his power of numbers—and so at least is a co-origin of the world-harmony.[156] In De Conjecturis our spirit unravels its 'puzzle-world' out of itself, in order to look more clearly at itself in this world begotten from itself, so that more deeply stimulated by it it might understand itself more perfectly as an image of the eternal; for the more we deepen (profundaverimus) our spirit, the closer we come to attaining the vital centre, God.[157] It is the old way—prescribed particularly emphatically by Gregory of Nyssa[158]—of an ever-deepening, metaphysical self-knowledge in order to behold more clearly the archetype in the image which is actualised on all sides. Cusa only adds that this actualisation of the spirit through its explication of the world—whether it is prescriptive, or receptive—has to happen. If the human image (so the letter to Albergati puts it) 'recognises himself as a living image of his creator, then he beholds his creator while he looks at himself, for he is transported from the image to the original.'[159] But one wonders if such a method of coming to know God can be carried through practically in any other way than through human sketches of the world and therefore man's quests for self-knowledge ever again shattering and thus simply revealing their quality as unauthoritative and conjectural and so proving the proposition: conjecturalis mundi humana mens forma existit, ut realis divina?[160] What does it really mean to be the form of a conjectural world, to be a puzzle-world? To understand oneself as a bare 'image',[161] and 'to use a riddle to explain'?[162] It can indeed only mean that man in his self-questioning becomes himself the ultimate puzzle of all world-puzzles, that inexplicable archetypal cypher, which is the point from which all the rest of the world-cyphers derive. This thought is adumbrated but not carried through existentially in Cusa's expositions.

---

[145] IM 4, 83v. K. H. Volkmann-Schluck (Nicolaus Cusanus, Die Philosophie im Übergang vom Mittelalter zur Neuzeit, 1957) places the mens at the centre of the speculative system, whence the opening up to the Renaissance and to Descartes becomes marked.

[146] Ibid.

[147] B 36, 192r.

[148] B 37, 192v.

[149] IM 1, 81v; 9, 88v.

[150] Ibid. 89v.

[151] IM 11, 90v.

[152] imago exemplaris omnium.

[153] So according to Trismegistus: B 6, 184v.

[154] IM 3, 83v.

[155] B 18, 186v.

---

[156] Cf., e.g., IM 7: mens est ita numerus divinus . . . quod est unitas simplex ex sua vi numerum suum exercens; 86v.

[157] C 1.2, 41v–42r.

[158] Présence et Pensée (1942): La Philosophie de l'image, 81–100.

[159] Cusanus-Texte IV/3, p. 28. Cf. Compendium 8, 172r.

[160] C 1.3, 41v. [The human mind is the form of the conjectural world, as the divine mind is of the real world.]

[161] VD 15, 107r.

[162] B 6, 184v.

Therefore finally the opposite way of thought gets the better of it: the philosophical longing—not simply Platonic as δαιμόνιον between God and the world, but quite really as a θεῖον—takes itself and its inner infinity as the vehicle for the knowlege of God, powerfully supported by the Christian revelation which seems to allow such an advance into the depths of the heart of God. The way in which Eckhart and in his own fashion too Ramon Lull (whom Cusa also had attentively followed) thought,[163] together with the impact of the renewed classical tradition, favoured the attempted construction of a total science fashioned out of philosophy and Christian theology together.[164]

What does the call to divine sonship mean, Nicolas was asked; the treatise de Filiatione Dei works this out in a way inspired by Origen and Eckhart: the sinking of the creature into the trinitarian process of begetting, the ascent of the yearning, conjectural knowledge into the mutual intuition of the Father and the eternal Son, through incorporation into Him, through actualisation of his potential presence (as divinum) in the finite reason.[165] So there takes place in all earnest a promotion through grace into the sphere of the eternal Logos, right to the participation in his omniscience,[166] a promotion from the dependence of the pupil to the maturity of the one who understands himself.[167] Because the beholding spirit promoted to the status of son is present in the Logos (where possibility and reality coincide), it lives the total life, 'as if only all that which is in it lives', indeed it is advanced to the place of the last coincidence, because in God every creature is God himself: 'and God will be for him not an other, not different and not distinct from precisely his spirit . . . Any otherness or any difference lies far behind the true childhood.' And in Plotinus' sense, in which Hegel must recognise himself: 'The whole pure reason brings everything intelligible (νόημα) to intellection (νόησις), for each object of knowledge is in the mind the mind itself.' But then the mind is the truth, which has become eternity, because outside the living intellect which is present to itself nothing else can exist. 'Therefore sonship is the annulling (ablatio) of all otherness and difference and the resolution (resolutio) of all things in the One, something that is at the same time the transfusion (transfusio) of the One into everything, and precisely this is deification (theôsis).' This 'coincidence of the being of one in which all is, and of the being of all in which one is' is the perfect echo at the end of the Middle Ages of the theology of John Erigena, but unquestioningly foreshadows the coming Idealism; sonship is absolute knowledge, which is effected philosophically through progressive synthesis (as simplification) and theologically through being born together with the Logos. That the conceptus absolutus[168] of God is attainable from below, is indeed denied, since analogy and docta ignorantia hinder it; but the means of faith, of grace, of the God-man acquire what is sufficient for this. It is already striking how in the third, Christological book of Learned Ignorance the a priori construction of the Incarnation as the union between the absolutely greatest (God) and that which is greatest in the world (the humanity of Christ) seems to be worked out quite unquestionably where before it was always inculcated that the concept of a greatest-in-the-world was an internal contradiction because something greater would always be thinkable. So then there is suddenly available an exact proportion between God and the world which had seemed to be excluded by the imprecise character not only of finite thinking in images but also by the finite being of images, and indeed available for a knowledge which understands itself neither simply as theology (which never finally passes beyond faith into knowledge) nor simply as philosophy (because it will never seriously attain a rational deduction of the mysteries of the faith). The bitter reproaches that Nicolas heaped against the theological efforts of the [163] Eusebio Colomer: Nikolaus von Kues und Raimund Llull. Aus Handschriften der Kueser Bibliothek (Quellen und Studien zur Gesch. d. Philos.), ed. by Paul Wilpert, II (1961).

---

[164] Nihil ergo scitur, nisi omnia sciantur; IM 10, 89v.

[165] FD 65r. On incorporation into Christ, already: DI 3.12, 33v, on adoption within the Trinity: VD 18, 109r.

[166] FD 65v–66r.

[167] FD 65v, 69r, also IM 14, 93v.

---

[168] P 179r.

Schools are not quite spared Nicolas himself; and that goes especially for the ever-continuing formal trinitarian speculations which only have meaning if they play around a mystery declared elsewhere, from afar, but which go astray as soon as they in all earnest think themselves capable of leading up to it from below. Christ is, as the absolute knower, ever again the 'way' to knowledge,[169] and to follow him is above all imitation of the teacher,[170] 'whose understanding is both truth as well as copy', this latter in the highest measure beyond all reaching.[171] Correspondingly faith is (in the sense of the early Augustine) wholly a means.[172] Here too belongs the tendency, which becomes stronger towards the end of his life, to pass beyond the Areopagitical negative theology to something positive:[173] for in the event of the speculative process, there comes the moment when thought is changed into true seeing and out of the 'difficulty' of dialectic is shown as something 'easy' (facilis),[174] incontrovertibly evident[175]—if it is once seen. So he can even speak against an exaggerated transcendence; if the finite is the negation, then the infinite is the negation of the negation, and therefore the pure assertion, as Nicolas, with Eckhart, affirms.[176]

---

[169] Via ad Seipsum qui est veritas: DI 3, 24r.

[170] Excit. 8, S. Crucifixus resurrexit, fol. 145, cf. also the whole, very intellectualist Christology in De Videndo Deo, c. 19–25.

[171] VD 20, 110r–v.

[172] DP 5, 196v; VD 24, 113r; similarly in the abruptly beginning theological intermezzo in De Possest, 178rv (where faith becomes 'seeing God', indeed 'seeing oneself'), and with a pedagogic turn in the letter to Albergati, no. 50f., Cusanus-Texte IV/7, 49f.

[173] Which at the beginning governed everything: DI 1.26; 12r.

[174] Facilis via: DP 1, 193v; breviter atque facile, facili compendio: G 69v, 70r; certe ista facilitas est maxima et stupenda . . . quod Deus est ipsa infinita facilitas: IS 2, 78v; o miranda facilitas difficilium!: ibid. 80v; Ipso Posse nihil facilius: ATh 219v; Hanc nunc facilitatem tibi pandere propono: ibid. 220v etc.

[175] So above all the overwhelmingly clear simplicity of the concept of Posse as also that of the Non-aliud.

[176] Texts in the note on p. 171 by P. Wilpert to the German tr. of De Non-aliud (1952). Cf. G 70r: nec te moveat Platonicorum quamvis subtilis consideratio Primum imparticipabiliter superexaltatum. And P 177v, speaking of a humanum conceptum ducentem aenigmatice to a qualiscumque de Deo positiva assertio. Indeed in P 182v it is shown that every negation (e.g. non-being) already presupposes affirmation (Being) and can only cancel the finite mode

Such vision, where it is systematically interpreted and ordered, is theologically an anticipation of the eschatological essential vision of the Father in the Son, in the philosophical context of an intuition of the Absolute which comes to transcend the negative theology. Because this contradicts the whole enterprise of a doctrine of analogia entis and an enigmatics, Cusa does not let himself be tied down to it; it can only be maintained that he has not sufficiently considered the danger of the paths he takes and has not assumed responsibility for their misuse. This aprioristically understood Christology (in the last book of Learned Ignorance) was certainly meant in an Anselmian way, but it opened the way for Hegel, because the exact proportion between God and the world in the God-man—philosophically completely unmaintainable—finally is made accessible to reason. So then too the manifold philosophical and theological attempts at harmonisation of all partial truths into a complete system remain in an ambiguous light. There are the philosophical concordances, as in the 'wonderful teaching' of the idiota, 'which undertakes to reconcile all philosophies one with another',[177] sketched in the characteristic propositions of De Possest and the Hunt for Wisdom.[178] Already the Learned Ignorance has sought to understand the many gods as explications of the one true God and thus secured for the partial religious systems their share in the truth: the mistake would lie rather in the tendency of 'popular religion' to absolutise, from which the wise remain relatively free.[179] De Filiatione Dei, in a way corresponding to its gnostic character, underlines the unity of all philosophies to the point that even contradictory utterances about the absolute—God is all, God is nothing, God is, God is not—are reconciled thanks to the of Being. 'In the way of negation you see indeed simplici intuitu that everything that is presupposed, which precedes non-being, is the entitas of each being to all eternity.' The Compendium too (169r) begins with the intuitus of Being above all conceptual knowledge, so as in this light to read every being as 'sign' and 'expression' (expressio): 171r.

---

[177] IM 3, 83r.

[178] P, after the Magdeburg Codex 166 tr. by E. Bohnenstädt (Vom Können-Sein 1947), p. 47f.; V 9, 204rv.

[179] DI 1.25, 11v.

coincidentia oppositorum and lead astray the wise not at all.[180] Even atheism—as a necessarily fragmentary utterance—is incorporated into the total system. The philosophical systematic passes over directly into the theological; begun ecclesiastically in Nicolas' great treatise for the Council of Basle (De concordantia catholica, 1433), it is continued in the heavenly council under the presidency of the Logos, which is to synthesise all world-religions without any loss to their own authentic features (De pace fidei, 1453–4).[181] It suffices to say about that, that the speculative background for both (as least as strongly as for Augustine's City of God) is Platonic: the earthly church as (ultimately, 'conjecturally')[182] a reflection of the heavenly Jerusalem must imitate it by concord (concordantia) as much as it can: both within and beyond the Church. There is one thing above all to be avoided: schism. But how the heavenly unity is represented within the Church—more in a conciliar or in a papal-monarchical way—is not from the Platonic perspective the main consideration. Jaspers has rightly pointed out that the concept of representation varies: between the universal-philosophical (everything transitory represents the eternal), the juridical-philosophical (the ordered forms of Church and State represent the abiding spirit of the community) and the constitutional (elected or appointed delegates represent the people).[183] Cusa endeavours as a Catholic to think universally and broadly within the Church; he wants to understand the Church, like the incarnate God in Christ, only against the cosmic background; even the ecclesiastically positive must be utterly transparent to the whole truth between God and man. The same thing is attempted on a higher plane by the treatise On the Peace of Faith which not only wants in all earnest to exhibit the share of truth each religion has in the whole Logos, but in the heavenly council of all religions requires and outlines the indispensably necessary reconciliation between the absoluteness and the relativity of the Catholic Church. The individual steps, which need not be convincing, will not be pursued here, only the undertaking as a whole is important now: because with the greatest courage it demands not only practical tolerance—to fight with the sword for the peace of Christ is pure contradiction and can convince no-one[184]—but theoretical agreement. It envisages the same point as the present book: to behold the glory of what is Christian without any reduction of its absoluteness in the context of the total glorification of God in his revelation in the world. Yet Cusa's attempt seems to be essentially hindered in its working-out by the fact that he projects the world-religions on to the background of the (Platonic-)philosophical and thus, as has been shown, sees in Christ above all the Logos, the perfect teacher of Wisdom who has appeared. Here lies that limit which will bring the next steps after Cusa (for instance Thomas More's Utopia) very close to liberalism. In the Logos as Wisdom the 'religious element in mankind' becomes available for this; thus the decisive glory of the God of Jesus Christ is emptied out. In order to discover it both embedded in and lifted from the background of myth, philosophy and religion, it must be depicted otherwise. That Cusa knew about this 'other Christianity' is not to be doubted and emerges clearly from the wealth of his sermon-outlines and notes.[185] That his will for universality is pure, is equally clear; but the synthesis betrays—more distinctly than with Aquinas—that the traditional structure of biblical revelation and of its glory in the Platonic-Plotinian context with its own conception of glory could not fully do justice to the biblical concept of glory. The modern age will unveil the consequences.

---

[180] FD 68v: Nihil itaque reperiet vere theologizans scholaris, quod ipsum perturbet in omne varietate conjecturarum. Nec minus apud ipsum hic dicit, qui ait nihil penitus esse [deum], quam ille qui ait omnia esse quae videntur. Nec verius hic dicit qui ait deum omnia esse, quam ille qui ait ipsum nihil esse aut non esse.

[181] On the historical context of this treatise see the detailed introduction by Ludw. Mohler to the tr. (Meiner 1943).

[182] Ecclesia conjecturalis: Epist. I ad Rodericum de Trevino (in the second part of the second volume), fol. 3v.

[183] Jaspers, l.c. 173f.

---

[184] Letter to John of Segovia, Akademie-Ausgabe VII (1959), 97.

[185] Cf. especially the 19 great sermons from the early period, tr. by Sikora and Bohnenstädt with an introduction by the latter (Predigten 1430–1441, Kerle 1952); and also the many extracts from the Excitationes in Scharpff, l.c.

5. CLASSICAL MEDIATION

a. Refuge with the Past

It is unnecessary to depict the relationship between metaphysics and glory in the modern period from the Renaissance to the present in detail: it is well enough known, and, in the goal towards which it strives, is manifest to the eyes of all. It is best understood from a bird's eye view which reveals to us why certain prominences, which from beneath seem to be great mountains, could not disturb the flow of an inexorably advancing stream. Even such sublime heights as Ficino or Leibniz or Spinoza, or Kant or Goethe or Hegel, must not now be wondered at in isolation, but must be seen as waves in the stream. It is one of the most glorious periods of human history—add to the thinkers and the poets, Italian and German music, French painting, English and Spanish theatre—but stirred up by the inner contradiction of entrusting itself to two mutually cancelling spiritual fields of force, beside the Christian, which have been already characterised at the beginning of the last chapter[1] and the opposition between which is already palpable in the work of Cusa. On the one hand, there is a cry for help to classical piety to be rooted afresh in the primordial tradition, when in the late Middle Ages the Assize Courts of Being are beginning to quake; and, on the other, a bold storming ahead on the ways of thought which Christianity had certainly opened up, but only to those who would tread them in faith and in love: something that amounts to a reduction of revelation through logic to a speculative doctrine of God. The same thinkers will be ground down between these two opposing tendencies—one could mention the tragedy of Spinoza, or of Schelling, or of Scheler—and in the end, as a matter of history, classical antiquity, fighting on foreign soil, has to lose the battle; but also speculation about God, decking itself out with foreign, that is Christian, feathers achieves its inner end, to reveal itself as that which it was in secret from the beginning: a Titanic, Promethean human construct.[2] Does that mean then that Western history from the Renaissance to the present has been a false trail that can be disposed of and forgotten with impunity or even with profit? By no means. But the history, the lesson of which is so comprehensible that the feeblest schoolboy must be able to follow it, has in this period led up to an unavoidable decision. As far as classical antiquity is concerned, Christianity, as its fulfilment, possesses the key to it, and anyone who tries to bypass Christianity and reach back behind it, necessarily misses its mysteriously radiating glory. Michangelo and Hölderlin understood that. And in what concerns the knowledge of the heart of God's mysteries: here too Christianity offers the only approach. Whoever violently breaks through the doors, finds the treasuries bare: the experience of Hegel and Feuerbach proves that. The development speaks neither against the re-rooting in the primordial tradition nor against a bold progress into the future of thought. The seventeenth century falsely located the fundamental decision in this Either-Or and unloosed an embittered 100-year war, 'la querelle des anciens et des modernes'. What for thought can be 'developed' (and therefore must be), avoids error only when it thinks within the horizon of the primordial tradition, where archetypally the depth of Being as a whole has been opened out. There Heidegger is right. But for the perception of the world it holds good that no Titanic over-powering of the forms of nature makes up for, and still less surpasses, the Goethean vision of things; this most ancient, Greek view of the world and mankind must remain a guide to all scientific and sociological-cybernetic advance; and even the ideologies of evolution (often in transcendentalist clothing), which seek finally to do away with the idea of a primordial tradition, could not disturb the vision of the 'primordial phenomena' in the Goethean sense. Did not the same Goethe, who perceived the uniqueness of forms, also know how to see the metamorphoses of plants and animals? Did not Aristotle, who here stands behind him, understand how to combine the finality of μορφή with the unforeseeable generation and decay of forms in matter, so that the idea of an evolution of forms, could it only have been scientifically proved, would not have shocked him at all? It becomes apparent from this that the 'battle between the ancients and the moderns' is a mock-battle, which obscures the real intellectual and historical points of engagement. The decision falls uniquely—and the history of the modern period has no clearer result—for or against the Glory of Being, and history has fashioned the Either—Or so simply that it has become a decision between Christianity and nihilism. The 'gods', the 'divine', hold sway still only where God's personal love in the Son of God is recognised and acknowledged, and the storming-ahead of metaphysical speculation is bridled only where thought—in the same epiphany—confronts the not-to-be-mastered majestic freedom of the God of love. That this simple result has always been obscured, both in the past and the present and certainly will be, too, in the future, by thousands of hypotheses, which are just so many attempts at evasion, needs no longer to be wondered at after this sketch of Christian history which proved itself to be just as full of such attempts. Over against all these stands the fact of the present's enormous loss of glory, which, itself played about by the most contrary hypotheses, of itself forms a quiet utterance not to be overheard, if there is anyone, like a Max Picard, with an ear for it.

---

[1] B 42.

---

[2] On this unmasking, cf. my account of German Idealism under the Leitmotiv of Prometheus (Apokalypse des deutschen Seele, vol. I (1939), newly reprinted under the title Prometheus, 1947).

The appeal of the humanist movement to classical antiquity for a renewed, more inward presence than had existed in the course of the Middle Ages was an event which perhaps first, on reflection, points to the depths of anxious need to which the Christian consciousness had fallen prey. The movement of these 'humanist' laymen, who, concerned for the studia humanitatis, for grammar, rhetoric, poetry, ethics, pursued a predominantly literary programme, stood neither in the service of ecclesiastical (clerical) theology nor in conflict with it (except where it had degenerated into a decadent scholasticism); it was, and understood itself to be, 'religious' precisely where, in the service of truth, the primordial sources of Western culture were, through the power of philology in its pure form and in the whole fulness which it had received, to be laid open as the living ground of all that was to come later. The Greek classics, and the no less studied Greek Church Fathers, both came, recovered in their original form, from Byzantium to Italy at the same period. How such access to the 'most ancient documents of the human race' was understood ideologically is indicated by the attempt of Gemistos Plethon (c.1355–1450) to follow Proclus' example in interpreting the Greek gods allegorically and to set beside Plato, as more ancient sources, Orpheus and Pythagoras, Hermes Trismegistus and Zoroaster (the 'Chaldean Oracles'), all witnesses to a universal-theistic revelation, the mainstream of which flowed into the Bible.

Long before, soon after Dante, Albertinus Mussato had in Latin epistles celebrated the value of mythic poetry, which in enigmatic form expressed the same thing as the Holy scriptures openly said: poetry is a second theology or an ars divina, and it should be linked to the tradition reaching from Lactantius and Augustine through Isidore to Thomas Aquinas: the most ancient 'theologians'—Orpheus, Musaeus, Linus—had been poets.[3] Among the many reasons Mussato brings forward for his comparison, he emphasises this original historical unity, but also that the poet is a vates, that poetry contains in itself an eternal fame and that Holy scripture itself often makes use of poetic forms.[4] It throws up again the problem of the veiling of the truth in images that had been a concern of scholasticism, and was now to be discussed in detail by Petrarch.[5] Against the scholastic ranking of poetry as the

---

[3] E. R. Curtius, 'Theologische Poetik im italienischen Trecento' in ZRPH 60 (1940), 1–15; Europäische Literatur und lateinisches Mittlealter (1948^2), 220–226 (Eng. tr. (1953), 215–221). Karl Vossler, Poetische Theorien der italienischen Frührenaissance (Literarhistor. Forschungen, Heft 12, Berlin, 1900).

[4] Mussato, Opera (Venice, 1636).

[5] Invective contra medicum, ed. P. G. Ricci (Ed. Storia e Letteratura, Rome, 1950).

'lowest science',[6] Petrarch raises it above the liberal arts (among which it is not mentioned); this sets it by itself in relationship with theology: 'I would almost say that theology is God's poetry.'[7] Salutati drops the hesitation in this utterance and openly explains: nullum . . . dicendi genus majus habet cum divinis eloquiis et ipsa Divinitate commercium quam eloquium poetarum.[8] Maxime cum certum [sit], ipsam divinam Scripturam nihil aliud esse quam poeticam.[9] Boccaccio has given in books 14 and 15 of his de Genealogiis Deorum Gentilium a justification for his wearisome compilation that comes to the same thing: the poetic myths of the ancients are true theology—il nostro Dante can interpret the ways of theological utterance in images, la onde è da chiamare Theologo sacro.[10] Earlier he had compared the 'fables' of the poet with that which 'our theologians have called figura'[11] and in the Life of Dante the formula of Salutati is already used: 'that theology is nothing more than a divine poetry. What is it if not poetry, when it is said in Holy Scripture that Christ is now a lion, now a lamb . . .? How else can the words of the Redeemer in the Gospel be heard than as a speech with a hidden meaning, which manner of speech we are accustomed to call allegory? So then it is clearly shown that poetry is not only theology, but also that theology is poetry.'[12] If the prophets speak in images and Jesus in parables, then for Boccaccio these forms of utterance fall univocally under the general concept of favola, which then lets itself shade off into different forms. The picture develops when the typical existence of the poets comes to be described as one of poverty and solitude—with examples from Homer and Euripides, Ennius, Plautus and Virgil up to Dante and Petrarch; unnoticed, the poet takes over the place of the poverello and becomes—one needs only to leaf through Walter Musch's Tragische Literaturgeschichte—the modern type of the saint.

---

[6] Curtius, Europ. Lit., l.c., 230, 473–476 (Eng. tr., 226f., 478–482).

[7] Ep.fam. X. 4.

[8] Epistolario, ed. Novati (1891–1905), III (XII.20), 540–542. [No way of speaking has more to do with divine utterances and the divinity itself than the speech of poets.]

[9] Ibid., IV.I.233. [Since it is most certain that the divine Scripture itself is nothing else than poetical.]

[10] Ital. edition (Venice, 1588), 258. [Wherefore he is to be called a sacred Theologian.]

[11] Leben Dantes (deutsch von Otto Frh. v. Taub, 1909), 49. Eng. tr. by P. H. Wickseed, The Early Lives of Dante (London, 1907), pp. 1–11. Cf. Rolf Bachem, 'Dichtung als verborgene Theologie, ein dichtungstheoretischer Topos vom Barock bis zur Goethezeit und seine Vorbilder' in Abh. zur Phil., Psychol. und Päd. 5 (Bouvier, Bonn, 1956).

[12] 14th Book, 236. (Eng. tr. 1. 72).

Boccaccio in the end saves himself from becoming in the least injurious to Christianity with his allegories of the gods. But what he and the others mentioned here were striving for is a back-projection of the isolated biblical revelation on to a primarily general, historical revealedness of God: in other words, on to a total poetic-theological symbolism, which, eighty years later when learned humanism has achieved its philosophical amplification and deepening in Cusa, Ficino, Pico and Leone, broadens to form a general cosmic horizon.

MARSILIO FICINO's lofty and long-influential philosophical vision is disarming in that it is intended as both sincerely Christian and sincerely 'Platonic' (or rather Plotinian). Both the treatise de Christiana religione and the commentary on the Epistle to the Romans[13] bear witness to an attachment, taken for granted, to the Church's faith. Yet when he asserts that 'his intention in the re-awakening of the ancients has been above all to serve divine providence',[14] much more is meant by that than an apologetic or paedagogical service,[15] rather the projection of what is Christian into a theology of humanity (brought to its highest development by Plato). Both are equally true: Ficino reads Plato with Christian eyes, and the Bible with Platonic eyes. That both are coextensive without remainder, that all differences are dissolved in a final presupposed identity beyond all analogies, is for him not at all problematic.[16]

---

[13] Opera omnia (Basle, 1576; repr. 1959), 1–77, 427–472.

[14] I 871, 3.

[15] As Raymond Marcel (Marsile Ficin (1958), 583–602) too onesidedly emphasises.

[16] P. O. Kristeller (The Philosophy of Marsilio Ficino (Columbia University Press, 1943, p. 36) carefully notes that Ficino deals with Being

The already frequently-mentioned identification of Eros and Agape (with which belongs Platonic friendship) has here reached perfection, but certainly not in such a way (as from Nygren's[17] perspective one would like to conclude) that Eros has overpowered and annihilated Agape. Already with Plato and Plotinus it has been shown that in its highest manifestation eros is thought of as self-less, because it loves the Good for the sake of the Good, so that it can become a reflection of the highest Good, radiating like the sun freely and gratuitously. This vision overwhelms the Christian Ficino and makes him interpret all being as beauty, for he sees in it the gracious self-radiation of the Good, deepened in a Christian sense as eternal love.

God as the centre of all things is the Good; the four circles which radiate from this centre—mens (=nous), anima, natura, materia—are the beautiful.[18] In place of pulchrum there can also stand splendor, claritas, fulgor. In the biblical-personal enhancement of the Platonic, the world-being can therefore directly be seen as splendor divini vultus, which reflected and refracted in the mechanism of the world appears as gratia: attractiveness and grace in one.[19] It is to be noticed that in this view glory and beauty are simply identical: as the beautiful is the radiant manifestation of the Good, so is the world the manifestation and streaming-forth of God. The intellectual creature has been created to perceive the wonder and grace of the eternal Good in the wonder of the Beautiful. Thus the authentic intellectual act is contemplation and love in one. 'The avidity (aviditatem), which unceasingly cleaves to the countenance of God, that I call love. O that such would fall to our lot!' The world in its beauty is therefore God's bait, hooked (so Plato's Symposium) to each individual beautiful form, which at the same time fascinates and disappoints us, because it promises more than it can keep and points to more in practice as the highest genus of all universals, and that he never mentions the analogy of being, although on the other hand he never excludes it either in his cautious formulation—as later a Giordano Bruno and Spinoza will do.

[17] Agape and Eros (tr. by P. S. Watson, rev. ed. 1953).

[18] De Amore (=commentary on Plato's Symposium), or. 2, c. 3; 1324.

[19] Ibid., or. 5, c. 4; 1336.

than it has within itself: 'Men strive after God's form and their striving is implanted in them by God. Our longing for God too is enkindled by him when the bodily instinct is enticed by anything that encounters the senses. And so much the more, so much the most powerfully, can the highest God attract than the slightest good things. For in fact . . .: the luminous brightness of the highest Good flashes within each individual being, and where it shines with greater affinity, there above all it attracts the beholder to itself . . . and compels him to honour this radiating being as a higher nature (numen), indeed to strive towards nothing else than to lay aside its old nature and to be changed itself into the radiance. In this it becomes evident that he cannot be satisfied with the sight or touch of the Beloved, but often calls out: this person has something in himself that sets me on fire and I myself no longer understand what I am striving after. So, by the radiance that breaks forth from a beautiful human being, . . . the soul is drawn up by God, as with a bait, to become itself God. But God would be, as it were, a wicked tyrant, if he kindled in us a longing that remained eternally unquenchable.'[20] The longings of Plato and Plotinus are here provided, as it were, with a Christian stimulus: 'The lovers do not know what they want to thirst for, for they do not think of God himself who yet has mixed in with each creature a secret taste of himself like a sweet fragrance.'[21] Love is—as Franciscan mysticism had radicalised it—the drawing of the heart to God beyond all knowing and understanding, and this drawing in man (which at the same time constitutes his spiritual being) is his being ontically an answer to the creator's outpouring of love. Creation is first of all the discharging of chaos or matter from God, which secondly however is immediately called back by him to obtain God's form in return (ἐπιστροφή) and homecoming to the Light.[22] So the ancient poet-theologians said that eros came into being immediately after chaos and in its answering primordial movement has become cosmos.[23] Thus there rules the circular movement: 'Insofar as it rises in God and attracts to him, it is called beauty; insofar as it proceeds into the world and brings enchantment to it, love; insofar as, flowing back to the author, it unites his work with him, holy delight (voluptas).'[24] For Ficino there can be no other love than religious love, even love between human beings, whether sexual or between friends, if it is love at all and not egoistic impulse, has its realisation uniquely in God. Doubtless Dante and the poets of the dolce stil nuovo have powerfully prepared the way here, as has Petrarch; yet what Ficino for the first time calls 'Socratic' or 'Platonic' love has been a fresh discovery for him by means of the Symposium and the Phaedrus. But Augustine's longing for God too and what Ficino made of caritas in the epistle to the Romans, makes its influence felt.

---

[20] Theologia Platonica, 1.13, C. 1; 306.

[21] De amore, or. 2, c. 6; 1326.

[22] Ibid., or. 1, c. 2; 1321.

If then the eros of the creature is always first of all an answer to the divine beckoning back of grace, so that, on account of the eternal prevenience of grace it can be called 'divine' or even 'daemonic',[25] then this eros can, without further ado, be explained as agape, if only it is considered that the beckoning of grace to the chaotic sinner is accomplished in the incarnate love of Jesus Christ. The caritas diffusa per Spiritum Sanctum in cordibus nostris proceeds from the bonum diffusivum sui, which graciously provokes (provocat) us to an answering love.[26] God has died for us in Christ, but all true love essentially means such a death to oneself so as to live only in the beloved, it is 'bitter' as this 'voluntary death', and anyone is a murderer who will not love a lover in return and thus not give him the opportunity to rise again in the beloved.[27] Ficino has no difficulty, therefore, in elucidating God's act of love in Christ by Plotinus and Denys.

---

[23] Ibid. Cf. Hesiod, Vol. IV of this work, p. 80 (Eng. tr.), and as a final form of this philosophoumenon its depicition by Soloviev, (Vol. III of this work, pp. 279ff.). It is the concept of creation in Teilhard de Chardin also.

[24] Ibid., or. 2, c. 2; 1324.

[25] or. 6, c. 2; 1341–2: quoniam a Deo descendit, deus, quoniam a daemonibus [i.e., from the angels and the spirits of the cosmic spheres] confirmatur, daemon est appellandus (1343).

[26] In Pauli Ep. Comm. 471.

[27] De Amore, or. 2, c. 8; 1327.

Is he not here silently passing over whatever does not come into his identity system of eros and caritas? All true love is mediated by beauty, all real love is mutual gift of self, indeed 'return',[28] something that only holds when both lovers, at least implicitly, love God and each other in God and for God's sake. But how is Christ's love for the sinner in his ugliness and unlovingness to be brought under the rubric of this general mystical death in love? At least it belongs on the side of God who loves a world which is not yet; and as a human gesture it is that which expresses God's love as comparable with none other. Pico della Mirandola sensed something of this and sharply attacked to his teacher and friend: quanti errori . . . commetta el nostro Marsilio confundendo in tutto (that is, God's love for the world and the world's love for Him, then love as desiderio di bellezza and the love of friends, which is something else)[29]—but then again went on himself to define love as longing for beauty and leave Christian love quite on one side.

Ficino's teaching had given the courtly, troubadour cult of the late Middle Ages its theological and philosophical justification even more than Dante had. Ficino creates the literary form of the epistola amatoria (according to which love is understood in its Platonic sense and as the pinnacle of a cultivated style of life), he initiated the countless trattati d'amore[30] of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Among these the tightly-packed synthesis of LEONE EBREO in his Dialoghi d'Amore[31] had the widest success, even outstripping that of Ficino. This doctor (like Ficino), son of the last great biblical commentator of the Jewish Middle Ages, Yitshaq Abrabanel, like his father a restless wanderer, came with Pico into touch with with the Platonic Academy and created for the Renaissance that identification of a personal intensity of love characteristic of the Old Testament with a world-view, explained and fully fashioned after the pattern of antiquity, as had once already been accomplished by Philo, and in the Middle Ages by Ibn Gebirol and Maimonides, and would again emerge in the Baroque period with Spinoza, in Idealism with Cohen, and finally in Bergson and the Jewish disciples of George: always in such a way that the intensity, with which beauty was declared to be the ground of being of all things, was nourished, apart from the much more exposed and sober utterances of the ancients, by an unknown or unavowed loan from the glory of the biblical God.

---

[28] Ep. to Ermalao Barbaro, 777–778.

[29] Commento sopra una canzona de amore, II.1, in Scritti vari a cura di Eugenio Garin (Ed.nat. dei Classici del pensiero italiano I, 1942), 488. [How many errors . . . our Marsilio commits by confounding everything.]

[30] L. Tonelli, L'Amore nella poesia e nel pensiero del Rinascimento (Florence, 1933). John C. Nelson shows in his Renaissance Theory of Love (NY, 1958) that Giordano Bruno too belongs here.

[31] Ed. with an account of the life and work of Leone (etc.) by Carl Gebhart, (curis societatis Spinozanae, 1929).

Again, therefore, it is a monism of religious love, for which in the act of theoria all is transparent to God: an erotic monism working with an analogy of God and the world, portrayed throughout in accordance with the ancient understanding, which however with Bruno and with Spinoza, who was deeply influenced by Leone, will become a theoretical and systematic monism. The erotic monism unites—as, fundamentally, do Plato in the Phaedrus and Ficino—spiritualism (as the dynamic transcendence of each individual form through longing) with symbolism (as a lasting gaze at the beauty of the individual form, in which the infinite beauty shines forth).[32] The spiritual and religious dynamic towards the highest beauty gives the moral measure to the relationship with individual beauty; it is itself one with the world-being, which, as with Ficino, is finally (as 'soul' of the world) appetitus, desiderium.[33] World-being is already chaos or matter turned back to the primordial love, which ascending from form to form and relinquishing the lower for the sake of the higher ('thus called by many a prostitute') pursues love of itself through to God.[34]

Now (in Plotinian fashion) God as bello bellificante is raised above the cosmos as bello bellificato, which stands in relation to him as a son to a father;[35] thus God can be designated as 'highest artist',[36] indeed as 'master builder'[37] of a perfect work; for Leone is not only an heir to the Old Testament, he is also the contemporary of Bramante and Leonardo. But then the relationship of God to the world is, as with Eriugena, Cusa and Ficino, one of centre to the periphery, of implication to explication, of the Good manifesting itself as the Beautiful, a relationship that for Plotinus possesses the highest exaltation (of the One over the many); the beauty is therefore understood, in opposition to the Renaissance artists' 'vulgar' aesthetics of proportion (especially, Leone Battista Alberti), in the Plotinian sense of the 'form' of the 'idea that shines through', which awakens the eros for the infinite.[38] As with Ficino, who in imitation of the classical and medieval metaphysics of light composed several treatises on light and the sun, light takes on with Leone a more than merely metaphorical meaning: it is the first manifestation—as simple beauty—of the primordial spiritual light, the single-formed mother of the differentiated beauty of colour and form:[39] already the way is clear for Goethe's doctrine of colour.

---

[32] Dialogue III.113a, 129b–130a.

[33] Kristeller, Ficino, l.c., ch. 10 (appetitus naturalis), 171–199.

[34] Dialogue II. 10b–11a.

Of Leone's aesthetic metaphysics, Menendez y Pelayo[40] has said that nowhere before Hegel had such an idealist aesthetics been more comprehensively developed. It is important as mediating and inspiring the great subsequent systems. The Plotinian rungs of Being are rungs, objectively of beauty, subjectively of love: world-soul and the intellectual realm of ideas mediate to the glowing centre of Being, which streams forth into the many in order through longing 'to draw all things to itself'. In the homecoming to God the acts of intellectio, of amor and of fruitio (Ficino: voluptas) are one: as that amore intellettuale,[41] which, dying to individual being, surrenders itself to the One—Spinoza's highest philosophical act. The descent of God becomes ascent to God, and the cosmic circolo amoroso is closed:[42] descending, it is beauty enticing attraction; ascending, it is that eros which, a Platonic mixture of fullness and need, charm and want, presses towards eternity.[43]

---

[35] III. 124b.

[36] III.100a.

[37] II.72b, III.106b.

[38] III.101a, b; III.37a.

[39] III.102b–104b.

[40] Historia de las ideas estéticas en España, III.60 (cit. in Gebhart, l.c., 63).

[41] III.99a; amore intellettivo: III.141b.

Here gapes that aporia which Pico discovered in Marsilio but had not been able to resolve. If creaturely love is essentially longing, how can it be quenched? How can it attain the form of divine love, which cannot be longing? Leone builds a bridge from both banks: God as infinite blessedness cannot grow through the blessedness of the creature, yet the communication of His love to the creature effects a glorification of God, as it were a super-fulfilling of his love, just as each lover is fulfilled in the beloved.[44] 'The upright man,' say the ancients [the Jews], fa perfetto il splendore de la divinità.[45] On the other hand, the lack of God in the creature burns the more fiercely, the more spiritual and loving it is; thus one sees that this 'need' cannot finally be something negative, but is a form of participation in the eternal love.[46] Here again we see the hidden biblical a priori of this theology. For while Plato and Plotinus view eros completely from the world's perspective, and depicit the One, as the sun of the Good, only as a self-radiance at rest in itself (even in Aristotle's 'thinking of thinking' there is no trace of eternal love), God now becomes the archetype of eros: 'the first lover is God, insofar as he knows and wills; the first beloved is the same God, insofar as he is beautiful. Thus the primordial love is God's love of Himself . . . this inner relatedness fashions His most perfect and most simple unity . . . Just as the one who understands, the thing understood and understanding itself are only divided, so far as they are in possibility, so too the beloved, the lover and love itself are three and divided insofar as they are in possibility, but insofar as they are one and the same, undivided thing, thus far are they in reality.'[47]

---

[42] III.143b–146b.

[43] References collected in Gebhart, 85.

[44] III.43a, b.

[45] III.35b. [makes perfect the splendour of the divinity.]

[46] III. 68a, b.

[47] III.55b–57a.

Thus eros wells out of a love which is more than erotic and is again transcended in this love.

After the liberal Jew, the renegade Dominican: in GIORDANO BRUNO there occurs one of Fate's turning-points; he becomes secretly father of the modern religion of the cosmos, Spinoza and Leibniz are decisively indebted to him, on him Schelling will build further, and when Herder and Goethe say 'Spinoza', they really mean Bruno. His authority is Cusa in almost everything that he thought or sought to think, but if Bruno still takes along with him the form of Platonic-Cusan analogy—as a thin shell—the triumphant content is now plain identity. The theses on God's unsearchability and on negative theology that he expresses in the Torch of the Thirty Statues betray the ancient form: God as the infinite sphere with its centre everywhere (Alan of Lille; with a reference to Parmenides), as the identity of essence and existence (Thomas), as more inward than one's self (Augustine), as above, in and beneath all things (Gregory the Great), as 'essence of essence', 'nature of nature', 'centre of all things' (Erigena), as the identity of being, power and action (Cusa), as the unity by which everything is one (Plotinus), as transcendent over every contradiction, every agreement, every difference (Cusa), as the invisible whose sole visible reaction is the world (Ficino).[1] It is only necessary however to ascertain in what context these theses of the Lampas stand, to discern that the principal accent lies elsewhere. For the construction of the cosmos begins here—quite as in Hesiod—with the three 'unformable' entities: Chaos, arising from that Orcus or the Abyss, and its child, the Night: 'the begetting Chaos lacks all things, the granddaughter Night however seeks after all things, the son Orcus, in between, is avidity for all things.[2] 'Chaos means emptiness, Orcus passive potentiality, Night matter.'[3] Set over against this lower trinity of darkness is the higher one as pater (pleroma), primus intellectus (=nous) and light, the spirit of the universe. On the balance between the two trinities everything depends. 'For with evil it is thus: it is an evil, if there is not evil, for it contributes to the necessity of the good; if one takes evil away, then there is no longing for the good, the good is no longer that strived for, glorious and highly to be praised.' Therefore the three are necessary: 'the formless Chaos, the unformable Orcus, and Night which ever absorbs all forms and never itself takes shape.'[4] After the manner of Heraclitus, cosmology arises in the unfathomable mystery of the unity of opposites: a form of negative theology that is no longer 'Platonic' at all. The unfathomable ground of all things, which manifests itself in nature, the fathomable ground, corresponds, for Bruno, to nothing else than the intoxicating experience of the bottomless height, depth and glory of Being. Of this there is only one—but a penetrating—proof: for Bruno (in contrast to Cusa, Ficino, Leone) prayer exists no longer, it is radically excluded by what he says. In the place of prayer there steps the elevated feeling of the 'hero' who attains haughtily to union with the universe, even if the coincidentia oppositorum tears him apart. Eros as a trembling, unquenchable longing for God has turned into the titanic power of the hero in his ardour which flares up from absolute fire itself: Eroici Furori. He is himself the contradiction of God, which, insofar as it strives towards God, strains upwards not directly, in Platonic fashion, from the imperfect to the perfect, but 'in circular motion' strives towards the centre which is beyond every form.[5] This circling corresponds to the infinity of the world which is Bruno's great revelation: 'hundreds of thousands of stars and tides! . . . only one heaven, one infinite region of the aether, in which these glorious lights keep their determined distances from one another and share in the eternal life. These flaming bodies are the heralds, which celebrate the Sovereign majesty and glory of God! So we recognise the infinite influence of the infinite cause, the true and real reflection of infinite power, and need no longer seek divinity in the remote . . .'[6] Circling in the infinity of the cosmos, the spirit is at the heart of God's glory; there is no further ascent. That is the message of the mystery of Diana and Actaeon, twice given detailed exposition in Eroici Furori: by a transposition back of the Cusan venatio sapientiae into the realm of pagan mythology the human spirit (as a hero who is capable of the philosophical, enthusiastic ascent) becomes a hunter in the great forest, who perceives unawares (exaiphnês) the naked goddess bathing and, changed into a stag, himself becomes the prey, for at the command of the goddess his own dogs tear his heart to pieces 'with pitiless, mutinous bites'.[7] In both expositions it is a matter first of all of the transference: the hunter becomes the prey; he who hunted the divine and wanted to assimilate it to himself, is hunted by it and is defeated, in the 'ecstasy brought about by so great a beauty'.[8] It is true, Diana is the divine glory manifest, splendor di specie intelligibili.[9] 'For no-one can see the sun itself, the universal Apollo and the absolute light in its highest and most withdrawn form, but one can see his shadow, his Diana, the world, the universe, nature, which is in things, the Light which is reflected in the darkness of matter, that which shines in the darkness.'[10] But when the dogs have torn the hunter to pieces, he no longer needs to behold his goddess 'through lattice and window' (as Bruno says, recalling the Song of Songs), but can 'without a dividing wall, himself become wholly eye, see her immediately', her who 'is the true essence of the being of all things', the 'comprehensible nature, in which the sun and the radiant glory of the highest nature is refracted', for 'from the monad of the godhead there proceeds the monad of the universe'.[11]

---

[1] Bruno, Opera latine conscripta I–IV, ed. Fiorentino and others (1880–91), Dialoghi italiani, ed. Gentile-Aquilecchia, in Classici della Filosofia VIII (Sansoni, 1958^3). German trans. by L. Kuhlenbeck, Giordano Bruno, Gesammelte Werke, 6 vols. (Diederichs, 1904–9). Op. lat. III. 38–43.

[2] Ibid., III. 19.

[3] Ibid., III. 9.

---

[4] Ibid., III. 21.

[5] Eroici Furori I. 4; 1012.

Diana is Beatrice transferred back into the myth. Since

---

[6] La Cena de le Ceneri I; 34.

[7] Interpretation of poem 18, Er. Fur. I. 4; 1005f.; of poem 54, ibid., II. 2; 1112f.

[8] 1008.

[9] 1113.

[10] 1123.

[11] 1125.

Dante and the stil nuovo the idea of the divine made manifest is feminine (with Plato it was masculine here below and in heaven sexless). But in truth Beatrice was the one who gave form, Dante the one who received it. Bruno-Actaeon however, the hunter torn to pieces, is utterly masculine, and the destruction of the furioso is in truth the ecstasy of sexual passion. In the speech for the Helmstadt Academy on the death of Prince Julius von Braunschweig he depicted himself complacently as belonging to the face of 'obscene fauns, gods of the forest and satyrs',[12] and in this consciousness the epilogue of his chief Latin work of natural philosophy de Immenso et Innumerabilibus mocks at the Ganymedes who are poured out like a shower in Platonic fashion, while he penetrates his object durus, villosus, rusticus, asper, callosus, rigidus, in short with an erect member—memet ingero rigidum, membrisque viriliter acrem, infrenem, invictum, sementoseque sonantem—and so the muses will have to love him.[13] Shortly before he had finally abandoned the Platonic ideas of things: God—or as one might call him: mens, deus, eros, unum, verum, fatum, ratio, ordo—is internal to all things, motor ab interius, and to be found nowhere else than in the cosmos, that is immediately in hearts overcome with enthusiasm.[14] Bruno cannot jeer enough at a Platonic furor, and just as much at a biblical furor—an inspiration that comes from above and catches one up into rapture. Such prophets are like the donkey who carries the sacrament. The true furor bursts forth from the innermost part of the heroic soul, it is not a 'neglecting of one's own self', but rather its elevation and realisation.[15] The dialectic of this eros will be dealt with below. But one can already see that attitude emerging here, which will be christened by the young Goethe under the name of Prometheus and of Faust, with an express and contemptuous refusal of prayer ('I to praise you: why?'): a masculine, creative attitude to Being and a conquering advance into the sphere of the 'macrocosmos' or the 'earth-spirit'. Diana will then be called Helen, and Faust will have to be content to be courteous and polite towards her, indeed he will not be able to do without the Ganymedean, just as throughout Bruno stands in need of the Platonic. The philosophical act again demonstrates its complete ambivalence, which had been manifest in it since Promenades, Heraclitus and Plato: extremely masculine, form-bestowing with Kant and Fichte, the natural philosopher, and with Jean Paul, and finally masculine with Hegel.

---

[12] Oratio consolatoria, Op. lat. I/1, 36.

[13] Op. lat. I/2, 318.

[14] Ibid., 313f.

[15] *Er. Fur. I. 3, 986*f.

Yet another conclusion remains to be drawn, and Bruno has towards the end even more shamelessly drawn it: his advance to the presocratics causes him to forget his Neoplatonic starting-point—Heraclitus and Parmenides step into the limelight (de la causa), but finally there emerges an atomism inspired by Democritus, Epicurus and Lucretius (de minimo, de monade).[16] It is an atomism that answers to the Eroici furori: yet it is, knowingly or not, the immediate expression of an infinite totality: in the 'Ganymedean' aspect the Eleatics are right, but in the 'Promethean' the atomists. It is basically, without the mediation of any analogy, Leibniz's system of monads; but both, Bruno and Leibniz (who knew him), seen as a whole, become steps towards a modern materialism. Why should the dark trinity, Chaos-Orcus-Night (as potency-laden matter), not in fact give birth out of itself as a superstructure to the trinity of light, which cannot exist without it, and thus contain within itself the whole mystery which the old metaphysics and negative theology vainly sought in imaginary heavens?

b. Eros: The Glory of Melancholy

The equation of Platonic eros—as the upward-attracting transparence of the beloved form to the divine—and biblical caritas was no arbitrary act of Ficino's: it only gave (as has been said) an expressly philosophical justification for the poets of the dolce stilnuovo and the Petrarcans. From the Middle Ages up to the present century there has held sway an image of eros which consciously or unconsciously was exalted, transfigured and divinized by the rays of agape. With Dante this Christianization of eros found expression for the first time and unsurpassably, yet with the imposition of a journey through hell, and a fully Christian penitence and confession before Beatrice. The step beyond classical antiquity is here taken with the utmost Christian conciousness. With Homer the highest love was the faithfulness of a couple; with Virgil religion and political duty inexorably limit and contain eros; with the tragedians exalted love is made manifest in austere sacrifice; Sappho alone can provide a faint anticipation of what in the Christian period would be made of eros. Yet even her cosmic feeling of love remained a matter of pious hope and painful supression. There is nothing in Plato to suggest that love for a boy accompanied the ascending eros of the Symposium through all the stages to the Godhead, still less (as with Beatrice) that it should illuminate the way ahead: the love of 'one beautiful body' is already extinguished on the next step of love of 'all beautiful bodies'. So the Platonism of the Middle Ages, of the Renaissance and of Idealism, where the beloved form as an incarnate Idea can attract upwards to reach God, is coloured and conditioned as a whole by Christianity: christologically, for only in Jesus Christ does a single human form make the Godhead present with complete validity and effectiveness (sacramentally); and in a trinitarian manner, because only the God of Jesus Christ is in himself freely and personally eternal love.

---

[16] Felice Tocco, Le opere latine di G. B. esposte e confrontate con le italiane (Florence, 1889).

What then if this true infinity of agape meets the infinity of longing of eros? There was the possibility that agape, providing a limit and a measure of eros, would subjugate it to itself and take it into service: such would be aspired to and celebrated in the service of courtly love. There was no possibility of forgetting the being of agape and letting eros hold sway as formerly: eros was disturbed, challenged and judged by agape. So there was only left the last possibility that eros itself should attribute to itself the dimensions of agape and raise itself to the absolute in a new way, far surpassing Plato. A beginning had already been made in post-Christian paganism, for with Iamblichus, Porphyry and Proclus eros had been elevated as a cosmic principle, which—in opposition to the utterances of Diotima and Socrates—only within an all-embracing divinity identity was shaded off in analogical stages (God — gods — daemons — heroes — world-soul — individual soul). This hidden Christian a priori, which is naturally strengthened in the modern period and effectively gives form, can alone explain the unselfconsciousness with which the Christian cultures from the late Middle Ages to the nineteenth century deal with the gods of antiquity: not at all using them only as playful decoration and external allegory, yet without equating them with the genuinely confessed mediator, Jesus Christ. They exist and rule with a not-properly-established reality in the space granted them by eros, itself robbed of infinity by agape. One recalls too with what ease the otherwise so curt Augustine in exchange with Porphyry could equate the ('created') gods with the biblical angels,[1] angels which, after all, for a long time—cf. Dante—were held to be movers of the spheres and therefore spirits. Thus one can better grasp the equally easy exchange between gods, spirits and angels, between biblical and mythological figures, in the art of the Renaissance and the Baroque, for example in the figures which animate a landscape by Poussin or Claude Lorrain.

The direct equation of eros and agape lends to eros new colours and new properties. First there falls on it a ray of biblical glory: its charis receives traits of Christian grace, its charm (pietà) shimmers with the New Testament mercy of God, its transfiguring power becomes the power to forgive guilt and transform the world. But further, its being possessed, its rapture, its ecstasy and foolhardiness, that mania which Plato dealt with ironically in the Ion, which Socrates handled at least dialectically in the Phaedrus (for he delivers one speech against and one for the mania or eros), is now evaluated positively in the spirit of the New Testament decision of faith to the point of martyrdom and raised to a furor which from Petrarch through Ficino to Bruno, to Byron and beyond, will find its defenders. Finally (and this is the decisive point) the post-Christian eros, set up as an absolute, can only be melancholy. Its hidden Christological structure makes it an immediate unity of the finite and the infinite, of the beloved man and God; the dynamic symbolism of Platonic provenance certainly softens this immediacy, but it cannot cancel it. In the 'sacrament' of beauty of this worldly form—woman, boy, landscape or whatever—is the gracious presence of the totality of the divine beauty; the 'moment' has to last and then be exhausted. It is the starting-point for Faust, who only formulates what the whole Christian culture of eros from the Middle Ages to the modern period characterizes—in complete contrast to the classical and pre-Christian—as something melancholy. One can say with Kierkegaard that only in the post-Christian period could the 'aesthetic' emerge into such a mortal opposition to the 'ethical-religious', because only now has the latent melancholy and anxiety of Christian existence come to light in its irreducible contradiction. But in saying that, one is not to let out of one's sight the fact that marriage is in Christian terms a sacrament, that, with the whole man, his eros too is capable of redemption, that God's covenant with man in Christ (and the Church) bears a form inspired by eros, that the Platonic-Plotinian longing for God as the eternal beauty must and can, too, find a Christian justification. The relationship of eros and agape remains for the west a veritable place of decision, as Titian's picture of earthly and heavenly love recalls—though at the same time in a veiled way, because the two women hardly represent anything other than earthly (symbolic) and heavenly (symbolized) eros, or as Wagner's Tannhäuser recalls—though his Tristan at the same time says the opposite.

---

[1] De Civ. Dei IX.23. The historical correctness of such a comparison, as far as the 'hosts' of Yahweh, the seraphs and cherubs, etc., are concerned, is known today. Cf. also Paul Vuillard, De la Conception idéologique et esthétique des dieux à l'époque de la Renaissance (Paris, 1907).

Tristan. Nothing shows more clearly that the eros-problematic only emerges apropos a Christian Platonism, than—in ultimate intensity—GOTTFRIED OF STRASSBURG's Tristan poem, which consciously undertakes to set the eros of man and woman absolutely face to face with St Bernard's Christ-mysticism based on the Song of Songs.[2] There had been earlier attempts to translate the 'drama' of the Song of Songs into the courtly style,[3] but even in this context Gottfried's undertaking stands solitary and unique. Eros as the content of life, utterly self-purposed, without a goal outside itself, as both the highest suffering and the highest bliss, above all as utter exclusiveness: for any other human relationship, any other fidelity or honour or one-time virtue is transcended and denied in the closed-off interaction of Tristan and Isolde, and this as the highest, most difficult achievement, declaimed in esoteric doctrine for a small chosen circle of noble hearts—this had hitherto not been heard of. Final passion equated with absolute suffering; passio understood consciously in the instinctive and Christian double meaning—with which Claudel will delight in playing—and this suffering as self-glorification of love, as its 'resurrection' and its 'eternal life' in its own enjoyment of its absoluteness: all this, as Schwietering has rightly said and also demonstrated, can be represented only in counterpart to the mysticism of love and passion in the traditional interpretation of the Song of Songs, which attained its highpoint in Bernard's commentary on the Song and amongst his friends, continuators and imitators. As later Petrarch composed his spiritual-secular Canzoniere from the sources of Augustine's Confessions, as Hölderlin and German Idealism drew from the stores of Swabian mystical pietism, so Gottfried creates—but in what a mighty inversion!—from the treasures of cloistered contemplation. The wild forest and the cell, in which the lovers pass the time, are borrowed from the life of the hermit; the grotto of love with the crystal couch as the sacred centre is the cubiculum of the Song of Songs or also the transposition of Christian sacred space with the altar; the mutual nourishment of the lovers in their gazing at each other repeats the mystery and miracle of the Eucharist. Everything profane is sacred, for everything Christian has been taken up without remainder into the mystery of eros.

[2] Julius Schwietering, 'Der Tristan Gottfrieds von Strassburg und die

But it was not this work alone, but the 'Roman de la Rose' of Guillaume de Lorris, begun shortly afterwards (c. 1250), to Bernhardische Mystik' (1943), printed in Mysik und höfische Dichtung im Hochmittelalter (Niemeyer, 1960), 1–35.

[3] Ibid., 22–23.

which Jean de Meung contributed a long, unsuitable continuation, that determined the next three centuries. Begun in the purely courtly spirit of transfigured Frauenminne, it ended as something polyhistoric, or rather misogynist; in the first part, in many allegorical forms, the God Amor rules personally, but in the second, the goddess Natura, known from the Chartrians, rules, here too accompanied by a companion spirit. The early Renaissance will quarrel about the importance of this learned world of eros: Christiane of Pisa and Gerson reject it, while the first humanists defend it.

The future indeed belonged not to the gentle and learned allegory, but to the metaphysical symbolism of the heritage of Dante: Petrarch's book of songs coins the form of the modern lyric, in the whole tension between religious sublimation (for Laura does not return his love, and after her death floats up to the heavenly ideal) and self-consumption in a lonely fantasy, which the poet recognises as sinful and yet in which he wallows. What in Dante is purified into tall, pure flame, smoulders here dialectically in uncertainty: it is not the beloved who is the ultimate object of desire, but the gloriously melancholy state of the lover. It is the hour of birth of the erotic-poetic furor, which one can pursue from Petrarch to Leonardo Bruni, Ficino and Landino and which from there invades France with Ronsard and la Pléiade,[4] late to triumph in Bruno. The long, weighty tradition of the love treatise—from Dante's early works through Guido Cavalcanti's interpretations of the Canzone d'amore to the Neoplatonists whom we have already discussed, to Bembo's Asolani, to Castiglione and up to Tasso's love treatises[5]—does not teach as much as one glance at the struggles of the greatest: of Michelangelo and Shakespeare.

With MICHELANGELO,[6] the symbol-schema, taken over from

---

[4] Raymond Marcel, 'La fureur poétique et l'humanisme florentin' in Mélanges Jamati. Editions du Centre nationale de la Recherche Scientifique (Paris, 1956), 178–193.

[5] John Charles Nelson, Renaissance Theory of Love. The context of Giordano Bruno's Eroici Furori (Columbia University Press, 1958), 15–162.

[6] Die Dichtungen des Michelangelo Buonarotti, ed. with a critical apparatus by Carl Frey (Berlin, 1897). Complete Poems and Selected Letters of Michelangelo, tr. by C. Gilbert, ed. by R. N. Linscott (NY, 1963).

Dante and Petrarch, stands as a kind of framework to which he clings, but out of which he also creates.[7] But the content overflows the form—both in his passion for Tommaso Cavalieri and in his humble devotion to Vittoria Colonna—the melancholy has Christian depths and is broken through by a purely Christian confession of guilt, a deeply moving prayer ('So near to death and so far from God!'),[8] the conviction that only grace can help him (Ne proprie forze o, c'al bisognio sieno/Per cangiar vita, amor, costume o sorte,/Senza le tue divine e chiare scorte,/D'ogni fallace corso guida e freno).[9] Platonism indeed in form, but in weary and deeply humbled letting-go of the beloved 'symbol' in order to surrender it, and himself with it, to God. In SHAKESPEARE's sonnets—love for a young man, with whom then the beloved woman (herself married) deceives him—all modish Petrarchism is shattered, till in the last collection (127–154) love is accused of wild, mad devastation (129). It is indissolubly tied up with hatred and with virtue:

Love is my sin, and thy dear virtue hate,
Hate of my sin, grounded on sinful loving . . . (142)

until the Platonic thought[10] unwillingly breaks out from one completely worn down, and the 'poor soul', the 'centre of my sinful earth', 'fool'd by these rebel powers' that assail it, is called upon, not to die any more of hunger in its body, 'painting thy outward walls so costly gay', but to live 'upon thy servant's loss' and to let it starve, so that its—the soul's—treasure may increase in heaven:

So shalt thou feed on Death, that feeds on men.
And Death once dead, there's no more dying then. (146)

---

[7] Erwin Panofsky, The Neoplatonic Movement and Michelangelo. Studies in Iconology (New York, 1939).

[8] No. XLVIII, p. 36.

[9] No. CLV (Carico d'anni . . .), p. 242. [It is not one's own powers, however necessary these may be, that can change life, love, custom or fate, without your divine and clear assistance, to act as guide and restraint from every erroneous course.]

[10] On this theme cf. Vyvyan, Shakespeare and Platonic Beauty (London, 1961).

Where Michelangelo weeps, Shakespeare is 'as a fever', 'past cure' and 'frantic-mad', his love longing 'for that which longer nurseth the disease', and the black-eyed and dark-haired beloved shows herself to him finally 'as black as hell, as dark as night' (147). If we had the verse confessions of Botticelli, Tintoretto and so many others, who created the inconceivably beautiful, who knows whether they would not sound the same, and with what melancholy the glories were purchased that should bear witness to the power of bodies to utter the eternal and to shelter the divine! Beside the dangerous heroic feats of eros there walks along, making all things gentle, a veiled, forming, playful, allegedly and to a large extent genuinely Christian culture in society, passing without interruption from the time of the Troubadours and Minnesingers to the cortegiano of the Renaissance and the gentilhomme of Baroque and Rococo. Arthur and his courtly circle still celebrate resurrection in the gigantic plan of Spenser's 'Fairy Queen' after the model of Ariosto and Tasso, and Amadis' triumphal procession we have already looked at—through the window of Don Quixote.

With Ariosto likewise, the Platonic-heroic furor of love is rendered harmless as the occasion for a lively social conversation, while the ambitious plan of the sick TORQUATO TASSO finally to create a valid Christian epic—and one knows how much it was admired and imitated a hundred times over[11]—regarded from the height of a Western perspective must seem a tragi-comic misunderstanding. As with Aeneas, a 'commander', and his 'pious arms' (arme pietose)[12] are sung, which 'liberate the great grave of Christ'; the 'knight of [11] 'The influence of 'Liberated Jerusalem' on the [epic] poems published between 1582 and 1698—almost a hundred of them—will be all-powerful and unlimited': Wiese-Pèscopo, Geschichte der italienischen Literatur (2nd edn. 1910), 385. The whole of Christian history is gone through from the 'destruction of Jerusalem' under Titus to 'Constantine' and the 'discovery of the Cross' under Heraclius, to the 'converted Bulgaria', the Gothic wars, further episodes of the crusades, to the 'conquest of Granada', the French wars of religion, naturally Italian history, the discovery of America, but Mondo creato) and the 'Earthly Paradise' to 'Esther', to Marino's 'Massacre of the infants of Behlehem' and to various Marian epics . . .

---

[12] Gerusalemme Liberata, with notes by Pio Spagnotti and preface by Jesus'[13] will 'in the Holy Land create a new kingdom', to make peaceful devotion possible for pilgrims to the Holy Sepulchre.[14] The world-historical commission of Aeneas-Augustus has shrunk to this undertaking, which, although intended in a Christian spirit, and also justifiable in a political perspective, is not at all to be recommended in the perspective of the Gospel. And while with Virgil the transcending of the limiting passion of love for the sake of the religious and political mission remains an episode, with Tasso eros becomes the all-pervading atmosphere. As a youth Tasso had written in close dependence on Ficino a first compendium of Renaissance love, Conclusioni amorose (1570), where he defined 'beauty as the reflection of the Godhead throughout the universe', equated beauty and goodness, described beauty as goodness causing attraction to itself through longing, whence 'the miracles of love are true', although he also conceded that 'each joy of love is accompanied by pain'. In a later treatise on love (1580), Platonism yields the place to a more realistic definition: 'Direi che l'amor fosse desiderio d'abbracciamento', and in yet another (1583) love (under the influence of Aquinas) is graded, that directed to God is called caritas, and all virtue is only the order of love.[15] This uncertain wavering between Platonism, realism and Christianity, makes the lyrical, erotic aether, which is condensed in the principal episode of Gerusalemme, appear as an ultimately univocal, all-sustaining reality despite its division into a good and bad love-enchantment.

Certainly there stands behind the strategic events, answering to the 'apparatus of the gods' in Homer and Virgil, a Christian apparatus too. God the Father looks with pity on his heroes;[16] he calles them and sends them;[17] he communicates to them through angels in dreams;[18] instead Michele Scherillo (Hoepli, Milan, 1923,[6] cited according to Canto and Stanze. I.1.

[13] VII.56.

[14] I.23.

[15] Nelson, l.c., 150–157.

[16] I.7.

[17] I.9f.

[18] XIV.1f.

of gods he has his heavenly hosts who (as in the Homeric battle of the gods) engage in the decisive fighting;[19] prayer is made to him often and piously, there are miraculous answers to prayer (as in Homer the wounds of the gods are quickly healed, so an angel heals the wounded Tancredi with a healing herb).[20] Still more: a decisive episode, the liberation by Rinaldo of the heroes who have been turned into beasts in Armida's Magic Castle owes its success completely to gracious heavenly guidance. The Devil's kingdom and its machinations are painted with a psychology so much more colourful and humanly sensitive than in Dante, that Milton found here his model and with him all later (and increasingly sympathetic) psychologists of the Devil. Despite that all these are only obligatory accessories (instead of which Camões unhesitatingly retained the ancient gods): the real moving force is the bewitching eros, and the follia d'amore of even the most magnanimous heroes,[21] since Tancredi loves the pagan Amazon, Clorinda, in the 'drunkenness and fury' of his accursed heart;[22] Erminia loves Tancredi without requital of her love; above all the wicked magic of Armida, who, sent out by the hellish forces of opposition to seduce the heroes, finally carries off Rinaldo, whom she really loves and who really loves her, to her Magic Castle at the Antipodes. These three pairs of lovers carry the action, or rather kindle its lyrical pathos; that Tancredi without knowing it in a decisive duel kills his beloved who, dying, demands of him baptism and later appears to him as a transfigured Platonic spirit to comfort him, when, in a frenzy of love, he tears the bandages from his wounds and almost dies[23]—that is the 'sublime'. That Erminia in love-stricken grief goes to lead the life of a shepherdess on the bank of the Jordan and finally discovers Tancredi whom she had believed dead—that is the 'pathetic'. But that Armida is changed from an evil enchantress into a helpless, abandoned woman who pursues Rinaldo with revenge, finally to perish of her own love, to be reconciled with him and humbly to speak to the hero a 'See, I am your maid, let it be according to your will',[24] is at the same time 'heroic' and 'human'. But when Rinaldo—and here the distance from Dante becomes clear—taking heart refuses the lovecharm of Armida, finds her love 'exaggerated' and obliterates his memory of her,[25] and when afterwards he, himself disenchanted, is able to banish the magic forest: this shows how much for Tasso love remains eros, its mania, the same as in Ariosto's 'Raving Roland'—a cosmic power, whose focal point lies not in God, but in the human heart.

---

[19] XVIII.92.

[20] XI.72f.

[21] I.45

[22] XIX.104

[23] XII.70f., 83–86.

This eros, that Sappho was the first to call bitter-sweet, smoulders throughout the 'classical' literature of the modern period: always both redeeming, making one taste sweetness in bitterness, eternity in the moment, and at the same time unredeemed, because it gathers up the contradictions in its own glory, beyond which it knows nothing higher. If with Cusa God was beyond the coincidentia oppositorum, and the longing of love, enkindled by this, streams out beyond it, then with GIORDANO BRUNO eros itself is the divine coincidentia oppositorum, where self-glorification and self-destruction must coincide. 'Who does not see that the principle of decay and of begetting are the same? Is not the final point of dissolution the origin of the one begotten? If we consider aright . . . love is hatred and hatred is finally love. The hatred of what is opposed is the love of what is related, in love for the one lies hatred of the other. In essence and root hatred and love are the same thing, friendship and enmity are all the same. Where then will the doctor seek a better means of healing than in poison? . . . And why? Because the ground of being of the one as of the other is single, as is the ground of their knowing.'[26] This absolute unity of opposites (absolute in the sense of being established on the ground of the world itself) the hero is able to attain in erotic furor; the metaphysics of the Eroici furori engenders the modern eros-poem, which is based on uniting the 'heroic heart' with the life of the universal cosmos, so that mortality is united with immortality, defeat with victorious triumph, in a manner at once glorious and tragic. This hero has his muses and his Castalian spring within himself, he is 'through the grace of his own heart . . . no less favoured than others by the grace of kings'. But 'out of one and the same feeling of the heart there spring forth the two opposites: hatred and love',[27] as in the heroically heightened eros destiny (sorte) is nothing else than the disposizion fatale and the ordering of life's circumstances to which destiny subjects him.[28] 'For what are you, my destiny, other than my love, and you, jealousy, other than a part of my being? So then let love remain and consume my life . . . what it tears from me mortally, gives me wings, quickens me and lifts me up.'[29] For the beloved form 'and its power over me is indeed nothing else than the power of love, the norm of my love and my own norm.'[30] There is also the hatred of the 'cunning beasts of the priestly power of the Tiber', there are the 'slanders of hissing serpents, the network of frothing boars, for the highest necessity of fate encompassed me,'[31] which will soon still more horribly encompass Bruno in the dungeons of Venice and the Roman Inquisition, and carry him to the stake. But thus it is with the destiny of the furioso eroico. If all things consist of opposites, then the hero is marked out by the fact that he does not balance the opposites in himself feebly, but 'suffers under the excess of the opposites', he does not only endure the most extreme tensions, but he strives for them:[32] as he sinks down to hell and wings his way up to heaven, he has to oscillate 'eternally between the opposites', and thus is bound to Ixion's wheel.[33] And this on the basis of his own audacity: as he was Actaeon so now he is Icarus: very likely he senses in his ascent that he will crash down, 'but what life could be compared with such a death?'[34] One of Bruno's devices is the moth, which hurls itself into the flame; and to appreciate this interpretation, one has to keep before one's eyes, the fact that for him the consuming symbol of eternal beauty is always the erotic love for a woman: 'It delights him not less to perish in the flame of the ardour of love, than to be caught up in rapture in the rare vision of the beauty of her face; naturally drawn towards it, in a free decision and through the authority of fate, he submits and dies, joyful, resolved, serene.'[35] And because both, the necessity of fate as well as free virtue, are insolubly one in the heart of the hero, and this unity is participation in the divine all-unity, the great moment already, as with Goethe, conceals eternity, according to the device amor instat ut instans and its interpretation: che l'instante sia tutto il tempo.[36] The fullness of these emblems is truly baroque; but the baroque quality in them is precisely that in the mystery of an extreme contraction they permit one to grasp the whole, deep meaning of infinite truth: they are Reason's game with its own sacramental form. Everything constantly balances on a drawn-out reciprocity—mutuo fulcimur[37]—oscillating in a precarious balance between angel and beast: the level of being of 'daemons or heroes'.[38] But always this eros is exposed to the teeth of the hunting dogs which Diana sets on to him, and rightly Bruno draws on Lucretius' interpretation, which depicts the madness of lovers:

---

[24] XX.136.

[25] XVI 53–55.

[26] Giordano Bruno, De la Causa, Principio e Uno, dial. 5, in Dialoghi Italiani (ed. Gentile-Aquilecchia, 1958³), 338–339.

---

[27] De gli Eroici Furori, dial. I.1:962.

[28] Ibid. 965. Cf. 1003: Necessità, fato, natura, consiglio, voluntà nelle cose giustamente . . . ordinate tutti concorrono in uno.

[29] Ibid., 971.

[30] 972.

[31] Oratio Consolatoria, Op. lat. I/1, 43.

[32] Er. Fur. I.2; 978

[33] Ibid., 979.

> They press closely to themselves the object of their > desire and cause pain > to the body; with their lips they drive their teeth into > each other.
> They afflict one another with kisses, because there is > no pure pleasure.
> There lurk impulses that goad them on to wounding > whatever

---

[34] Er. Fur. I.3; 999.

[35] I.5; 1037–1038.

[36] I.5; 1066–1067. [that the instant be the whole time]

[37] I.5; 1034. [we support one another reciprocally]

[38] I.4; 1023.

> They touch, and a madness from which such urges > arise.[39]

'Through such an attraction the art-ful mastery of nature is effective, that one is melted away in a delight which at the same time annihilates, and in the midst of every torture senses satisfaction, and remains tortured in the midst of every satisfaction.' There is only a unity of opposites and the continual preponderance of one or the other pole.[40]

Certainly KLEIST did not think of Bruno, when he wrote his Penthesilea; rather, it was classical tragedies that had their influence, like the tearing in pieces of Pentheus and Lycurgus, or the demonic love of Phaedra or Medea. Yet his drama is not at all classical, but precisely presupposes the post-Christian, absolutized eros, with its coincidentia of greatest tenderness and utter cruelty, of divinisation (in the Rosenfest) and annihilation; for the queen of the Amazons lets loose her hunting hound on the defenceless Achilles and herself buries her teeth in his flesh. Why does she do this? Because she wanted to surrender herself to him only out of the sublime heroic feeling of having vanquished him, but he has defeated her and has concealed this from her. Eros as a haughty feeling of triumph here has achieved its extreme opposite to Christian, serving agape. In the whole piece Penthesilea is called time and again 'the raving'; she is smitten 'by the most poisoned dart of amor';[41] she speaks the word of the Gospel: 'Ah, my soul is weak, even to death'.[42] When Achilles once more calls her out to battle to let himself be defeated by her, it is too late, she has, in her love, let frenzy get the upper hand:

> It is before the countenance of the gods—
> I call down the furies!—that he should strike me![43]

'Amazons with packs of hounds in pairs, following them elephants, firebrands, chariots with blades': these Kleist has follow her on to the stage. 'Half-Fury, half-grace, she loves me . . . she will do nothing to me,' says Achilles, and dares to meet her in battle. Finally she is simply 'the dreadful', 'the gruesome', the 'most monstrous'. But she says, [39] De Rerum Natura IV. 1079–1083.

---

[40] Dial. II.1; 1079–1080.
[41] Penthesilea, Scene 7.
[42] Scene 9.
[43] Scene 20.

> I am so blessed, Sister! More than blessed!
> I feel myself, O Diana, to be utterly ready for >   death.[44]

And throughout it belongs to this eros and again corresponds exactly to the Eroici Furori, that Penthesilea, to kill herself, needs no outward weapon—she willingly surrenders it—but descends into her own heart and therein unearths an annihilating feeling, as cold as steel, with which she stabs herself.

Kleist's famous piece, rejected by GOETHE, with a half-hearted, mute voice, far outstripped the latter's planned Achilleis, in which Achilles, conscious of the approach of death, falls in love with Polyxena and during the wedding is killed by Zeus' lightning. Here Goethe wanted to transfer the ancient myth from the religious to the private, erotic sphere, just like the immense chain of courtly baroque operas from the sixteenth to the end of the eighteenth century, which never manage without such an eroticizing of the classical material: a witness to the poverty of this whole period of Christian culture! Goethe finally accepted honestly the remoteness of his sketch from the Iliad: '. . . further, the object holds a merely personal and private interest, whereas in contrast the Iliad embraces the interest of nations, of continents, of the earth and of heaven'.[45] To lend to eros this cosmic dimension was only allotted to Claudel in his Satin Slipper: a unique success. In Faust this cosmic form is not successful, for the real love of Faust for Gretchen is a 'merely private interest' and not even something ideal, whereas his love for Helen, with its universal and cultural overtones, remains unreal and therefore, too, cannot be ideal, but merely allegorical. To elevate Gretchen finally in Christian fashion into a kind of little Beatrice is romantically and humanly touching,[46] but poetically and from a cosmic perspective irrelevant.

---

[44] Scene 24.

[45] To Schiller, 16 May, 1798.

To the genuine stock of Penthesilea belong Racine's Phèdre and Grillparzer's Medea and many of Byron's characters: for here eros is presented in its self-glory and autonomy, as with Gottfried, but with a keener Christian edge. It is eros that forms the intelligible mean between heaven and hell, God and demon, eternal life and death; Kleist struggles and pleads for the 'understanding' of this self-glorified mean, even when it is to be seen as 'raving, gruesome, most monstrous'.

In his mighty Nibelungentrilogie (1862),[47] crafted with iron weightiness and subdued power, HEBBEL can resurrect the German heroic song in no other way than by making it throughout also a double tragedy of eros: the eros of the Valkyrie Brunhild who will surrender herself only to the one who can master her in the mightiest struggle: that Siegfried does it in darkness in place of Gunther is such a humiliation for her that Siegfried must die at Hagen's hand. And the eros of the bride of Siegfried, Kriemhild, who vows her life to vengeance and does not rest till, as queen of the Huns, she had murdered the Nibelungs all together in the burning hall of Etzel. The figures and the sequence of events are of superhuman greatness, Aeschylean: against what metaphysical background will Hebbel set them? Just where they belong; at the turning-point between the old German myth and Christianity. The Valkyrie is baptized only with difficulty, and her Norn-like prophetic power, her feeling for the Father of the gods forces its way violently back into her consciousness from beneath.[48] In Worms it is not much better. For there too the cross is honoured by 'letting it stand beside an oak of Wodan, because no-one can know whether any magic indwells it.'[49] The heroes are in a Christian context: at Etzel's house they go to early mass, 'and we are good Christians, as you know,' says Hagen grimly.[50] Hebbel nowhere characterizes so truly and deeply what is Christian than in the chaplain's speech to Kriemhild who thinks only of revenge:

---

[46] And recalls the way in which in Tasso the tragically-killed Clorinda appears to the grief-stricken hero in the dream, transfigured as the 'eternal-feminine', etc.

[47] Historical-critical ed. by R. M. Werner (I. Abt., Dramen IV).

[48] II.Act 1, Scene 2.

[49] II.2.5.

> You seek revenge, yet revenge has > Been reserved for the Lord, he alone
> Sees what is hidden, he alone repays . . .
> Perhaps you bear it hard, and want to cry to heaven,
> Yet look on Him, who yet bore much more hardly!
> Having come down to us in the form of a servant,
> He took the guilt of the world on himself
> And having experienced thoroughly every anguish, > made atonement . . .
> Even your anguish, and more deeply than you > yourself! . . .
> He was obedient to death on the cross.
> This sacrifice he offered for you in his love,
> In his unfathomable mercy;
> Do you want now to refuse him yours?[51]

Still more: Hebbel frames the event with two mottos: 'Consider him who forgave on the cross' (spoken to Kriemhild)[52] and 'In the name of him who died on the cross' (Dietrich von Bern's final word to the whole tragedy), words which are spoken not out of the psychology of the heroes but out of the great historical vision of the poet. And yet this tragedy can take place only in the twilight and in the transition from myth to revelation, it shows what happens to the reality of myth when it stands in the sphere of revelation. But whence can Hebbel, in the middle of the nineteenth century, give back to the myth true power (something that neither Goethe nor Schiller nor Wagner could do)? Only from the elemental powers of eros, which here again is made into a titanic, cosmic power, but quite without that looking up to the divine typical of the devout classical texts, the divine which is always right, even in Aeschylus' Prometheus.

[50] III.4.11.

[51] II.5.9.

[52] II.5.9

Michelangelo had already raised the human form to this superhuman, titanic format; within it, Henry Fuseli gathered together all the great Western poetry from Homer, Aeschylus and Sophocles through Dante to Shakespeare and Milton (even Wieland's Oberon is included); Wagner will—alongside various ambiguities in his world-view from The Flying Dutchman and Tannhäuser to Parsifal—compose in Tristan the apotheosis of post-Christian eros set up as an absolute: eroici furori as the unity of erotic passion and death. What is here preserved in a disintegrating (decadent) harmony, is agonizingly broken in pieces by Strindberg—quite in the spirit of Bruno's law—for each new attempt at love infallibly conceals within itself the seed of deathly hatred and dissension, finally to crystallise in new forms of eros. As in Tristan, the West here passes over, cancelling itself, into Buddhism.

The absolute self-glory of eros, which grasps eternity in a moment, if taken seriously, eliminates any accompanying thought of an individual immortality after death. The Greeks stood, when they surrounded the hero with the prestige of mythical glory (κῦδος), before this thought and already in part advanced towards it (Pindar); the classicising modern period clings to it ever more onesidedly (with Ficino the whole 'Platonic philosophy' is absorbed into proofs of immortality), ever more uncertainly and anxiously (Pomponazzi, Descartes, Herder, Kant, Jean Paul, Tennyson's 'In Memoriam'), ever more contradicted by pantheisms and empiricisms. Heroic eros sucks the radiance of the idea into itself; here man is timelessly raised beyond death. He can, as in Goethe's Faust, project himself into what lies beyond death, and thus the classical idea of the 'eternal feminine' (in Helen) changes into the 'virgin, mother, queen, goddess', 'highest sovereign lady of the world' (Mary). But this projection can only be understood as a bare 'postulate', perhaps only as a mere fugitive ray of the tragic self-glory of eros. Then everything classical becomes, together with what is Christian, a 'myth' of the loving heart.

A final, solitary success and thus something like a synthesizing retrospective of the whole tradition is that world drama that its author PAUL CLAUDEL has characterised as an opus mirandum, The Satin Slipper.[53] What Goethe had been incapable of—giving a universal meaning to the eros of two lovers—Claudel has fashioned out of a personal experience of existence (love and, as calling, exile), which is aware of being mysteriously related to that of Dante.[54] The tragic glory of the absolute love between Rodrigue and Prouèze, at once hell and paradise,[55] complete impossibility of fulfilment, pure longing and nevertheless presence of eternal blessedness[56]—this tragic love is 'used' by the king of Spain (Charles V, sovereign of the Old and New World) as a monstrous potential by which he can give form to the newly-discovered, chaotic continent. A lover like Rodrigue can be seduced by no earthly gloire, and a lover like Prouèze will hold in Africa the royal attributes right to the most extreme humiliation. When they meet again after ten years, because it is in earthly terms finally 'too late', Rodrigue addresses that speech to his officers on the tragic eros, in which he places himself beside Caesar and Mark Antony, while the poet of these Eroici Furori puts himself beside Dante and Shakespeare: as if he understood his mission here to be to utter the word of farewell to Western Platonism, his wayward Muse takes it back once for all into the service of Christian grace. At night, by passing through a purgatory of flames, Prouèze is purified by the guardian angel from a longing eros to an agape of renunciation, which wills nothing more than what God wills. So she withdraws from clinging to her beloved, leads the way, now without any wishes, into death, and becomes for him the guiding star. His earthly path continues a little longer. The drama is, so to speak, geographically laid out: Europe spreads (in Columbus and then in the pair of lovers) to America and Africa, but it discovers too (as Renaissance) its classical origins; at the same time it is divided in itself (in the Reformation) and struggles for its reunion (in the episode with Doña Musique and Don Juan d'Austria); China is from the beginning given a part, Japan becomes the final goal of conquest from America. But while the globe of the earth is covered, the whole earthly imperial glory (under Philip II) becomes fantastic and unreal and is smashed (in the defeat of the Armada), while at the same time the hero's earthly glory of eros crumbles away and what becomes visible beneath it is a simple Christian sinner—untrue to his own love (with the 'actress'), parleying with Christian love (Doña Sept Epées), and failing before her, Rodrigue degenerates into an aesthete, who paints 'folk' art, and finally becomes a traitor out of sheer blind presumptuousness, and so, ending up on a dunghill, is ready for confession in the face of the stars, to be picked up by a rag-picking Carmelite nun to be a servant of the monastery. Claudel therefore manages to associate with the Eroici Furori an element which, historically, remained almost completely foreign to it (if we make the exception of Ariosto and his imitators): humour, in which the univocal glory of eros is again resolved in the all-embracing analogia gloriae, to which agape says the last encompassing word. This fading and decay of baroque splendour in the 'Fourth Day', when every form of kingdom and art is dissolved into the glory of the all-bearing sea, would be immanently pure tragedy, but the poet knows how to undergird it with humour and to make it reflect existentially that higher harmony that rules everything, the Platonic-Christian symbol of which is the character of Doña Musique. So the poet is at the level of love and yet simultaneously quite transcends it: be it with the sceptical humour of the Chinese servant in the face of his raving lord, or with the guardian angel's love, drawing close with understanding, for the madness of Prouèze and the love of the great patron saint (in the church of Prague), which can, quite Platonically, be heavenly constellations too (like Sant Jago). Claudel's final word stands, like all the greatest poetry, in an historical kairos, from which it cannot be displaced and out of which it streams forth effectively. It is a word which, once again and quite personally experienced, gathers together and sets its seal on a long Western tradition—and one knows what Aeschylus, Pindar, Virgil and Dante meant to Claudel. It shapes them into a secular, historical form, which the world that follows will perhaps no longer understand, or only from the outside, just as, on a smaller scale, Hofmannsthal's Schwieriger brought a cultural form to an end that twenty years later would no longer exist and that can no longer be reconstructed by any actor.

---

[53] Le Soulier de Satin, in Théatre II (Pléiade, 1948), 563–849. (Eng. tr. by J. O'Connor; London, 1931).

[54] 'Ode jubilaire pour le six-centième anniversaire de la mort de Dante'(1921), in Feuilles de Saints, Oeuvres Poétiques (Pléiade, 1957), 667–681.

[55] 'Each of your kisses gives me a paradise, which I know is forbidden to me. Where you are, there will be for me the impossibility of escaping from this paradise of torture, which . . . penetrates me and from which I remain excluded . . . You open paradise to me and prevent me from staying there . . .': Second Day, Scene 14.

[56] Fourth Day, last scene.

What becomes of the 'heroic' eros, once this is no longer mediated in the post-Christian period, deserves no further notice, because self-consumption in absolute contradiction robs it of any glory: Penthesilea, Kriemhild and Isolde become a prey for psychiatry. And with Sartre the heart's most extreme contradictions grow cold as the pendulum-strokes of a lonely existence devoid of eros.

c. Retreat to the Human Person as Centre

The battle of the modern period about God's glory in the world was justified. It was no tactical error to call for help on intact powers of classical antiquity from humanism and the Renaissance onwards, for antiquity was intended and perceived as that which was valid for all human persons; but it proved to be strategically wrong. Seen as a whole, the battle has to be considered as lost. History brings a parenthesis to a close and distances it from the highest intellectual creations: Poussin and Watteau, Hölderlin and Goethe . . . So it is a matter of exercising the most attentive discretion of spirits over the next step of the tradition: if its concerns are now ours, why are its instruments not ours?

The mediation of antiquity for the sake of the salvation of a total Christian culture has been seen so far from two points of view: the embedding of the biblical revelation in a theophanous cosmos, and the embedding of agape in the basic human orientation interpreted as eros (desiderio di bellezza). Both movements broke down at the point of the overwhelming of 'supernature' by 'nature'. The decisive battle is however fought only where the two great inroads on the hitherto tolerably intact world-view are made:

1. With the Reformation, the visiblc unity of Western Christendom, the sacramental expression of its nature as the unity of the love of Christ, was torn to pieces: a fearful incursion into the credibility of its form, the inner unity of which should bear witness to the world of the truth of the Incarnation. It is open to misunderstanding, and finally futile, when the baroque period exalts the outward ecclesial forms, both in theology and in art, as the 'representation' of the Christian divine glory. The retreat from the smashed form of the revelation to the still sound piety of men and women becomes inevitable: under English leadership, which operated on a European scale in the Enlightenment, the new attitude is established.

2. From the advance of natural science from Copernicus to Galileo and then to Newton, which initially suggested to man a changed attitude only to matter, radical metaphysical consequences were precipitately drawn: atomism, materialism, atheism come into sight almost simultaneously. The natural religion of mankind, which gave itself out as 'progressive' as opposed to the fragmented Church, was 'traditional' in its reaction to these these radicalisms; it could certainly admit the altered attitude of mankind to the cosmos, but did not need to draw the atheistic consequences because man as the embodiment of the world was for it a religious being. In this second stance, what we earlier characterised as the 'anthropological reduction'[1] is still clearer than the first stance: for here the theophanous character of the cosmos can already be given up, while the religious phenomenon in man is allegedly still intact. But in the first (anti-Church) aspect too, an inner logic compels the displacement of the religious dimension from all heteronomy and its relocation in the spontaneity of the heart and the autonomy of reason, and therefore essentially in ethics. This will become the criterion of the relationship to God in Shaftesbury's Moralists.

[1] Love Alone: the Way of Revelation (1968: German original 1963), 25–42.

This anthropologising of metaphysics, too, is still accomplished in close dependence on antiquity, even though cosmology retreats into the background. Plato's Republic, in which man has a world-structure, Plotinus' plan, which sets the intellect between God and the world, but above all the Stoics, for whom man stands as the steward of cosmic reason and the master of destiny, orchestrate an accompaniment to this turning-point. It is on man that the flood-light concentrates from all directions ever more clearly: he becomes the focus of glory, where the cosmos lightens up to the mind and the darkness of God steps into openness.

Cusa had already granted to man the position of a reflected implication of the cosmos and, correspondingly, of a reflected creativeness (as secundus deus) and designated him with Protagoras—in spite of Plato—as the 'measure of all things'. He had moreover proclaimed in a heavenly council the unity of the religions of mankind in the One Logos. In his programmatic (even if much over-valued) treatise, Pico della Mirandola develops the dignity of man who in his free self-determination surpasses the laws of the cosmos, is 'sculptor and poet of himself', 'and if he, dissatisfied with the lot of a creature, withdraws into the centre of his totality, then he becomes one spirit with God and in the lonely darkness of the Father, transcendent over all things, will likewise have precedence over all things'.[2] Around the centre of this man, Pico gathers together all arts and sciences, philosophy, mysticism and magic, and finally also Christian theology. The ideal of the uomo universale seeks for a time to realise in life this great man who will be equal to every intellectual exercise, like Leonardo da Vinci or even Erasmus, Paracelsus, Milton, Goethe. In order to probe his metaphysical being and at the same time his fitness for achievement, he is—like a chemical—isolated in strange retorts; on the island Utopia (Thomas More), in the kingdom of the Sun (Campanella), in New Atlantis (Francis Bacon), he is to prove how far he can create a society out of his own powers. In the later innumerable Robinson-stories, the experiment is sharpened, for this experiment of abstraction is expected of the individual. From Hobbes to Rousseau, man—in a new abstraction—will be constructed out of his original, historical situation. In Rabelais, and more impressively still in Montaigne, he becomes the true point of reference for all classical (and especially Stoic-anthropological) and Christian 'benefits of culture': the scepticism of the Essais signifies nothing else than that man remains the measure of his historical and social constructions. The French moralists and tellers of fables (under the patronage of Theophrastus and Aesop) encircle him and pursue him with their aphorisms and parables, just as today the reporter pursues a star with his snap-shots: the surprise unmasks.

---

[2] De hominis dignitate, ed. Garin (1942), 104–6.

These positions are very consciously marked out, and defended very firmly: the philosopher, withdrawing from cosmology and leaving the field free for the natural scientist, and the theologian, withdrawing from church dogmatics, meet one another in a single person: he is the advocate of the man of autonomous religion. In 1593 Jean Bodin writes his religious dialogue called Heptaplomeres between a Catholic, a Lutheran, a Calvinist, a Jew, a Muslim, an upholder of natural religion and an agnostic.[3] The climatic differences between the different peoples and races—noticed by Aristotle, taken up by Shaftesbury and developed on a grand scale by Herder in his Ideen—are held here to explain the religious differences too; the Jew already stands close to Lessing's Nathan; the basis for understanding is natural religion and the decalogue. Castellio transcends the individual Christian points of view and their narrow ecclesiastical dogmatisms and persecutions of heretics; Sebastian Franck distances himself by his Paradoxa from the Church denominations, by making in gnostic fashion the biblical texts a 'manifestation' of an event of universal history, beyond time: of an 'invisible Christ' in whom the world as a whole is given grace a priori. Origen's Logos, interior to man, Augustine's magister interior, is already interpreted here as the intelligible element in man, in a way that foreshadows Kant.

---

[3] Ed. L. Noack (1857).

The sovereign autonomy of man is also the inner light that inspires the three great aggressive ideologies that are fought by the liberal theisms. Niccolo Machiavelli's leading idea in his Discorsi and Il Principe is—after his study of Livy and Polybius—the Roman state, in which man understood how to give himself firm boundaries imposed by an objective intelligence which could tame his subjective and ineradicable tendencies towards decadence. Man, as he is found in the idea of his own greatness and 'form', has here the power thoroughly to fashion the empirically always unstable man as 'matter'. Strangely enough, it is always a classical, purely anthropological blueprint that leads to the later scientific ideologies. The gloomy figure of Francis Bacon, the reckless, ambitious and faithless upstart who was accused of corruption and was soon once more ending his life in loneliness, transfers Machiavelli's political, manipulative harshness to man's relationship to nature. He must win back his lost paradisal sovereignty over it, something possible only by inexorably taming it: it is matter for the power of the mind, and this power increases with every partial victory. Knowledge is power: scientia et potentia humana in idem coincidunt. But considered like that, the whole of classical metaphysics – which was contemplation of the truth—is good for nothing; in place of its half-religious conceptual compositions the inductive methods must be introduced. 'The corruption of philosophy by . . . an admixture of theology is far more widely spread . . . from this unwholesome mixture of things human and divine there arises not only a fantastic philosophy but also an heretical religion'.[4] 'It were better to have no Opinion of God at all; than such an Opinion, as is unworthy of him'[5]—so in the Essays, behind which stands a Plutarch read through Montaigne's eyes. The third, Thomas Hobbes, fashions a strangely exact synthesis of them both. The classical author he started out from was, significantly, Thucydides[6] and his (sophistical) doctrine of the rightness of might; he first became known by translating Thucydides: a demythologised classicism of the pure conflict of power. The philosophy has two themes: the bodies and the state, but only one method: subjugation under one imposed form. Extreme nominalism and sensualism united with mathematical method—to think is to reckon, to add and subtract—leaves a space free where abstraction of the most general geometrical forms can be understood as structures produced a priori and can be cast over the sense perceptions to subdue them. Correspondingly the material substrate must be conceived of hypothetically as something purely mechanical and atomistic. From all this it is clear that this hypothesis is derived, not from experience, but from the methodical presupposition (that knowledge is power and therefore a matter of reckoning). The theory of the state cannot be understood without Protestant presuppositions. The primordial bases of man, according to his experience, are the egoistical cupiditas of the individual for power, and the natural instinct to avoid violent death: a personal 'chaos' (like the former atomic chaos), which is subdued only by an absolute social form of power from above, required by the universal necessity of escaping the war of everyone against everyone else. In this form lies every value: what it includes is good, what it excludes (forbids) is bad, and this holds, too, for the conscience of the subjects. This form of power—it is a matter of indifference whether it is realised in a monarchical or a democratic manner—is therefore humanity, collectively rising above the condition of instincts, structuring itself by its own rational power. There is left for religion, revelation, theology—outside any relationship with strict philosophy, which knows nothing of God—a place in an empty vacuum.

---

[4] Novum Organon I § 65 (Eng. tr. by R. Ellis and J. Spedding, pp. 86f.).

[5] Of Superstition, in Essays XVII (ed. W. A. Wright, London, 1879; p. 68).

[6] But one should not be silent about the fact that in his old age Hobbes

In Holland and France, Hobbes was in intensive exchange with the circle of Descartes; the stark mind-matter dualism of the latter was one of his starting-points, as it will also be for mind-matter speculation. And remarkably enough it was from translated the whole of Homer into rhyming verse. On the classical bases of Hobbes: F. Tönnies, Thomas Hobbes, der Mann und der Denker (1922); W. Dilthey, Weltanschauung und Analyse des Menschen seit Renaissance und Reformation in Ges. Werke II (1923^3), 292f.

Descartes that the great English opponent of Hobbes, the leader of the Cambridge Platonists[7] Ralph Cudworth, initiated his return to Plato, or better to that classical-Christian, ethical and aesthetic view of the world as a whole, which had nowhere in Europe been more deeply and more convincingly maintained, even up to the present, than in Anglican England.[8] Cudworth, who originally wanted his True Intellectual System of the Universe (1678) to oppose all forms of determinism—mechanistic atomism, Stoic-pantheist fatalism and Calvinist predestinarianism[9]—in fact covered only the first position in the form given it by Hobbes. Elementary propositions lay the foundation: truth is greater than man; the concept of God underlies all religions in such a way that man must mount up above himself to God; faith—which cannot be derived from the natural concept of God—is necessarily rooted in the fact that even the Divine Trinity, once revealed, shows itself, as with Cusa, to be present everywhere in vestigial form in natural religion. Christianity is here—and in an unbroken tradition from Cudworth and Butler (The Analogy of Religion: Natural and Revealed, 1736), through the Oxford Movement (and its recourse to the Platonism of the Church Fathers), to the present with Farrer and Mascall—essentially the revealedness of the Glory of God: archetypally in the heavenly, eternal world, in the earthly, mortal, sinful world in a veiled mirror and likeness, mediated by Christian death which therefore takes on a central significance (cf. the great English poetry of meditation).[10]

And yet it is not this tradition that is historically dominant, but the other, which will engage the anti-materialistic battle over God on a purely anthropological front. With Herbert of Cherbury, the principal contents of Christian thinking are entrusted to purely religious reason which is given responsibility for them. Later with John Locke (The Reasonableness of Christianity, 1695), John Toland (Christianity not Mysterious, 1696), and Matthew Tindal (Christianity as Old as the Creation, 1730), man is ethically obliged to measure any revelation that is revealed to him against his free, autonomous reason (Locke), to strip down the Christian religion, disguised in dogmas, to the simple, universal-human truth in the preaching of Jesus (Toland), to base Christian teaching simply on man's universal piety (Tindal), in a decided secularisation of the Augustinian civitas Dei ab Abel.[11] But this whole movement is important for the history of the concept of glory only as the presupposition of a new synthesis into which it leads, and which again is itself the fundamental presupposition for the next phase.

---

[7] F. J. Powicke, The Cambridge Platonists, a Study (1926).

[8] J. H. Muirhead, The Platonic Tradition in Anglo-Saxon Philosophy (1931). E. Cassirer, Die platonische Renaissance in England und die Schule von Cambridge (1932). K. Schmitz, Cudworth und der Platonismus (Diss. Giessen, 1919). Cf. The Glory of the Lord, vol. III, pp. 354–355 (Eng. tr.).

[9] Lydia Gysi, Platonism and Cartesianism in the philosophy of Ralph Cudworth (Diss, 1950; H. Lang, Bern, 1962), 1.

[10] Louis L. Martz, The Poetry of Meditation, a Study in English Religious Literature of the Seventeenth Century (Yale University Press, 1954).

ANTHONY, EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, creates this strange synthesis of Enlightenment (with its anthropological reduction) and antiquity (with its aesthetic, cosmological dimension), that was to be one of the starting-points for the classicising, humanist-cosmic religion of the period of Goethe.[12] Thus his creation must be briefly set out.

Shaftesbury[13] fought a battle on two fronts: with Cudworth against the materialism of Hobbes, and with the freethinkers against the dark, humourless dogmatism of the guild of theologians and, in the background, against the similarly humourless image of God in the Old Testament that is unworthy of a free man.[14] Our own black melancholy makes us fashion both: a mindless, materialistic universe and a God, on whom we project 'wrath, and fury, and revenge, and terrors'.[15] So it is a matter of finding a position, independent of atheism and revealed theology and invulnerable to attack by either, which contains sufficient absolute criteria on which to judge the two hostile standpoints: for Shaftesbury, this is ethics, modern and humanist, but understood with the breadth of classical cosmology. And within this ethic it is a matter of finding that subjective 'situation of mind'[16] which best answers to the dignity of man's freedom, and which therefore best brings him into contact with absolute reality, with divinity present in universal nature: Shaftesbury calls it 'good humour'[17] not only in the classical sense of ἁρμονία of the powers of the soul and the humours and their agreement with the universe, nor only with the Platonic supplement of the philosophical irony of the 'man of the world', but in a specific way characteristic of the Enlightenment as the inner, serenely superior self-possession of the free, self-determining spirit. The reduction of the two antinomian 'religious' positions to a religiously neutral ethics corresponds to Descartes' theoretical reduction to the cogito, yet with this difference—indicative of the passage of time—that ethics is seen as an irreducible minimum, based on freedom as autonomy, and at the same time as a self-sufficient maximum, because the fundamental moral phenomenon can generate from itself the whole world of ethics even as conduct in relation to the universe and to God (cosmology and theology) and can thus become the judge of any externally-announced doctrine of the world or of God.[18] It then becomes clear, for example, that atheism has a fairly neutral stance to the ethical phenomenon, neither [11] On the whole subject: Emmanuel Hirsch, Geschichte der neueren evangelischen Theologie im Zusammenhang mit den allgemeinen Bewegungen des europäischen Denkens, vol. 1 (1949), 244–344.

---

[12] C. F. Weiser, Shaftesbury und das deutsche Geistesleben (Teubner, 1916).

[13] Shaftesbury's Characteristics (his own collection of his most important works, especially: 'A Letter concerning Enthusiasm' (E), 'Soliloquy or Advice to an Author' (S), 'An Inquiry concerning Virtue or Merit' (M), 'The Moralists, a Philosophical Rhapsody' (R)), cited in the annotated ed. by John M. Robertson (2 vols. London, 1900). Newly discovered works collected as Second Characters by B. Rand (Cambridge University Press, 1914).

[14] There is polemic against the followers of 'some religions', who

---

'expressly give no other idea of God than of than of a being arbitrary, violent, causing ill and ordaining to misery; which in effect is the same as to substitute a daemon or devil in his room': M I.242. On the Jews, their 'surliness' and consequent intolerance: E III.23.

[15] E IV.24.

[16] R II.31.

[17] E I.17, I.39. And the whole essay on the Freedom of Wit and Humour: I.43–99.

[18] M 1, II.243, 255; M 1, III.260–1.

essentially furthering it nor essentially threatening it,[19] while positive religion, in accordance with its purposes,[20] can certainly inwardly exalt and perfect the ethical,[21] but in general tends to endanger it. This is because the free man essentially loves the good for its own sake and correspondingly does the good too, and only from this, his most sublime perspective, can see the true nature of absolute spirit: God is either pure selfless good and self-radiance[22]—and in this selflessness pure beatitude—or he is simply nothing. The act of looking to God takes place in an ethical, aesthetic intuition of the whole, which lets itself be split up for the ratiocinating reason, when the implications of the primordial ethical phenomenon are discovered:[23] Platonically, because the order in the self on the higher spiritual plane reflects the order of the universe, and the natural social disposition of the beasts must be realised spiritually through ethical self-renunciation for the sake of the common good.[24] The world-harmony is stamped with ascetic 'temperance',[25] 'decency',[26] and in so far as the universe is orientated to self-preservation, the individual too will strive for it and thereby also know the 'self-enjoyment'[27] of virtue, which all the same rests principally on triumph over self for the sake of the generality. If beauty and goodness are characterised as 'still one and the same',[28] if the ideal of εὐδαιμονία is realised already on earth[29] in a quite classical way through ethical renunciation, expressly through a preference of choice,[30] through the distinguishing of deep joy from superficial pleasure,[31] then here we find a link with Plato and Aristotle via Kant's separations to Herder, Schiller, Goethe, Hölderlin and Jean Paul. Yet even Kant will be included in the synthesis insofar as the moral good may be sought and posited solely for its own sake, and any thought of merit (which religion had a partiality for including) is to be excluded from it; for the moral good is primarily its own reward.[32] In order to elucidate this, Shaftesbury calls on the non-functional character of beauty, which the admirer must let be. The beautiful ocean: 'The bridegroom-Doge, who in his stately Bucentaur floats on the bosom of his Thetis, has less possession than the poor shepherd, who from a hanging rock . . . stretched at his ease, forgets his feeding flocks, while he admires her beauty.'[33] Not for nothing does Shaftesbury look across to 'the mystics of the ancient church, whom these of latter days have followed',[34] to the advocates of amour pur who wish to love the eternal Good for its own sake alone. Thus he clearly draws out the principal line of the Western metaphysics of glory: from Homer and Heraclitus, Plato and the Stoics to the Christian lovers of God, but also to Leone, Spinoza and their adherents. It is not personal immortality that stands in the foreground here, but that glory of the intrinsically-worthy good, which in Shaftesbury's opinion is the only legitimate starting-point for any hope of immortality on the part of the individual: 'if by the hope of reward be understood the love and desire of virtuous enjoyment, or of the very practice and exercise of virtue in another life, the expectation or hope of this kind is so far from being derogatory to virtue, that it is an evidence of our loving it the more sincerely and for its own sake.'[35] Shaftesbury, who

---

[19] M 1, III.275.

[20] '... the end of religion is to render us more perfect and accomplished in all moral duties and performances': M 2, I.287.

[21] 'So ... nothing can more highly contribute to the fixing of right apprehension, and a sound judgment or sense of right and wrong, than to believe a God who is ever and on all accounts represented such as to be actually a true model and example of the most exact justice and highest goodness and worth': M 1, III.264–5.

[22] R III.110.

[23] R III.140–1.

[24] Virtue is largely defined by the notion of a public interest: M 1, II.252, III.258, 279; M 2, I.280.

[25] R II.41f.

[26] R III.137.

[27] M 2, I.292; 1, II.248.

[28] R III.128.

[29] R II.58, 67.

[30] R III.130–1.

[31] R II.29f.

[32] R II.37–8.

[33] R III.127.

[34] R II.55.

[35] M 1, III.273.

was so displeased with the Jewish religion because of its notion of reward, had not noticed that without any primary perspective of immortality it demanded the loyalty of faith and caused the (eschatological) reflection to shine forth from the divine covenant which was an end in itself.

But the ethical starting-point which methodically brackets off the religious, both against atheism and Christianity,[36] in order to be its measure, establishes a relationship to the Godhead immanent in the world, which in the end is necessarily one of identity. Negative theology completely vanishes. Prayer has assumed the form of 'enthusiasm' which sings those great hymns to the harmony of the universe which have had such a mighty impact on posterity. Sharply marked off from all its ethically rejected forms, the true enthusiasm means being filled by the spirit of the pure divine love,[37] which is simultaneously (as selflessness) our pure being-outside-ourselves and (as the essence of our morality) our pure self-realisation—or even the pure immanence of God in us. Here lies the knot: the glory of God, which, if we have eyes and heart, manifests itself to us everywhere in the cosmos, shines for us primarily in the glory of our own love. In it we feel that God is present and that we are inspired by him.[38] This is a God, who has decided to travel incognito, like a prince, through his world,[39] who even (in a deeper image) exists in his world-nature in a condition of pure unconscious self-distribution, although all the children of this nature consider this to be so obvious that it is not at all striking: 'Who then understands for ever [i.e., Nature], or is interested or concerned in her behalf? No-one; not a soul.'[40] The eternal God-nature kenotically among men: Hölderlin, Rilke and Heidegger will take this thought further.

[36] R II.52–3.

[37] R II.54: '. . . whether there be anything in divinity (= theology) which you think has more the air of enthusiasm than that notion of divine love such as separates from everything worldly, sensual, or meanly interested? A love which is simple, pure, and unmixed, which has no other object than merely the excellency of that being itself . . .'

[38] R II.97.

[39] R III.102.

[40] R III.104.

The all-embracing, unexpressed identity, the replacement of prayer by enthusiasm, indicate that Shaftesbury was deeply influenced by Giordano Bruno.[41] Even if his basic accent is quite other, much more measured and more gentlemanly, still it is Shaftesbury who, picking up from the titanic behaviour of Bruno and his Eroici Furori, places the symbol of Prometheus in the foreground of the creative artist.[42] One thinks back to Cusa, for whom the created mind as a secundus deus produces from itself an unreal world after the model of the creator; one can mention the famous Poetica of Julius Caesar Scaliger (1561), who seizes man's position of pre-eminence for the true poet: while the rest of the arts only imitate and, like an actor, bring to expression what has already been composed, the true poet is creative like a second God (velut alter deus condere).[43] But there is still need of Bruno's and Shaftesbury's new metaphysical presupposition, to raise man up to a true Titan who administers the divine fire: 'such a poet is indeed a second Maker', 'a just Prometheus under Jove': the one who from the inner apprehension and experience of the divine, creative, universal nature and from the fullness of his ethical personality becomes himself a creator—and now we hear the Plotinian word—from 'inward form'.[44] In the transition to the Germans, the use of the expression 'Schöpfer' (creator) for the poet at first causes offence.[45] It makes its way with Klopstock and the Swiss; in the Sturm-und-Drang circle the 'under Jove' is simply abandoned. With Herder all 'gods, heroes and goddesses' become the disjecti membra poetae,[46] that is, of man as inner meaning of the world, who is extended through and by means of nature, and whom the Promethean poet gathers together from his inner, divinatory power.[47] With Goethe (Zum Schäkespears Tag, 1771; Von Deutscher Baukunst, 1772), Shakespeare (and in him Goethe himself) is at first the rival of Prometheus: he 'copied his men from him stroke by stroke, only in colossal size . . . and then breathed life into them all by the breath of his spirit'; then Erwin von Steinbach becomes the 'godlike Genius': 'more than Prometheus he leads the blessedness of the gods on to the earth'. In the Prometheus Ode and the Dramenfragment (1773) the 'under Jove' (which governed Aeschylus' trilogy) is finally converted into its opposite; in the latter, the Titan becomes the absolute poet, beside whom Minerva stands as 'my goddess', as the inspiration of his own genius: 'And you are for my spirit, What it is itself; From the beginning your words have been to me the light of heaven! Always, as if my soul spoke to itself and opened itself to itself, And inborn harmonies echoed in it from out of itself. Those were your words. So I myself was not myself, And a divinity spoke, when I supposed I spoke; And if I supposed a divinity spoke, it was I myself who spoke. And thus with you and me so united, my love for you so inward, so eternal!' Minerva: 'And I am eternally present with you.'[48] The relationship to genius (again, as in Shaftesbury, called god) cannot be depicted more clearly: the absolute, divine 'I' inspires what is Titanic, already in the sense of the saying of Heraclitus/Hölderlin: ἓν διαφέρον ἑαυτῷ. So Minerva can give life to Prometheus' clay creatures; so she can accompany him upwards, too, to the 'source of life', whether this is called 'fate' or 'Zeus', with whom too Goethe finally wanted to reconcile his Titan. Even though the poet later in Pandora distances himself from the principle of Prometheus, it has nevertheless grown far beyond him into the realm of world-history: in Fichte's I-philosophy, Schelling's concept of freedom, Hegel's dialectic: The vigorous force at work in this growth is quite different from the process whereby Plato's philosophy of daimonion has grown beyond the relationship between Odysseus and his [41] This has been proved above all by Dilthey: Werke, vol. II, 335f., 342f., and the comments by G. Misch, p. 521. Frischeisen-Köhler follows him in his introduction to the Moralists (Ein Brief über den Enthusiasmus, Die Moralisten, trans. and introduced by Max Frischeisen-Köhler, Phil. Bibl. 111, 1909); according to him, it was Toland, not the Dutch philosophical circle, that was the decisive mediator: pp. XIIf.

---

[42] Oskar Walzel, 'Das Prometheussymbol von Shaftesbury zu Goethe', in Neue Jahrbücher für das klassische Altertum etc. XIII (1910), 40–71, 133–65.

[43] Poetica (1561), 3a.

[44] S I.136.

[45] Walzel, l.c., 56–8.

[46] Ibid., 52.

---

[47] Ibid., 52–3.

[48] Artemis-Gedenkausgabe IV.188–9.

(true) goddess, Athene. For the Greeks thought in terms of analogy, but Bruno and Shaftesbury in terms of identity.

This hidden identity makes the man-Titan, and also the harmless citizen of the Enlightenment, essentially good. Only with this presupposition can his enthusiasm, that is his god-inwardness, suffice as prayer. His transcendence into the divinely-animated universe is always God's immanence in himself as well: as a gesture of self-emptying love, it is always reconciliation too, or better, the seizing of the state of being reconciled. The young Goethe is not lacking in piety, but he sharply resists a God who could hear prayer (Lavater and Jung-Stilling present him with a caricature of such a God). The word 'Gefühl' (feeling) which the whole Goethe-period—from Shaftesbury and Rousseau's confession of faith in Emile, to F. H. Jacobi and Schleiermacher, and to Faust's confession of faith before Gretchen—reserved for the relationship to God, could well characterise the 'feeling after him and finding him' of the Areopagus speech (Acts 17.27) and thus legitimately continue the sentire of the sensus spiratales[49] (from Origen to Bernard and Bonaventure), if only it did not function with the hidden presupposition of a final, encompassing identity. This identity characterises even the most sublime attempt of the succeeding period once more to make Christian glory coterminous with classical beauty, against all the overshadowing nights of the present: the poetry of Friedrich Hölderlin.

d. Hölderlin

1. 'GLORIOUS, HOLY, DIVINE'

In modern times, none has championed the cause of 'glory' as urgently and tragically as did Friedrich Hölderlin.[1] His need to express his experience of reality in terms of a general validity led him to combine the three historically definitive intellectual forms—Christianity, the ancient world and German Idealism—by means of a two-fold reduction; subjectively the ancient world was to emerge as the predominant form, yet objectively Idealism properly became the higher centre. Hölderlin, after all, taking his lead from Schiller's progress (in his Aesthetic Letters and programmatic didactic poetry) beyond Kant, is certainly the inspiration behind 'German Idealism's oldest system in programmatic form',[2] a text formulated, presumably, by Schelling and preserved in Hegel's script; here the highest act performed by reason, that which embraces all ideas, is seen as 'an aesthetic act' postulating 'sisterhood of truth and goodness in beauty alone', and demanding 'a new mythology', a 'mythology of reason'. And yet, the further he went the more resolutely did Hölderlin turn his back on the Idealistic philosophy[3] and its destruction, through cold reflection and speculation, of the experience of theophanous reality; but while he took up his definitive philosophical stand-point beside Parmenides-Heraclitus and made this the basis for his interpretation of Homer, Pindar, Sophocles and Plato, the fundamental assumption remained identity (and not analogy), which implies at least essential agreement with Leibniz-Shaftesbury, Schelling-Hegel, Heidegger-W. F. Otto. At the same time, if the splendour of the ancient world and its gods was to enjoy such supremacy, all the forces and motifs that had belonged to Christian revelatory glory had to be transferred to the ancient glory, seen as a theophanous Nature-cosmos. This Hölderlin did yet more thoroughly and exhaustively than had the naiver Ficino, so exhaustively, indeed, that by the time [49] Cf. Vol. I of this work, pp. 368–371 (Eng. tr.).

---

[1] The text of the Complete Works follows the larger Stuttgart edition; the volumes are indicated by Roman numerals. Modern orthography is used. Hyperion = H, the 'Fragment of Hyperion' = FH, the metrical version = MH, 'Hyperion's Youth' = YH, the penultimate version = PH, and the order of reference is: Volume, Book, Letter; thus H 1/2, 4 = Hyperion, Volume 1, Book 2, fourth Letter. References to Empedocles give the version (1E, 2E or 3E), act, scene, and line. All other references are according to the volume (or half-volume) and page of the Beißner edition. The Hölderlin Yearbook for 1944 and 1947ff. = HYb.

---

[2] IV/1, 297–299.

[3] Thus the justified reaction of Johannes Hoffmeister (Hölderlin und die Philosophie, Meiner, 1942) against Wilhelm Böhm's one-sided philosophisation of Hölderlin.

Christ's prerogatives had all been made over to the priestess of love, Diotima, and to the true pantheistic mediator Empedocles, whose death reconciles the world, when at the last there came a more conscious return to Christ no more was left of him than a tree stripped bare of leaves, an empty treasure-chest, a brother to Heracles and Dionysus,[4] one who, even if called by the poet with the other gods to the 'Feast of Peace' at the evening of ages, nevertheless ultimately (in the final version) cannot suffice to perform in and through himself the eschatological anakephalaiōsis of heaven and earth (Eph. 1.10), and must leave this office to the 'First of the Feast',[5] the cosmic, world-historical, Germanic, spirit.[6]

It is with an amazement close to worship that Hölderlin contemplates the wonder of the ancient world, which succeeded in spiritualising, whole and unimpaired, in art a total experience of God in the cosmos; he contemplates this glory with Christian eyes, and a Christian heart which unquestionably sees and understands it as the glory of love. In an early apostrophe of the genius of Greece he says (1790): 'In the sight of the gods/ Thy mouth determined/ To found thy kingdom on love./ Then were amazed all the heavenly ones . . ./ On love dost thou found thy kingdom./ Thou comest, and Orpheus' love/ Soars up to the eye of the world/ And Orpheus' love/ Wells downwards to Acheron./ . . . Maeonides![7] like thou!/ None loved like thou;/ Thy heart did embrace/ The earth and ocean/ And giant spirits, the heroes of Earth!/ And the heavens and all the heavenly ones/ Thy heart did embrace!/ And the flowers too, the bee on the flower/ Loving thy heart did embrace!'[8] Five years later, in 'Hyperion's Youth', the strains of the Pauline hymn of praise (1 Cor 13) are transposed into a classical-Idealistic cosmos-hymn far outdoing the chords Shaftesbury had sounded: 'She [Love] bears with her the painful sense of lackingness, and fills heaven with her abundance, . . . unsuspecting that the holy half-light coming towards her proceeds from herself alone. In her is nothing, and outside, everything . . . She does but hope and trust; does but sorrow, that still she is there to feel her nothingness, for rather were she part of the holiness that hazily appears before her. The abundance of the Divine is too boundless, that in her insufficiency she should comprehend it. Marvellous! from her own glory doth she start back. Let the Invisible become visible to her! appear before her clothed as Spring! smile at her from a human visage!'[9] Here Hölderlin means nothing but that same love which in the early, Christian-Pietistic 'Hymn to Love' (1790), 'everywhere in lovely glory' fills the world: 'Love doth bring down rocks in ruins,/ Conjures paradises up,/ Anew creating Earth and Heaven—/ Godly, as in the beginning',[10] and which, shortly afterwards in a new version (1792), is already enlisting as an image of expression the hieros gamos: 'See! how with the Earth doth pair/ Itself Heaven's holy delight,/ How, o'ershadowed by the storms/ The Mother's breast enraptured quakes.'[11] And yet in the meantime, as, indeed, the most convincing expression of the loving All-and-One, the Idea of identity has come to the fore, as Heraclitus' 'divine Ἓν διαφέρον ἑαμτῷ',[12] the One that within itself parts itself, and sets itself opposite itself, called by Hyperion the 'essence of beauty' and fons et origo of all philosophy.[13] This means discovery too of the new god's new name: 'Know ye his name? the name of him who is One and All? His name is beauty.'[14]

---

[4] 'The only One' (1st vers.), ll. 50f. (II, 154), (2nd vers.) ll. 50f. (II, 158), (3rd vers.) l. 54 (II, 162).

[5] 'The Feast of Peace', ll. 15 and 112 (III, 533, 536).

[6] It must be acknowledged that Beißner is right in this interpretation, despite the many Christian interpreters who would still like to identify the prince of the feast (in the final version) with Christ, on the basis of his role in the three preliminary poems (beginning 'O Peacemaker thou who beyond all hope . . .'). And that is a conclusion not derived merely from this isolated text, but wholly supported by its context, the late odes and prose texts. The Christian truth, to which Hölderlin remains faithful from beginning to end, has long since poured out over the entire garden of the ancient world, like a liquid, making everything bloom, while the old container ran dry.

[7] Homer.

---

[8] ll. 28–51 (I, 126).

[9] III, 203, ll. 7–20.

[10] 2nd vers., ll. 16 and 37–40 (I, 112–113).

[11] 'Hymn to Love', ll. 29–32 (I, 167).

[12] Frag. 51 Diels = Plato, Symposium, 187a (Beißner, II, 427; III, 465).

[13] H 1/2, 19 (III, 81, 83).

[14] H 1/2, 3 (III, 52–53).

Nevertheless, only as διαφέρον is the divine One-and-All 'beautiful'; as Ἓν it is 'holy', and as the holy appearing 'in beauty' it is 'glorious'. For Hölderlin, glory is the unity of the holy and the beautiful. But because the classical difference between gods and men dissolves into the Idealistic difference between (absolute) spirit and (thereto opposed through itself) Nature, the glorious is equally holy and equally divine when it is Ἓν (spirit) as when it is διαφέρον (Nature), when 'a god' as when 'man'; indeed, as is essential to its innermost divinity, holiness and glory, in becoming Nature and Man it strips itself of itself, descends from plenitude into poverty, changes from self-sufficiency into love: and because with Hölderlin this kenosis of the One-and-All is the poetic theme, executed with the intensity of Christian prayer and the world-commitment of a Christian mission, the unheard-of takes place: the Christian depletion of God depletes itself, becoming God's cosmic-pantheistic depletion. In the process, however, it is left undecided whether the Greek-Idealistic categorical schematism is not all the time—and the more so the deeper the work grows—a language to express an elementary Christian experience of faith: the immanence and nearness, the glory, present in concealment (absence), through suffering of the divine love, as being the water-mark of the cosmos; or whether, in the end, the language does not overpower its object, the 'tragic as such' and its 'calculable law'[15] becoming the inner form of the Cross. What is, in 'Tears', that 'Heavenly Love, tender' which, on shores of 'nigh-distorted' Greek islands, 'for her idolatry doth penance': 'Thus must be overreached,/ Too-trusting yet overall must be love'?[16] When the other 'intransigent genius powers' are frigid with winter, what is the single one left to man: '. . . yet Love doth love'?[17] And when the Titans rage, the world-forces, God looks on smiling, so long as 'the bonds of love' be not spoiled.[18] What is that love which in the pouring of the rain and the split blood alike proclaims itself as the single, flowing, world-substance?

---

[15] 'Notes on the Antigone', V, 265.

[16] 'Tears', l. 15 (II, 58); cf. 'The Poetic Calling', ll. 38f. (II, 47): 'The Spirit . . . the simple one/ Deniest, heartless'.

[17] 'Vulcan', l. 28 (II, 61).

[18] 'The Rhein', l. 97 (II, 145).

> Then should I sing 'With rain doth quench thy thirst
> The cloud, thou Mother-ground! but man with blood.
> Thus rests and cools itself that love which > Findeth no equal above or below.'[19]

A glance at Hölderlin's use of the great words is instinctive, showing, however, less the demarcation of the semantic spheres than their mutual interpenetration.

'Glorious' is used extravagantly in the early and middle periods, but in the late period more sparingly, the words 'pure' and 'clear' (to make clear) coming to the fore instead. Above all, Nature is glorious, in so far as she reveals God: 'O, if a Father's daughter glorious Nature be, is not the daughter's heart his own? Her innermost being, isn't not he?'[20] The sun is glorious,[21] and the spring 'in all the splendour of youth',[22] the landscape of the Alps[23] (the 'hook of dreadful glory'),[24] the flames of Etna,[25] and, most of all, the 'genial powres of Nature',[26] among whom Hölderlin numbers aether (the sky), light and earth, often water too. The Teck is 'of royal glory', 'God's most glorious work',[27] and in the youthful poems heroes are addressed as men of glory[28]—the phrase is recognisably drawn from Klopstock—and later the 'goddess of harmony'[29] too is at once of 'unbounded majesty', 'stately', 'of divine beauty'; here and in the cycle of poems to the Ideals the formulations for sublimity swell like a flood. In the hymn to the Muse we read 'Worship what is fair and glorious!',[30] an anticipation of Hyperion's [19] 'To Edward' (1st vers.), ll. 13–16 (II, 39).

---

[20] H 1/1, 3 (III, 12).

[21] 'At Morn', l. 14 (I, 302); 'Go down, fair Sun . . .', l. 6 (I, 314).

[22] FH III, 166.

[23] 'The Canton of Switzerland', l. 7 (I, 143).

[24] Ibid., l. 27 (I, 144).

[25] H 2/2, 10 (III, 151).

[26] 1E 1/4, l. 411 (IV, 18); 2E 1/3, l. 435 (IV, 107).

[27] L.27, l. 53 (I, 55, 56).

[28] 'Keppler', l. 19 (I, 81); 'Gustav Adolf', l. 54 (I, 86); Rousseau in 'To Quietude', l. 25 (I, 93).

[29] L1.12,26,50(I,130,131).

[30] L. 116(I,138).

'Religion is love of beauty'.[31] With the 'Genius of Courage',[32] greeted as 'Glorious one!', we turn our gaze to man, whose calling, as 'King of the finite realm', is 'wonderfully and gloriously to heal';[33] his body even is glorious,[34] but his spirit is 'devouring glory'.[35] While in the Hymn to Humanity this glorification is still primarily seen in Christian-eschatological terms—'E'en now in greater glory from our tombs/ The splendour of the finite realm goes forth'[36]—in 'Hyperion' this glory gains immediacy through events; after the 'glorious voyage to Chios' we read 'Thus did we receive glory from the powers of Earth and Heaven'.[37] The sunset flows about Diotima 'like a gloria, such as the saints have',[38] and in the poems too Diotima is the 'glorious one',[39] the 'too glorious one';[40] for her too Hyperion is 'the glorious one',[41] and the two share 'the endless faith with which we gave ourselves glory'.[42] The expression can explain the words from the ode to Princess Auguste of Homburg: 'But glory hath from thy name my song'.[43] The Greeks are glorious: 'We in our poverty are annihilated by such glory';[44] Homer is glorious,[45] and [31] H 1/2, 19 (III, 79). [32] L.3 (I, 176).

---

[33] L.67 (I, 159).

[34] 'Sömmering's "The Organ of the Soul" and the Public' (I, 227).

[35] H 1/1, 4 (III, 12).

[36] L1.45–46 (I, 147).

[37] H 1/1, 7 (III, 30).

[38] YH 5 (III, 218, l. 5); Melete has already said this in FH (III, 168).

[39] L.26 (I, 212); l. 18 (I, 216).

[40] L.59 (I, 221).

[41] H 2/1, 13 (III, 109).

[42] H 1/2, 18 (III, 75). There is an echo of this in Letter 123, to Neuffer: 'How could I have become as I now am . . . if this, this one and only being, had not come before me and with a light as of spring brought youth, strength, good cheer and glory to a life which I had come to think worthless?' (VI, 213).

[43] L.25 (I, 312).

[44] FH III, 169; YH 3 (III, 208–209): 'Who can endure that? whom doth not hurl down the dreadful glory of the past?' H 1/1, 5 (III, 18). Today, Hellas is clothed 'like a beggar-woman, with the rags of thy old glory': H 2/1, 11 (III, 107). Athens and its areopagus are glorious: 'The Archipelago', l. 196 (II, 109).

[45] FH III, 168; Sophocles: 1E 1/1, l. 114 (IV, 7).

Achilles is a 'glorious son of the gods,'[46] 'But nor is there aught more glorious on earth' than the proud pairs of Greek friendship.[47] Thus the friend Alabanda too, the young Titan, is glorious,[48] and as he goes to his death Hyperion calls after him: 'Die! Thy heart hath sufficient glory'.[49] Again, Empedocles is called 'the glorious one',[50] and as a thinker he is 'the glorious pilot'.[51] And in his spirit and Hyperion's alike the most comprehensive experience of glory is compressed into the words: 'That only in suffering do we first feel the true freedom of the soul—that is glorious'.[52] The use, often too extravagant, of the word glory becomes in the later period more sparing, for the sake of the thing itself. It disappears inside the language, which is made so compressed, so burdened, pregnant and costly as to become in each and every part a reliquary of glory. In familiar speech the word 'bright', which always for Hölderlin also means the holy quintessence, suffices: Father Αἰξθήρ = 'Father bright!'[53]

Things and beings are 'holy'[54] in so far as they point to the presence of the eternal Spirit and intimate his infinite worth. Such, again, is Nature as a whole,[55] light,[56] aether,[57] and the sun, 'whom I never name without joy and thanks';[58] the stars are 'holy in their freedom',[59] the earth is holy,[60] the plant-world,[61] a mountain-valley,[62] the vine,[63] the wine of Bacchus.[64] The joy of living can be called holy,[65] as can suffering sent by the gods,[66] 'life's holy aberration',[67] and, since love came to it, the heart;[68] to Hyperion the names of the seasons have also become holy,[69] but the friends too become 'ever holier'[70] to one another in their suffering. Diotima is a 'Holy Being',[71] the poem, as it lies in the poet's heart, seeking form,[72] is holy, and the Muse is holy.[73] Empedocles is the holy man,[74] and his end is holy.[75] Nemesis too is holy,[76] as is the heretic Vanini, who dies for 'holy Nature'.[77] The poet begs his mother not to lose faith in the holy within him.[78] And then back—the holy spring,[79] the holy green[80]—but also forward to the end of times: pressing closer, the holy host of god-like men in the blue heavens;[81] and the 'holy, the universal Love'.[82]

---

[46] 'Achilles', l. 1 (I, 271).

[47] H 1/2, 15 (III, 63).

[48] H 1/1, 7 (III, 24).

[49] H 2/2, 5 (III, 140).

[50] 1E 1/1, l. 49 (IV, 4); 1E 2/5, l. 1827 (IV, 76); 2E 1/3, l. 374 (IV, 105).

[51] 1E 1/1, l. 90 (IV, 6); 1E 2/4, l. 1738 (IV, 72): 'and glorious are thy thoughts'.

[52] Letter 162 (VI, 278, ll. 33–34).

[53] 'Bread and Wine', ll. 65 and 69 (II, 92).

[54] On the tradition, see Isabella Papmehl-Rüttenauer: Das Wort 'heilig' in der deutschen Dichtersprache (Weimar, 1937); August E. Hohler: Das Heilige in der Dichtung. Klopstock / Der junge Goethe (Zürcher Beiträge zur deutschen Literatur- und Geistesgeschichte, ed. Emil Staiger, Vol. 10 (1954)).

[55] 'Vanini', l. 10 (I, 262); 'Her Recovery', l. 13 (I, 253; II, 23). With emphasis, in Letter 229: 'To look upon holy Nature with true eyes' (VI, 416, l. 38).

[56] 'The Voice of the People' (2nd vers.), ll. 43–44 (II, 52).

[57] Ibid., l. 67.

[58] H 2/1, 1 (III, 93).

---

[59] 'Peace', l. 56 (II, 8).

[60] 'What I do own', l. 28 (I, 307), and often elsewhere.

[61] H 2/2, 3 (III, 126).

[62] H 2/2, 4 (III, 133).

[63] 'Man', l. 16 (I, 263); 'The Spirit of Time', l. 13 (I, 300).

[64] 'The Poetic Calling', ll. 3–4 (II, 46).

[65] 'Her Recovery', l. 9 (I, 253, II, 23).

[66] 'The Land of Home', l. 22 (II, 19); so Neuffer's dying bride Rosine is 'the suffering saint', Letter 87 (VI, 134), 'the saint', Letter 100 (VI, 171).

[67] 1E 1/4, l. 403 (IV, 18); the fatherland is 'holy in endurance': 'On Returning to his Homeland', ll. 11–12 (II, 29).

[68] 'The Applause of Men', ll. 1–2 (I, 250).

[69] H 2/1, 13 (III, 109).

[70] H 1/1, 7 (III, 29).

[71] 'An Apology', l. 1 (I, 244).

[72] 'To the Fates', ll. 7–8 (I, 241). The art of poetry is early called 'The holy Path' (I, 79).

[73] 'Peace', l. 41 (II, 7; the Greeks can quite generally be described as 'the holy ones' ('Tränen', l. 9 (II, 58)).

[74] 1E 1/9, l. 1039 (IV, 45); 1E 2/4, ll. 1808–1809 (IV, 75).

[75] 1E 2/4, l. 178a (IV, 74); said of the death of the towns that pine for death in 'The Voice of the People' (2nd vers., 1.22 (II, 51)).

[76] 'To the Genius of Courage', l. 64 (I, 178).

[77] 'Vanini', ll. 4 and 10 (I, 262).

[78] Letter 170 (VI, 297, l.65).

[79] 'To Spring', l. 9 (I, 202).

[80] 'The Wanderer', l. 4 (I, 207).

Under holiness comes majesty, since Klopstock a well-loved word, but now acquiring a new and special ring: there is 'the majesty of the undestined soul',[83] and Diotima's wide, inspired eye, 'enthroned with the majesty of a god',[84] and poetry, by which 'a veil is woven about the majesty of the Invisible';[85] and then there are the unusual and yet so characteristic combinations of words: 'sweet majesty',[86] 'serene majesty',[87] even 'light majesty'.[88] Other key words, each from a different sphere, point the way into the mystery in its totality: the bright and brightening, the silent, the pure, the devout, also the much-used words from spheres of magic and enchantment—love, poetry, reality itself—are among the most crucial expressions.

All is comprehended by the generously-used word of exaltation 'divine', which bears superficial resemblance to the Homeric usage;[89] this would mean that not only the sphere of the gods is divine, but also everything earthly and human, in so far as it rises above itself and into the light of the gods. However, the Homeric tradition (and therewith also that of Pindar and the tragedians) is here interpreted conceptually within the all-enclosing identity, Nature herself,[90] and in particular man, being in the innermost spiritual core divine: 'But man is a god, so soon as he is a man.'[91] 'The god that is in man' may not be 'denied'.[92] And yet this statement

---

[81] 'Germania', ll. 31–32 (II, 150).

[82] Letter 231 (VI, 419, l. 26).

[83] H 2/1, 22 (III, 122).

[84] FH III, 166.

[85] 'To the Genius of Bravery', ll. 31–32 (I, 117).

[86] 'A Hymn to the Genius of Youth', l. 16 (I, 168).

[87] 'Diotima', later vers., l. 74 (I, 222).

[88] H 1/2, 5 (III, 55).

[89] above, p. 51.

[90] The limiting of the Hen kai Pan by opposition to the concept of identity (in 'Judgment and Being', IV, 216) is irrelevant in this context; both concepts are alien to Greco-Christian analogy.

[91] H 1/2, 19 (III, 79).

[92] Letter 171 (VI, 300, ll. 31f.).

(impossible in Greek literature) can be replaced and clarified by the Platonic θεῖον—Not to lose faith 'in ourselves, in our θεῖον, or however you wish to call it'[93]—providing a key to statements such as: 'In the Divine believe/ Those alone who themselves are',[94] 'Ah! little know we ourselves,/ For within us a god holds sway';[95] 'You shall remain among men and be a man, but a godly man'.[96] The word acquires a new density where the subject is the higher mystery at work between those who love one another ('So from time to time the deity that binds you and me must also receive an offering'),[97] but only in the conception of the holy (communal) spirit, which we shall deal with last, is it revealed in its entirety. But if we seek an indication with which to conclude for the time being, there is still that elucidation (it comes in the letter to Schütz, the editor of Aeschylus) according to which Greek tragedy 'was never permitted to make men into gods or gods into men, and commit impure idolatry, but only to bring gods and men alike nearer to one another', thus 'at the end leaving behind on the one side worship of the heavenly ones, and on the other, as the possession of man, a purified mind'.[98]

Time and history in human experience are therefore by no means divine as such. In particular, the present is a dreadful and godless time, 'brimming with cold unspeaking dissension'; 'as the instinct for slavery increases, so with it does a coarse sense of daring, as cares increase, so does intoxication, and hunger grows with luxury'; 'there is nothing holy that is not desecrated, denigrated into a miserable expedient',[99] so much so, indeed, 'that now the dead walk above on the earth and the living, the godly men, are below'.[100] Only to one looking back, with longing, and forward, with presentiment, can the divine, the holy and glorious, be present; it can also break in upon such longing with momentary fulfilment when, in its (child-like) naivety or elegiac brokenness, a soul is capable of the act and the mood which Hölderlin calls intensity, and which he values ever higher until, in the 'Basis to Empedocles', it becomes, as 'the deepest intensity', the all-supporting category[101]—in such a way, however, that 'through excess of intensity' there comes about 'a rift', and it must needs pass through a purifying night of division, thereupon 'returning, more stable, to the tone with which it began'. Now if 'intensity' is understood simply, and ignoring the late dialectic of the 'Basis', then it is that state of surrender to the wonder and mystery of Being which contains the experience of being touched by 'God'. 'Could I but restore to thee this silent feast, this holy peace within, when can be heard even the softest of sounds that cometh from the depths of the spirit, and the softest touch from without, from the heavens, from the branches and flowers—then is he, the Invisible, so near to us!'.[102] And, in yet more urgent tone and already at the stage of 'withdrawal from all living things': 'I heard a reproach from the heart of the grove, and a cry from the depths of Earth and Sea: where is thy love for me?'[103] Thus to be touched and called upon conceals in itself—beyond the reach of all thought—a promise without end, confronting one who knows it with that absolute demand which can be discharged only by payment of life itself. This demand is that, despite the detachment required by sober daily life, by action, by, above all, the attitude of speculative philosophy, that deeper intensity binding the single heart to the heart of the All should never be abandoned. 'Inspiration' is a state demanding critical limitation such as before him Shaftesbury had said should be accorded it. 'Where moderation has left you, there is the limit to your inspiration'.[104] But intensity, even if in its unrestraint it must learn measure through pain and self-denial, can never turn back, not even when, as in Empedocles' case, this means the sacrifice of life.

---

[93] Letter 163 (VI, 278, l. 20).

[94] 'The Applause of Men', ll. 7–8 (I, 250).

[95] 'The Lovers', ll. 3–4 (I, 249); cf. the last lines of 'The Blind Singer' (II, 55).

[96] Letter 87 (VI, 133, ll. 14–15).

[97] Letter 169 (VI, 293, ll. 8f.; cf. Letter 231 (VI, 420, ll. 70f.).

[98] Letter 203 (VI, 382, ll. 34–37).

[99] H 2/2, 11 (III, 156, 154).

[100] H 2/2, 4 (III, 130).

---

[101] IV, 149–162, esp. 150.

[102] FH III, 175.

[103] FH III, 183.

[104] 'Reflection', IV, 233, ll. 16–17.

This raises the question of prayer, which in Bruno and Shaftesbury, but also in Herder and Jean Paul, has run dry and passed into enthusiasm, and which is so grievously lacking in German Idealism generally from Kant to Hegel, in Schiller, Goethe, and Humboldt: for how could the 'I' adopt an attitude of prayer towards its own intelligible inner being, or towards a divine nature whose awareness depends upon man, a view maintained by Hölderlin too, even in his late period?[105] Surely in the end (as in Novalis's fairy-tales of love) this Eros in prayer will eventually be revealed in the light of identity: '. . . as t'were I could feel him, the Spirit of the World; but, awakening, I think t'was my own fingers I had held'.[106] Of love, we read: 'Marvellous! from her own glory doth she start back . . . Her whole being strives to bring forth, in all intensity, the divinity that is so near her, and, as her very own, fully to know it. All unsuspecting is she that, in the moment of her embrace, it will disappear'.[107] And yet all this remains theory, paling before what is truly Hölderlin's attitude of prayer—and which refines, as it grows beyond the enthusiasm of the youthful hymns and 'Hyperion', into ever more boundless reverence and worship. As for the theory, it can be interpreted equally well in terms of Plotinus (the One eternally impalpable beyond the conscious spirit in its longing), of the Christian theology of God's eschatological perception by God, or of Fichte's religion of the intelligible 'I'; it does not really matter.

---

[105] Letter 231, to his brother (1801): 'All is infinite unity, but in this all there is that which is supremely unified and unifying, which is not, in itself, an I, and between us let this be God!' (VI, 419, ll. 41f.). The idea occurs in 'The Archipelago': 'Truly, as heroes need their wreaths, alone in the hearts of/ Feeling men do enjoy the sacred elements glory' (ll. 60–61), 'For in the feeling heart and heavenly ones do rest gladly' (l. 235, II, 104, 108), and, with the utmost clarity, in the hymn 'The Rhein': '. . . if gods in/ The heavens have any need/ Then 'tis the heroes and men and/ All mortal things. For because/ In bliss complete nought feel they alone,/ Must haply, if 'tis permitted/ To speak thus, of the gods' fate/ Partaking, feel another,/ In their name. Him they need . . .' (ll. 106–114 (II, 145)).

[106] H 1/1, 3 (III, 12).

[107] YH 1 (III, 203, ll. 17ff.).

But what Hölderlin experiences, what he risks his whole existence for, is the presence, indeed, the urgency of an infinite love in the mystery of the world's being. Instead of the preacher's office, he chooses the life of a poet, poor and futile in the eyes of the world, in order to have a profounder influence as a priest';[108] outwardly, and yet more so spiritually, the poet must make his way 'defencelessly through life',[109] step 'bare into life',[110] that he may 'in humility' preserve the 'inner purity'[111] he needs above all things,[112] if he is to pursue this 'most innocent of occupations',[113] 'unharming . . . like the peaceful swans',[114] in 'virginity of the spirit'.[115] To begin with, 'inspiration' is that youthful state through which the 'needy' landscape is transfigured, appearing now 'like a bride';[116] which becomes 'a grave of bliss'[117] for the lovers, for it is the 'omnipotence of undivided inspiration',[118] but which, according with Nature, also pales with the sun and with spring, fading away to leave behind the darkness of perplexity. 'In the Arm of the gods grew I';[119] that is already the past, and when such abundance has been lost it can only be awaited till the end of days;[120] meantime nothing is left to man but complete self-devotion to the departed being hovering, perhaps, about him, intangible as a ghost. It is here that the poet's great experience of aether, air and wind belongs. If heaven (light, aether) and earth and the air which joins them are the cosmic trinity—'ye three in Unity',[121], the great— And joyful forms of this our world',[122] 'Life's great genii'[123]—so the wind's breath is like the spirital 'murmuring descent' of the longed-for heavenly father,[124] soothing the heart. In the final version of 'Hyperion', after many preliminary attempts, Hölderlin achieves this extraordinary intimation of Diotima: 'The motherly Air came to all, even into their hearts, lifting and drawing them to herself. And the people went out of their doors, and felt the spirital Breath in wondrous wise, . . . and, loosening their garments in welcome, received it to their breasts'.[125] Here the 'holy air' is called 'sister of the Spirit', and the poet never tires of praising her touch,[126] of longing for the return of that pentecostal moment as 'the Soul of the world, the holy air everywhere surrounded him with her embrace'.[127] Thus Empedocles strives to reach the summit of Etna, where the gods are present: 'A! then will come to us the all-moving/ Spirit, the Aether with his tender touch'.[128] As the hour of death approaches, 'Now cometh, bearing tidings of my night,/ The evening Wind, true messenger of love. The time is nigh!'.[129]

---

[108] Cf. e.g. Letter 193 (VI, 361); Letter 204 (VI, 384, ll. 50f.); Walter Rehm, Orpheus (1949).

[109] 'The Poet's Courage' (1st and 2nd vers.), ll. 3–4 (II, 62, 64).

[110] 'Foolishness', ll. 3–4 (II, 66).

[111] Letter 173 (VI, 308, ll. 22 and 29).

[112] Letter 235: 'Forgive me, that there may be purity between us' (VI, 425, l. 23).

[113] Letter 173 (VI, 311, l. 122); Letter 130 (VI, 225, 1.41) also speaks of poetry as 'these happy, at the least innocent, occupations'; they lift the poet into 'the innocent life of Nature' (Letter 141, VI, 245, ll. 25f.), as, in 'guiltless moments' (Letter 174, VI, 316, l. 67), he gives himself up to the landscape: 'to have felt the beauty of the earth with so pure a heart . . . is as good as having been in church' (ll. 69f.). Especially in Hauptwil he feels the 'innocence of life here beneath the silvery Alps' (Letter 231, VI, 420, ll. 74f.), a feeling which is preserved in 'A Song sung under the Alps' (II, 44), with its opening 'Innocence holy . . .'.

[114] 'Elegie', l. 41 (II, 72).

[115] Letter 144 (VI, 249, l. 7). Compare the early, naive, expression of this 'virginity' in Letter 4 (VI, 7, ll. 28f.), also Letter 193 (VI, 362, ll. 55–65).

[116] H 1/1, 6 (III, 21).

[117] 'Diotima' (second vers.), ll. 113–114 (I, 219).

[118] H 1/1, 4 (III, 14).

[119] 'When I was a boy . . .', l. 32 (I, 267).

---

[120] 'But now, 'tis Day! . . . From the Aether aloft . . . / Anew the Creator of all/ Doth feel itself, Inspiration' ('As on a holiday . . .', ll. 19f., II, 118). But such inspiration is also man's achievement, bringing the parusia nearer: 'O Heaven's rain! o Inspiration! Thou wilt restore to us the spring of the peoples' (H 1/1, 7 (III, 32)).

[121] 'The Wanderer', l. 99 (II, 83).

[122] 3E 1/3, ll. 410–411 (IV, 137).

[123] 2E 1/3, l. 402 (IV, 106).

[124] 'To the Aether', l. 50 (I, 205).

[125] H 1/2, 2 (III, 50).

[126] 'When for the first time within/ Felt I godly stirrings, round me/ Whispering thy Spirit was', the poet says to 'Diotima' (fragments of an earlier version, ll. 37f., I, 213) (cf. the later version, ll. 22f., I, 220). Similarly in 'What I do own', ll. 13f. (I, 306), 'Palinode', l. 2 ('Why now, o Breezes, breathe ye on me as then?' (I, 308)), 'Encouragement' (1st vers.), ll. 10f. ('And Nature's breath doth, quietly forming, wash/ About us, as about bare fields,/ Cheer to all bringing, in soulfulness . . .', II, 33), 'The Blind Singer', ll. 7–8 (II, 54), 'Elegy', l. 100 (II, 74), 'Stuttgart', l. 31 (II, 87), 'Bread and Wine', l. 13 (II, 90), 'The Fettered Stream', ll. 5–6 ('The messengers of love that the Father sends,/ Canst know them not, the Zephyrs, their breath of life?' (II, 67), 'The Rhein', l. 190 (II, 148), 'Patmos', l. 129 (of the pentecostal spirit: 'the locks catching hold of, presently' (II, 169), and cf. 'Heimkunft', l. 35: 'The Spirit cometh in presence' (II, 97).

Yet the touch of divine breath is merely a particularly convincing and joyful experience which confirms all the other experiences of the world, but is not separate from them. Light, too, 'softly rouses' (that is, touches),[130] 'the spirit/ Of the Sun touches',[131] and 'dark Earth's flowers' breathe 'on us with love';[132] from evening and morning, from trees and mountains, from autumn[133] no less than from spring comes the breath, and even the night, in its 'sad and majestic ascent' (in 'Brot und Wein'), brings 'a breath', its incomprehensibility for all wise men being a message of love.[134] The further the poet goes and bares his heart, the more the dark forces in their intangibility become instruments and vessels, until finally storm and lightening become the very heart of revelation,[135] 'the storm not just in its highest manifestation, but . . . as might and form'.[136] The spirit in 'storms, those in the sky, and others,/ That in the depths of time were longer prepared,/ With meaning more pregnant . . .'.[137] But it behoves the poet 'To stand, bare-headed, beneath/ God's storms, and in his grasp the rays, ay of the Father, His own/ To clasp, and veiled, and of milder might,/ In Song to mortal men, that we do love, the heav-/ enly gift to give'.[138] All this finding highest expression in a single mythological image:

---

[127] H 2/1, 15 (III, 112).

[128] 1E 2/3, l. 1207 (IV, 53). Empedocles is returning into the all, but in the whispering spirit he will draw near to those he is leaving behind: 'Then haply in the song will breathe my note,/ As, veiled in the fair world's choir of love,/ Once more your friend's word lovingly ye hear' (1E 2/4, ll. 1799–1800 (IV, 74)). We read of the godly powers ('As on a holiday . . .', ll. 36–37, II, 119) that '. . . in song doth their spirit breathe'.

[129] 1E 2/6, ll. 1912–1914 (IV, 80). Cf. 'The Fragment of Hyperion': 'My whole being falls silent, listening, when the soft and mysterious breath of evening blows upon me' (III, 184). In contrast, there is 'not a whisper of wind in the branches' on the occasion of the 'wake of my youth' (Waltershäusen paralipomenon, III, 577, ll. 10–11).

[130] 'The Journey', l. 15 (II, 138).

[131] 'For when from the grape a juice . . .', ll. 9–10 (II, 207).

[132] 'Go down, fair Sun . . .', ll. 13–14 (I, 314).

[133] [Autumn] 'lies closer to my hear than any other period in Nature's life' (Letter 145 (VI, 251, ll. 9–10)).

[134] 'Bread and Wine', ll. 18, 13 (II, 90).

[135] In an early form in 'Diotima' (I, 210), and wherever Hölderlin depicts the storm as a purification enabling Nature's brighter rays to follow.

> Thus on Semele's house, so poets say, as > She wished the visible God to see, did his lightening > fall
> And divinely-struck, she brought forth
> The fruit of the Storm, him, Bacchus the holy.[139]

In the lightning of the late poetry the entire cosmic theophany, which in the early and middle period has its centre in the whispering aethereal spirit, becomes compressed into the Platonic-apocalyptic moment of discharge (ἐξαίφνης). It is a road leading from the immediacy of an inspiration with its pulse in Nature's rhythm (with which it must therefore always die and be reborn),[140] passing through the endurance of divine distance 'when 'tis over, and the Day extinguished',[141] even to the experience of God in this selfsame darkness, as lightning. Certainly at first this road is made possible by Kant and Fichte, by the soaring flight (Hyper-ion!) over existence in servant form, Nature, by an 'I' that knows itself to be eternal, and even uncreated: 'I can feel in myself a life created by no god, begotten by no mortal. I believe 'tis through ourselves that we are, and only in the freedom of pleasure are we joined so intensely with the All';[142] soaring in flight as though 'to leave a city of plague and flee to the mountains, where there is purer air',[143] and looking out from 'the proud heights . . . the better to know . . . the lovely and glorious things we can see from up on high'.[144] But eventually this philosophical flight must deny the intensity which for Hölderlin was primary, and kill prayer; and so, even before hearing Fichte, he has soon left Kant, and Schiller, still the all too faithful disciple, behind again. For Plato too can teach him that the 'I', being elevated above Nature, is eternal'[145] and his great love for Susette Gontard serves as proof positive that the descent of the spirit into the 'servant-form' of defenceless need is the ultimate truth and glory of all being. 'When thou art most hapless, dost thou perceive it [thy glory]'.[146] And even when love has long since turned to renunciation[147] this is still the one place where he can be struck by 'lightning', wounded by Apollo.[148] Even if the unsolved philosophical conflict (Idealism against ancient philosophy) reaches to the very centre of the poetic tragedy and is a contributing cause of it,[149] the poet cannot abandon either of the two poles, because in secret it always has been and always will be the third, Christian position that determines the way he feels and lives, and can alone enable his work to be what it is: prayer.

---

[136] Letter 240 (VI, 433, ll. 38–39); cf. also 'Homecoming', ll. 15f. (II, 96).

[137] 'As on a holiday . . .', ll. 39–41 (II, 119).

[138] Ibid., variants, II, 669.

[139] Ibid., ll. 50–54 (II, 119).

[140] The returning spring evokes these words: 'Mourn ye not, when your heart's melody doth fall silent! ere long a hand will there be to tune it' (H 1/2, 2 (III, 51)).

[141] 'Germania', l. 20 (II, 149).

[142] H 2/2, 5 (III, 141).

The young Hölderlin prays.[150] When a Spinozism (seen through Jacobi's eyes, and therefore taken to be atheistic) 'of reason, of the cold reason that has been deserted by the heart' seems unavoidable, he finds refuge with Christ, who 'shows through miracles that he is what he says he is, that he is God. He teaches us existence of the deity and love and wisdom and omnipotence of the deity so plainly. And he must know that God is, and what God is, for he is in closest union with the deity'.[151] Christ wished to lead us 'to the feeling of the living deity in which we live and are, to the feeling truest to Christ, that we and the Father are one';[152] Christian theologians and ritualists have committed an infamous betrayal of his intention, turning 'him, the Living, into an empty idol',[153] 'gone to waste all heavenly powers, used up the kindly ones'[154]—thus, in 'Empedocles', the tones of a Last Judgement pour down wrath upon the 'god-forsaken'[155] 'wretches'[156] who bind men, so that they know nothing of divine presence,[157] and who deal in 'holy things as though in trade'.[158] Only by leaving all these shameless ones behind and entering into the pre-Christian divine intimacy can Christianity too in its original meaning be saved for the eschatological 'Feast of Peace'.

---

[143] Letter 170 (VI, 297, ll. 55–56).

[144] Letter 83 (VI, 124, ll. 22f.).

[145] Upon whom he is now planning to write a commentary (Letter 88, VI, 137, ll. 89–99).

[146] YH 1 (III, 204, l. 5).

[147] The Diotima letters 182, 198 (VI, 336, 370).

[148] Letter 240 (VI, 432, l. 10).

[149] Cf. the next two chapters.

[150] Letter 15 (VI, 24, ll. 110–112).

The poet assumes this holy office. 'Such are the cares that whether he will or not, in his soul doth/ Bear a Singer, and oft must, but unheeding the rest.'[159] His words are praise in the Pindaric sense,[160] celebration, calling to the feast,[161] but above all they are 'thanks', for through him man is to learn to give thanks for everything,[162] 'to give heartfelt thanks for that which is there'.[163] To do this, the poet's heart must rise to that utmost chievement and, even while being spiritual, also be worldly;[164] like the 'Blind Singer', he must follow through darkness the 'voice of the Thunderer/ At noonday',[165] 'so sure on his wand'ring path'.[166] If it is the poet's office both evermore to sing of 'the Highest' to whom he is devoted and also, inspired by the 'unlooked-for Genius', prophetically to proclaim the 'days of destiny' of history, he cannot perform this second office unless he stands, protected only by his innocence, unarmed and guileless, 'alone before God', 'till that God's lack helpeth'.[167] In such an exposure of the heart, facing death itself with unflinching readiness, even in night and absence there is 'worship', 'prayer', 'devotion',[168] and the poet is prepared for the hope he invokes to 'affright the heart'[169] with its unfamiliar form. In this posture he is an intercessor who through his word, his silence (where holy names are lacking),[170] through his very being calls down blessings upon the world: 'Ye bless so kindly over our mortal heads,/ Ye Powers of heaven! that which to each is his,/ O do but bless mine own . . .';[171] 'bless for me rather then/ My mortal work . . .'.[172] In 'Palinodie' the plea that the gods may spare him is taken back.[173]

---

[151] Letter 41 (VI, 64, ll. 43–47).

[152] Letter 151 (VI, 261, ll. 14–16).

[153] Letter 173 (VI, 309, l. 65).

[154] 'The Poetic Calling', ll. 46–47 (II, 47).

[155] 1E 2/4, l. 1319 (IV, 57) and l. 1364 (IV, 59).

[156] Ibid., l. 1295 (IV, 56).

[157] 2E 1/1, ll. 13–14 (IV, 91).

[158] 1E 1/5, l. 535 (IV, 23).

[159] 'Homecoming', ll. 107–108 (II, 99).

[160] For his early estimation of Pindar: 'A History of the Fine Arts . . .' (IV, 203, ll. 1f.).

[161] These two words passim. See Heinrich Knittermeyer, Fest und Feier: Ein Beitrag zum Wortgebrauch Hölderlins, HJb, 1950, 47–71.

[162] 'The Course of Life' (2nd vers.), l. 14 II, 22).

[163] Letter 228 (VI, 414, ll. 34–35); extensive discussion in Paul Böckmann, Hölderlin und seine Götter (1935), of which see index.

[164] 'The only One' (1st vers.), ll. 104–105 (II, 156).

True, this prayer may sometimes be threatened by the Fichtean 'I'-identity and in theory demoted to a preliminary stage—when we read that the oriental god hurls men 'to the ground with his might and brilliance, and even ere man has learned to walk must he kneel, ere he has learned to speak must he pray; ere his heart knoweth equilibrium must he bow down'[174]—but Péguy too will contrast the prayer of the free, upright-standing Christian before God with oriental prostrations.[175] And through love Hyperion learns again humility and devotion; Hölderlin once more demands that man 'in all his arts and activity bow down, humble and devout, before the Spirit of Nature whom he carries within him, whom he has around him, and who gives him material and powers'.[176] There is not one among Hölderlin's poems which could be described as prayer-less, that is, in which his faith does not say in advance[177] an all-embracing 'yes' to reality: 'Let whate'er there befall always a blessing be,/ Be it turned into joy!'[178] The rush and tumult of human life, the desire of the human mind for progress, always remains no more than 'service to Nature', and returns, borne by her embrace, back 'into the Grave of Nature', 'and ultimately all is good'.[179] That is also Hyperion's final thought. Fichte's eternal asymptotic progress never becomes as strong as the Greek 'circulation' that, here with Christian meaning, is the hope that the spirit may return, and that God may be 'all in all'. Thus even Menon too, at the end of his lament for Diotima, can give glad consent to the death that could scarcely be overcome: 'Now would I too, ye heavenly ones, give thanks, and at last is/ Lightened my breast, and once more praying the Singer doth breathe.'[180]

---

[165] 'The Blind Singer', ll. 25–26 (II, 55).

[166] Ibid., l. 36 (II, 55).

[167] 'The Poetic Calling' (II, 46–48).

[168] The Frankfurt 'Empedocles' plan (IV, 146, l. 2, l. 5, 147, l. 6).

[169] 'To Hope', ll. 17–20 (II, 59).

[170] 'Homecoming', l. 101 (II, 99).

[171] 'What I do own', ll. 49–51 (I, 307).

[172] 'At Morn', ll. 18–19 (I, 302); cf the plea for a blessing in 'The Return to his Homeland', l. 23 (II, 29), and the blessing brought by the inclining aether in 'Go down, fair Sun . . .' (l. 16, I, 314).

[173] 'Palinode' (I, 308).

[174] H 1/2, 19 (III, 82).

[175] 'The Mystery of the Holy Innocents' (ed. Pléiade, 354–358).

With Hölderlin, nothing is rhetorical dressing-up or tradition appropriated without existential content (unlike, for example, Schiller's constant talk of gods). It is homage that is being proclaimed 'in poesy of prayer',[181] homage which he, like Empedocles, is prepared to reinforce with the sacrifice of his life. It is by virtue of this very unity of word and death that, towards the end, the figure of Christ makes its powerful resurrection. His grandmother's birthday poem, filled with piety towards Christ ('His breast in its love all the World's suff'ring did bear./ E'en with Death did he friendship tie, in the name of the others/ Vanquishing pains and toil did to his Father return')[182] threw the poet into such turmoil, making him feel so acutely how far and near his youth was, that later he 'could find no sleep'.[183] At the same time he is working on 'Empedocles', whose situation becomes closer and closer to that of Christ, a probable reason why the drama is left uncompleted. Christ joins the line of cosmic deities as the last theophany, being the 'quiet genius' who leaves behind humble gifts, 'bread and wine', because 'greater' gifts 'became too great',[184] yet also 'fulfilling' and concluding the 'heavenly feast', being 'the most loving' envoy that the Father had, so burning that men will be capable only of misuse and each 'unto himself sufficed, o'erweening Heaven forgot . . .', but even thus, by his death, bringing apocalyptic 'fulfilment of the times'.[185] That the poet then, in the final version, restores Christ to the series of earlier theophanies,[186] that in the very song, 'The One and Only', written to the glory of Christ he declares himself hindered, when to 'thee I would liken/ Those men of the world . . .' (Heracles and Dionysus), by a kind of shame, yet still, and despite the outburst of prayer 'My Master and Lord! O thou, my Teacher!',[187] calls him their brother,[188] that he once again, in a variant of the Johannine hymn 'Patmos', describes him as a 'demi-god',[189] that he can speak of a 'clover-leaf' (of the three demi-gods),[190] all this is a sign of the deadly earnest in which the poet conceives the mission he has undertaken, to sacrifice nothing of the cosmic theophany for the sake of the Christ-revelation. And when but 'Since converse we do have/ And can from one another hear . . .',[191] since the peoples can show each other the divinity each has, and at the 'evening of time' the sum of history must be assembled, to form 'One Speech',[192] indeed, one song,[193] one spirit?[194]

---

[176] Letter 179 (VI, 329, l. 128f.).

[177] 'Faith' is a fundamental word, not just in the letters to his mother (Letters 173, 175), in which he deliberately uses Christian language, but in general; thus in the letters to his brother (Letter 231), his relations (Letter 223), and Sinclair (Letter 171).

[178] 'The Poet's Courage' (1st vers., ll. 5–6 (II, 62)).

[179] Letter 179 (VI, 328, ll. 83–84).

[180] 'Menon's Laments for Diotima', 9, ll. 109–110 (II, 78).

[181] 3E 1/3, l. 417 (IV, 137).

---

[182] 'To my revered Grandmother', ll. 16–18 (I, 272). The celebration was on 30 December, 1798. It had been at the beginning of the same year that Christ was mentioned in a letter (151, VI, 261, l. 15) for the first time since the beginning of 1791 (Letter 41).

[183] Letter 172 (VI, 306, ll. 151f.).

[184] 'Bread and Wine', 8, ll. 129–134 (II, 94); cf. 6, ll. 107–108; 9, ll. 155–156. The Christian title replaces the original 'The Wine-god' with its reference to Bacchus.

[185] 'The Feast of Peace' (1st draft), ll. 63–71 (II, 132).

[186] For a discussion of the newly-discovered final version, and bibliography, see HJb, 1955/6.

[187] 'The only One' (1st vers.), ll. 36f. (II, 154–155).

[188] Ibid., ll. 48f.

[189] 'Patmos' (preliminary stage of a later version), l. 146 (II, 177).

[190] 'The only One' (3rd vers.), l. 76 (II, 163).

2. POOR LOVE

Hölderlin's Christology will not be found where those who squeeze the text look for it; perceivable only as a water-mark, it is dissolved throughout the existential statement as a whole, and can be most powerfully felt when directly contradicted by the framework inside which it is stretched. But the very frame-work itself holds contradictions: the absolute spirit is without consciousness, and so to be themselves the 'blessed gods' need 'destiny', the suffering heart of men: only if the One-and-All be thus drawn asunder ('Εν καὶ πᾶν as 'Εν διαφέρον ἑαυτῷ) can god be god and man be man. That, beyond intellect and reason, is both the central concept of philosophy[1] and the essence of beauty: Homer's 'analogy' (God-world) is interpreted in terms of Heraclitean and Parmenidean 'identity', and, equally, vice-versa; here, then, we have Hölderlin not just leaving Kant and Schiller behind and arriving at an objective idealism similar to Schelling's, but referring this idealism back to the Greek sphere as a whole. For even the spirit, however 'eternal' it may be—

---

[191] 'The Feast of Peace' (3rd draft), ll. 50–51 (II, 137).

[192] Ibid. (final vers.), l. 84 (III, 535).

[193] Ibid., l. 93 (III, 536).

[194] This 'sublime Spirit' (l. 77), with the active participation of mankind (ll. 85–86), brings about and is—in a Christian rather than Hegelian sense—the eschatological revelation of God (and, in him, of all the gods), and as such is the 'Prince of the Feast' (ll. 15 and 113). Certainly he is 'blessed Peace' (III, 224, l. 27), but peace as such is not the same as the spirit it is created by; the late Hölderlin does not glorify abstractions. The ultimate object of 'our homage name we not'; it is at once the brightness that bursts in from above (the concealed master stepping out of his work-shop) and, rounding off its sum, the inner history of the world.

[1] H 1/2, 19 (III, 83).

indeed, as the individual spirit, eternal in the Platonic and Leibnizian sense[2]—is one element in the whole inasmuch as it has to acknowledge the poverty of its descent into love; both in and free from poverty it is tragic,[3] and as well in this very descent into 'servant form' as in its ascent into divine form it is 'glorious'. But this means nothing other than a transformation of Christology into (classical-Idealistic) ontology, or in theological terms: an equation of the economic with the absolute doctine of the Trinity.

By virtue of this latent Christological element the kenotic element, the humility in all worldly love and form receives a divine radiance, but at the price that the shadow of transitoriness and melancholy falls upon the godly. If man can bloom divinely, so too the godly in human form can 'wither'; this nexus is indissoluble. 'Nothing can . . . in real life appear as it originally is . . . but only in its weakness, so that in true reality the light of life and appearance constitute the weakness of every whole.'[4] For the poet and his infinitely vulnerable soul this means: 'Purity can only express itself in impurity, and if you try to depict a nobility free of all baseness it will look utterly unnatural and foolish, and that is because nobility itself, when it comes to be expressed, carries the colour of the destiny under which it originated, and because beauty, when it takes shape in reality, necessarily receives, from the circumstances under which it comes forth, a form that is not natural to it. . . .'[5] Thus beauty, as transcendental category of being, emphatically becomes the synthesis of the beautiful and unbeautiful (within the world).[6] Now, according to the perspective, and with it the modality, chosen—tragic inolvement of the eternal in the transitory world, or heroic, ideal elevation of the transitory into eternity—within the all-comprehensive identity, there arises that 'alternation of tones'[7] which for Hölderlin is so decisively important; and the historical significance of which extends far beyond Hölderlin's own scale, for soon this same structure of identity will be met by the cold breath of atheism.[8] Nevertheless, all attempts to transpose Hölderlin forward and into that tone are unjust and absurd.[9] The focal point is 'the eternal heart': heart conceived as middle, between the loving man and suffering god:

---

[2] H 2/2, 12 (III, 159, l. 14).

[3] Such thinking is characteristic of the entire period, as Walter Rehm has shown, in 'The Silence and the sorrow of the Gods' (1949).

[4] 'The Significance of the Tragedies' (IV, 274).

[5] Letter 167 (VI, 290, 11.75f.). Cf. Letter 183 (VI, 340, l. 67) on 'delicate forbearance from the accidental', also the sentence from Letter 185: '. . . thus, in poetry, truth and harmony emerge from falsehood, error and suffering all the more beautiful and delightful' (VI, 344, ll. 25f.).

[6] Thus there is no season nor time of life which is 'altogether beautiful' the truth is 'that beauty consists in all the times of life together, as they follow one another, rather than in any particular one' (Letter 188 (VI, 351, ll. 29–31)).

> Deep-shaken, with a god doth suffer too the Eternal > heart, but still it remaineth firm.[10]

Whether it be described as divine (heavenly), as human (earthly), as half-godly (Titanic) or as divinely-human, the place of the heart, mediator of heaven and earth, is all-important. The heart is the source of the truth that 'the divine, when it goes forth, can never be without a certain sorrow and humility',[11] and that 'the greatest joy' speaks not in joy, but 'at the last . . . in sorrow'.[12] Hölderlin's interpretation of this middle is emphatically in terms of the classical Eros (albeit in the light of Fichte): love unites the will to infinity and the desire for limitation, 'for the father is Abundance, yet doth she not deny her mother, Poverty'.[13] Only, the loving heart must bear an infinitely greater burden than in Plato's day, for it is a sacrifice, consecrated in the middle of mutual hate: [7] 'On the various methods of Poetry' (IV, 228–232), 'The Alternation of the Tones' (IV, 238–240), 'On the Procedure of the poetic Spirit' (IV, 241–265), 'On the differences of the poetic genres' (IV, 266–273). See Meta Corssen, 'Der Wechsel der Töne in Hölderlins Lyrik', HJb, 1951, 19–49.

---

[8] Thus already in Jean Paul's 'The Alternation of the Tones', on which see Walter Rehm, Experimentum suae medietatis: Eine Studie zur dichterischen Gestaltung des Unglaubens bei Jean Paul und Dostojewski, Jb. des Freien Deutschen Hochstifts, 1940, 237–336.

[9] In particular by Beda Allemann, Hölderlin und Heidegger (1954). This interpretation needs intolerable force if it is to fit Hölderlin but proves itself to be correct as an interpretation of the subsequent development in historical logic.

[10] 'As on a holiday . . ' (Hellingrath, IV, 153; Beißner, II, 676). On the variant, see Herm. Pongs, 'Das ewige Herz in Hölderlins Dichtung', in Worte und Werte, Markwardt-Festschrift (19610, 292–314; and Ulrich Häussermann, 'Herz', HJb, 1958–60, 190–205.

[11] Letter 169 (VI, 294, 11.25–26).

[12] 'Sophocles' (I, 305).

Ay! I knew it ere this. Hatred hath taken root,
All hath sundered, and long parted the gods and men.
Now, with blood to appease them,
Now must perish the lovers' heart.[14]

With Hölderlin's progress from 'Hyperion' to 'Empedocles' and then to the last songs, this insight matures.

'Hyperion' comes about in stages. In the 'Waltershausen version' (published through the 'Thalia' fragment), heavily influenced by Schiller, Hölderlin describes a path from natural 'simplicity' to spiritual 'culture'[15] as necessary, but all the more dangerous,[16] an 'excentric course'[17] without which, however, there could be no centre. Thus an absolute love is demanded,[18] while at the same time the self-sufficiency of the beloved glory is feared.[19] The fragment will, then, have achieved its ultimate goal when its hero is content to leave the beloved object of beauty as it is; when the lover is so purified as to be absolutely free from self. Yet at the same time 'unfathomable Nature' is to appear (idealistically) as the 'veiled beloved';[20] and forthwith, under Fichte's influence, this now unfolds.

---

[13] MH (prose outline), III, 194, ll. 13–15.

[14] 'The Parting' (1st vers.), ll. 13–16 (II, 24).

[15] FH III, 163, 180.

[16] FH III, 165.

[17] FH III, 163. The concept remains central. There is an underlying element of doubt (YH 4, III, 211, l.1), but: 'we must all travel an excentric path, and no other way is possible, from youth to fulfilment' (Hyperion (preliminary stage [henceforth pH]), III, 236, ll. 13f.). In the 'Oedipus' the rhythm develops the velocity of 'excentric rapidity', tearing with it, in the end, 'into the eccentric sphere of the dead' (V, 196–197). See W. Schadewaldt, 'Das Bild der exzentrischen Bahn bei Hölderlin', HJb, 1952, 3f.; and for a comprehensive examination in terms of the history of ideas, cf. Eudo C. Mason, 'Exzentrische Bahnen: Studien zum Dichterbewußtsein der Neuzeit' (1963).

[18] 'For me, that which is not All, and eternally All, is nothing' (FH III, 164, l. 8).

[19] 'This desperate sentiment—that the glorious object of my love was so glorious that it had no need of me' (FH III, 170). 'Why had I to demand that the glorious being should be mine, when it had no need of me?' (III, 577, ll. 27–28).

The author of the 'metrical version' knows of the elevation of the spirit above Nature, but in the very first sentence speaks of the guilt of one who has become tyrannical against Nature; a guilt that the sage (the old Hyperion who narrates his youth) is to help overcome. This he does by interpreting Fichte in the light of Plato, and the contradiction in Eros (the will to unlimitedness, the will to limitation) as 'beauty', and this in turn as 'appearance of the holy'.[21]

In 'Hyperion's Youth', with its highly compressed style, he is feeling his way beyond Plato and Fichte and into a third country. Only in the pain of poverty is the 'nobility' of the 'I' revealed; starting back before its own glory, it contemplates itself 'in the land of the senses . . . as in a mirror'; but when 'to thy lonely thought the forms of Nature would sisterly companionship afford, do thou rejoice, and love, but ne'er thyself forget'.[22] Such love must remain longing, for were the ideal attained, consciousness would end and 'the Divine would . . . be nothing'.[23] Thus man's glory is to endure the long wait[24] of 'unending progress',[25] eternally dissatisfied, hoping and striving, between self-sufficient poles, Nature and idea. When the hero encounters the 'superhuman' Diotima, round whom flows 'the gloria of the saints', and who venerates the 'Panagia' (Mary),[26] the tragic element comes to appear almost psychological: Hyperion drags his beloved down, we read of 'murder',[27] and the lover, torn by conflicting emotions, 'inwardly rages against the heavenly creature',[28] having 'cursed . . . her most divine possession, that peace, that heavenly sufficiency';[29] and the end of the fragment moves towards the same solution, to 'leave be'. But the predominance of the idealistic philosophy of the spirit in this fragment, written before Hölderlin met Susette, really leaves no room for love: 'abundance' is sufficiency, and 'poverty' self-preoccupation; the one is beyond love, the other falls short.

---

[20] YH III, 184.

[21] MH III, 191–195.

[22] YH 1(III, 203–205).

[23] Ibid., 203, ll. 23–26.

[24] Ibid., 206.

[25] YH 4 (III, 214, l. 32).

[26] YH 5 (III, 218); veneration of Mary already occurs in MH l. 207f. (III, 197); the Christian and biblical echoes, which in the penultimate version are still strong, are in the final version eliminated.

[27] YH 6 (III, 230, 1.29). Cf. pH III, 249: 'Men killed, so the fable tells us, the living deity . . . The fable is true.'

In the prologue to the 'penultimate version', the whole question reverts to a presocratic context; 'Being' is the 'blissful unity' which has been lost and can 'only' be recovered through action 'in infinite approximation', but 'nonetheless' is always already present, in the sovereign form of 'beauty'.[30]

In the final version, all the metaphysical rocks and contradictions are smoothed, in order to express the marvellous paradoxes of love. That famous key sentence is truly at the centre: 'The Heart's wave, that foameth upward and becometh Spirit, ne'er would be so fair, did not the Rock of destiny stand, dumb and old, in its path.'[31] Radiant in the background, there is the 'consuming glory of the Spirit' that must conceal itself in Nature,[32] yet still retaining 'that monstrous striving to be All';[33] a spirit that burns up all resistance ('naught remaineth but ashes'),[34] returning as fire 'from straitened captivity . . . to the halls of the Sun, in triumph'.[35] But now the spirit has another, contrasting, image. She, Diotima, is, in the naturally spiritual simplicity of beautiful beings, an 'ideal', and becomes a 'Muse',[36] sending her lover into the world of events and political action,[37] which then being war, she turns pale and falls silent;

---

[28] Ibid., 232, ll. 33–34.
[29] Ibid., 233, ll. 33–34.
[30] pH III, 236–237.
[31] H 1/1, 8 (III, 41).
[32] H 1/1, 4 (III, 12).
[33] H 1/1, 5 (III, 18).
[34] H 1/1, 8 (III, 41).
[35] H 1/2, 2 (III, 52).
[36] H 2/2, 4 (III, 130).
[37] H 1/2, 19 (III, 87f.).

Hyperion, following the realistic logic of action, tears her away and on to a path among things which turn her to a 'sorrowing divine image',[38] and she withers, is consumed; he implores her to leave him, for he 'is no longer aught',[39] has failed the ideal as which he had always wanted to leave her: 'Nay, nay, need shalt thou never know! Thou shalt not behold in thyself the poverty of love.'[40] But when he wishes to go and see her again, she passes from him into death. Thus the conclusion has the form of a contradiction in the nature of being, in that, though needing the suffering poverty of love to feel itself, in death it must yet find its way back to the 'spirit'; a contradiction that glorifies itself within the 'injured heart'[41] whose only 'solace' can be 'among gods'.[42] This experience of the glory of love lives on in spiritualised form, and that is the elegiac mode, which also characterises in its entirety the rebirth of the ancient world in the German present. 'Beauty fleeth out of the Life of men and up into the Spirit; what Nature was doth become Ideal, and if below the tree hath decayed and been worn down, yet hath he put forth on high fresh branches, verdant in the shining sun. . . .'[43] The revival in German Idealism of the ancient world must always be this biologically impossible phenomenon: the green crest of a decayed root. About this contradiction Hölderlin, for whom elegiac feeling can never become the last word, casts the great mantle of universal Nature: 'Men fall from thee like rotten fruit, o let them perish, for thus do they return to thy roots, and I, o Tree of Life, that I once more with thee grow green, about thy topmost branches there to breathe. . . .' [44] Death—not only of bodies, but also of hearts—is Nature's dung; 'palingenesis' becomes the reconciling idea: 'The veins in the heart do part and return and All is one eternal glowing Life.'[45] The idea that, in this merging-back into the universal heart, earthly sublimity might confer a right to personal immortality[46] is only a fleeting thought, designed to keep faith with, express the everlastingness in, love; the comprehensive conception is Nature's eternal return, the image of the tree being a clear reminder of Herder.[47]

---

[38] H 2/1, 4 (III, 98).
[39] H 2/1, 21 (III, 119).
[40] H 1/2, 16 (III, 65).
[41] H 2/2, 4 (III, 131).
[42] Ibid., III, 129.
[43] H 1/2, 15 (III, 63).
[44] H 2/2, 12 (III, 159).
[45] Ibid., III, 160.

In the course of the drafts to 'The Death of Empedocles', the author tunnels his way deeper and deeper into the cul-de-sac of the identity of the contradiction, and here it is from Christology that the interpretation of the world and of man draws its innermost core; the profound philosophical interpretation appended by the poet ('The basis to "Empedocles"') is always in a state of reconciliation with the contradiction, which, indeed, provides the basis for his argument. Here, rather than love for a woman, as in 'Hyperion', is love for the All; Empedocles is (as a philosopher) spirit, 'manly', self-sufficient, 'Nay! all his own is he, the Living one,/ Alone his spirit on him law doth impose',[48] 'He free from want doth wander/ Within a world his own',[49] 'Himself to be that is/ To live; and we, the dream thereof we others are';[50] he is 'born free',[51] 'proud in sufficiency'.[52] As such, he opens himself to the all in absolute intensity, a feminine role, and has surrendered himself in 'inspiration'[53] to the holy genial powers: aether, air, sun, earth. . . .[54] But, in a terrible fall, this 'harmony' has been lost, 'chastised with desolation boundless he', 'For all his strength the Gods have from him stripped'.[55]

[46] Thus, in 'Elegy' (II, 71), those whose lives have been unfulfilled on earth sink into the depths of Hades, and only lovers find salvation; in the final version, 'Menon's Laments for Diotima', this fall into Hades is replaced by 'the power of a miracle' (ll. 76f., II, 77) at which 'from deep in their grave/ Must they return'; but underlying the Christian image of resurrection is the idea of naturally-occurring palingenesis.

[47] Letter 83 (VI, 124–125, ll. 31–36).

[48] 2E 2, ll. 567–568 (IV, 112).

[49] 1E 1/1, ll. 73–74 (IV, 5).

[50] 1E 1/1, ll. 101–102 (IV, 6).

[51] 1E 1/3, 1.313 (IV, 15).

[52] 1E 2/8, 1.2015 (IV, 84). Cf. Hyperion 1/2, 10: 'Ne'er have I known aught so free of need, so self-sufficient' (III, 58).

[53] 1E 1/1, 1.78 (IV, 5).

[54] 1E 1/3, 1.280f. (IV, 14–15).

[55] 1E 1/2, ll. 185–186 (IV, 10).

Where does the guilt lie? In the first version, it has the twofold countenance of reflection—'when the genial spirits of this World/ From love themselves in thee forgot, thy thought did/ To thee turn, fancying, meagre fool, to thee/ Their kind had them sold . . .'[56]—and of self-deification, 'when of himself/ A god he made'.[57] If the second aspect of his Titanism causes strife between Empedocles and the priests, who curse and exile him from the polis—a situation in which he can beg, in the true classical tradition, for one request,[58] and become 'sacer'[59]—so too he for his part can curse the hypocrites, as Christ did the Pharisees. But that aspect is purely superficial; how to appease a deity profaned, injured, by the Fichtean elevation of the sprit above Nature, that is the question. Through death alone: which, transforming the initial inspiration (with its unreflected-upon reflection) into the resolution to surrender existence, regains – on a higher, ethical-ideal level where the reflection upon reflection dissolves into an intense immediacy—the grace of renewed union, the reconciliation of heaven and earth.

The author's groping uncertainty as to how to motivate the guilt must not be allowed to obscure the paradox that the 'guilt' of the spirit in distancing itself from Nature is at the same time its very nature, and therefore guiltless. Accordingly, in the second version a different motif appears: Empedocles has betrayed a mystery, the experience of oneness (of being a god), to the people, degradingly allowing it into the public sphere of state and church.[60] In his 'daring' he has tried to utter 'what uttered ne'er may be',[61] thereby revealing himself as god and causing himself to be worshipped. But in the course of the versions the antagonists too are taken increasingly seriously. Instead of the ruthless priests there appears Strato, lord of the city and Empedocles' brother; and the 'institutionalisation' of the mystical has (like the 'political' sphere in 'Hyperion') its own necessity, even to the extent that it is no longer merely profanation for the feeling to become language.[62] Is not the truth, as in the first version, simply that a vessel so filled with divine substance must needs be shattered, 'that it to other purpose may not serve'? 'Through whom/ The Spirit hath been heard, soon be he gone.'[63] For in the second version, which gives Promethean affirmation to Fichte's elevation of the spirit, seeing therein the task of man,[64] Empedocles wishes through his sacrifice to call out from Nature the spirit; such a path Hölderlin could not tread, and so the fragment breaks off.

---

[56] 1E 1/3, l. 338 (IV, 15).

[57] 1E 1/2, ll. 251f. (IV, 12).

[58] qE 1/5, ll. 676f. (IV, 29).

[59] 1E 2/2, l. 1136 (IV, 49).

[60] 2E 1/1, ll. 29f. (IV, 92).

[61] 2E 1/1, ll. 175–176 (IV, 97).

In the attempt at a third version, the whole question is transferred from the natural to the historical sphere, and here the 'Basis' will carry the thought further. Expelled by his royal brother, the hero acknowledges as guilt his self-sufficiency: 'For, since my youth, my sins have many been,/ I loved men, but ne'er as a man . . .';[65] it is this exclusive devotion to 'Nature, all-enduring' that impels him to his death, leading him to repel his loving disciple Pausanias with determination, and even greater harshness than in the earlier versions; universal love ultimately demands that all other bonds be cut, every personal and individual love sacrificed, notwithstanding all assurances of eternal faithfulness.[66] Here an 'all-sacrificing heart' is met with relinquishment of existence as an 'I' ('I am not who I am, Pausanias').[67] Then there is the temptation of the encounter with the Egyptian, Manes, who asks him: 'Art thou the man?'; for in the passing of an age none but an 'only one' can be 'the new saviour', 'One only may thy sin so black ennoble', something, then, that would be black sin for anyone who happened not to be the only one.[68] Empedocles' answer is yes, and then follow his credentials; both the intensity of his relationship with Nature and the straying of the 'poor people'—'wearied with life, with life, with their own hands their own house they did break/ The temples too, displeasing now, forsaken'/have made clear to him his errand; he recognised the parting god of his people, 'and, to appease Him, went I forth'.[69] So the freely-chosen death of the 'only One', with its epochal significance, is now confirmed (as expounded in the 'Basis to Empedocles') and enabled to represent the age in which he lives, by resolving 'the problem of destiny' in it, thereby synthesising that age (of Greece) in a 'premature' model so that it can be handed down, as a promise, to the coming (German) aeon in which his sacrifice will bear fruit: 'and there remains behind a riper true pure universal intensity'.[70]

---

[62] As he says in an earlier letter: 'Our silent bliss will always die if it is put into words' (Letter 136, VI, 236, ll. 48–49).

[63] 1E 2/4, ll. 1754–1755, ll. 1747–1748 (IV, 73).

[64] 2E 1/3, ll. 501f., 535f. (IV, 109–110). In the 'Basis' he writes: 'He had to strive for identity with her [Nature]' (IV, 159, ll. 5–6).

[65] 3E 1/1, ll. 35–36 (IV, 122).

[66] 3E, the entire second scene (IV, 101f.).

[67] 3E 1/2, 1.253 (IV, 130).

[68] 3E 1/3, ll. 369ff. (IV, 135–136).

Hölderlin has broached the innermost treasures of Christ, and is placing them at the disposal of a messiah of identity. Proceeding from an unconditional intensity of existence with the divine All, whence his divinity ('I and the Father are one'), Empedocles falls into kenosis and, after recognising this (in the third version) as mankind's errant alienation from itself, thereupon devotes himself resolutely to death for the sake of love and atonement, the death which achieves a representative reconciliation of time with eternity and opens the prospect of an eschatological promise. While in the first two versions the drama was still essentially concerned with enacting the dialectics of a personal experience within the metaphysics of identity, so that, despite many biblical echoes, the parallel with Christ was still looser, that parallel now, as the historical kairos of this death gains a social and eschatological dimension, finally becomes evident. Here is the Johannine Christianity emerging, as in the late Fichte, the old Schelling, and the young Hegel, as the alpha and omega of Idealistic thinking. The eternal Logos, in the world in the form of poverty and humility, glorifying himself through suffering and death, then to ascend back whence he came; declaring his mission and all-embracing love in great parting speeches, consoling even as he withdraws, promising the Spirit and a second coming—there is correspondence everywhere. That, furthermore, the redeemer is to be proclaimed king, that the priests form an opposition to him, that he withdraws, that he asks the disciples whom they take him for and forbids their taking revenge, that Pausanias follows him like a John, and Panthea like a Mary; but above all, that every single one of the master's words carries the weight of the death he has seen in advance and chosen, aims at it, recalls it, and is justified by it: that completes the circle. But what divides the two figures? That Christ comes, acts, speaks and dies not in his own name, but in his Father's. That therefore the ultimate testimony is not his religious experience, but his mission. That his kenosis, so great that even God forsakes him, was not dialectical guilt, not fate, nor yet usurpation, but, again, a mission accepted out of obedience. All this presupposes, not cosmic identity, but the relationship of analogy between God and the world, freedom in the divine sending, and, in God himself, the Trinity; this is the insuperable obstacle for any intellectual construction of a figure of redemption parallel to the Christ. Thus 'Empedocles' remains uncompleted, and the epithet 'only One' returns to Christ: 'There yet a shame is, and doth hinder/From likening the men of the world unto thee. . . .'[71]

---

[69] 3E 1/3, ll. 410ff. (IV, 137).

[70] 'The Basis to Empedocles' (IV, 157, ll. 12–13).

While resisting all such crystallisation into an actual figure, the Christological is nevertheless a fluidly pervasive element. Stripped of a metaphysical formulation dependent upon Fichte and Parmenides, the ultimate horizon of experience is: that all being is born of the abundance of eternal love, but that this love, out of love, enters the realm of poverty. This is already a conviction in the early ode 'To Nature' (1794/5): 'E'er the dearest love must pauper be',[72] while the ode 'Destiny' turns it round: 'From Need hath every pleasure sprung,/ And pain alone doth make to thrive/ The Dearest . . .'.[73] This might have encouraged a classical interpretation:

---

[71] 'The only One' (1st vers.), ll. 60–63 (II, 155).

[72] l. 57 (I, 192).

[73] ll. 25f. (I, 184f.).

that the 'undestined' 'unchanging Gods'[74] in their 'eternal youth'[75] 'o'erhead in Light'[76] gaze down on 'suffering' men as they are cast 'Through the years down Uncertainty's maw',[77] so that even to look up at them would be much, for who 'knoweth ye not is poor'. 'Thou, my Preserver fair/ Whene'er hath pain my soul', he says to the aether.[78] But for the riddle which in Euripides had no solution, how painful love can prevail over painless love, there is now a Christian clue: the divine itself penetrates suffering. So overpowering is the light of this truth that it is raised to become an overall necessity. 'Who then can say his feet are firm . . . if even the divine must humble itself, and share mortality with all mortal things!'[79] That 'must' could have remained tied to the world and its experience; instead it gains the profundity of a theological law/'O, well I know it . . . In her richness Love doth play a godly game; Need doth she fabricate for herself, that she may give of her abundance!'[80]—and, finally, a metaphysical expression: 'For it is an eternal law that the Whole, so rich in content, cannot, because of its unity, feel itself with the distinctiveness and vitality . . . of its parts, which also constitute a whole, albeit looser, so that it may be said, if the vitality, distinctiveness, singularity, of the parts, when their totality can feel itself, should exceed the limit set for these, and become suffering, and the completest possible separateness and isolation, then, and only then, can the Whole feel itself in these parts . . . vitally and distinctly.'[81] In that too much is asked of the parts, which are to become a vessel of the whole in order that in them the whole may feel itself, they too experience the 'arbitrary necessity of Zeus'.[82] But any such metaphysical expression of the law immediately implies its Titanic con-comitant, the spirit, which, knowing of its infinity, rages in the confines of its cell; and so long as the law of love is not harmed, Hölderlin grants him his roaring till the last (see the fragments 'The Titans'). On the other hand, the heart, sharing 'the wounds that they inflict on Nature the divine',[83] is so deeply 'wounded', 'insulted',[84] by the world and its coarseness that it becomes a part of which too much is asked, which breaks, and thus it too feels something of the suffering of the whole, and learns how deep is the eternal love.

---

[74] 'Palinode', ll. 8, 20 (I, 308); cf. 'Hyperion's Song of Destiny', l. 7 (I, 265).

[75] 'The Gods', l. 9 (II. 16).

[76] 'Hyperion's Song of Destiny', l. 1 (I, 265).

[77] Ibid., ll. 19, 24 (I, 265).

[78] 'The Gods', ll. 1–2 (II, 16).

[79] H 2/1, 1 (III, 94). [80] H 2/2, 5 (III, 136).

[81] 'On the differences of the poetic genres' (IV, 268, ll. 19–27).

[82] Ibid., 269, l. 24.

Between these two forms of suffering is the apocalyptic post of the poet's heart; he who creates beauty even as he is passing, lonely, strange and astray, beyond beauty, ultimately beyond words themselves, and into the opacity of 'converse' with God.

Now cometh Spring. And each, in its own way, doth Bloom. He though far is gone; no longer there.
Astray went he; for all too good are Genii; heavenly converse hath he now.[85]

3. THE APOCALYPSE OF THE SPIRIT

In Christian belief, it is from the Spirit sent by him that the ascending Redeemer receives glory in the history of the world; and it is good that the earthly form vanishes, or else the Spirit could not come. So too Hölderlin, despite his monistic philosophy of Nature with its pre-Socratic cyclical foundation, is totally and increasingly prophetic-eschatological in thought and feeling; the kingdom of the spirit must and will come. We may let the harsh words in 'Patmos' stand: 'An excess yet/ Of love, where is adoration,/ Bringeth danger, striketh the hardest. They though to depart from/ The countenance of the Lord/ Wished not, and from their homeland. Deep implanted/ Like fire was it in iron then, and there at/ Their side, as 'twere a plague, went walking the shade of their dear one.'[86] 'And harming the countenance divine in verity/ Did walk as 'twere a plague beside them the shade of their dear one./ So them did send he/ The Spirit'.[87] Of the three Tübingen friends Hegel, Schelling and Hölderlin, who parted with the motto 'The Kingdom of God!', only the last kept a burning eschatological faith, with ringing utopian notes: 'It must change to its very foundations!'[88] 'All must rejuvenate itself, must change to its foundations!'[89] It is 'the holy glory of love' that must come in this way, before which 'egoism in all its shapes will bow';[90] for Hölderlin a hope concerning above all, and with ever more awareness, the fatherland. On the 'Day of the Fatherland', each casts his own into the festive flame of the offering, where, like pearls in wine, it dissolves.[91] Already in 'Hyperion's Youth' he is hoping for the 'harmony of our spirits'[92], a 'community in God',[93] and in 'Hyperion' this is called 'Time's fairest Daughter, the new church',[94] similarly, in a letter, 'the aesthetic church';[95] already it is time for it to assemble, 'so that out of this unification, this invisible, fighting church, may be born the great child of time, the day of days, which the man of my soul [Paul] . . . calls the coming of the Lord'.[96] In the late hymns, it is the 'holiday' at the end of time, the 'feast of peace'. The poet constantly rejects any conception of the parusia (as of the Christian faith in general) according to which 'the giver of a revelation does everything by himself, and the one who receives the revaluation may not even rise up to take it';[97] rather, with the help of the spirit humanity will in the course of history come to own the gift from within, even if at first its excess leads yet further astray.

---

[83] H 2/2, 11 (III, 156).

[84] H 2/2, 4 (III, 129).

[85] 'Ganymede', ll. 21–24 (II, 68).

[86] 'Patmos' (fragments of the later version), ll. 185–191 (II, 182–183).

---

[87] 'Patmos' (drafts for the final version), ll. 190–193 (II, 187).

[88] H 1/2, 19 (III, 89).

[89] H 2/1, 14 (III, 111).

[90] Letter 222 (VI, 407, ll. 27–28).

[91] 'Stuttgart', ll. 29–32 (II, 87).

[92] YH 5 (III, 224, l. 31).

[93] Ibid. (III, 224, ll. 3–4).

[94] H 1/1, 7 (III, 32).

[95] Letter 179 (VI, 330, l. 150).

[96] Letter 106 (VI, 185, ll. 51–54), and Beißner's commentary, citing contemporary parallels (VI, 761–763).

[97] Letter 171 (VI, 301, ll. 58–60).

> The kindness of men is followed by thanks,
> But not so a godly gift, and for years
> Come toils first and straying,
> Till truly owned it hath become and well-earned
> And his so too a man may call,
> Divine and human, the gift now.[98]

In the next lines, the poet is aware of 'a danger vict'ry holds, when drunken and o'erweaning', for at first the sense of power induced by the gift of the spirit will lead to the mastering of Nature, the technologisation of the world, while the 'humble' prize, the 'nearest' [that which lies closest] and 'dearest' [love], will not be won till the end. So strong is the emphasis on the immanence of the eternal in the human spirit that there is a genuinely naive conception of the gods and their numerous forms as 'children' of man in his union with the divine;[99] he imparts to them the special 'qualities of his nation', makes them 'descend to earth, for the sake of beauty', 'in this way the myths were born'.[100] 'Since converse we do have' the spirit has been collecting up these images, drawing 'together the beauties of Earth', from 'abroad', from 'colonies',[101] from the 'sea' (where 'beginneth the wealth');[102] and the 'holy powers' have 'To love's true token a witness', for they still have their place in the assembly at the end of days, and are represented in the 'number holy', which is the sum of the world, the 'Feast of Peace'.[103] From early days, Hölderlin's life is devoted towards the end of time,[104] and it is this that finally becomes the object of 'the high and pure delighting of songs of the Fatherland';[105] hence also his expectation of 'the peace of peace, that is higher than all reason'.[106] If 'our joy' is already 'well-nigh too small' to grasp a god,[107] if for now we are being spared by the heavenly ones, 'for not always the strength hath them to contain a weak vessel',[108] because they come with 'too bright', 'too dazzling', a happiness,[109] 'even that oft/ The light of the eye by the gifts of the gods was extinguished';[110] thus does that which the poets 'e'er divine',[111] the fulfilment of the Hen kai Pan, remain ineffable.

---

[98] 'The Feast of Peace' (2nd draft), ll. 63–68 (II, 135); cf. the final version, ll. 85–86: 'But where the Spirit worketh, we too are, disputing/ What might the best thing be' (III, 535).

[99] H 1/2, 19 (III, 80).

[100] 'A History of the Fine Arts . . .', IV, 190, ll. 13, 16f.

[101] Variant to 'Bread and Wine', II, 608; Beißner's comment, 621.

[102] 'Remembrance', ll. 40–41 (II, 189).

[103] 'The Feast of Peace', ll. 100–108 (III, 536).

[104] 'Courage proud the son of Earth imbibeth/ From the Future's cup, of magic full' ('Hymn to Immortality', ll. 83–84 (I, 118)); 'While torches ye funereal yet hold. . . ./ E'en now doth dawn the newer better world' ('To the wise advisers', ll. 54, 56 (I, 224)).

The darker his path and the firmer the grip of night, the more resolutely does Hölderlin maintain his attitude of prayer and total affirmation, even in the face of the abysses, the objects of dread, the chaos. Already in 'The Books of the Ages', a quite early hymn in Klopstockian tones, the poet, confronted by the books of the world's history thrown apocalyptically open with their merciless record of the most terrible miseries, nevertheless wins through to 'celebrating, trembling adoration/ About the shrine of the Unnameable'.[112] The metaphysics of beauty, at once classical and Idealistic, prove a sleep-walker's path back to this apocalyptic vision of the end; thus the plunge, 'the shortest path back into the All',[113] the delight in death with which Empedocles seeks life—'there doth well and flash/ A godly fire up from the depths to thee', and down he casts himself 'in shuddering desire'[114]—increasingly (in the tragedy) turns to an affirmation of the 'wild discord' that strives up 'from below'[115] and in which yet 'mindful of/ The Unity of old the Mother dark [Earth]/ Doth stretch her arms of fire out to the Aether';[116]'; it is 'the old forming chaos',[117] the 'ancient confusion',[118] celebrated (in the first strophe of 'Heimkunft') as the awful and holy landscape where all things originated, ('The joyfully shuddering Chaos')[119] while in 'The Archipelagus' it is a subterranean quaking by which even the glorious islands are threatened, as when

---

[105] Letter 243 (1804), VI, 436, l. 19.
[106] pH III, 236, ll. 25–26.
[107] 'Homecoming', l. 100 (II, 99).
[108] 'Bread and Wine', 7, ll. 112–113 (II, 93).
[109] ib., 5, l. 74 (II, 92).
[110] 'At the Danube's Source', ll. 62–63 (II, 127).
[111] 'As on a holiday . . .', l. 17 (II, 118).
[112] 'The Books of the Ages', I, 69–74.
[113] 'The Voice of the People' (1st vers.), l. 13 (II, 49).
[114] 'Empedocles', ll. 1f. (I, 240).
[115] 3E 1/3, l. 382 (IV, 136).

> from the abyss set > Free, at times did the flame of Night, the underground > tempest
> Seize upon one of the angels, and dying she sank in > thy bosom,[120]

and by which, equally, the life that has dissolved into chaos is cast up anew in resurrection, as by a volcano

> When there is rumbling below, for Night with her > treasures doth toll pay,
> And, in the beds of the streams, gold, for long > buried, doth glean.[121]

Thus do almost all the late poems[122] strive to return from the formed land of Greece to the chaotic mother Asia, the origin of love and of great prayers;[123] the Rhein flows towards her at first and the Danube till the end, while as the 'Ister' the latter seems to the poet 'almost backwards to go', that is, to flow from the East to the West.[124] The West is by its origins an open land, and perhaps it and the East might be joined in a marriage that would, as it were, pass over Hellas.[125]

---

[116] 3E 1/3, ll. 476–477 (IV, 139).

[117] Letter 229 (VI, 416, ll. 26–27).

[118] 'The Rhein', l. 221 (II, 148).

[119] 'Homecoming', l. 5 (II, 96).

[120] 'The Archipelago', ll. 20–22 (II, 103).

[121] 'Menon's Laments for Diotima', 6, ll. 81–82 (II, 77).

[122] 'At the Danube's Source', 'The Journey', 'The Rhein', 'Germania', 'The only One', 'Patmos', 'Remembrance', 'The Ister'.

[123] There 'the Strong' have their place, they who 'Did fearless face the signs of the world/ And the sky and all fate on their shoulders laden/ For days on mountains implanted/ Had none done as they did/ Alone when spake they/ With God' ('At the Danube's Source', ll. 80f., II, 128); whether here he means the Indian worshippers, Moses on Mount Sinai, or the Christian monks and stylites.

[124] 'The Ister', ll. 41–42 (II, 191).

Yet this ardent reaching-out far and ever further into the distance also signifies a twilight that is fading into an implacably destructive spiritual darkness; the tremendous intensity with which he thought to do justice to the glory of all being was, despite all the humility of its thanksgiving and praise, objectively hubristic; it reduced the freedom that is God's in his mystery of suffering to a law defining the nature of the One-and-All, a law open to be experienced. The Christ, having been dissolved into the cosmos, can therefore ultimately never be brought back. And immediately after Hölderlin the cold winds of nothingness come bursting into his glory, as already in Jean Paul; a nothingness whose approach Hyperion too can already sense: 'O ye poor people, ye who . . . are so utterly possessed by the nothingness that rules over us, who perceive so clearly that we are born for nothing, that we love a nothing, believe in a nothing, wear ourselves away for nothing, thus slowly to pass into nothingness—if your knees give way when ye contemplate that, how am I to help you?' And the next words could have been Zarathustra's: 'Remain below, ye children of the moment! strive ye not to scale these heights; nought is there up here'.[126] This darkest of shadows is inseparable from any kind of thinking based on identity; to interpret it as an 'absence of God' that will in the end be helpful is therefore over-confident.[127] But when, amid this aberration, the post 'would gladly beg a drop of oil, to shine yet a while through the night'[128]—as he writes to Diotima—then he has been absorbed into a movement which transcends his own moment, leaving him, as he remains, without weapons or guile, 'alone before God',[129] with shelter only in the utmost exposure. 'And mightily light doth flicker in/ The wildness of the Abyss'.[130]

---

[125] 'The Journey', ll. 40ff. (II, 139).
[126] H 1/2, 11 (III, 46).
[127] 'The Poetic Calling', l. 64 (II, 48).
[128] Letter 182 (VI, 337, ll. 6–7).
[129] 'The Poetic Calling', ll. 62–64 (II, 48).
[130] 'The Titans', ll. 72–73 (II, 219).

e. Goethe

1. THE MEAN AS A FORM OF RESISTANCE

THE CURVE

Such a dominant influence not only on the 'Age of Goethe' but also on the nineteenth century, Goethe[1] lived in the calm but often fearful awareness that, like a rock, he stood against a mighty racing current. All his religious experiences and their manifold expressions, despite their ring of affirmation, sprang from, were carved out by, a primal No. When he set out, the young man left behind two companions, a feeble Pietistic Protestantism and the flat materialism offered by France and the European Enlightenment: 'How hollow and empty the world had become in that gloomy atheistic twilight.'[2] And now, in powerful contrast, there arises a cosmic experience of Being which brings to our minds the names of Bruno, Spinoza, Shaftesbury, Herder. After Strasburg and Frankfurt came Weimar; was the pantheistic 'I' to fit comfortably into court life? to accept limitations which seemed at once an unbearable distortion and a beneficial necessity? This conflict (played out in Torquato Tasso) was not resolved until Goethe fled to Italy and found refuge in the classical world, where Nature and form are always in harmony. His next encounter was with the 'philosophy of the spirit' which Schiller and Fichte had developed from the Critiques. The resulting intense dialogue was highly productive, but drew from Goethe that primal No, indeed, only made him the more aware that something he had found in his cosmic experience was missing in the Idealistic version represented by Kant and Fichte, by Schiller, finally by Hegel. 'Schiller showed too little gratitude to our great Mother'.[3] 'All Schiller's works are pervaded by the idea of freedom . . . What use to us is an excuse of a freedom we cannot use! . . . Freedom lies not in refusing to acknowledge anything above us, but, on the contrary, in revering something that is above us.'[4] Even as he reacted against Idealism, Goethe's God-Nature religion became more profound, a religion of awe (in programmatic form in Years of Wandering). So too the primal No to the French Revolution can explain the greater profundity of the ethos typified by Eugenia and Ottilia, a noble heart with its renunciation; so too his determination to stand by the western tradition and its classical roots became, thanks to his rejection of Romanticism and the ensuing painful isolation, firm and unshakeable; finally, when from his essentially pious theory of Nature Goethe developed, and obstinately defended, an organic morphology and (Plotinian) theory of colours, the impetus is really his No to an increasingly technological natural science and its catastrophic consequences, man's (atheistic) departure from Nature.

---

[1] We shall quote from the Artemis Gedenkausgabe (24 vols. + 2 supplementary vols.). Abbreviations: P = Poems; D = West-eastern Divan: F = Faust; MA = William Master's Apprenticeship; MW = William Master's Years of Wandering; MV = William Master's Theatrical Vocation; EA = Electoral Affinities; IPH = Iphigenia; T = Tasso; IJ = The Italian Journey; TF = Truth and Fancy; A = The Annals; TC = The Theory of Colours; C = Conversations with Eckermann; L = Letters. The volume number is indicated in Roman numerals; e.g. MA 4, 16 (VII, 279) = Apprenticeship, Book 4, Chapter 16, in Volume VII, page 279. Sometimes fragmentary writings on natural science are quoted from the Insel Dünndruckausgabe (ed. G. Ipsen = Ipsen).

[2] TF 3, 11 (X, 538).

Hölderlin we might compare to a fine and tapering flame; Goethe too, whose life and work have such a mighty compass, unquestionably represents a last secular manifestation of the heritage of 'glory' which the history of western metaphysics has bequeathed to us. His adherence to the tradition of Bruno and Shaftesbury (and their antecedents Cusa, Plotinus, Homer) was far from leading him into the temptations of Idealism; for out of his youthful religion of the One-and-All there arose an adoration of the mystery of Being characterised by distance and awe. And a paradoxical situation comes about; this 'child of the world' who never prays, unlike Hölderlin, who does, can truly be said to live within the analogia entis, rather than the mysticism of identity.

---

[3] 'My first acquaintance with Schiller' (XII, 621).

[4] C 18.1.1827 (XXIV, 216).

Never, not even in his youth, did Goethe feel any compulsion 'to take refuge in the doctrine of absolute unity; for therein gain but equals loss, and what is left at the end? the consolation of a disconsolate zero'.[5] Meanwhile, God's presence in the world, in every element and form, is a fundamental experience that only an ultimately irreligious Christian or Enlightenment deism can deny. The Ancient Persians became Goethe's friends because they based their worship 'on contemplation of Nature', turning, 'when they prayed to the Creator, towards the rising sun, since that was by far the most glorious thing they knew'. But 'nor was fire the only representative' of the deity, for 'their religion was intrinsically based on reverence for all the elements, inasmuch as these proclaimed the presence and power of God', reverence 'for God's universal presence in the works of his sensual world'.[6] Such a 'faculty of vision', that 'penetrates life in all its manifold forms', occurs, of course, 'only in a few divinely-favoured men'; for most, religious experience emerges 'only as a fiery feeling of inspiration which lasts a moment and departs, whereupon the subject, restored to himself, dissatisfied, unoccupied, at once relapses into a most endless emptiness', which the national religions with their pious ceremonies are then an attempt to fill.[7]

Goethe was never prey to doubts of an atheistic nature; and if he preferred to 'observe a profound silence' where 'God and things divine' were concerned,[8] nevertheless he could not but hear the Universal Being and his 'open secret,'[9] his 'holy public secret'[10]: that 'Nature doth in all her forms/But a single

---

[5] 5. D III, 452.

[6] D III, 423–425.

[7] D III, 424.

[8] A 1794 (XI, 637).

[9] D III, 304.

[10] P I, 519; playfully echoed in a conversation with Ulrike von Lewetzow (no. 1635, XXIII, 290), when Goethe tried in vain to keep his birthday a secret, and then called it 'the day of the open secret'. Cf. also Years of Wandering 2, 8: the 'happy rose of life' 'from secret life awaketh/ A meaning plain' (VIII, 277). The truths of the Theory of Colours are entrusted to the future as an 'ingenuous mystery' (Ipsen, Vol. 2, 680).

God reveal'.[11] And this God, far from being a mere unknown X, is the unattainable source of all ordered beauty. 'I do not ask', Goethe said, 'whether this highest Being is able to think and reason, for I feel that it itself is none other than thought and reason. All creatures are pervaded by it, and as for man, he has so much thereof as to recognise even some parts of the Highest.'[12] Such a religion 'really needs no faith . . . some such conviction imposes itself on everyone.'[13]

Yet God is so much the universal essence that, like Plotinus, Erigena and Ficino before him, Goethe is not prepared to attribute to him a private will, to burden him with prayers as such. We find prayers proper only in the early Weimar period, two poems reviving the strict ancient distinction between gods and men: 'The Limitations of Man' ('For with gods/ No man soever/ Should seek to vie . . ./ What is it divides/ Gods, and men? . . .'), 'The Divine' (which has man fulfilling his existence 'by brazen/ Great Laws bound', yet still playing a positive role, exercising choice, conferring perpetuity on the individual moment).[14] Then we have, with a conscious return to Homer and the tragedians, the prayers of Iphigenia; the rebellious, titanic 'Song of the Fates' is not the heroine's—for her it only represents a burgeoning temptation—but her nurse's.[15] To understand her own prayer we must remember how she was miraculously transported away from death by Diana;[16] she is a 'miraculée', and therefore a virgin and priestess:

> Sole right unto my consecrated life
> Hath not the goddess, who my life did save?[17]

In this mind she prays to the goddess to whom she owes her existence, and has towards her an intense relationship, listening, with an inner ear, for the divine voice:

---

[11] MW 2, 8 (VIII, 277).

[12] C 23.2.1831 (XXIV, 462–463).

[13] TF 1, 4 (X, 154), where the structure of the natural order is distinguished from revealed religion.

[14] P I, 323–325.

[15] Iph 4, 5 (VI, 198–199).

[16] Iph 3, 1 (VI, 183); 5, 3 (VI, 202).

[17] Iph 1, 3 (VI, 160).

> This is no god that speaks, but thine own heart.
> 'Tis only through our hearts they speak to us.
> And have I then no rights, myself to hear.
> The storm doth overwhelm the frail voice.[18]

Later we read:

> Thoas: Rough Scythians,
> Barbarians, hear not that voice, you think?
> Iphigenia: All may hear it,
> Born under any heaven, if
> Through the bosom unhindered and pure
> The Spring of Life doth flow.[19]

Pylades too knows this:

> Upon the will of those above must heedfully wait
> All human wisdom, or 'tis nought.[20]

Thus Iphigenia's are true prayers, founded on that ancient cornerstone, the 'limitations of man' and the miraculous grace of the gods.[21] The first great step from enthusiasm to a distant reverence we may safely relate to Goethe's love for Frau von Stein, to whom he wrote in March 1781: 'The Jews have laces for wrapping around their arms when they pray: in the same way I wrap your beloved ribbon round my arm when I send my prayer to you, and wish to partake of your goodness, wisdom, moderation and patience.'[22] Later this dialogic element pales into a mere gesture of awe which, in the Years of Wandering, is elevated to become the very essence of the religious act. Thus Iphigenia, from the religious point of view, is like an exposed gash between the early and late periods; perhaps the breach of the mean goes deeper than the conventional picture of Goethe, for which the poet bears not a little responsibility, allows us to see. For could Goethe, that devotee of finished classical form, be asked what single essential image he planted in the history of the human spirit during the sixty years of his life's work, then would be revealed his tragic uncertainty.

---

[18] Iph 1, 3 (VI, 162).

[19] Iph 5, 3 (VI, 205).

[20] Iph 2, 1 (VI, 169).

[21] Esp. Iph 1, 4 (VI, 163–164), 3, 3 (VI, 186–187), and the prayer of thanksgiving and entreaty for 'fulfilment' in Iph 3, 1 (VI, 179–180): the 'abundance' of the gift identifies the gods as the givers.

[22] L 510 (XVIII, 578).

A BREAK THROUGH THE MIDDLE

For the young Goethe, poetic creation was the act that joins heaven and earth, God and the world; the ecstatic discovery that creativity in Nature and in the heart of the genius has a single common source. 'Who, if you will, has formed gods, raised us up to them, brought them down to us, other than the poet?' 'If others dream . . . why, he waking lives the dream of life . . . Destiny has elevated him, god-like, above all such things.'[23] But in Weimar the titanic visions, confronted by the hard, limited and objective reality of things, lose conviction, as Jarno's words show: 'Man is only happy when his uncompromising aspirations put a limit on themselves.'[24] In 'Ilmenau' (1783) we find a first, implacable, self-judgment:

The fire I lit hath not a flame so pure.
The glow, the danger, are by storm increased,
I falter not as I condemn myself.[25]

In Theatrical Vocation, two feminine figures—the muse of tragic poetry and the personification of commerce—compete for the young poet; William tears up his note-books and is about to throw them into the fire; Werner stops him, and he collapses in tears on the table, all covered with jumbled papers.[26] When he fled to Italy, Goethe won through to the positive side of the crisis: for this was in every respect the supreme and happy time, the heart of Goethe's existence. But the healing of the person meant the laming of his work. Shortly before leaving Italy, Goethe wrote: 'In Rome, for the first time, I have found myself; at last I have found an inner harmony, I am happy and reasonable.'[27] But that was not his initial emotion: 'I am like an architect who, having in mind to build a tower, has laid a poor foundation; at least he sees soon enough his mistake, and brings down without ado what he has brought up from the earth, seeking to broaden, to ennoble, his plan . . .'[28] He is now sure of 'two of my prime errors': 'If I wanted or needed to throw myself into something, I was never prepared to learn the appropriate craft, which is why, despite great natural potential, I have done and achieved so little. My second is a closely related error: I have never been prepared to devote to a task or matter as much time as it needed.'[29] A dilettante, then, an unwitting one at that; and nearing forty. 'It seems, I fear, that I have wasted the best time of one's life.'[30] 'My titanic ideas were just phantoms of air.'[31] And, reflecting on the shamefully meagre harvest of his collected works: 'How can an existence leave so little trace?'[32] Thus, again, his William speaks for him when he says: 'Supremely happy is he . . . who needs not to cast away all the life he has lived, to be in accord with destiny!'[33]

---

[23] MV 2, 3 (VIII, 598–599), reappearing in MA 2, 2 (VII, 88).
[24] MA 8, 5 (VII, 593).
[25] P I, 362.
[26] MV 2, 3 (VIII, 604).

The significance of this break emerges from consideration of those three life-works which, in surviving the crisis of the middle years, bind youth and old age together: the Faust poem (begun in 1772, completed in 1831), the Master novel (in its three parts, Theatrical Vocation, The Apprenticeship and The Years of Wandering; begun in 1777 and though not completed, broken off in 1829), and, finally—if one goes by size—the major work: Goethe's autobiography, in which The Italian Journey (edited between 1815 and 1829) and Truth and Fancy (1808–1829), supplemented by an abundance of travel reports, annals, diaries, letters and conversation, constitute the central parts. All three life-works were completed by the eighty-year-old. An individual work, Tasso, is the document proper of the break; it was begun shortly before leaving Germany, then towed around Italy ('I shall have to revise Tasso; as it is, it is useless'),[34] and not finished until the poet was back in Weimar.

---

[27] IJ 3, March 1788 (XI, 583).
[28] IJ 1, 20.12.1786 (XI, 163).
[29] IJ 3, 20.7.1787 (XI, 407).
[30] IJ 3, 2.10.1787 (XI, 453).
[31] IJ 3, 10.1.1788 (VI, 526).
[32] IJ 3, 1.2.1788 (XI, 568).
[33] MA 7, 6 (VII 494).

Tasso embodies the poet's completeness, an ideal of the young Goethe seen, quite correctly, as continuing the spiritual tradition of the Florentine Academy; Ficino, Ariosto, the historical Tasso himself. And if for the young Goethe Eros was the clear and dominant medium of inspiration, in this too there is an unmistakable continuity with the classical-Platonic metaphysics of the Renaissance; indeed, we are inevitably reminded of the historical Tasso: fanciful ideas floating around à la Petrarch, and, in tense but unified contrast, a realistic sexuality.[35] Tasso portrays the poet's completeness; but the cost is an absolute exposure of the defenceless heart. The poet possesses

> That which only Nature can confer,
> And ever lies beyond the will of man,
> Beyond his every effort, and which gold
> Cannot force forth, nor sword, nor wit, nor long > Endeavour.[36]

And if Iphigenia listens to the voice of the god in her heart, of Tasso we read:

> His ear discerns the harmony of Nature.[37]

But, to soar aloft in this harmony, his cosmic Aeolian harp needs the touch of Eros' breath, both as a longing for the unattainable ('for that unto this goal/ My life a wandering eternal is')[38] and as a passion for an exalted lady; the Princess, however, will always be beyond Tasso's reach (she is always herself a 'disciple of Plato')[39] and thus the two forms merge, like the figures in 'Jerusalem Freed'.[40] Just as Iphigenia cannot, even to save herself, besmear her lips with a lie, Tasso's exposed heart senses every tarnishing of the moral order, every impurity, betrayal. Right to the end his penetrating insight never fails him. Antonio, the courtier and man of the world, insults him, the Duke punishes him; like Hyperion's, his 'wounded heart but slowly heals',[41] yet remains unswerving. Were the conflict that of the poet Goethe, confronted by the court and business world of Weimar, it would not in itself be so totally and tragically insoluble. But the web of lies spun by Leonore San Vitale—her 'love', a guise for selfishness, is exposed by Tasso in a magnificent scene (4.2)—snaps his wings, while the Princess' feeble and evasive Platonism (giving the light of 'scanty moonshine', but no warmth)[42] completely disrupts his precarious balance; bodily he embraces one who is bodiless, and, more tragic than the Faust who will clasp the garments of the withdrawing Helen, collapses in utter failure. The drama is by no means a pathological study of a single unfortunate person, but an ontology of poetic existence. In the foreground we have the tension between the ideal and real worlds (Tasso and Antonio); but in the background is the incurable tension between the pre-Italy Charlotte and the Charlotte who greeted the returning lover, the man who had fled from her without a word of farewell, with a coldness hardened into hatred; and yet further in the background, the whole problem of Eros classical and modern, a problem concentrated, for Goethe-Tasso, in the question of 'the moment' which gives that timeless (and therefore unreal) glimpse of the Absolute without which the poet could never create anything real.[43] Herein lies the true reason why Goethe, who even in the penultimate act champions his hero undauntedly against all the other characters, goes over to the side of the opposition in the fifth act; now, and only now, do the scales sink. The crack running through Tasso betrays the hidden rift in Goethe's own heart.—The three life-works, once broken down, are easier to grasp.

---

[34] IJ 3, 1.2.1788 (XI, 568).
[35] Above, p. 272.
[36] T 4, 2 (VI, 281).
[37] T 1, 1 (VI, 218).
[38] T 1, 3 (VI, 228), also T 4, 4 (VI, 289).
[39] T 1, 1 (VI, 219).

---

[40] T 2, 1 (VI, 245).

[41] T 4, 4 (VI, 288).

[42] T 3, 3 (VI, 270).

[43] Strikingly, the word 'moment' recurs five times in lines 2129–2147, likewise in ll. 2674–2708.

Faust, determined to win the whole, rejects the piece-meal knowledge of the four Faculties and resorts to magic (not unfamiliar; we recall the magical path, in their case theological, of Porphyry and Iamblichus). He finds in his book two 'signs' for the All-and-One. The first is that of the 'Macrocosm'; of 'living Nature' wherein 'all things interwoven are,/ Each in another doing, being!/ Heavenly powers mounting and descending/ The golden buckets one to other passing!'[44] It is the hierarchical, dynamic, analogical universe envisioned by Plotinus or Denys the Areopagite; a magnificent 'show, but ah! a show and nothing more' for Faust. He wants, not classification, but immediate identification. So he decides he will not invoke this universal spirit: instead, turning the page over 'resentfully', he catches sight of the sign of 'the Earth Spirit': quite 'different', 'nearer' to him, and enticing him 'the woe and the delight of Earth to bear'. Rays of red light flash and a breath of chill air wafts down from the ceiling, as Faust invokes the spirit, who appears before him (according to the original version) 'in hideous shape'. Describing itself as 'A sea eternal/ A ceaseless weaving/ A glowing Living', billowing up and down 'in floods of life, in storm of deeds', it points Faust away from itself to the spirit he understands—Mephisto, as we shall see. Henceforth the cosmos is the realm of the earth-spirit, viewed, that is, from Bruno's chthonic perspective, with Heraclitus in the background: the billowing coincidentia oppositorum, not analogy but an identity, which man soars up into, a cosmos not 'divine' but 'daemonic'. Here is not that contemplation which, in its sublime longing for the One, sees the laws of the universe soften (a motif which runs from Plato and Plotinus via Boethius and Bonaventura to Cusa); here is action ('In the beginning was the Deed'; 'He who acts has no conscience; only the observer has a conscience').[45] Action, however, consists in single steps, and therefore always needs an opposing complement and creative negation. This constant companion is Mephistopheles, and together, in their ceaseless striving and endeavour to be, or rather seem to be, the whole. Thus everything, even the highest deeds, performed through and with Mephistopheles retains a sense of illusion and deception. Properly, the absolute act should have been suicide ('The time is come, that deeds should finish proof/ A man may worthy be to scale the heights divine'),[46] the way of Werther, more precisely of Ippolit (in the Idiot) and of Existentialism. But a half-Christian, half-pagan Easter changes Faust's mood, and provides a transition to the 'pact' that, being a contract with contradiction, can itself only be contradictory: Faust wants the moment of divine-daemonic identity and, at the same time, curses it in advance. His path, seen from its starting-point, cannot be that of Eros, of the desired object, the 'restless heart' (Goethe's later insertions try to create that impression);[47] it is, rather, a path whose traces are never free of deceptiveness. All is appearance trickery—the eroticism of the Witches' Kitchen (leading to the Gretchen tragedy), the devilish goings-on of the first Walpurgis Night, the paper money at the Emperor's court, the phantasmagoric Helen and Euphorion—and the final trick is the great cultural achievement by the sea-shore, compromised by murder. In the end Faust, as he faces death, understands how ruinous was his initial decision in favour of the sphere of the earth-spirit and its concomitant spirit of negation:

---

[44] F, ll. 441, 446ff. (V, 157–158).

[45] Maxims, IX, 522. On the whole subject, see the decisively important essay by Eudo C. Mason, 'Goethes Erdgeist und das Pathos des Irdischen',

> Could I but free from magic now my path,
> Put spells behind me once and for all,
> Before thee, Nature, stand a man alone,
> Then, 'twere not labour lost, to be alive![48]

This thread is clearly visible; it originates precisely in the

---

in Exzentrische Bahnen: Studien zum Ditcherbewußtsein der Neuzeit (1963), pp. 24–59.

[46] F, ll. 712f. (V, 165).

[47] In the glorious lines of Easter-eve (1064–1099), with the setting sun pursued by the yearning crane.

[48] F, ll. 11404–11407 (V, 503).

Bruno-like pathos of contradiction we found in Faust's opening programme:

> You giddy whirling world, excruciating pleasure,
> Love's hate and ennui's thrill, yours shall I be . . .
> That lot accorded the whole race of men
> I mean to feast on in my inner Self . . .
> My Self enlarge to be the equal of mankind
> And, like mankind, I'll shatter in the end![49]

The style, even the vocabulary, recall Eroici Furori. But this is the very style the classical Goethe sickened of; the Faustian in Faust therefore had to be dismantled in mid-stream. Faust's prayer, in which the 'Earth Spirit' is elevated and identified with the spirit of the macrocosm, with the Plotinian-Christian God in-and-above Nature, was composed in Italy:

> Spirit Sublime, thou gavest, gavest everything to me
> For which I prayed. And not in vain didst thou
> In fire turn thy countenance to me . . .[50]

This is a classical execution of the same apostrophe in a very early scene that was never used: 'Great and glorious Spirit, that hast designed to appear to me, that knowest me heart and soul, why chain me to this shameful companion? . . .'.[51] And really this elevation of Faust's is, within the context of the western tradition, not so difficult. The unity of opposites (Heraclitus, Bruno) is ultimately no more than the immanent variation upon the theme of the transcendent Platonic cosmos; if in the former case the poles are set out independently so that the pendulum swings within the conflict, here, brought together in a single perspective, they are the object of contemplation. The 'Prologue in Heaven' (1797), with its 'Song of the Three Archangels', now determines the new perspective from the beginning; the angels contemplate from above the wildly-foaming world of the earth-spirit, in which the brightness of Paradise alternates with a deep and dreadful darkness, storms roar in a raging chain, and ravaging lightning flickers before the thunder. The sight 'gives the Angels strength', for they perceive in all this not only the ancient 'singing-match of the brother spheres', but God's kabod:

---

[49] F, ll. 1766–1775 (V, 196).

[50] F, ll. 3217–3219 (V, 244).

[51] F, 'A gloomy day. Field' (V, 281).

And all thy works sublime
Still know the first day's glory.[52]

This permits eros, the motif of desire, to come to the fore ('A good man, 'midst the darkness of his urge,/ Yet knows full well which is the righter way').[53] The pact can be passed over and finally treated simply as superseded (dirty work, on which Mephisto puts a bright face); the dreadful murders in the first part and the conclusion of the second are forgotten; and, lastly, the instrument of transcendence, eros, is transfigured, to become the Marian agape of Dante as descending grace. As we surface from the magical intoxication of the giant poem, we may ask which of the spheres is its true home, whence it derives the principle of its form; but the only answer lies in the movement itself—from the one to the other sphere—ultimately the movement of Goethe's existence. For Faust is Goethe, in him he has his justification, his living figure.

William Master begins with the belief in a theatrical 'vocation'; what follows is a retraction, this supposed vocation turning out a mistake. If Faust renounced his world-spirit because it remained 'a show, no more', for the young Master the theatre is to become an image, indeed a kind of symbol, for the world. After the successes of Clavigo and Götz, Goethe's sense of vocation and vision—not just of a national literature but of an actual German culture based on the stage—were of a grandeur that can scarcely be overestimated.[54] The artist builds the ecclesiastical and spiritual house in which the nation is to dwell.[55] His is a self-sacrifice seen as a vocation, in that he projects the best he has on to the stage, which becomes like a secular pulpit; and this slow, progressive objectivising of his own existence for the benefit of the public was the 'theatrical vocation' of William-Goethe. As Goethe made clear to himself in the splendidly acrimonious essay 'Literary Sans-culottism', the beginnings had to be basic, indeed, almost from nothing.[56] From puppet-plays at fairs and in garrets, passing through all the stages of an actor's career with its misery and self-doubt, to the popular and amateur theatre, the court, and finally the regular town-theatre; such is the rise of Master, as writer and player. Hamlet provides the training-ground, an exercise in the meaning of real poetry, true theatre; all the accidents of Fortune's coat-of-many-colours prove to be linked by the inner necessity of the vocation[57] with its 'presentiment of the whole world',[58] so that the only question is whether the hero's inner core is strong enough for chance to crystallise into destiny. This is the question Hamlet raises, for here 'a soul is burdened with a deed too great for it';[59] at this point the focus shifts from the subjective to the objective sphere. 'Here, the hero does not have a plan, but the play does . . . All the circumstances unite and seek vengeance, but in vain! neither on earth nor below has any the power to execute what Destiny has reserved for itself.'[60] Shakespeare, not

---

[52] F, ll. 243–266 (V, 149–150).

[53] F, ll. 328–329 (V, 151).

[54] He states that he 'thought unceasingly on the German theatre' (TF, 3, 13 (X, 619)): a national poetry would have to be based on the great events in the destinies of nations and kings, for these 'become much more interesting than the gods themselves; the gods have no sooner determined a destiny than they withdraw from it' (TF 2, 7 (X, 308)). After Götz, he continues, he became secretly preoccupied with the idea, using the Thirty Years War as a basis, of 'moving forwards and backwards, and treating the principal events in the same vein' (TF 3, 13 (X, 629)).

---

[55] It is the young architect of Electoral Affinities who puts this most beautifully: An artist's 'works leave him as do birds the nest in which they have hatched and grown . . . To him the royal halls owe their splendour, a splendour whose greatest effect he cannot share in. In the temples, he sets a boundary between himself and the Holy of Holies . . . just as a goldsmith will worship from afar the monstrance he has created with its glaze and pearls . . . Truly, since it was assigned to her to care above all for public works, for things that belong to everyone and so to the artist as well. Art has perforce become her own only strength' (EA 2, 3 IX, 151–152)).

[56] XIV, 179–185.

[57] MV 6, 14 (VIII, 877).

[58] MV 6, 11 (VIII, 859).

[59] MV 6, 8 (VIII, 846).

[60] MV 6, 10 (VIII, 856).

Hamlet, controls the course of the drama; so too Master's inner vocation is not the highest instance, for he too has a role, in a destiny greater than himself.

At this point the novel of vocation was broken off, in anticipation of the rupture again to come in Italy. Goethe 'abandoned the venture; and when he returned to it the "vocation" was no more. Into its place came a Bildungsroman (story of a young man's progress to maturity) called The Apprenticeship; those theatrical aspirations had now become a mistake, hardly even a "fruitful" mistake, of Master's youth . . . Disillusioned with the idea of a German national theatre, Goethe now felt that the stage was not after all able to create a "people", in the truest sense of the word.'[61] Thus he who had a vocation now becomes, like Faust, a searcher: 'The story of his life is an eternal searching and never finding.'[62] Destiny has its core no longer in him, nor in a personal providence, but in the Masonic secret society in the background, which, in pulling the strings of a 'destiny' seen as pure 'chance' by William, turns the hero's wayward existence to good.[63] Here, once again, Goethe is condemning the first half of his life: '"I have, I fear, nothing to relate but mistake upon mistake, aberration upon aberration," William replied';[64] but the Masonic abbé takes the view that 'error can only be cured through errancy'.[65] Thus such error and the failed vocation became, as with Faust, integrated into a meaningful process, to be called Bildung (formative education); 'Alas . . . what endless operations Nature and Art must do, before there stands before them a fully-formed human being.'[66] Later still, in The Years of Wandering, Goethe imitates Plato as he bans the theatre altogether from the sphere of education: 'It has an ambiguous origin which it will never, neither as art nor craft nor simple pleasure, be able to shake off.' Goethe steps on to the platform and, as the 'editor of these papers', speaks to the reading public: 'Has not he too, in many ways, expended more life and strength on the theatre than was right?'[67] It is pardonable because it has found a place in the unified whole of his striving existence. In Vocation and Apprenticeship, the idea of the 'role' provides the transition from the actor playing a part to the man who is the plaything of a universal 'world theatre'; Goethe praises the nobility, so favoured from the start in worldly goods, and at the same time criticises: to make up for his disadvantages, the humbler citizen has to 'sacrifice his entire self'. Unable to live by 'representation', he has to draw on 'loyalty', the 'prime resource of all our wealth'.[68] 'If through the portrayal of his person the nobleman gives his all, the ordinary citizen through his personality gives nothing, nor should he. The former can, indeed should, seem to be; the latter should only be, and what he tries to seem is absurd and tasteless. The former should do and act; the latter should achieve and create . . ., and it is an initial premise that in his being there is and can be no harmony, for in order to serve a useful purpose he has to neglect everything else.' Nor does Master-Goethe stop there: 'Now it so happens that I have an irresistible inclination towards that harmonious development of my nature my birth has denied me.' He would like to be both a 'public person' and a poet; and here too the theatre provides the bridge: 'On the boards, the cultivated man can appear in all his personal distinction, no less than in the upper classes.'[69] A profound dialectic; while the nobleman represents rather than really is, the ordinary citizen actually is, but cannot represent; in the theatre, however, he could do both at once, and in this way catch up and overtake the nobleman. This is undoubtedly a dream of Goethe's own, in that it envisages a middle way that neither Tasso nor Faust is able to achieve. Both Master and Goethe see their dream collapse; but if we ask what Master has learnt, The Apprenticeship provides no further answer, and we must look, paradoxically enough, to The Years of Wandering, or, Paths of Renunciation.

---

[61] Emil Staiger, Goethe I, (1952), 472–474.
[62] MA 8, 4 (VII, 571).
[63] MA 7, 9 (VII, 531–532).
[64] MA 7, 6 (VII, 480).
[65] MA 8, 5 (VII, 590).
[66] MA 7, 2 (VII, 459).

---

[67] MW 2, 9 (VIII, 278–280).

[68] MV 5, 13 (VIII, 811–812).

[69] MA 5, 3 (VII, 312–314).

But no structural cohesion shall we find here; for once again a painful fracture runs through the middle, distorting the original idea out of all recognition. Master has scarcely brought Natalia home—the transfigured Amazon of Vocation[70] who reappeared 'in a radiant halo' in Apprenticeship, where she was named the 'Saint'[71]—than he leaves her for a life of wandering, a way of renunciation which does no more than skirt human spheres and destines. In such detachment the world becomes objective and a true sympathy possible; but William strives afresh to escape from this distance. He becomes a surgeon. However, the problem of 'wandering' (in the 1821 version) is transformed into that of emigration to America (in the final, 1829 version). With the novel now disintegrating into a collection of loose bundles, the centre-stage is taken over by the question of education, that is, of character formation' once again, now on a comprehensive and systematic basis, extending from the religious sphere to art and craft. Even where Christianity appears as the third, highest and ultimate religion,[72] the ideal is really the classical paideia; for 'awe' (before the impenetrable), rather than love (for Him who has revealed himself), has the final word. The second element is a classical-stoic renunciation in favour of citizenship of the world; this is the inspiration behind Leonardo's speech on the endless fluidity of all human callings, classes and persons. A 'world-wide bond', so that 'everywhere is home',[73] that is the ideal, crowned quite logically by the figure of Macaria, in whom the mysticism of ancient astrology makes an unexpected resurrection of profound significance. This 'oldest of sibyls'[74] has the preternatural gift of clairvoyance: 'it was as though she could see through the mask that each of us wears to the inner nature behind'.[75] She lives in mysterious communion with the solar system, which she knows, by heart and intuitively, according to its constellations; in Plotinian-Leibnizian terms[76] a cosmic entelechy or potency, and a soul whose consciousness is not separate from the material system indwelt by her. In a dream, William sees her transformed into a star (here the poet uses the words 'glorious' and 'glory' five times),[77] and the Astronomer has calculated that she, who since her childhood wandered always around our sun, in so doing 'departing, in a spiral, even further from the centre', is circling towards the outer regions; this represents, no doubt, a Dantesque progress towards the hyper-cosmic and truly divine spheres, such as Pater Seraphicus, in Christian language, commands the blessed boys at the end of Faust:

---

[70] MV 6, 14 (VIII, 879).

[71] MA 4, 6 (VII, 244); MA 8, 7 (VII, 609).

[72] MW 2, 2 (VIII, 179).

[73] MW 3, 9 (VIII, 412–420).

[74] MW 1, 6 (VIII, 74).

[75] MW 1, 10 (VIII, 127).

Onward mount to higher circles,
Ne'er perceived your constant growth,
Thus, in pure eternal wise,
Strength God through his presence grants.
For such is the spirits' nurture Copious in freest aether;
Love eternal's revelation,
Unto bliss itself unfolding.[78]

Macaria lives 'like an angel of God on earth, for her spiritual entity, though orbiting around the sun, was moving outwards, in ever-increasing circles, towards the ultramundane'.[79] Such is the wide arc bringing Goethe back to Faust's starting-point, to the macrocosm; yet it is no magician who returns, but a human being wholly devoted to renunciation, indeed, free of self: ''Tis not the spirit-world is locked . . .'[80] Nevertheless, Macaria merely represents an already extrapolated, extreme piece of the world of William Master; as a whole, there is simply no centre, unless it were purely the movement of a life. For Master too is a shadow of Goethe's existence, a part of his autobiography, which, then, holds the true key to all his work.

[76] 'What we designate with the term 'entelechy' he [Leibniz] called monads.' C 7.3.1830 (XXIX, 399).

[77] MW 1, 10 (VIII, 134–155).

[78] F, ll. 11918–11925 (V, 520).

[79] MW 3, 15 (VIII, 482).

[80] F, l. 443 (V, 157).

Everything that delighted or tormented him Goethe felt the need 'to change into an image, a poem . . . whatever came to be known of me in this way represents mere fragments of a greater confession, and this book [Truth and Fancy] is the bold attempt to execute that task.'[81] Goethe indicates the nature of his annals in the heading 'Completing all I have told of myself'. All the myths he used or invented ultimately refer to himself; he himself is the 'Prometheus', his 'Mohammed' and his 'Ganymede', he drives in the coach of 'Postillion Chronos' (that is, Time), he is 'Faust' and 'Master', 'Werther', 'Clavigo', 'Tasso', Edward and the Major, the 'Man of fifty years' and 'Hatem', and it is he who, in the loneliness of the last years, sings the 'Elegy' of Marienbad. He had to construct a national literature out of practically nothing; Truth and Fancy describes the sparse material available. Beyond Klopstock, Lavater and Herder there was almost nothing worth while, and certainly there was no myth, so that one course only remained for Goethe: to give the essence of his own self as the point of crystallisation for an entire age; to make of himself a kind of substitute myth, in hand, at times unjust résistance (Xenien), and with one-sided aye and no, nevertheless of such universal breadth as to shelter an age which, after all, is not called the Age of Kant, or of Schiller, or of Hegel, since it can only be Age of Goethe. That is why at the beginning, and again at the end, Goethe identified himself so closely with Nature; we must consider 'with reverence a personality in which the seed of a great destiny has been shown, and which must now await the development of this conception and may not, cannot, accelerate either the good or the bad, either the happy or the unhappy times to come'.[82] And the further this destiny unfolds, the more does its bearer deem worthy to be borne, everything, even the most stray products of chance, becoming as Goethe would say mysteriously 'significant'. Unlike William Master, there is above him no 'society of the tower', and in chance he can see destiny, but in destiny the appearing glory of the guiding god himself. 'What men in their undertakings do not and cannot take into account, and whose power is most strikingly revealed just when their greatness should most appear in glory—afterwards they call it "chance"—that is none other than God, appearing directly in his omnipotence and glorifying himself through some utterly insignificant thing.'[83]

---

[81] TF 2, 7 (X, 312).

[82] EA 2, 3 (IX, 148).

In Master and elsewhere, character-formation is admittedly seen primarily as a bringing-out of innate capacities;[84] 'every capacity is important and must be developed'.[85] Indeed, 'Our wishes are presentiments of abilities latent within us, signs of what we will some time be able to do'.[86] True, this view is contradicted by Natalia;[87] but while she allows her actions to be governed by the situation rather than by disposition and inclination, still the two possibilities unite perpetually in Goethe's conception that his destiny (being that of a 'great entelechy'), is determined at once from within and from above, at once in a micro- and in a macrocosmic context.

Determined 'from within', in the sense that the fundamental experience of his youth was the ever-flowing miracle of his creative powers, which he saw well up from the same centre as the springs of Nature themselves. 'Thou dwellst with me, thou source of Nature' the Artist says in 'The Artists spring wells up from Earth',[88] while the Poet of 'The Eternal Jew' says 'For 'tis an urge, and so a duty';[89] looking back on these two, Goethe said: 'I have become accustomed to regard my innate poetic talent entirely as Nature'.[90] In Italy the same statement, now reflecting his new-found classical objectivity, is applied to all great art: the 'great works of art were at the same time sublime works of Nature, produced by men in accordance with true and natural laws. Everything arbitrary and fanciful collapses; but here necessity, God, is at work'.[91] Such is the raison d'être of Prometheus; dispensing with individual gods, even Zeus, he works in harmony with his divine Muse and destiny, creating his figures: 'The mythological point where Prometheus steps on to the stage was something I was always aware of; it had become a living idée fixe.'[92] Hence also that vital concept 'the moment' (expressing consummated time and intimated eternity), at first much less a philosophical theory than a direct experience, the spring ever welling up afresh in the innermost centre. It runs through all the youthful poems, through Master, Faust and the Divan; and even in the later years there are lines such as: [83] To Riemer, 25.11.1807 (XXII, 478).

---

[84] 'Nothing is possible without an innate gift' is the view of the Abbé in particular (MA 8, 3 (VII, 558)).

[85] MA 8, 5 (VII, 592).

[86] TF 2, 9 (X, 424).

[87] MA 8, 3 (VII, 566).

[88] IV, 227.

[89] IV, 233.

[90] TF 4, 16 (X, 735).

look . . .
The moment in the eye! And no postponement!
Go swift and meet him, eager and warm-hearted,
Be it in action, joy unto your friend.
E'er childlike, let where thou art be all,
Thus art thou all, and shalt not be o'ercome.[93]

We should not forget Goethe's inherent ability to forget and begin again, his power of constant regeneration ('Ilmenau', the beginning of Faust II after the Gretchen tragedy, etc.). He rejects the very concept of memory; 'when we have encountered something great, beautiful or momentous, it must not wait to be re-called, re-collected, so to speak, from outside; rather it must from the outset weave itself in with, become one with, our inmost being . . . in this way it will live on in us, ever forming and creating. The past we long to bring back does not exist; there is only an eternal newness'.[94] We have here the actus purus in the origin of existence, the same that inspired Faust's translation 'In the beginning was the Act', and his creator to derive the immortality of the 'entelechian monad' from a 'restless activity.[95] This act is purely procreative, in the coincidentia oppositorum, beyond good and evil ('what we call evil is but the other side of good',[96] a saying repeated many times in a watered-down form); it became for Goethe a constantly new and overpowering reality, in Eros.

---

[91] IJ 3, 6.9.1787 (XI, 434).

[92] A 1807 (XI, 821).

[93] P I, 478. And in a last addition to Years of Wandering: 'Now that they had accepted renunciation' it was among 'their strange duties . . . that when they met they might speak neither of the past nor of the future; only the present might concern them' (MW 1, 4 (VIII, 44)).

[94] To Chancellor v. Müller, 4.11.1823 (XXIII, 315).

[95] To Zelter, 19.3.1827 (XXI, 728).

Goethe's poetry draws from the quintessential vigour of Eros, and his 'May Song' testifies to his archetypal procreation. ('How splendidly doth/ Nature shine to me!/ The gleaming sun,/ The laughing meadows! . . ./ O Love, o Love!/ So golden fair,/ Like morning clouds/ On yonder heights!/ Thy blessing crowns/ The fields fresh,/ In blossom mist/ The world so rich./ O maiden, maiden/ My love for thee!/ Thy glance, thy eye!/ Thy love for me!')[97] There is, in Years of Wandering, a magical recreation of an earliest boyhood memory: William and a friend, a fisherman's son, are tumbling about by the river on a fine Pentecost day; the boys undress, bathe, and then stand there, 'dazzled by a triple sun': the sun in the sky and in the water, and the sun of the glorious human shape, 'of which I had had no conception'; 'amid fiery kisses, we swore an eternal friendship.' William-Goethe adds: 'In later life that first blossoming of the outside world came to represent pristine Nature as she truly is; thereafter, everything our senses apprehend seems no more than so many copies, lacking, however close the resemblance, the original spirit and meaning.' Without a pause he continues: 'What despair ours would be, to see the outer world so cold, so lifeless, were it not that something evolves within us to render Nature glorious in quite a different way, a creative power by virtue of which it is we who become beautiful in her'.[98] In their origin Nature and creative-transfiguring love arise inseparably: 'Amor, the landscape-painter'.[99] For Goethe, a word transfigured by love is 'glorious':

> Today, all's glorious to me; if 'twould but last!
> Today I see through Love's eye-glass.[100]

---

[96] 'On Shakespeare's day' (IV, 125).

[97] I, 52.

[98] MW 2, 11 (VIII, 292–297). Soon afterwards the beloved boy drowns.

[99] P I, 387–389.

[100] 'The Book of Suleika', D III, 369.

Out of love comes the art of poetry; rhyme, which Faust teaches Helen, is love's dialogic game,[101] invented by Behramgur for Dilaram: 'For sure 'tis Love's resplendent All.'[102] The quintessence of love the Divan calls 'spirit', and love itself is the quintessence of life:

> For Life is Love,
> And Life's life, Spirit.[103]

In the Roman Elegies the poet prays the god to grant him and everyone this alpha and omega of all the world's goods.[104] Eros is not just enjoyment; after every amorous disappointment love is still the same vital medium for experiencing the kalon and agathon of existence. Reflecting on Gretchen, on his love in Frankfurt, Goethe says: 'It seems to be Nature's will that each sex should find a tangible form of goodness and beauty in the other. Thus did the sight of this girl and my feeling for her open up a new world of beauty and excellence.'[105] The unbroken continuity between eros and agape appears in the deliberately shocking 'The God and the Dancing-girl',[106] while a letter looking back on the experience at Marienbad says: 'Meantime I have . . . enjoyed much; and according to Holy Scripture much must be forgiven me, for I have loved much'.[107] And just as Dante peopled his Venus' Heaven with women doing homage to eros while purifying themselves for agape, Goethe's Faustian heaven is filled with Magdalenes in the biblical and early Christian tradition, joined now by the Gretchen who once killed a child. It is they who lay before Mary the plea on Faust's behalf. Goethe knows and accepts that there is a price, that passion 'also means suffering' and imposes upon the coerced lover an experience of renunciation: 'To love is to suffer. Only under constraint can one enter upon it, that is, one must, one does not want to'.[108] We shall return to the question of renuncation later.

---

[101] F, ll. 9377ff. (V, 437–481).

[102] D III, 360. Not only rhyme but all poetry springs from eros. 'The words are like fans! Between the slats/ A pair of lovely eyes peeps out' (D III, 305).

[103] D III, 356; see the notes in Divan III, 456.

[104] P I, 178.

[105] TF 1, 5 (X, 189).

[106] P I, 158.

[107] To L. F. Schultz, 8.9.1828 (XXI, 563).

If the great figures we have here encountered bear but fragmentary witness to the continuity governing the Goethean 'formation' of the genius—whose essence is, since eros blossoms ever anew, a gaining and a generation of form—nevertheless this idea of formation is not just exposed to the winds; it remains embedded in an all-embracing Nature whence 'stream floods of heightened figures'.[109] 'Heightened' does not mean 'random' or 'arbitrary'; it refers to a process which constitutes the second fundamental law, as Goethe saw it, of Nature's activity. 'Tuchê, Chance', may 'dally' her way through life, 'Eros', Love from heaven, cascade down on the 'graven form', 'Anankê, Necessity', 'Elpis, Hope' stretch it; the 'law by which thou entered first' remains intact. In 'Utterances. Orphic' are most profound statements on both man and Nature;[110] Goethe, heedless of all Idealists and Romantics, draws back into their all-embracing framework; only by virtue of God's revelation in Nature can he be a human being, and only by virtue of the formed figure, he, as a human being, has received through God-Nature can he be lord of creation and, in his own way, pious. For Goethe, Nature is the proper site of glory; glory to him consists precisely in the truth that the 'graven form' displays from within itself the infinitely mysterious Idea, which idea—being the one and only[111]—always, however, remains the divine beyond all appearing phenomena. His research into Nature produced what Goethe saw as his most important work, the Theory of Colours; but there is all his other research as well—mineralogical, botanical, zoological, anatomical, meteorological—all fragments of a monstrous morphology the outlines of which he worked so stubbornly to draw. It is here that he once again stands alone, and never more lonely, against his age, experiencing not without bitterness their lack of understanding. His aim was to combine the cool precision of scientific research with a constant awareness of the totality apparent only to the eye of reverence, the poetic-religious eye, the ancient sense for the cosmos. But the scientists had gone over to his arch-enemy Newton, the Idealists preferred to deduce Nature as an a priori system, or, if they were Romantics, to feel a vague irrational feeling of the whole. Goethe was just as much a lone fighter in his age as Thomas Aquinas had been when he sought to combine exact research and intellectual work with a reverentially pious perception of the divine presence in the cosmos. For without uniting the two, there can be no attitude objective enough to do justice to existence.

---

[108] To Riemer, 11.7.1810 (XXI, 563).

[109] P I, 522.

[110] P I, 523.

[111] 'The Idea is eternal and unique; to use the plural is inappropriate' (XVII, 701).

2. THE FORM OF NATURE AND GLORY

GOD AND NATURE

Like the ancients, Goethe neither could nor would separate God's immanence from his transcendence, not least because—with the exception of poetic licence—he refused to explain the convergence of all Nature's individual entelechies in terms of a universal soul distinct from and subordinated to God. At the same time he rejected a flat pantheistic interpretation of the mystery, and so was left with the hyphenated formula 'God-Nature',[1] which, however, he expanded in careful periphrases; he could speak of the 'purity and beauty of the universe in which God reveals himself',[2] could describe Nature as an 'organ of the Divine',[3] and warn against dividing 'what God in his Nature brought forth united'.[4] Thus none can afford to reject the conception that 'at the root of the entire structure that is the world' 'there lies an Idea, whereby God may work and create in Nature, and Nature in God, in all eternity'. To this he added his lines on

[1] P I, 522, and often.

[2] 'Aphorisms on Light and Colour' (Ipsen 2, 649).

[3] XVII, 708: cf. P I, 521.

[4] XVI, 884.

'the eternal Weaver and her masterpiece'; how busily she lays the warf, 'That the eternal Master can/ So carefreely his weft cast in'.[5] Goethe, like Plato, could not be content with a plethora of ideas, no more than his Mohammed (in the first fragment of the planned drama) with a polytheistic heaven. The stars ascend in glory, and each time the glowing heart would gladly consecrate itself to the glowing object of its longing. To the sun: 'Be my lord thou my God! Allseeing, lead me. Thou too o glorious one descendest'; the heart lifts itself up to the 'Creator', the 'all-loving Thou' present in all things as love: 'Seest thou Him not? By each quiet spring, each blossoming tree, he cometh to find me in the warmth of his love. How I do thank him, for that he hath opened my breast, and taken away the hard shell that did encase my heart; now can I know of his approach.'[6] This Mohammed of his youth looks forward to the aged Goethe's Divan, in which Islam and, with yet greater sincerity, the ancient Persian creed are evoked; the religious form represented by the individual myth is superseded, for the poet, borne by the wings of Eros, looks beyond the marvel of the appearing phenomenon to the single mystery within.

It is here that Goethe likes to speak of glory; although without the ecstatic mystical ring, the sense of apotheosis, we found in Hölderlin, his lofty and solemn utterances often attain to the same sphere. In the Italian Journey the word, at least in its isolated sentence, makes a superficial if not pallid impression on the lower and middle levels; however, the dense overall usage conveys a general state of mind which the phenomena somehow through their heightened theophanous potential satisfy. So many things are 'glorious' in Italy: the climate,[7] the weather,[8] the morning,[9] the sunset,[10] the night of the full moon,[11] the clear sky,[12] a great stream in the gloaming,[13] an oak forest,[14] the sight of spring,[15] the sea,[16] the area of Campagna;[17] and Rome,[18] especially the historical city,[19] St Peter's[20] and its liturgy,[21] St Paul-outside-the-Walls,[22] Caserta,[23] Naples (time and again),[24] Capri,[25] (with great feeling) Paestum,[26] Pompeii,[27] Girgenti,[28] the view from Etna,[29] one of Raphael's pictures,[30] Michelangelo[31]—and much besides. Later, Goethe spoke of Italy as the 'glorious element of art',[32] and described how he lived there 'amid the most glorious phenomena'.[33] Often the word by itself seems not enough; while walking in Girgenti, for example, he reaches a vantage-point 'where the view . . . was still more glorious';[34] or the full moon 'lends to the evening an indescribable glory'.[35] Goethe is 'comfortably at ease in all this glory'.[36] In the difficult time that followed Italy, the word fossilised somewhat into an ornamental epithet, with the role, for example, of investing the petty-bourgeois world of Hermann and Dorothea with a

---

[5] XVI, 872–873; 'To cherish and be cherished by Nature' (P I, 509).

[6] 'Mohammed,' IV, 181–182.

[7] IJ XI, 121.

[8] Ibid. 185, 464.

[9] 126, 303, 404.

[10] 237, 345.

[11] 209, 251.

[12] 390.

[13] 492.

[14] 205.

[15] 298.

[16] 215.

[17] 200.

[18] 141.

[19] 167.

[20] 389.

[21] 170.

[22] 498.

[23] 225.

[24] 207, 241–242, 350, 385.

[25] 246.

[26] 238, later: 'Paestum is the last and, dare I say, most glorious Idea I now take north with me, intact' (352).

[27] 223.

[28] 298–299, 303.

[29] 321.

[30] 500.

[31] 158.

[32] XVI, 932.

[33] XI, 168.

[34] 299.

[35] 251.

[36] 167.

little mild shimmer. Here we find the German soil 'glorious',[37] and the wide landscape,[38] the rich acres,[39] the fields,[40] the rococo grotto where coffee is served,[41] the horses,[42] the men,[43] the maiden Dorothea,[44] Hermann's weighty words,[45] the naming of Paris as capital of the world,[46] the early days of the Revolution,[47] the two lovers,[48] their future together[49] and their hopes.[50] As for the Achilleis, in which the word occurs some twenty times, only the generally elevated tone makes it sound so sublime; it is a mechanical epithet used to lift the proceedings on to an heroic level.

How different, how much more from the heart, is its glow when it is used in the writings on natural science, or in the summary of these theories in the two programmatic poems on metamorphosis. In 'The Metamorphosis of Plants' it gains a new density through juxtaposition with the word 'holy'. His beloved need not be confused by the multitude of shapes among garden plants, behind which there lies 'a secret Law,/ A holy Riddle'. Let her consider how a plant unfolds its seed and breaks through the earth:

> Thus to delectable Light, holy and ever unresting, > Straightway entrusting the frame so frail of > burgeoning leaves.

The principle of height induces growth, such that often it 'arouses astonishment'; but then Nature slows the seed, thus to unfold 'the wonder' of the flowering on its rejuvenated stalk. 'Thus doth Nature display her finery noble and rich . . ./ Ever a marvel new . . . Yet the glory becomes the Herald of new creation,/ Aye, the colourful leaf feeleth the hand divine.' Goethe is referring to the mystery of fructification; first the necessary organs evolve, then the pairs take their places about the consecrated altar, 'and glorious scents stream forth/ Mightily fragrances sweet, and up life springs all around'. 'The letters the goddess doth print today' are everywhere there for the beloved to decipher; then she will understand the poet's invitation: 'upward doth holy Love/ Strive to the highest fruit: two that are of one mind.'[51]

---

[37] 4, l. 100 (III, 192).
[38] 4, l. 77 (III, 191).
[39] 4, l. 186 (III, 195).
[40] 4, l. 195 (III, 195).
[41] 3, l. 90 (III, 187).
[42] 4, l. 5 (III, 188).
[43] 5, l. 99 (III, 201).
[44] 5, l. 192 (III, 205); 8, l. 96 (III, 231).
[45] 5, l. 222 (III, 206).
[46] 6, l. 16 (III, 208).
[47] 6, l. 36 (III, 208).
[48] 9, l. 55 (III, 233).
[49] 6, l. 156 (III, 213).
[50] 9, l. 293 (III, 242).

In contrast, 'The Metamorphosis of Animals' is completely dedicated to the immanent natural order; it is concerned not with the εἶδος but with the μορφή, with how life takes shape under necessary and wonderful limitations. Thus we read of 'harmony', of the 'beautiful concept of power and its limits, of arbitrariness and law, freedom and restraint, and flowing order'; of 'the beauty of form' and the 'holy circle of living formulation' whose boundaries no god can extend. All these are classical concepts explicitly embracing sub-human Nature and human moral nature alike:

> No higher concept will e'er be found in the realm of > ethics,
> Nor by the man of action, the artist, or the great > ruler.

And it is man's prerogative to scale the heights of this 'highest thought' of universal Nature.[52] Here the word 'glorious' is absent, but it returns all the more insistently in the same collection 'God and the World'; in the appended verses containing the poet's reflections on Schiller's skull. With great emotion Goethe considers the law dictating that the spirit be introduced into this 'arid shell' that nobody could love, 'however glorious the essence it preserved'; but Goethe, so adept at reading the forms of life, can decipher the writing of this skull. 'The holy meaning did not speak to all'; he, however, was able to pick out among the common crowd of skulls 'a figure priceless, glorious'.[53] But this 'noble essence' and 'holy meaning' can never seek to exist outside the circle of 'Nature', as Goethe understands this; 'Is not Nature's essence/ In the hearts of men?'[54] Haller is called a philistine for maintaining that 'no created spirit/ In Nature's heart can see';[55] for who would be interested in the mere shell if the essence remained beyond all reach? For it is Goethe's 'ancient belief' 'that Nature has no secret she does not somewhere bring naked before the eyes of the alert observer'.[56] This is the truth without which one will never reach 'that glorious period' of life in which 'everything within our understanding comes to seem unworthy and foolish'; 'glorious' because it represents 'a point half-way between desperation and deification', as Montan says in Years of Wandering.[57] His explanation: 'Letters are no doubt a fine thing, but in vain do we seek in them the notes; notes we need, but from them we shall never hear the true meaning . . . Nature has but one script, and all the scrawl we meet is so much useless lumber.'[58] Plotinus would agree; the mystery is plain and open because it is a true mystery.

---

[51] P I, 203–206.

[52] P I, 519–521.

A COSMIC ALPHABET

Schiller, when he first met Goethe, made a comment that left him perplexed and also annoyed; his 'original plant' was 'not real but ideal'. To which Goethe replied: 'That is what I like to hear; I not only have ideal forms in my head without knowing it, I can actually see them.'[59] He had to struggle hard to win this power of seeing, through unremitting observation, experimentation, induction, and provisional 'empirical laws' serving as hypotheses; and if a case contradicted the law, the whole perspective would have to be shifted on to a higher level.[60] Goethe saw clearly that such a method took him into a sphere beyond empiricism and Kantian idealism, and Heinroth's comment that his thinking was 'totally engaged in the realm of objects' found a grateful ear ('A single intelligent sentence can be so much help').[61] Tongue slightly in cheek, he enlisted the authority of Kant's intellectus archetypus: 'We, through the observation of an ever creating Nature, made ourselves worthy of spiritual participation in her products'.[62] Goethe cannot be seen as a naive objectivist; 'Nature' is implicitly understood as the mutual reciprocity and indwelling of subject and object: 'All that is in the subject is in the object, and something more besides; all that is in the object is in the subject, and something more besides.'[63] That holds particularly true in the aesthetic theory: 'The Law that comes before our eyes, in complete freedom, under its own unique conditions, brings forth the beauty of objects; there must then be found worthy subjects, able to apprehend it'.[64] A similar structure of identity-in-tension is postulated for the relationship between the sensual and the spiritual spheres; Goethe had no time for 'lower and higher powers of the soul'. 'In the human spirit as in the cosmos nothing is higher or lower, for everything demands equal rights from a common mid-point that itself can only manifest its secret existence through the harmony existing between the parts and itself.'[65] Both dualisms are already implied for him in the concept of (appearing) reality (the appearance of God in his world), in the essential Pythagorean-Plotinian tradition; and here we meet a whole list of dualities with echoes in the history of ideas: 'We and the objects [Aristotle], light and darkness [Mani], body and soul [Plato], two souls [Paul, Faust], spirit and matter [Descartes], God and the world [Plotinus, Goethe], thought and extension [Spinoza], ideal and real [Schelling], sense and reason [Kant], imagination and intellect [Jean Paul], existence and yearning [Fichte]'.[66] To sum up: 'Reality and division are synonymous.'[67] This fundamental structure, which Goethe terms 'polarity', for once permits him to venture into the Idealistic camp; he was able, much to the philosopher's astonishment, to make a precise summary of Fichte's system[68] and to translate his own ideas on to that plane (after all, Fichte's 'I' with its various destinies is not far removed from Faust).

---

[53] P I, 522.
[54] P I, 529.
[55] P I, 529.
[56] A XI, 626.
[57] M W 1, 3 (VIII, 38–39).
[58] Ibid. 40.
[59] XII, 622.

---

[60] 'Experience and Science', XVI, 859–871.

[61] XVI, 879f.

[62] 'Perception and the faculty of Judgment', XVI, 877–879.

[63] XVII, 774.

[64] XVII, 703–704.

[65] XVI, 884.

The theory of colours is absolutely within the Plotinian tradition. The premise here is the identity-in-tension of objective and subjective light (the receiving organ is the 'sun-like' eye). 'Thus the eye evolves by virtue and on behalf of light, that the inner light may meet the outer.' In support he quotes the Ancient Greek saying: 'Like is known only by like.'[69] Thus colour is 'an elementary natural phenomenon' that, operating within the analogical area of tension holding object and subject, is characterised by continual transitions; in the three fields—subjective, subjective-objective and objective—it behaves respectively as 'physiological', 'physical' and 'chemical' colour. Here it is decisive, firstly that this analogical context provides the arena for everything that happens in the world around us (any sweeping statement that the senses are deceptive is therefore nonsense: 'So in the senses put your trust,/ And never shalt thou see awry,/ If awake thy mind thee keep').[70] Secondly, this complete openness is due as much to the highest objective natural phenomenon, light, as to the eye, and Goethe even accords priority to the objective phenomenon. (Admonishing Schopenhauer: 'What! Light is only there inasmuch as you see it? No! You would not be there if the light did not see you!')[71] Light, being thus identified with the manifestness of existence, represents the highest thing in Nature; this implies, in its proper sphere beside horizontal polarity, the dimensionally complementary second principle of all reality: the principle of height. Colour as such arises out of the primary polarity of light and darkness; light on a dark background (the sun-lit air before the darkness of space) produces blue, and darkness before light produces yellow (the sunset). Yellow and blue in horizontal polarity produce green, but when each is in its heightened form (as orange and violet respectively) they converge into the highest phenomenon in the spectrum, 'which, on account of its high worth, we have often called purple.[72] The resulting closed ring of colours is a most welcome confirmation of the classical theory of the world and of art, that finitude and perfection belong together; it is, in fact, three-dimensional, being at once qualitatively structured, horizontal and vertical. And this upward progression (to red) is in itself highly mysterious, for 'in its light state the colour is also a dark one [because it only originates through the 'sombre' medium]; if it is made denser it will become darker, at the same time acquiring a shimmer we designate with the word "reddish"'.[73] Thus to darken is to intensify and must, in a new sense, become illuminating.

---

[66] 'Polarity', XVI, 863.

[67] XVII, 700.

[68] Cf. also the scheme XVI, 917f., and comment by A. Speiser, ibid. 937–938.

[69] TC, Introduction, XVI, 20.

[70] P I, 515.

[71] XXII, 741.

The Newtonian theory of colours, whose bitter adversary Goethe was, cannot cope with such ideas. Instead, colour is treated as a random 'phenomenon' scientifically demonstrable in, i.e. reducible to, numbers. But 'measurements, numbers and signs do not constitute a phenomenon'.[74] 'Mechanical formulae . . . have an element of crudeness. They transform the living into the dead', even if 'in many cases they can be conveniently and successfully applied'.[75] They cannot express the qualitative distinction between the whole and its parts, in a word, the 'shape' (which is the key factor). Mechanistic thinkers are consequently also quite blind to the fact that the eye, in contemplating a secondary or tertiary colour, never loses the totality of the relevant colour, itself supplying the complementary components; this explains, makes possible, the art of painting in its own realm beyond Nature.[76] Goethe appreciates and indeed shows great interest in the methodical exactness of physiology;[77] he can see, and think of, an organism in terms of its functions as well as its shape, precisely in the unfolding of the original plant, that 'ideal form'. A function cannot, however, be isolated from its totality, and an awareness of the whole, the overall unity—that is, a philosophical or artistic awareness—is needed for the ('exact') comprehension of the object as it really is. Only by using such integration can so-called scientific exactitude really be anything like exact. Complete exactitude is impossible, since no original phenomenon can as such be explained; why is yellow yellow, or blue blue? whence this original 'decision' ('The evolution of a colour is its original decision')?[78] Hence Goethe's consistent liking for the word 'decisive' (colours, for example, in combination 'produce a partially harmonious, partially characteristic, often discordant, but always decisive and powerful effect').[79] Natural beings and objective forms are always taking objective decisions. And even accepting the plant kingdom as an unforeseeable series of variations upon an original ideal form, this would never ultimately be mechanical. Instead, it would consist of monitored 'dictums' to all of which, by virtue of analogy, the 'Utterances. Orphic' correspond.

---

[72] TC 703 (XVI, 189).

[73] TC 699 (XVI, 189).

[74] Ipsen II, 678.

[75] TC 732 (XVI, 203–204).

Consequently all language, not least the conceptual language of philosophy, remains 'in fact purely symbolic'.[80]

---

[76] TC Intro., XVI, 20.

[77] 'It is absorbing to speculate whether one might gain insight into that organic-chemical operation in life whereby the metamorphosis of plants takes place subject to a single law, but in all kinds of ways', Goethe wrote, shortly before his death, to the chemist W. F. Wakkenroder, 21.1.1832 (XXI, 1029). Astonishment at the wonders of life and acknowledgment of the 'Unfathomable' are marvellously balanced with the necessity of scientific research throughout this letter; for 'if he is truly determined man cannot desist from his attempts to corner the Unfathomable, not until he is finally satisfied and admits defeat'.

[78] TC 695 (XVI, 188).

[79] Ibid. 758 (XVI, 206).

[80] TC 751 (XVI, 203).

And even philosophy is a secondary phenomenon in comparison with poetry (for poetry is the original language of mankind, 'until finally that one and only true poetry, of the very beginning, disappears almost completely. At the beginning the philosopher is always a kind of poet').[81] He who seeks to understand the world should begin not by constructing, but by observing.[82] In so far as science adopts a mathematical exactitude, however, it becomes 'dependent upon quantitative factors . . . and so, to a certain extent, upon the external features of the world. But if we consider the world with all the spirit and powers at our command, we see that the two poles of reality as we know it must be quantity and quality. This fact leads the mathematician to drive his formulaic language to its extremest limits, to see if he can grasp the unmeasurable element in his measureable and calculable world. He can now see everything as tangible, comprehensible and mechanical, and in this he comes under the suspicion of a secret atheism. For he now believes he can also understand that most unmeasurable of all things, which we call God, and whose particular or pre-eminent nature he appears willing to abandon.'[83] Such a position thus involves not only a complete reduction of the principle (equivalent to 'height' or 'analogy') of quality within the world; the relationship between the world and God, the analogical foundation of all being, is also reduced to nothing. In this fight-back against the despotic tendencies of scientific method, Goethe was also fighting for the true cosmos and for God; for these stand or fall together.

Such is the quantitive-qualitative nature of the world of colour. But there is a further, or rather higher,[84] realm of a similar structure, that of music. While the two cannot directly be compared, they can 'be seen in terms of a higher formula'.[85] If it were not for the highly formalised and subjectivised nature of modern music,[86] Goethe's conception of a subjective-objective musical totality would not be far removed from the ancient and mediaeval conception: a cosmic harmony of human dimensions uniting spirit and senses. In the story Novelle the myth of Orpheus is in the background: one of the characters, Honorio, is passionately in love. When there is a fire at the local circus and a tiger escapes, he can only think of shooting it; meanwhile the showman's boy is leading the lion home, entranced as it is by his flute. 'In the Lion's Den Daniel had no fear; he remained firm and undismayed, and the wild roaring could not interrupt his pious singing.'[87] The 'child in its transfiguration' was 'like a mighty conqueror in the hour of his victory'; but Honorio is told 'First overcome yourself'. But in the peace of the song that follows the discord, the strains of Orpheus pass into Christian tones: [81] 'The Epochs of the Sciences' (draft for TC), XVII, 762.

---

[82] XVI, 878.

[83] XVII, 769.

[84] 'The effects of sound must almost be placed above all else. Were not language indisputably the highest form we have, I would place . . . music even higher.' He goes on to justify the priority of notes over colours (XVI, 862).

> The Eternal rules on earth . . .
> Faith and hope, they are fulfilled;
> Wondrous power hath the love
> That in prayer is unveiled.[88]

CLASSICISM

If in his natural philosophy proper the forms of nature have been freely associated with the religious mystery, we find that the humanistic approach of Goethe's theory of art tends rather to confine all such elements within a definite compartment; this is especially so in the middle, high classical period. In formal structure, this theory of art remains completely within the context familiar since the Renaissance, but with an unmistakable tendency to stress man's independence; he is the middle and apex to which Nature relates. 'The highest purpose of art is to show the human form in all the sensual grandeur and beauty it can.'[89] 'We know of no world save in relation to man; we want no art save that which reproduces this relation.'[90] As far as their depiction of the gods is concerned, Goethe treats the Greeks, normally so canonical in respect to art, as though their religion itself were merely aesthetic, its setting purely immanent.[91] In the essay 'Elementary Imitation of Nature, Manner, Style' these three artistic forms are presented as a hierarchy: 'elementary imitation' presupposes an initial insight into the essence of the object to be reproduced, 'manner' (as the personal 'handwriting') requires a deeper insight, while 'style' is based on 'the deepest fundaments of perception, indeed, on the very essence of things, in so far as we may perceive it in visible and tangible shapes'.[92] This 'essence' is clearly the entelechy, in other words, the Aristotelian morphê at the world's heart.

---

[85] TC 748 (XVI, 202).
[86] TC 750 (XVI, 203).
[87] IX, 451.
[88] IX, 452.

When Goethe occasionally speaks of the 'ideal form', partly identifying and partly contrasting it with Nature, he is assuming the linguistic garb of the Renaissance, Baroque and Enlightenment as well as Idealism; but what he means is simply the entelechy, invisible as such, but present in shapes and movements. Beginning with the Renaissance, a struggle had raged over the 'Idea'; there had been the Aristotelian interpretation, in favour of an activity of the artist's mind, a process of selection seeking out the most beautiful features (so Leonardo, Alberti); and the Platonic interpretation: sparks of inspiration from the divinity irradiating the artist's spirit. This was the view of Ficino,[93] whom within the space of a hundred years the Manneristic era had elevated into the leading theoretician, indeed the metaphysician, of art, and we find similar variations in Zuccari, Lomazzo, Ripa, Scannelli and Bellori, some of whom feature in Italian Journey.[94] There have been (in ancient thought as well) many positions compromising between the objective and subjective Idea. We have seen how Goethe locates the colours in the area of tension between the poles. Similarly, the subjective Idea can be innate or a god-given inspiration, or it can be won from the intuitively grasped 'true' intention of Nature. The formulation we may call classical, or at least canonical for Classicism, is that of GIAN PIETRO BELLORI, from his programmatic speech to the Academy (1664), 'The Idea of the Painter . . . a refinement of natural beauties superior to Nature'. In the starry world God's ideas find a pure realisation; in the earthly world—and especially in mankind—often, because the material is not sufficiently well ordered, the reflection is turbid. The artist must seek to imitate the highest Artist; he must always bear in himself an image of the highest beauty, which will guide him in his search to restore to Nature her true and pure essence, her Idea.[95] Thus Nature and art were conceived of as mutually dependent in the recreation of the Idea; never have Aristotle and Plato co-operated better. Also, the religious, almost priestly and prophetic, status adhering to the artist since the times of Petrarch and Boccaccio was reaffirmed; his role, according to Zuccari, was to bring to light man's true likeness to God and unveil the paradisiac nature of the world. No doubt Rubens, Poussin, Claude Lorrain and the other great artists Goethe loved had just such a programme.

---

[89] Writings on Art, XIII, 71.

[90] XIII, 332.

[91] 'Winckelmann and his century': While the moderns went vainly off at tangents into the infinite, 'the Ancients had an intuitive sense for, felt uniquely at ease in, the physical limitations of their fair world' (on the ancient world). They had an 'admiration for the gods merely as works of art, as it were' (on the pagans), XIII, 417, 419.

[92] XIII, 66–71.

[93] Ficino had spoken of 'innate formulae idearum' that flash suddenly like sparks in the spirit, awakening the memory of when the gods were visible; this conception gained ground in the aesthetic philosophy of the Baroque, with its Platonic influences. The Renaissance artists thought primarily in psychological-empirical terms; the Idea preceding creative activity, or plan (disegno interno), being related to the role of the eye, its search for an object's

Poussin had very close contact with Bellori and adopted the latter's theory of beauty, but added a strong neo-Platonic essence (the Idea is therefore present in the object). This is Raphael's view in the letter to Castiglione (1516), and also that of Vasari (who identifies the Idea with the artist's power of visualisation). The later classical-baroque aesthetic philosophy unites the two directions. Erwin Panofsky, Idea: Ein Beitrag zur Begriffsgeschichte der ältern Kunsttheorie (Teubner, 1924).

---

[94] IJ 3, Nov. 1787; Lomazzo and Bellori (admiranda Romae) are mentioned (XI, 483).

[95] Panofsky 59; text of Bellori's speech, 130–138.

accent. Bellori, the antiquarian and art theorist, became the decisive influence on Winckelmann, who enlists his authority; but the German too is more exposed to the light of neo-Platonism.[96]

On a theoretical level WINCKELMANN, that canonical figure of the Age of Goethe, was responsible for very little that was new, even 'Noble Simplicity and Quiet Greatness' being an old topic.[97] He speaks freely of imitation of Nature ('naturalism') as distinct from the higher stage of 'ideal beauty', but envisaging a perfect synthesis, such as the Greeks were able to achieve partly through a unique natural gift, but partly by their own efforts. Greece represents the very marriage of ideal and reality, and the swiftest way to true imitation of Nature is by imitation of the Greeks. 'The sensual beauty provided the fairness of Nature, and the ideal beauty those sublime features; from the former the artist took the human, and from the latter the divine, aspect of his depiction.'[98] When this synthesis is called a 'noble simplicity', 'simplicity' means, in the Plotinian sense, uni-formity (the 'state of unity'),[99] indicating 'the soul's true [namely, metaphysical] character', which is expressed physically in the 'state of rest'; while 'noble' means that the soul's natural-ethical state corresponds to its 'uni-form' essence, 'quiet' (like 'rest') expresing the external correspondence to this nobility. Consequently Winckelmann, like Plotinus, insisted that 'beauty, properly speaking, is not a matter of numbers and measurements'; you might know these, but if Heaven has given you no feeling for it you will never perceive the beauty in them. For 'beauty consists in multiplicity within simplicity; this is the wise men's stone which the artists must seek, and which few find.'[100] Winckelmann, however, went on to find the signs of this 'simplicity' in constant new examples of significant posture, gestures and situations (as Goethe later put it), and demanded an ultimate catalogue of sujets, spoke of 'allegories' and 'independent thinking'. The Weimar art-lovers did indeed expend much effort in finding such sujets, some of which became subjects for essay competitions. All labour lost, of course; in fact, it was not long before all Goethe's plans in this regard collapsed into complete failure. But the pure humanism of his programme did come from Winckelmann; for the latter had already been convinced that 'the highest object of art for thinking men is man'.[101]

---

[96] References, ibid. 117f.

[97] Wolfgang Stammler, Edle Einfalt: Zur Geschichte eines kunsttheoretischen Topos. In Worte und Werte: Festschrift für Bruno Markwardt (Berlin, 1961).

[98] Joh. Winckelmanns sämtliche Werke, ed. J. Eiselein (1825), I, 19.

[99] I, 33.

[100] I, 207.

And yet, in his conversations with KARL PHILIPP MORITZ in Rome, Goethe had envisaged a broader metaphysical horizon for art; the subsequent piece by Moritz, 'On the formative Imitation of beauty' (1788), is discussed by Goethe,[102] and large extracts appear at the end of Italian Journey. The essay begins with a grand principle: 'the horizon of creative power in the forming genius must be as wide as Nature herself; that is, the organisation must be so finely woven, must offer the copious floods of Nature so infinitely many points of contact, that the uttermost ends, as it were, of all the elements of Nature find space within this miniature vessel, and need not jostle one another'.[103] In other words, the microcosm of the genius must, so far as possible, be co-extensive with the macrocosm; that is potentially Plotinian, but also accords with Bruno, Shaftesbury, Herder and the young Goethe himself (Faust, 'Prometheus'). Such an horizon is beyond the reach of thought, imagination, the senses; the genius depends on 'creative power' to capture the totality in a single focal point, to choose an object 'to which he may impart a reflection of that highest Beauty whose mirror his powers are', 'and for which this smaller scale is rejuvenation'.[104] Then comes the strict Plotinian doctrine also, however, prevalent in the cult of the genius: 'The living concept of the formative imitation of Beauty can only be found in the feeling of creative power as the work is being produced, in the first moment of its genesis'. Only in the moment of birth, when the chaos becomes shape, is beauty genuinely there; the process over, only a shadow remains. Thought, imagination (taste) and the senses by their nature seek always the beauty above them, but can never capture it; hence it appears as the abysmal, glorious and sublime. 'Confronted by Beauty, the power of thought can no longer ask why it is so; but that is the sign of beauty . . . There are no terms in which to speak of true Beauty, save as the very essence of all the harmonious elements comprising Nature's great Whole, which no power of thought can capture. Each of the myriad fragments of beauty we find in Nature is only beautiful in so far as it partakes, to whatever extent, of this essence of all the elements comprising that great Whole.' Thus beauty is something not to be understood, but to be produced. There is also the possibility of an empathy, taste, for the original totality by virtue of which the pleasure of creation can be compensated for by that of contemplation. However, Moritz and Goethe sound a double warning. Taste is not the same as creative power, so let there be no confusion or deception over this; and the genius who works with pleasure in mind will surely fail, for 'the slightest trace of self-interest must be erased'.[105] Beauty has no purpose; 'its sure reward is in itself'. Beyond this, the creative microcosm is not identical with the macrocosm; the greater whole is only interwoven with our being, and constantly searching 'to spread back out in all directions', as it must, by a law that governs the entire natural hierarchy. Thus plants, being amid matter, seek to draw it up into themselves, and so do animals; as for man, he 'develops, grows, enjoys, in the process transforming flora and fauna alike into his inner being. In fact, everything subordinate to his own organisation he absorbs . . . into his existence . . . and then returns it, but with a new beauty, to the outside world'.[106] Such transcendental aesthetic conceptions, despite their impression of modernity, are thoroughly classical. Two sentences form the climax: 'The organisation of Nature in her entirety would be our highest Beauty, could we for one moment (ἐξαίφνης) comprehend it. Each fair work of art is in its unity a miniature copy of that highest Beauty in the entirety of Nature.'[107]

---

[101] I, 207; cf. Italian Journey: 'The Alpha and Omega of all the things we know: the human figure' (IJ 3 (XI, 425)).

[102] XIII, 71–75.

[103] IJ 3 (XI, 588).

[104] XIII, 73 (XI, 589).

---

[105] XI, 590–593.
[106] XI, 596.

This synthesis, never in fact attained, was to be the summit, the non plus ultra, of Goethe's speculation; and towards the end of his life he became decidedly antipathetic towards such intellectual paths: 'I find nothing more hollow and fatal than aesthetic theories.'[108] Yet the synthesis represents a daring combination of the classical with the modern-Promethean outlook, of Plotinus with Bruno, of true transcendental glory with immanent sublimity (or, to use Moritz's word, 'majesty'). We cannot quite see how it is stitched together: how macro- and microcosm relate to one another. The genius is not the totality, yet creates from within it. Their relationship is like a brotherly intimacy; there is no place in it for an act of worship. Thus Goethe's aesthetic philosophy, even after the Italian rupture, is still clearly anthropocentric, in contrast to that of Hölderlin and indeed to the much less inhibited piety of the writings on natural science. An important reason for his dislike of Romanticism was the Romantic Belief that artistic ability could be replaced or at least invigorated, by religious feeling.[109] According to Bellori's theory, the glory of art resided in its power to assemble the supreme but transitory moments of existence, and confer upon them a kind of eternity. Winckelmann's essay has a similar conception: 'The ultimate product of the ascent of Nature is the beauty of man. Now it is indeed a rare achievement of hers; too many conditions obstruct her Ideas [!], and even she, omnipotent [!] as she is, cannot remain long on this level of perfection, nor bestow lastingness on the Beauty she has brought forth. For, to be truthful, human beauty has but a moment's life. But here Art makes her entrance; for even as man finds himself on the summit of

---

[107] XIII, 73.

[108] To v. Müller, 1.5.1826 (XXIII, 429).

[109] 'Final Exhibition of Art', 1805: 'Such an artist relies on moral value, which is supposed to compensate for artistic weakness. They seek to express an intuition of the highest moral value through art, ignoring that such a value has only one possible incarnation: in the highest form of sensuality' (XIII, 456).

Nature, he sees that he has now become himself an entirety of Nature, bound to bring forth just such a summit within itself.' Thereupon bringing 'selection, order, harmony and meaning' into the cosmos, he 'finally rises to the production of a work of art' into which 'passes all that is glorious, admirable, and delightful; such that, as life is breathed into the human form, man is lifted above himself, the circle of his life and deeds is sealed off [!], and he is deified for a present that contains past and future . . . The god [i.e. Pheidias's Zeus] had become man that man might be raised to his godhead'.[110] In the face of this Weimar gospel, any questions as to the nature of the Idea become secondary. It may be said that his contemplation of ancient sculpture led Winckelmann to a perception of 'glory in fulfilment, the Idea';[111] thus, in the essay 'Myron's Cow', it is demanded that the highest truth be sought not through slavish imitation, but through a constant awareness of the Idea.[112] We are left with a dialectical conception of experience that embraces elements ranging from empiricism through Aristotle to Plato. 'When artists speak of Nature they always, without fully knowing it, mean the Idea. It is the same with all who extol experience alone, not reflecting that experience is but the half of experience.'[113] 'Nature and Idea may not be divided without destroying both art and life.'[114]

3. GLORY AS REFLECTION
BEING AND CELEBRATION

Thus far we have considered Goethe's view of the world in terms of its 'essence', and as a manifesto addressed to his own age in favour of the classical age, in its post-Christian resurrected form. Let us finally attempt to describe its inner dimensions, its private character; for here our historical account may find its most conclusive and revealing material.

---

[110] XIII, 421–422. Cf. 'Myron's Cow': 'The Greek conception and endeavour is to deify man, not to humanise the deity. Here is no theomorphism, no anthropomorphism!'

[111] XIII, 441.

[112] XIII, 645.

[113] XIII, 332.

[114] XIII, 331.

Even the vitality that characterised the ancient world is not to be compared with the Renaissance and Baroque experience. Existence then was a celebration, and this uplifted mood found expression in the trionfo;[1] indeed, in every great work a triumphal element was sought and celebrated.[2] Admittedly, in the Baroque culture this emotive potential was channelled into specific forms, partly mythological or mystical, partly appertaining to court life. In Goethe, however, it does not so much reappear as erupt, with a new and stark power. In later years we find him absorbed in study of 'The Triumph of Julius Caesar', a painting by Mantegna known to many through Andreani's sequence of wood-cuts. A fascinating account of his reactions begins like this: 'Trumpets and horns, a declaration of war, musicians with puffed-out cheeks. Next, throngs of soldiers, their legionary ensigns, standards, lucky signs held aloft on poles. The busts of Roma in the van; then Juno, bestower of victory, her peacock in relief, goddesses of plenty with cornucopia and baskets of flowers, swaying over streaming pennants and floating banners. In their midst, torch-pans, flaming and smoking in the air, in honour of the elements, to stir all the senses . . . .'[3] Thus begins the 'extravagant triumphal procession'; then follow the captured gods, the booty, elephants, arms, captive women and children, mockers, musicians, Caesar himself in the tumult, and last of all, the academics, among whom Goethe is amused to discover Gottsched, and, he thinks, a certain professor of dialectical philosophy. He is impressed above all by the all-but impossible unification of classical greatness and realistic characterisation achieved by Mantegna's art; on the one hand, the 'noble spirit', but informed by 'Nature in all her primal force'. It is true Goethean festivity.

Such trionfi are high-points in Goethe's life and work. It all began with the jolly, crazy hubbub of the humble fairs at

---

[1] W. Weisbach, Trionfi (Berlin, 1969).

[2] André Chastel, Art et Humanisme à Florence (1959), 485–521.

[3] XIII, 924.

Frankfurt; here were born both Faust (out of the puppet-play) and the Master's Theatrical Vocation, in initial sketches rough as wood-carvings. 'A Fair at Plundersweilern',[4] 'Shrove-tide Carnival, also to be acted after Easter',[5] 'Merry Andrew's Marriage, or, The Way of the World';[6] here, everything is much and yet nothing; just so the 'eternal Jew' would see the history of mankind. In another plan of 1801, for a 'far-reaching project' provisionally entitled 'A Stay in Pyrmont' (a spa),[7] the revels were not to obscure the essential idea; set in the sixteenth century, the novel was to present 'the hustle and bustle' of throngs of people ravaged by infirmities of body and soul; 'the Inscrutable and Holy' would 'contrast attractively' with the atmosphere of the fair. 'Thus arises, amid the tumult of the world, a City of God, about whose invisible walls the rabble, as rabbles must, roars and rages'; a strange fresco which, though never executed, tells us, even from its outlines, much about Goethe.

But now let us move on to the great festivals of real life. After the 'unbelievable chaos'[8] of the busy market-days, we come to the grand celebration marking the coronation, in Frankfurt in 1765, of Emperor Joseph II. For the youthful Goethe it was a grand delight, and later, how the old gentleman enjoyed conjuring up that scene again; 'a never-ending procession of glory'[9] (but ending on an uncanny note, with the youth overtaken by a disastrous episode). What is unusual for Goethe is that this festival becomes a metaphysical experience, of which he provides an exact account: 'Ceremonies of political and religious import exercise an infinite fascination. We see before our eyes the earthly majesty, surrounded by all the symbols of its might; but then it bows before the might of Heaven, and we realise that the two exist together. For the individual too can sense his closeness to the Divine only in abject worship.'[10]

[4] IV, 160f.
[5] IV, 171f.
[6] IV, 247f.
[7] XII, 627–629.
[8] TF I, 1 (X, 28).
[9] TF I, 5 (X, 220).
[10] TF I, 5 (X, 222).

The elevating contributions Goethe made to court occasions received something akin to this religious gleam, if rather paler. There were presentation speeches to dignitaries (often highly rhetorical, in the Baroque style),[11] pageants for the stage,[12] and masked processions[13] (a genre which then passes directly into Faust). In contrast to the court occasion, the monstrous parade of the 'Roman Carnival' seemed like a kind of cosmic 'saturnalia'; and rarely did Goethe's heart beat so in time as to this mighty piece of prose.[14] The Carnival is a festival 'the people gives itself': hectic, ecstatic, breathless, dangerous, proceeding only along the long, narrow, overcrowded Corso, which 'reminds us of the roads of Life itself, where everyone, actor or onlooker, masked or unmasked, from balcony or platform, can see but little space before and beside him, and in coach or on foot advances only little by little, not so much walking as being pushed, and held up rather than stopping'. And thus 'the intensest and highest pleasures, like fleeting horses, are there for a moment, touch us, and are gone, leaving scarce a trace in the soul; thus freedom and equality can be enjoyed only in the giddy swirl of madness; and the highest pleasure becomes its most alluring only when it draws very close to danger, and gives itself up lasciviously to sweetly-fearful feelings.'[15]

In the summer of 1814, Goethe, now sixty-five, witnessed a Catholic festival, the Feast of St Roch[16] in the church above Bingen, a pilgrimage laid waste in the war and recently rebuilt. We share in the joyful anticipation at Rüdesheim; the cannonades resound, and the night is clear under a 'heaven burning with stars' as they start the ascent. 'And now the tumult seizes us!'—a confusion of spiritual and worldly, a divine service and stalls selling rolls, muffins, ginger-nuts; and onward draw the faithful holding their statues, standards, canopies, all of a sudden a brief and cruel fox-hunt shoots through the middle, then there is the welcome smell of freshly-fried sausages, and more than ten thousand people are there feasting and drinking, and quarrelling about which is the village with the best wine; between times there is the pretty legend of St Roch, and a beautiful sermon on him to conclude. In this last the words tremor with the emotion and and agreement of the aged Goethe; they speak of a limitless surrender to God's will, easing a neighbour's burden, even when this is dangerous, without looking for earthly reward, for 'the span of Time is too short for boundless reward'.[17] All is embedded in a wonderful, radiant landscape, with ample time to look around during te sermon in the open; he already had the geologist's hammer out as they all went up the hill. A communal celebration in a Christian landscape.

---

[11] Thus 'To a noble Lady on a journey', (P I, 367), and the poems to Empress Maria Ludowika of Austria (in Carlsbad, 1810): P II, 257, 259, 260, 263.

[12] III, 569f. The open-air 'Celebrations in honour of Louisa' should also be mentioned; Goethe's description, XII, 610–617.

[13] III, 681f.

[14] XI, 533–567 (from 1789 onwards, often published separately, but later added to Italian Journey).

[15] XI, 566–567.

[16] 'By the Rhine, Main and Neckar', XII, 469–497.

All these festivals find their climax in Faust, in which the hero is led through three grand celebrations (or four, counting his marriage with Helen), each very different. First come the demonic revels of the 'First Walpurgis Night', then the celebrations at the Imperial Court, and last the classical-cosmic universal feast, 'The Classical Walpurgis Night'. The devils' revelry (written in 1800–1801) is built on the massive foundations of a grandiose landscape, rugged, chaotic. On they go up the Blocksberg, and the looming mountain plays host to the witches and their grotesque goings-on. But just as we see the bloody phantom of Gretchen, and a climax seems imminent, the action breaks off, and we finish with something quite out of place: the elf-play 'The Golden Wedding of Oberon and Titania' (explicitly called an 'intermezzo'). In contrast, the 'Emperor's Masked Ball', which closely resembles a blown-up Weimar masquerade, dallies and trifles its way through over nine hundred lines[18] of masked allegory. Faust's 'Boy Guide', symbolising poetry, only has to snap his fingers, and little flames dart all over the place; but suddenly the Emperor's false beard catches fire, and his disguise—Great Pan—goes up in flames. But the Emperor is fascinated by this harmless show, while the more serious magic involving the paper-money fails to satisfy him. He now wants to see Helen and Paris. Faust, having duly conjured them up, falls in love with the ghost: 'liking, love, worship, madness'.[19] Thereupon, in the next act, he is led into the vast phantasmagoria of 'The Classical Walpurgis Night', throughout which he seeks for Helen. We lose him from sight in the illusive twists and turns that become increasingly independent, reaching a climax in a universal feast of the elements, and issuing forth into a song of praise to cosmic Eros, a kind of symphonic orchestration of Pausanias's speech in the Symposium: 'And everywhere Fire doth overrun,/ So let Eros reign, by whom all was begun!'[20] It is as though the conclusions of the second, third and fifth acts of Faust II were in competition to see which can enact the highest celebration of Being. It we may call the solutions of the second and fifth acts Eros and Agape respectively, that of the third act is Dionysus. For after Faust's marriage with Helen and Euphorion's death fall, followed by his mother's return to the depths whence she came, the classical Chorus, singing a bacchic hymn, dissolves back into the elements; fluttering away into the breezes, running away into the streams, passing into the vines, where they too will be plundered when the wine-harvest comes, and offered up to the drunken, riotous god.

---

[17] XII, 495.

[18] Over 900 lines (5065–5986), V, 304–331.

SEMI-REALITY

These three conclusions from Faust show with particular force that whenever Goethe most elevates the value of beauty, a shading of reality becomes necessary. Now Goethe was none the less convinced that the world's highest truth is its revealed beauty; indeed, in Italy the contemplation of beauty became the path to personal truth. 'I am now living here in a peace and clarity which I had forgotten were possible. My attempt to train myself in seeing and understanding things just as they are, my determination to keep a lucid eye, my complete rejection of all pretention . . .; I am quietly becoming extremely happy.'[21] In the Sistine: 'I could only look and marvel.'[22] So sublime is his experience that it seems even to demand theological language: 'The gleam of the greatest works of art no longer dazzles me; now I can wander in contemplation, in true critical understanding . . . I have no words to express the quiet and wakeful bliss with which I am now beginning to look at works of art.'[23] It is a 'rebirth',[24] a 'self-construction from within':[25] 'I am growing from within.'[26] And this is also an encounter with God, and therefore certain truth. The 'great works of art were at the same time sublime works of Nature, produced by men in accordance with true and natural laws. Everything arbitrary and fanciful collapses; but here Necessity, God, is at work'.[27] Nor is this power something to be comprehended, for it is an 'infinite, inscrutable Presence'; however we may 'separate, distinguish, order', 'in the end we return to contemplation, enjoyment, admiration'.[28] 'How infinite the world can become; we need only abide by finite things.'[29] It is, once again, the 'holy-open mystery', that of the form which 'ultimately comprehends all'.[30] Nevertheless, what Goethe so admires is only an immanent transcendence which has been alienated from its true transcendent origin and use. Long before, Goethe had entered the 'sanctuary' of the Dresden Art Gallery, as one 'enters the house of God'; but 'the ornaments of the entire temple, objects of so much worship . . . seemed only set out for holy artistic purposes'.[31] But that is why the truest beauty gives the dreamy impression of a semi-reality, an impression so perfectly conveyed by the Helen act.

[19] F, l. 6500 (V, 347).

[20] F, ll. 8478f. (V, 409).

---

[21] IJ, 1, 10.11.1786 (XI, 146).
[22] IJ, 1, 22.11.1786 (XI, 152).
[23] IJ 3, 25.12.1787 (XI, 492–493).
[24] IJ 1, 20.12.1786 (XI, 163).
[25] IJ 2, 15.3.1787 (XI, 226).
[26] IJ 3, 16.6.1787 (XI, 386).
[27] IJ 3, 6.9.1787 (XI, 436).
[28] IJ 3, entry for April (XI, 600–601); cf. XIII, 180.
[29] IJ 3, 22.9.1787 (XI, 440).
[30] IJ 3, 11.4.1787 (XI, 598).
[31] TF 2, 8 (X, 352).

Faust receives the magic key to admit him to the realm of the 'Mothers'; there he will find Helen and bring her back up. The 'Mothers' can be reached only 'through wilderness and desert ways', through 'ever empty distance' beyond all forms; by fleeing the entire sphere of existence and disappearing into the 'unfettered realms of images'. The Mothers 'see thee not; designs alone they see'.[32] And these germs of reality are neither wholly ideal nor wholly real; they live, not in the eternal Mind, but in the undefined potentiality of Nature or matter. There, past and future manifestations can communicate outside time, Faust can enter into communication with Helen, and a marriage between Germania and Hellas can be born. The aura of ghostly unreality surrounding Helen and her attendants, as they enter the Palace of Menelaus, is an achievement unprecedented in the poetic imagination. Even Hölderlin's 'holy islands' are more real.

The same semi-reality occupies the central position in Goethe's theory of colours; it produces a half-light which, in weaving to and fro between light and darkness, is solely responsible for the phenomenon of colour, the only medium suitable for human sight and existence. But because the colours produced by this half-light have an objective-subjective validity, their appearance is not less a reality, even though they derive only from a screening of actual light itself. Goethe returns to this theme so often that it must have deep-seated existential roots. The most powerful expression of all comes in Faust; a tremendous roaring sound intimates the approach of the sun; and then it rises, and the human being is dazzled:

A sea of Fire devours us, and what fire!
The glow of this embrace, 'tis love or hate?
Delight and pain in alternation dire,
We look perforce to Earth, before too late . . .

---

[32] F, ll. 338–341.

Then he catches sight of the water-fall and the rainbow:

> Ah, but what glory, springing from the storm,
> O'erarching bow of many hues, so fixed in change . . .
> By colourful reflection know we life.[33]

Thus the sun—God—is a devouring coincidentia oppositorum; only the 'colourful reflection' is called glorious. This shrouding factor Goethe even projected back into the characteristic Italian clarity he had loved so much. 'The most beautiful aspect is that even at a short distance the vivid colours are softened by the tone of the air . . . It is a lustre, and at the same time an overall harmony, a scaling, such as we in the north have no conception of . . . It is the same as with happiness and wisdom; their archetypal images hover before us, and we scarcely touch the hem of their dress.'[34] We are all familiar with Goethe's favourite Nature-symbols: the mist (especially in the youthful lyric poetry) and the cloud, depicted in its insubstantial changefulness in 'Howard's Revered Memory';[35] the poet 'from airy worlds doth receive/ O'erpassing matter mild/ That he may clasp it, feel and form it'.[36] In 'Entoptical Colours', optical experiments generating a 'most lovely play of colours' are applied to man's intermediate existence, and here too, in the weight of the final line, the word 'glorious' occurs:

> Mirror here and mirror there
> Double setting, finely chosen;
> In between and in the twilight
> Crystalline the earth-dweller . . .
> Let the Macrocosm in his > Eerie habitants rejoice!
> 'Tis the little worlds so dear
> Hold the really glorious things.[37]

We find the same idea in the Divan ('The Reunion'): God's creation divides initially into the pure duality of Light and Darkness, and then dawn 'unfolds from the gloom a ringing scale of colours', here symbolising the unifying power of eros.[38] Another variation (in 'A lofty Image') has the rainbow as a connecting bridge between Helios and Iris (the weeping rain-cloud); Iris brightens, but the god still cannot reach her.[39] The flight of the human spirit cannot bear the glare of the absolute; man 'Hath in likeness and image enough'.[40] He should 'perceive Life's colours bountiful/ As through fine crape, in pale yet pleasing guise', as the worldly-wise Princess puts it in Tasso.[41]

---

[33] F V, 294.
[34] IJ 2, 24.11.1787 (XI, 478–479).
[35] P I, 524f.
[36] 'Nota bene', P I, 526.
[37] P I, 527.

Within the context of 'The Gospel of Beauty'[42] this modifying process becomes particulary important in dealing with 'every sort of ugliness', which, since it 'cannot simply be driven from the world, has in the realm of art to be banished to the lowly sphere of the ridiculous'.[43] Significantly, the Nibelungen, which both fascinated and exasperated Goethe, represented, in a pejorative sense, something 'truly heathen', 'even if they did conform with church ritual; for Homer was always in contact with the Divine, but in these people there is not the slightest reflection of Heaven'.[44] This is confirmed in the Diaries: 'What is so terrible about the Song of the Nibelungen is that it does not reflect a further dimension; the heroes just exist through and for themselves, like so many beings of bronze.'[45] The profound words in the letter to Riemer have the same meaning: 'The Idea is closely connected with illusion; this is its image, so to speak, its painter. It is, indeed, none other than the Idea itself, clothed in a minimum of concrete form.'[46] Such radiant illusion both provides a transition to the finite world and invests finite things with their religious aura. Clearly glory is no more for Goethe than a facet of beauty itself, namely its power to illuminate, and is therefore less independent than in ancient thought, to say nothing of Christianity. Glory attends the visible form while it lasts, and attends eros likewise. For both have their twilight, as Goethe knew too well.

---

[38] D III, 364–365.

[39] D III, 362–363.

[40] P I, 509.

[41] T 2, 1 (VI, 238).

[42] TF 2, 8 (X, 346).

[43] Ibid. 348.

[44] Conversation 837 (XXII, 521).

[45] Supplementary Vol. 2, 293.

[46] 20.2.1809 (XXII, 538).

FRAGMENT AND RENUNCIATION

But the boundary we have fixed is in fact crossed by all the great works and figures of the old poet. According to the experience and philosophy of the young Goethe, 'the moment' represents contact with, attainment of, eternity, whereas in the middle period the fulfilment given by beauty is a semi-reality. With the passage of time, with the fading of beauty, the nothingness and fragmentary nature of existence come to the fore, and so too the need for renunciation. We recall, at the very beginning, the violent crisis of Werther, the hero's 'disgust at life'.[47] 'The principal reason, however, for this nausea is the return of love'; the diasappointment that something which ought, by virtue of its inner meaning, to be unique can really be repeated. Add to this 'that our only prospect is to prolong our lives in a sluggish bourgeois existence devoid of spirituality',[48] and why not simply put an end to it all? Among the reminiscences of Strassburg we read: 'Real life often becomes so lack-lustre that it takes the varnish of fiction to restore its shine'.[49] But varnish cannot deceive for ever; Goethe had a mordant sense for the transitoriness and eventual disappointment of even the greatest experiences. At the end of his tour of Sicily comes a surprising retrospect: 'We had really seen nothing but utterly futile attempts by the human race to preserve itself against the violence of Nature, the spiteful malice of Time, and the wrath of her own internecine conflicts.'[50] In Girgenti he stood before 'ruins wearing away inexorably to nothing.'[51] In

[47] TF 3, 17 (X, 631).

[48] Ibid. 632, 637.

[49] TF 2, 9 (X, 402).

[50] IJ 2 (XI, 343).

[51] Ibid. 304.

Rome, even quite recent apartment buildings were disintegrating, like the families living in them; 'indeed, even that which had been kept fresh and alive seemed to be sickening, as though gnawed at in secret by some worm. For how could any earthly thing hope to remain standing without actual physical strength, relying only on moral and religious props?'[52] In Electoral Affinities the author considers whether human memory can provide a kind of perpetuity, but concludes that 'even this image, this second existence, sooner or later flickers and goes out'.[53] In the same novel, the lord has maintained his estates on behalf of a son 'who takes no interest . . . Who is there now to enjoy my buildings, my park, my gardens?' Ottilie, reflecting on what she herself has done, is aghast; it seems as though everything 'is really quite useless'.[54] The poet of the Marienbad 'Elegy' knows that even the memory of love fades; that the beloved keeps an eternal place in the heart is an idea now forgotten.[55] In such moments we sense all the conviction of Goethe's experience of life, and a change for the better, any progress, seems absurd. 'The more I see of the world, the less I can hope that mankind will ever become a wise, sensible and happy conglomeration.'[56] Witness the teaching of Hermann and Dorothea:

> Yet then too set thou but lightly thy fleeting foot on > the ground,
> For double the pain that doth lurk awaiting misfortune > new.
> The Day be holy to thee; but life shouldst thou not > esteem higher
> Than any other good, and all goods treacherous are.[57]

So too Wilhelm Meister finds that ill fortune and sickness 'have robbed him of the pure feeling of youth, and given him in return a sense for the transitoriness, the fragmentariness of our existence'.[58] The logical ending to his life will be the way of 'renunciation'; so too for the Major in Electorial Affinities, Eugenia in The Natural Daughter, Nausicäa in the planned tragedy,[59] Epimetheus in Pandora; already in Tasso the hero is told that many things 'but through restraint/ And through renunciation may be ours',[60] and compare Faust's 'Thou must forego! Forego must thou!'[61] It is a lesson Goethe sought to inculcate into himself when still young, in 'Ilmenau': 'He who would truly lead others must be able to forego much.'[62] In his old age, he summed up his life in the same terms: 'Our physical and social life alike, our customs, habits, worldly wisdom, philosophy, religion, and indeed so many chance events, all cry out to us: we should renounce. So much of our most intimate nature we are unwilling to develop for the sake of the outside world; what we need from outside, to complete our inner selves, we are denied, while we have imposed on us so much that is alien and irksome.' We 'find ourselves forced gradually and then totally to abandon our personality. And . . . the more bitter the cup, the sweeter our face must be, for the slightest grimace on our part might offend the casual observer . . . We try everything out, and in the end we cry that all is useless . . . Few indeed are those who, seeing the inevitability of this unbearable feeling, and seeking to avoid any partial resignation, resign themselves once and for all, for ever'[63]—or who, like St Roch, are capable of a 'limitless surrender to God's holy will', a 'complete submission'.[64] While the word 'resignation' has a classical-Stoic ring, 'surrender' recalls a Christian theme; between the two comes Spinoza's amor dei, so important to Goethe presumably precisely because of this mediating role. In the end, neither the Stoic nor the Christian solution could suffice by itself, and thus the last images of this search all cluster round that middle Goethe designated symbolically with the name of Spinoza, representing, like Leone Ebreo and Philo, a pre-Christian Jewish tradition in a classical context. Let us look at three such final images—Pandora, Electoral Affinities and Years of Wandering—and conclude with a few words on Goethe and the Bible.

---

[52] IJ 3, entry for Dec. (XI, 505).
[53] EA 2, 2 (IX, 146).
[54] EA 2, 10 (IX, 212–213).
[55] P I, 478.
[56] IJ 2, 17.5.1787 (XI, 352).
[57] III, 242.

---

[58] MA 4, 17 (VII, 286).

[59] IJ 2, 8.5.1787 (XI, 325–328).

[60] T 2, 1 (VI, 245).

[61] F, l.1549 (V, 189).

[62] P I, 364.

[63] TF 4, 16 (X, 731–732).

[64] XII, 493.

Pandora, a fragment of a festival drama whose full title—certainly intended as a parallel to 'The Return of Christ'—was to have been 'The Return of Pandora', is a draft, of eschatological (and thereby unclassical) conception, whose theme is the possible integration of man. Pan-dora ('All-Gifts' of the gods), who should have brought healing to a humanity sunk in dichotomy and polarity, has, at least on her first visit, brought nothing but airy illusions, 'ideals' of integration: 'Shapes godly flitting to and fro, a charming company'.[65] Here Prometheus is no longer the youthful ideal; demoted to that half of the human person interested only in action and technological acheivements, he has no use for Pandora's eschatological ideas. It is Epimetheus, the 'Spirit of deep reflection' and his brother's counterpole, who adopts and indeed marries the 'god-sent image of bliss'; and the wonderful fullness of love grants him 'the moment that eternally life's fable sweet will be'.[66] There are twin daughters; and when Pandora departs she takes with her to heaven Elpore, Hope, who appears only in dreams, promising not earthly goods (they are for everyone to seize for himself), but the eternal aspect of love; meanwhile Epimeleia—'she who needs love'—her anxious and remorseful sister, remains behind with her father Epimetheus. Prometheus's son Phileros, who represents Passion (in every form: as Eros, as the sting of longing, as jealousy, wrath, revenge, desperation), falls in love with Epimeleia, then pursues her for what he thinks is infidelity; like Werther, he hurls himself to his death in the water, and Epimeleia ends herself in fire. The four Titans symbolise the four parts of man's divided soul, and the fathers represent the rent between action and contemplation, while the earthly children are the dichotomy of passion and longing (in analogy to the horses in the Phaedrus). While these latter are overtaken by wild tragedy, Pandora—the possibility of integration—remains tragically unattainable, in a distant realm beyond the fathers. Prometheus and Epimetheus join in a hymn of praise to her which forms the centre-piece and includes those famous elegiac verses 'The fullness of bliss I have known!' and 'He who to part from his beauty condemned'. Here Epimetheus-Goethe has become the spokesman for the whole of unwhole mankind, expressing eros as longing for the once physically present and now unattainable ideal. We may compare Faust's love for the ultimately remote and ghostly figure of Helen; this more unappeasable eros is of tragic dimensions far exceeding its platonic-classical counterpart. Pandora cannot be Beatrice, for she lacks every Christian trait; she is the personified absence of the wholeness sought with such erotic desperation. This is not far from the tragic pathos of the Michelangelo and Shakespeare sonnets, but more hopeless still. While Goethe could not seriously attempt to bring Pandora back to the world, he does offer the glimpse of a solution in Eos, goddess of the 'dawn' and the iridiscent half-light. For she

---

[65] VI, 410.

[66] VI, 411.

> Strong doth gently make the eyes infirm of mortal >   men,
> That by the shaft of Helios my race be blinded not,
> For it was born illuminated things to see, not Light.[67]

Through her miracles she brings back Phileros and Epimeleia to the world, but she herself represents a mere promise, and at the end does no more than open a prospect, full of signs of miraculous grace from above. Here, unusually, the name of the gods is given its due weight:

> Ye nether dwellers feel what should be wished;
> But what might given be know they above.
> Ye Titans, mighty are your deeds; yet
> Beauty and eternal Goodness can be reached
> By guidance of the gods alone; this let them grant.[68]

[67] VI, 439.

[68] VI, 443.

Pandora is followed immediately by Electoral Affinities (1808); in the one case we have a metaphysical and in the other an ethical anthropology. Thus the novel is concerned with a rule for life, essentially based on renunciation in love, by which man may be purified and achieve the degree of integration possible on earth. There are two pairs—Edward and Ottilia, and Charlotte and the Major—but three stages of development. The lowest is that of Edward, who in his heart cannot renounce and is forced to do so, in a tragic and brutal fashion, by destiny; in the middle come the figures of renunciation, the Major and Charlotte; and the highest stage is represented by Ottilia, who does not need to think in terms of renunciation at all. Renunciation is already present in the selflessness of her nature and her love.

The marriage between Edward and Charlotte is characterised by the ethical attitudes we are shown at the beginning. 'Edward was not wont to deny himself anything',[69] whereas Charlotte 'was always anxious to be aware of herself, to rule herself';[70] when both are exposed to a violent temptation their reactions are, accordingly, in complete contrast. Edward, an 'extreme version of Werther' who in the end kills not himself but the woman he loves, cannot 'overcome himself'.[71] He simply 'cannot completely renounce [happiness with Ottilia]',[72] and soon 'knows no measure. The awareness of being in love, of being loved, drives him into the Infinite'.[73] 'He did not resist, for he could not.'[74] He does leave the house and seek his death in war; but is still accompanied wherever he goes by his unconquerable passion, and remains 'self-centered', just as 'pre-occupied with himself' as ever.[75] He proposes to his friend that they exchange women: 'I know you love Charlotte, and she deserves it . . . take her from my hand!

[69] 1, 2 (IX, 16).
[70] 1, 12 (IX, 9).
[71] 1, 16 (IX, 117).
[72] 2, 12 (IX, 228).
[73] 1, 13 (IX, 101).
[74] 2, 16 (IX, 254).
[75] 1, 14 (IX, 106); 2, 6 (IX, 177).

bring me Ottilia!'[76] But there is an insuperable obstacle, the institution of marriage, seen as the 'foundation of any moral society', the 'alpha and omega of all culture'. 'This bond may never be dissolved, for it brings so much happiness that all individual unhappiness counts for nothing beside it . . . But from time to time people are assailed by impatience, and fancy themselves unhappy. This moment once safely past, they will be grateful for their happiness again . . . Are we not also wedded to our conscience?'[77] Let the moment of eros go past—here Goethe is admonishing himself, renouncing his own nature; this injunction is in fact put in the mouth of Middler, but the course of events shows that he meant it seriously. And that applies also to the Sermon on the Mount, with its insistence that adultery takes place primarily in the heart; Charlotte's child, conceived while both husband and wife bore within them the image of their pasion, has to die.[78] By virtue of the self-denial she and the Major have accepted, the selflessness she has achieved, Charlotte feels she can agree to the divorce Edward desires;[79] however, it is not for these three to unravel destiny, but for Ottilia, 'the glorious child'.[80]

Her love for Edward is as human and total as his; after his departure 'she felt an infinite emptiness',[81] and she 'had not renounced Edward'.[82] She does not need to; nevertheless, she feels 'that to become complete her love must become completely selfless . . . She wished only for the welfare of her friend, believing herself capable of renouncing him, even of never seeing him again, if she only knew that he was happy. Yet she was quite resolved in her mind never to belong to another'.[83] As Edward sees the entire meaning of love in the passion and direct experience of the moment, which cannot bring such fulfilment, Ottilia, because she is the one who does

[76] 2, 12 (IX, 231).
[77] 1, 9 (IX, 78).
[78] 1, 11 (IX, 94); 2, 13 (IX, 239).
[79] 2, 14 (IX, 243).
[80] 2, 14 (IX, 244).
[81] 1, 17 (IX, 126).
[82] 1, 17 (IX, 126).
[83] 2, 9 (IX, 205).

not renounce, is forced to sacrifice herself. She becomes, in the original sense, sacer, 'a consecrated person who, with a terrible evil threatening herself and others, has only one recourse: to devote herself to the Holy Presence that with its invisible arms can alone protect us against the dreadful and relentless powers'.[84] 'I am resolved . . . I will atone for it.'[85] She vows complete silence and almost unbroken fasting.[86] Thus, like Beatrice, she transcends, and eros is integrated into a perspective which incorporates death as a necessary but superseded element. This leads to the graveyard, and how it may accord with the deeper meaning implicit in the transcendence of death. The point is not a 'self-willed obstinate perpetuation of our personality, attachments and circumstances',[87] a narrow attitude Charlotte too had refused to accept; it is rather the mystery of yielding the self to an all-embracing and incomprehensible grace, and finding, in and through this abandonment of the self, total refuge in eternity. Here, for Goethe, is the meeting-point of Spinoza and Christianity, in all their true power; and the pagan element—Homer and the pre-Platonic philosophers, the search for goodness for its own sake and without selfish concern for the 'I'—is also satisfied.

From this, and not from a flat pantheistic interpretation, derives Goethe's fascination for Spinoza, as is made very clear by his own statements.[88] We find the same, in light-hearted vein, at the end of The West-Eastern Divan, in the image of the paradisiac harem; one member resembles Suleika 'to a hair', but 'Our self-love disappeared'.[89] In 'Higher and

---

[84] 2, 15 (IX, 251).

[85] 2, 14 (IX, 246).

[86] 2, 17 (IX, 259–261).

[87] 2, 1 (IX, 239).

[88] TF, 4, 16; after the great passage on renunciation, the need to relinquish our personality and embrace a permanent and total resignation, he goes on to speak of Spinoza, and adds: 'But one must not think that I could have subscribed altogether to his writings or been a blind disciple' (X, 731–733). Cf. TF 3, 14: 'What particularly fascinated me about him [Spinoza] was the boundless selflessness which shines out in every sentence' (X, 684).

[89] D III, 394.

Highest', 'man in his complacency/ His self would gladly rescued see/ Up above as here below'; instead, his scattered five senses are brought together, in Plotinian fashion, to exist as one (ἑνιαίως), and thus enabled to penetrate 'more easily the eternal circles' themselves interpenetrated 'by Word of God in pure and vital wise'; until, finally, 'Mid contemplation of eternal love/ We float away, we pass away'.[90] This 'selflessness' is one of the essential elements of Goethe's religion (the other is reverence), and can result in a refined version of the Christian tradition, as when the young architect's painting depicts Ottilia as a saint,[91] with a 'trace of life in heaven',[92] and when in the living picture of the Christmas crib she 'becomes like the very Mother of God',[93] her 'form, gestures, manner and expression surpassing anything a painter has ever depicted'. The scene appears first in nocturnal illumination, the only light being that from the child, a 'picture of night and lowliness'; and then in full illumination, a 'picture of day and splendour'.[94] In Ottilia's final destiny the two pictures merge; after the accident with the boat, her earthly light diminishes constantly, for suffering love has become her life; but once she is dead, miracles occur at her coffin,[95] and soon Edward, the man who has failed, is called to come through purifying fire and share her death and transfiguration. We are reminded of 'una poenitentium, once called Gretchen', and her Faust. Edward's last words express humility: 'To imitate the inimitable is a fearful task. Well I feel, dear friend, how everything, even martyrdom, requires genius.'[96]

Years of Wandering never reached a final form, and instead there are isolated peaks: the idea of wandering and renunciation, the cosmic mysticism of Aunt Macaria, but above all the religious climax of the doctrine of paideia: the idea of threefold reverence. 'My temperament inclined by nature to reverence', the author says at the beginning of his autobiography.[97] The concluding fresco describing the threefold reverence reflects great artistic ability. Reverence is in the first place not something innate: 'It is with reluctance that man adopts reverence, or rather he never in fact adopts it; it is a higher faculty that has to be implanted in his nature, and which evolves only in particularly favoured people, who have for this reason always been considered saints, indeed, gods'[98] (saints, indeed, but not gods; it is gods one has reverence for). Religion begins where fear ends, in reverence: 1. reverence for that which is above us, which is 'ethnic religion' ('pagan', and 'one such is the Israelite religion as well');[99] 2. reverence 'for that which is like us', which is 'philosophical' religion ('for the philosopher whose position is in the middle has to bring down to himself everything higher, and bring up everything lower; only in this middle situation does he earn the name of a sage' and 'live, in the cosmic sense, in pure truth');[100] 3. reverence for that which is below us, in 'the Christian religion', which is 'an ultimate achievement in human potential and destiny. It would have been possible simply to abandon the earth below on the grounds of a higher birth-place; instead to accept lowliness and humility, scorn and contempt, disgrace and misery, suffering and death, as divine, learning to respect even sin and crime, to love them, because they do not hinder but help the Holy—here was an achievement beyond our imagination. True, traces thereof appear throughout history, but a trace is not a destination; and once such a destination is reached mankind can never return to its previous state, and we may well think that, having once appeared, the Christian religion can never disappear'. Every word of this statement merits deep consideration: the unity of all religions and the exceptional status of Christianity, in that its essential movement is downwards, out of reverence for suffering and by virtue of the selflessness of agape; the definitiveness, supreme significance, of this movement, in which the first two religions become subordinated elements. The final fruit of all three is 'reverence before oneself', an idea which goes beyond Pascal's 'self-hatred' and even Spinozistic self-forgetting; it expresses a new, reverential attitude towards oneself 'without being dragged down to an unworthy state by arrogance and self-centredness'. The three religions are ordered in terms of the Creed and the Trinity: 'The first Article (Father) is ethnic', 'the second (Son) is Christian', and the third (Spirit) teaches the community of the saints, 'of those who are in the highest degree good and wise', thus completing the philosophical religion.[101]

---

[90] D III, 397–398.
[91] EA 2, 3 (IX, 148–149).
[92] EA 2, 2 (IX, 144).
[93] EA 2, 6 (IX, 181).
[94] EA 2, 6 (IX, 181–182).
[95] EA 2, 18 (IX, 270).
[96] EA 2, 18 (IX, 274).

---

[97] TF 1, 2 (X, 56).

[98] MW 2, 1 (VIII, 170–171).

[99] Ibid. 174.

[100] Ibid. 171.

Here Varro's three religions provide no more than the spring-board for a far richer conception.[102] The first (mythical) and third (political) merge to form Goethe's ethnic religion; the second, philosophical ('physical') religion—the one Varro clearly favoured, according to Augustine—is, with great insight, criticised for its levelling tendency; while Goethe's third religion, which has no place in Varro's work, represents a height of achievement that must be maintained, an 'ultimate religion'.[103] Nevertheless, Goethe did in the end reject the deification of the earthly Jesus; he is numbered among the wise men and prophets, no more than 'a true philosopher',[104] and only in this (classical) sense a 'godly man'. His Passion is revered too highly to permit images of crucifixion, which, so Goethe, are a 'degrading and tasteless insult to the Sublime'; the 'shrine of pain' remains veiled. That is a specious idea, but leaves the human dimensions of the cross equally obscured; in this light it counts for little that Goethe excludes the Jews from his 'sphere of education', for having opposed the founder of the highest religion.[105]

---

[101] Ibid. 171 172.

[102] See Vol. IV, pp. 216–219 (Eng. tr.).

[103] MW 2, 1 (VIII, 179).

[104] Ibid. 176–178.

[105] MW 3, 11 (VIII, 434).

Goethe's attitude to the Bible displays all the advantages and disadvantages of liberalism. God resolved to become man; 'we must therefore at all costs avoid making him into God again'.[106] Through his descent God showed himself as love, proved his glory; what need then for a reascent? 'In this knowledge I look to die, that I possess no happiness and may hope for no bliss, save that vouchsafed to me by God's eternal love, which shared in the misery of the world and itself became miserable, that the misery of the world might share in its glory.'[107] All the sayings of the Bible, and especially all the dogmas later made from them by the various Christian sects, the Pastor of  measures against this descending love. Love is the eternal content, and human symbols (such as the sacraments) are its vessels and means of communication, but only so long as they continue to speak to human 'feelings' and thus remain effective; for 'to require someone to feel what he cannot feel is tyrannical nonsense'.[108] 'We believe that the eternal Love became man that we might be granted our heart's desire':[109] the freedom of love, proclaimed, by the 'beloved John', as the essence of all.

These early utterances (1773) contain the seeds of almost all the later statements. First there is a tendency to interpret the 'positive' elements of the revelation of Scripture in 'natural' terms,[110] rejecting more and more sharply orthodox Protestant supernaturalism[111] and legalistic moralism.[112]

---

[106] 'The Pastor's Letter', etc., IV, 129.

[107] Ibid. 128.

[108] Ibid. 135.

[109] Ibid. 137.

[110] TF 2, 8 (X, 367).

[111] Thus he rejects a doctrine of original sin, since thereby man may no longer try to achieve (or contribute to) his own salvation; hence Goethe's leanings towards 'Pelagianism' (TF 3, 15 (X, 694–695, 698)); cf. the 'key words' of Faust: 'The man who strives in right endeavour,/ Him can we redeem!/ And if the Love that dwells above/ Hath entered into him . . .' (V, 520), and the observation to Eckermann, 21.12.1831 (XXIV, 504). Similarly, he condemns any education that seeks to instil Christian suffering without encouraging the child to learn a healthy self-defence (TF 1, 2 (X, 76–79)); and disapproves of the numerous motifs involving suffering to be found in Christian art (IJ 1, 19.10.1786; XI, 113f.).

[112] TF 1, 1 (X, 50).

Goethe would like a restoration of the sacramental cosmos in the Catholic sense, and explains why at length;[113] he regrets the demise of the monasteries under the Protestants,[114] and dislikes the churches' naked interiors.[115] And after all, the Reformation was soon back where it started:

> The Reformation had its feast,
> The priests they lost their grand estates,
> And priests became the new inmates.[116]

When, in 1817, there was a plan to celebrate the Reformation, Goethe thought it a very bad idea; he would have preferred a commemoration of the great Battle of Leipzig, to be celebrated by all the Germans together, and not again each other. It would be 'a pure celebration of humanity'; everyone, 'not just Christians, but Mohammedans and pagans' 'would come to church in unity' and share their spiritual experience' 'at the same divine service'.[117]

But the Catholicism he found in Italy proved equally far from the ideal. Rome—even if her liturgies have some merit[118]—is a Babel;[119] all that business has nothing to do with Christ. Christ would be as certain to be crucified in the Christian world of today as he was in Israel; that is a view Goethe persistently maintains.[120] For 'With Cross and Christ there's such a fuss/ They've got no time for him and his cross'.[121]

---

[113] TF 2, 7 (X, 318–24): 'The sacraments are the highest features of religion, the tangible symbol of an extraordinary divine favour and grace.' Goethe would not part with any of the seven, not even the Confession, which had been so spoiled for him as a boy.

[114] EA 2, 15 (IX, 249).

[115] EA 2, 2 (IX, 142).

[116] 'The Eternal Jew', IV, 240–241.

[117] XIV, 263.

[118] 'I enjoyed . . . everything enjoyable about the ritual [in St Peter's], and the rest I have quietly reflected on. Nothing made what people call an "impact" on me or really impressed me, but I did admire everything', for it all unfolds 'with great taste and perfect dignity' (IJ 3, 22.3.1788 (XI, 584)).

[119] XI, 427.

[120] When Marie Antoinette rode through Strassburg, all the sick and lame were kept well out of view; and Goethe composed 'a little French poem, comparing the coming of Christ, who seemed to walk the earth especially for the sick and lame, with the arrival of the Queen, who shunned these unfortunates' (TF 2, 9 (X, 400–401)). And in 'The Eternal Jew' he

As a boy, Goethe already loved the Bible and would never part with it; he paraphrased large portions of the Old Testament according to his ideas, making many shrewd and open-minded observations.[122] The Bible was and remained for him a mighty testimony to human belief; and only from such belief could any culturally fruitful and edifying experience spring. A much-quoted Goethean saying is that 'the real, single and profoundest issue in the history of the world and mankind, overriding all others, is and will always be the conflict between unbelief and belief'. Less often do we find the vital sequel: 'All epochs in which belief in whatever form reigns shine forth, uplift the heart, and bear fruit for their own and later times. All those, however, in which unbelief in whatever form claims its wretched victory may swagger in a depicts Christ wandering through the modern Germany, both Catholic and Protestant, and 'recognised by no one'; in a planned sequel to the epic there was to have been a second crucifixion, an idea that came to Goethe in Italy, for 'my soul was overcome by the feeling that every trace of the original Christianity has vanished', leaving merely 'a distorted baroque paganism' (IJ 1, XI, 133–134). And when Goethe saw the Pope celebrating mass and 'gesticulating and mumbling like a common priest', he was struck by the thought: 'What would he [Christ] say . . . if he walked in and found his image on earth humming and swaying to and fro?' (139). In Sicily: 'For eighteen hundred years now Christianity has based its possessions, splendour and solemn festivities on the misery of its initial founders and most fervent believers' (IJ 2 (XI, 260)). 'If he came, they would crucify him a second time', the old man still says, to Eckermann (12.3.1828 (XXIV, 690)), for, as the Pastor's early letter says: 'Nowhere was Christ's teaching more suppressed than in the Christian Church' (IV, 136).

---

[121] IV, 238.

[122] TF 1, 4 (X, 143–158: the earliest history of mankind, the original polytheism of the Patriarchal age with its wealth of material available for fiction, the conflict between natural and revealed religion, his wish to turn the Joseph story into a novel). TF 2, 7 (X, 303–304, on the struggles between orthodox and liberal exegetes at the University of Leipzig: 'I was in the enlightened camp . . . although I could not conceal to myself that this admirably rational way of interpreting those scriptures would in the end mean the loss of their poetic as well as prophetic content'). In the 'Notes' on the Divan there is a lengthy essay on Israel in the desert (III, 504–523).

brief illusion of brilliance, but vanish from posterity. For who cares to toil away investigating something unfruitful?'[123] This is expressed with particular force in the Theory of Colours, even superstition being preferred to unbelief: 'Superstition occurs in energetic, great-hearted and positive natures; it is part of their inheritance. Unbelief, on the other hand, characterises weak, small-minded and unadventurous races that seem closed in on themselves. The former delight in marvels . . . but the sublime only destroys a generation that is important.'[124]

Goethe's best endeavours went into achieving a 'universal piety' (in contrast to the limitations of a domestic piety);[125] what this would mean for a Christian is made clear in the charming sketches devoted to St Philip Neri. Here the essence is that during the days of Luther someone in Rome conceived a great ideal: 'That the spiritual, indeed, the holy domain be united with the worldly; that the heavenly be brought into the secular, and in this way a different reformation become possible. For here and nowhere else is the key that will open the cells of Papacy, and restore to a free world its god.'[126] This idea, taken up again in an extended draft,[127] is accompanied by another: that Neri sought 'to conquer' the imperious traits of a natural leader, 'to disguise the shining brilliance of his being through self-denial, abstention, philanthropy, humility and abasement. The thought that by appearing a fool in the eyes of the world he might truly gain insight into God and things divine, and train himself in this knowledge, this became the inspiration of all his endeavours . . . St. Bernard's maxim spernere mundum, spernere . . . se sperni seems quite to have taken hold of him'.[128] It is the same motif that later becomes associated with Ottilia: the veiling of the image of glory in that of lowliness. Such selflessness represents a considerable advance upon the opaque mysticism

[123] D III, 504–505.

[124] TC XVI, 362.

[125] MW 2, 8 (VIII, 264).

[126] IJ 2, 26.5.1787 (XI, 357).

[127] XI, 509–523.

[128] XI, 513–514.

of 'The Thoughts of a Fair Soul', with its neo-Platonic conception (also important in Bruno and Shaftesbury) that the soul must purify itself, and then it will see 'the eternal sun reflected' in its pure mirror.[129] Such thinking distorts the simple and direct relationship to God.

To conclude: what does glory mean to Goethe? In 1805 he translated extracts from Plotinus and embodied them in Macaria's archive,[130] their theme being the beauty of the Spirit and the Idea in sensual form, the search for the One above through the ideal realm. But Goethe goes on to warn against escapism into a world of ideas, if this means losing touch with the true sense of the outer and inner experience. Only in the form of polarity can the mystery of the world appear. Thus eros is not primarily a soaring-up to God; its impulse is to seek the opposite pole, within the world and between the sexes. We are close to Feuerbach, and the vision of divine light in human relationships. We should also remember that in the theory of colours, for example, 'polarity' and limitation are related to the concept of 'decision', and thus have a positive meaning we do not find in Plotinus. In an ethical context, a decision in favour of one thing can certainly mean the rejection of another; indeed, this is for Goethe a condition of any total affirmation.

> In the end there is no choice,
> A poet many things must hate;
> All that's ugly, all that's gross,
> May not of its beauty prate.[131]

Yet such hatred is always—in Goethe's cosmos as in Bruno's—balanced within an overall polarity:

> Within the confines of his narrow being > Man needeth twofold feeling, love and hate;
> Doth need not day alone, but also night.[132]

And so the end does end thus: 'Be it as it may, life is good';[133] 'Howe'er it may be,/ It was so fair!'.[134]

---

[129] MA 6 (VII, 388).

[130] VIII, 495–497 (marked by inverted commas).

[131] 'Elements', D III, 292.

[132] T 4, 2 (VI, 281).

[133] P II, 50.

[134] F V, 500.

Since its author is Goethe, this statement cannot be purely contemplative; it presupposes action, involvement, and is, indeed, an act of decision and choice. 'One can tell who really loves the truth: he who will always find and value what is good.'[135] Reflecting on Plato's maxim that beauty is hardest, he writes: 'Art is concerned with what is hard and good. When something difficult appears easy, we catch a glimpse of the impossible.'[136] Thus the ethical dimension affords a bridge to a philosophy summed up in the Divan: 'For all is glorious before God; is he not the Best?'[137] Such glory founded on goodness is reflected in Nature, man's universal home; here Goethe's experience of Being is that of the ancients and Hölderlin. The famous poem describing the 'event' of the rose contrasts a miracle of Nature with the prosaic restlessness of science:

They say thou art the fairest thing of all,
The flower-realm hath named thee as its queen;
Should aught gainsay, in confidence serene
The miracle of thy event to witness call.
For seeing and believing meet in thee,
No fancy art thou, but art wholly true;
Yet tirelessly men toil for knowledge new,
The law and cause, the why and how to see.[138]

Thus the antecedent Presence of highest excellence is a condition of human activity, determining the paths it will take. Man's role is to enact the lot that befalls him; otherwise he will bring neither himself nor the world to fruition:

Whate'er thou dost in her, the world's already made,
The Lord of Creation his plan hath laid.
Thy die is cast, thou must follow the strains,
The way is begun, but the journey remains.
For cares and grief will change it no whit,
From the saddle they'll shake thee where thou dost sit.[139]

[135] MW VIII, 315.

[136] EA 2, 5 (IX, 176).

[137] D III, 379.

[138] P II, 54.

[139] MW VIII, 8. They become caught up in the 'velociferous' force (MW VIII, 312).

You Goethe's communication with the 'Lord of Creation' is not through prayer,[140] but only through reverence and the consciousness that the All is ultimately good. In this way the name 'Nature' (behind which is God) can be replaced by the word 'Being', expressing an all-embracing totality: 'In Being let thee rest rejoiced! Eternal is Being . . . .'[141] Thus prayer, all-pervasive in Hölderlin's Christian vision of the ancient world, gives way to Goethean reverence; to a sense of existence in which dependence is not the unquestioned experience of a created being, but the function of a cosmic polarity. The yearning of eros and ephesis is not for the hen, but for the derivative physis (Plotinus's Nous-Psyche); the shining images of the world remain ciphers whose meaning ends in themselves. The great conclusions to Faust are successive final hieroglyphs. Glory passes from God to the cosmos, to what Heidegger will call Being.

f. The Final Period

1. THE LEGACY OF GOETHE

To the extent that the overweening character of the Hegelian Geist (spirit) and its left-wing off-shoots fail to determine the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, these latter are influenced by the classical and the Goethean view of nature. These two paths remain clearly distinct even today. In the philosophy of spirit, the spirit comprehends nature as the object which serves it and which stands over against it, which it commands with exact scientific and technical means, applying it to its own ends. In the philosophy of Nature, on the other hand, the universe, in whatever way it is understood, is wholly comprehensive and is the landscape in which the Absolute encounters the spirit, and which makes it high-spirited, reverent and creative, setting a limit to its lust for technological supremacy. But in accordance with Goethe's final lack of certainty, this universe retains its ambiguity even after him. It does not point to a transcendent unity beyond itself, as we find in Plotinus, for Christianity now occupies this space, which metaphysics accordingly avoids. It possesses its own unity, and thus its own glory, in itself, and the eros, which does not seek to penetrate beyond it, remains an anti-Christian 'cosmogonic eros'. But while man's gaze, stripped of its transfiguring longing, turns realistically to 'the world as it is', he is greeted by the fearful 'ruminating horror' into whose abysmal depths the young Goethe, following Bruno and Böhme, had peered. It is to this world that, if he can summon the strength, he must sing his Song of Yes and Amen with Zarathustra. Whatever he later feels in his 'old heart' of the 'seafarer's desire' for 'new shores' must be bent back into the 'nuptial ring of rings—the ring of (eternal) recurrence'.[1] [140] Cf. the poem prefacing Years of Wandering, ibid.

---

[141] 'Legacy', P I, 514.

Because the classical substance increasingly recedes, both metaphysical projects—the philosophies of Nature and of spirit—must increasingly live from Christian material, despite their contradiction and rejection of it. Thus the concealed theological a priori element, which was characteristic of the late-classical and early medieval metaphysics of glory, now becomes manifestly Christian. In the philosophy of spirit, this takes the form of an adapted Augustinianism in Descartes, Malebranche, Rosmini; an adapted Paulinism in Kant; an adapted Johanninism in Hegel, Schelling and the later Fichte. In this way Christianity is positively reabsorbed. In the philosophy of Nature, on the other hand, there now occurs a spoliato Aegyptiorum in reverse: in the clear denial of Christian transcendence, the raiment of glory, which it reserves for the God of love and of the Cross, is removed from these and cast upon the members of the universe, or of that physis which Heidegger calls Being. But a universal philosophy which, precisely because it is anti-Christian, cannot and will not eschew religious pathos, must necessarily return via the path of 'metaphysics' to the mythic origins. The young Nietzsche in his Birth of Tragedy quite consciously completes a process begun by Creuzer, Görres and Lasaulx, and Heidegger will bracket off the whole 'metaphysical' tradition from Hegel to Aristotle and Plato in order to arrive at the Presocratics: 'Heraclitus and Parmenides were not yet "philosophers"'.[2] [1] Nietzsche: Zarathustra 3, Die sieben Siegel, ed. Schlechta 2, 475.

---

In the wake of this renewal of myth we first find the broad, dense seam which is the innerworldly humanism of Bildung (educational development), almost wholly devoid of religion, for which Goethe in his Wilhelm Meister and in many of his short stories, even partly in Faust, provides the model. This begins to celebrate its 'scientific' triumphs in the incipient study of psychology, of sociology and evolutionary history, while it overruns the field of art with its novel of bourgeois realism: from Scott to Dickens, Thackeray, Galsworthy, Freytag and Keller to Fontane and Thomas Mann, from Balzac via Stendhal and Flaubert to Zola, from Pushkin to Tolstoy and Hamsun, in all of whom we see man within a milieu, an environment, nature, world, and how he grows into or out of these, both involving and extricating himself. Neither that heaven-directed gaze of foolishness prevails here, nor the thrust of a transcendent eros. The former is submerged in a kind of human wisdom, the wisdom of Bildung, while the latter becomes an interpersonal problem of love. Even the demonic and heroic grandeur of the metaphysical eros (from Shakespeare's sonnets and Kleist's Penthesilea) is taken captive by psycho-(patho)logical analysis, as it develops from Kierkegaard via Dostoievsky to Freud. What is initiated by Stendhal in his Tentation de Saint Antoine, continued by Rimbaud and Lautréamont and taken to excess by Thomas Mann and more recent writers, is the dissolution of an immanent anthropology which in its enclosed dialectic must increasingly have recourse to forms of perversity in order to awaken any kind of tension.

Beyond this level there comes a more ambitious one, viz. the attempt to resuscitate authentic myth through a power that is analogous to the prophetic inspiration of Classicism or of the Bible. Schelling and Görres yield to myth as such a newly secure place within the domain of speculative thought. In Faust, Goethe retrieved a certain mythic dimension for 'modern man', as did Mozart and Byron in Don Juan and

---

[2] 'Was ist das—die Philosophie?', 1955, p. 24.

Nietzsche in Thus spoke Zarathustra. By employing the resources of all the arts, Wagner creates a phantasmagoria which (in The Twilight of the Gods) occupies the existential position where myth, although still exercising a certain fascination, has by now degenerated to the extent of being merely symbolic of the human. This was the lesson Wagner learnt from Berlioz, and which Richard Strauss and Hoffmansthal (himself deeply influenced by Freud), not to mention Thomas Mann, were in their turn to learn from him. The entire Homeric world of the gods is resurrected in Spitteler's marvellous Olympian Spring, which however is in truth an Olympian Autumn, because all the glory of the gods is played out against the sombre backdrop of a heartless, materialistic anankê as the ultimate authority of the world. Despite all the distance that pathos lends, it is the same attempt to heighten the glory of beauty of form against a barren background that we find in Schopenhauer, who coloured so decisively the universal feeling of his century, particularly among the bourgeois levels of society, and who has influenced even the heroic pessimism of the twentieth century via E. von Hartmann and Wagner. Wagner provides the stage scenery for the brief myth of the Third Reich, while Hartmann celebrates his resurrection first in the early and then in the later Scheler. But nowhere does the material of the classical myths attain more than a purely psychological penetration (Giraudoux, Hofmannsthal, Anouilh). Rilke's 'angel' and his 'Orpheus' (to which we shall later return) evoke something of the mythic, whereas George's new God, incarnate in Maximin, had a merely comic effect upon the majority of his contemporaries. And what should one say about Mombert's attempt to raise humanity as a whole to the level of a mythic figure in a comprehensive universe whose divine powers become man? Or what of Klage's contradictory attempt to proclaim simultaneously the kingdom of myth ('soul') and its refutation ('spirit')? Challenging cries resound on all sides (Ernst Michel: Der Weg zum Mythos. Zur Wiedergeburt der Kunst aus dem Geiste der Religion, 1919),[3] but in exterior terms the closed culture is lacking that which is essential for its realisation, and inwardly the pre-Christian religion is irretrievable. Of course, many classical myths retain symbolic expressivity, indeed take on a greater expressivity where the fate of modern mankind takes on a more tragic form—the myths of Prometheus and Dionysius,[4] for instance—but the titanic or divine figures themselves are not thereby reanimated. They remain at best 'names' with which we designate our universal fate, well aware all the while that this in its occurrence transcends all names. But we remain unsure how far such names are mere labels for that which proclaims itself, or how far we ourselves are responsible for falsifying by our defective mode of reception what presents itself. It is on account of this uncertainty (unknown to the Ancients) that the myths are rendered ambiguous by their transformation into 'cyphers'. Jasper's 'cyphers' correspond exactly to the place at which Goethe drew an invisible dividing line between Nature and God, which denies entrance to the eros.

---

[3] Michel's book, which repays attention even today, situates the modern

The final stage of the metaphysics of the 'classical tradition', which began with Nicolas of Cusa and Ficino and reached its apogee with Bruno, Hölderlin and Goethe, can be resolved into three distinct strands. The comprehensive universe can, according to Goethe in his writings on natural science, appear to be wholly a 'biological universe'. This seems to erect a bridge between the classical theophanous world-view and the modern scientific world-view. Or the comprehensive universe succumbs to the universal experience and creative power of the artist in the manner of Prometheus or Ganymede as Weltinnenraum ('world-inner-space') by virtue of the identity between the microcosm and the macrocosm. Or, finally, the comprehensive principle is no longer conceived as universe (since this classical concept is no longer possible after the advent of Christianity and of the philosophy of spirit), nor is it seen as absolute inwardness and subjectivity (since this loses period from the middle ages onwards in its relationship to myth. Mombert appears to him as a promise of the return of myth's creative power.

---

[4] I have used these as the guidelines to explain the modern course of history in my Apokalypse der deutschen Seele (1937–39).

its location within the comprehensive principle), but becomes in Heidegger the phenomenon of Being, which, only masked by the logos metaphysics of subjectivity, always was contained in the classical notion of physis. Thus Heidegger becomes the executor of that epoch-making enterprise which we have dubbed here 'the classical tradition'.

2. THE PHILOSOPHY OF LIFE AND WELTINNENRAUM

The first two ways of grasping the comprehensive principle, which are interrelated, transport one 'to that sea whose flood engenders intensified forms', but which however gives them shape only as sea, that is to say causes them to solidify from flux, only to dissolve them into movement again. These forms were 'intensified' for Goethe in the double sense that, being of a spiritual nature, they were themselves an intensification of life and second that each form, the mental and the submental, possessed not only a horizontal but also a vertical polarity—such as colour, for example—as their formal principle. This principle of intensification will have a parallel effect in extreme Idealism too, but will find unexpected confirmation in the philosophy of Nature through the evolution theory of empirical biology. When this appeared, there already existed a well-established, religious view of nature, such as we find in Goethean form in the work of Oken and Carus, according to which the Macrocosm of 'Divine Being'[5] divides 'harmoniously' into a dimension of rationality and one of nature, and man as Microcosm strives on the basis both of empiricism and of speculation towards a participation in the act of the Divine World-Thought within nature through ideas, types and homologies. Even as Evolutionism took on an all-dominating aspect in the second half of the century, it left its mark on the existing model of the world, which in Fechner's work (Zend-Avesta, 1851: Die Tagesansicht gegenüber der Nachtansicht, 1879) is a mystical

---

[5] C. G. Carus, 'Welches sind die Anforderungen an eine künftige Bearbeitung der Naturwissenschaften?', 1822, in: Biologie der Goethezeit, ed. Ad. Meyer-Abich, 1949, p. 209; cf. p. 210; 'Nature and one's own ego, as equal emanations of the highest essence'.

God-Nature organism of Christian inspiration, closer to the stoic-neoplatonic kind than to that of Leibniz and Spinoza, and which in the anti-Christian monist melée of the close of the century still offered the basis of a naive, enthusiastic and religious aesthetics of the world (Bruno Wille, Wilhelm Bölsche).

With Bergson, universal Biologism first seriously enters the field of metaphysics: the tension between living being in its actual duration (durée réelle) and intellectual conceptual thinking becomes central. From the directly aesthetic, marvelling and participatory beholding of the leaping fountain of life (Évolution Créatrice), thought deepens to that reflexion which runs counter to the stream of life (again we sense the proximity of Plotinus' ἐπιστροφή), to that exertion of thought which precisely guarantees its own authenticity and which was to influence so deeply Péguy[6] and finally take the form of the mysticism of the Deux Sources with its Christian emphasis.

For Georg Simmel, the religious philosopher of life and theoretician of art, Being is likewise life which in an inner transcendence overflows its own boundaries and confronts that which is objective and form-like, significant and of valid worth, whereby however, it encounters its own limits. The retreating sea leaves the rejected images stranded on the beach, that which was objectified loses its vitality and validity, and a new educational process begins. Objectification originally signifies, as in Bergson, the stream of life in reflex upon itself, that 'first miracle of the spirit' which, 'while remaining in its own unity, opposes itself to itself'.[7] But in Simmel we find buoyant hope: 'Perhaps the next step for philosophy will be the conquest of a new concept of life, with which the latter is removed from those contraries, raised to a perspective from which the flow of the real and of the ideal, and the constancy of both, extinguish the absolute character of their opposition and are glimpsed as the revelatory modes of an as yet inexpressible unity of metaphysical life.'[8]

[6] Cf. Vol. III of this work, pp. 415ff., 465ff. (Eng. tr.).

[7] 'Philosophische Kultur', 1911, p. 211.

[8] 'Zur Philosophie der Kunst', 1922, p. 145.

But how sad such promises sound, how forced the Monists' fever of inspiration, how thin even the young Bergson's harmonious voice, and how defenceless all this is against the ever-possible, indeed already actual, transformation of this 'day-side' (Tagseite) into the 'night-side' (Nachtseite) of unadulterated mechanism and materialism! Their inspirations are no less illusory and forced; this merely proves that mankind needs some kind of Absolute, no matter which, which he can worship and in the service of which he can expend himself. NIETZSCHE shows this most clearly when he dissolves all objective truth in favour of the 'lies' of which life has need, and then proceeds to sing the praises of this annihilated Being as the 'eternal affirmation of Being . . ., untarnished by any negation', consecrating himself to its 'voiceless beauty': 'I shall be your affirmation for all eternity, for I love you, O Eternity!'[9] This 'Eternity' is the 'eternal recurrence of the identical'; it is the sea 'whose flood engenders intensified forms' in a sense which goes far beyond that intended by Goethe. It becomes the intensification of life beyond man to the 'superman', to the new, untrodden shores.[10] In his earliest work, Nietzsche drew attention to the insuperable and fatal contradiction by pointing to Dionysian music, which in concrete terms is that of the Schopenhauerian-Wagnerian kind: for Dionysian Greek tragedy too had proscribed 'the myths of the Homeric world which dance ahead of us' for the sake of its 'deeper scrutiny of the world' and laid an embargo on them: Zeus now trembles at the threatening rebellion of the Titan, and the latter himself is now pressed by the Dionysian artist into the service of the new deity. 'The Dionysian truth appropriates the whole realm of myth as the symbolism of its own occurrences'. When they are bathed in music, the myths, which were near to extinction, blossom once again in all their colour.[11] Nietzsche later had no more need of the pessimistic music of intoxication, and the mercilessly Mediterranean Carmen sufficed. The principle of Dionysius, as Zagreus torn to pieces, even as 'the crucified one' ('against the crucified one') was music enough for him to harmonise out every contradiction. It was finally the contradiction of a man who wants to break out of the suffocating atmosphere of Platonic-Christian metaphysics into what is greater than that which has ever been thought,[12] and who thus finds himself in the circles of Being from which there is no escape: 'The eternal recurrence even of the very least detail! That was my weariness and disgust at all existence!'[13] But where are the most extreme happiness and the most extreme disgust held together, if not in that 'ego' of Nietzsche-Zarathustra, which has become his fatum? He portrays himself as the 'man of fate' in the manic Ecce Homo, whose true form has finally been presented to us by Erich F. Podach.[14] 'God or a buffoon—that is what I cannot choose, that is what I am'.[15]

---

[9] 'Ruhm und Ewigkeit', Schlechta, II, pp. 1262–1263; cf. Zarathustra 3, 'Der Genesende': 'The ring of Being remains eternally true to itself' (II, p. 463).

[10] Conclusion of the 'Morgenröte', I, p. 1279.

[11] 'Die Geburt der Tragödie', I, pp. 62–63.

Goethe's polarity was erotic—almost still in the great classical sense. The glory of the world became visible to him in the beloved ('Is it possible? Star of stars, do I press you again to my heart!') Nietzsche's polarity between God and the buffoon is wholly solipsistic; women are worth nothing and men only in so far as they are potential disciples. In Goethe the Plotinian Hen remains untouched, but Nietzsche replaces it with his monstrous Subject which extends from the universe in its entirety to nothingness. It is wholly self-sufficient; Zarathustra knows of no possible fidelity other than that to himself, to his own highest idea. If he shudders, then it is at the sight of his own abysmal depths.

RILKE's experience of the world is not so different from that of Nietzsche. He knows the same early, life-long and passionate rejection of Christianity, this time of Catholicism, the same time-conditioned, biologistic-evolutionistic foundation (later strengthened for Rilke by his involvement with psychoanalysis), the same fundamental imperative to remain faithful to the earth, the same searching (nevertheless) for an overcoming of the current world condition along utopian, eschatologically productive lines—in Rilke's case to the extent of demanding of God (who does not as yet exist) the attempt to create productively 'Him who will finally hear us'[16]—the same comprehensive unity of all contradictions on the basis of a prophetic soul's creative powers of transformation. Orpheus stands beside Zarathustra. The successive attachments of Lou Andreas-Salomé, who was first Nietzsche's lover and then, from 1897, partner to the twenty-two-year-old Rilke, and who was later also to be the friend of Freud, form a highly significant garland that weaves its way through time. Innumerable women will follow Lou and his wife Clara, but they are no more than occasions for awakening anew that 'intransitive' love which has no 'Thou', for which Rilke strives, which he demands from others and which in all his works is the object of his teaching. This is no longer the eros of Goethe, who grasped the glory of the world each time in a real Thou, nor is it Nietzsche's 'love at a distance' which lacks virtually all eros. This is, rather, a Platonic Love, transcendent in its inner structure, which comes alight at a Thou who is physically present, but immediately transcends this and expends itself in the Infinite (and therefore comes most easily to those who suffer abandonment, compelling them to infidelity). And yet it does not reach towards a Platonic Sun of the Good, and still less towards a Christian God, but aims into the emptiness of space which perhaps ultimately, in the last days, warmed and animated by this love, will give birth to a deity. In the early Tuscan Diary, a vision of the convergence of the absolute artist with the new God is hinted at in an almost speculative manner.[17] But what is rigorously excluded, both in the human domain and in the relationship with God, is the element of dialogue, the sense of community which takes lovers captive, the fidelity. It is from within a monological love that Rilke enquires into the human capacity for being whole.

---

[12] On this, cf. the excellent analyses of Eugen Biser, 'Gott ist tot', Nietzsches Destruktion des christlichen Bewusstseins, 1962, esp. pp. 49ff., where he speaks of the Anselmian 'concept' of God (as the 'boundary value of all conceivable contents of thought') with reference to Nietzsche.

[13] II, p. 465.

[14] Friedrich Nietzsches Werke des Zusammenbruchs, Rothe 1961, p. 321.

[15] Ibid.

---

[16] R. M. Rilke, Sämtliche Werke (Insel Verlag, 1955f.), I, p. 767. More detailed analyses in: Apokalypse der deutschen Seele, Vol. 3 (1939), pp. 193–315.

The first reply is harmony: the harmonisation of the world with the poet's soul. His work begins with a flood of highly atmospheric poems among which, after the journeys to Russia with Lou, the Book of Hours appears as the first genuine fruit. These prayers are inspired by the Russia of an instinctive, mystical piety, though one which can turn instantly into atheism (The Letter of the Young Worker); they are a monologue in dialogical form, and they cover a post-Christian core with classical and Christian clothing. The God who is addressed in prayer is the God of the future who inherits the world and above all the great tradition of art, and who yet already has a covert presence in the form of poverty, in the extraordinary final poems on poverty. 'For poverty is a great radiance from within': this line focuses the full meaning that 'glory' can possess for Rilke in the Book of Hours. The poor man, the man without resources, the cast-out leper is the place where kenotically the divine dwells, in irreconcilable opposition to the 'great cities' which parade and 'glitter like whores', to the kingdom of wealth, of technology and of progress ('and call their snail's tracks progress'). But the poor, who are 'laden with all the dirt and abused like things going rotten in the sun',[18] are not in Rilke's view something that can be bypassed, but are the painful, real indication of that 'poverty in spirit' which the poet needs in order to achieve his cosmic work. Thus the book closes with the praise of Saint Francis, who was poor in body and in spirit. But although Rilke brushes very closely against the mystery that lies at the heart of Christianity, his attempt at poverty does not set him free for his fellow man, but invariably only for himself in his work, which surrounds his narcissistic centre like a hall of mirrors and to which he sacrifices all his amorous relationships when they have outlived their use. It is in his work that the intransitive and objectless eros for which Rilke strives and which he forever glorifies, finds its purpose and its limit. What Rilke really intends and can conceive and achieve, though not without contradiction, could be solved only in Christianity's Trinitarian love, though this can no longer be viewed as a variant of eros.

---

[17] 'Tagebücher der Frühzeit' (Insel 1942). 'Nothing will exist apart from him [the artist-God] . . . When he makes a gesture, he will create and hurl into infinity many millions of worlds . . . I do not know how other distant worlds will mature to become gods. But for us, art is the way . . . Thus I feel that we are the ancestors of a god' (pp. 139–140).

[18] I, p. 364.

The poet transforms the crude world into a permanent, eternal form, and it is Rilke's middle period, culminating in the New Poems, which delivers this transformation. It is a Platonism from below, as by the power of the human heart the poet distils the idea from the most sensuous forms of experience. The idea is both the substance and the poet himself. It becomes visible where the emotional content and resonances coincide fully with the form. It is striking to what extent Rilke, the atheist and anti-Christian, persistently transforms Christian themes in this way, incorporating them into his artistic universe. They are a decisive part of the experience of mankind, and as a reality which people experience in depth, they are material that he must use. He feels them, examines them, from within: precisely where faith is demanded of the Christian, Rilke applies feeling and through feeling experiences the entire, transcendent, otherworldly dimension of mystery: the Cross, Death and Resurrection. The early Visions of Christ[19] claims to participate in the whole transcendent existence of Christ through sharing Christ's feelings (revealing, of course, his despairing failure), the Life of Mary and numerous other Marian poems express empathy—through the medium of a tender human eroticism—with her mysterious radiance, and even the most mature cycles make use of themes from the Old and New Testaments and from church history.[20] Almost everywhere it is a question of gingerly exploring the Christian mystery, which pervades life and death, in its entirety, but not in a manner substantially different from the exploration of the transcendent myths of antiquity, those three great myths, for instance, at the end of New Poems: 'Orpheus, Euridice, Hermes', 'Alcestes' and the 'Birth of Venus'. The many 'kenotic' poems of the middle period also attain a mythic force; these derive from experiences of poverty of every kind: infancy, madness, loneliness, autumn, the poverty of beggers, of the blind, drunkards, suicides, widows, orphans, idiots, dwarves, lepers (all these in the cycle The Voices and Going Blind, The Blind Man, The Leper King), the poverty of corpses in the Morgue and in the Washing of Corpses. These and other images form a fluid motif that runs through all else, even the radiant and blissful pieces. Even here praise and lament are everywhere inseparable, more than in the highest achievements of antiquity (because there the plain and ordinary was not the object of praise), and in a manner which, albeit concealed, is thoroughly Christian.

---

[19] III, pp. 129–169; also 'Glaubensbekenntnis' and 'Christus am Kreuz', III, pp. 489–493.

[20] Especially emphatic: in the 'Buch der Bilder': 'Das Abendmahl'

Rilke's work ends with the two mythical cycles of the Duino Elegies (1912–22), which embrace the angel myth, and Sonnets to Orpheus (1922). In the former it is the note of lament, in the latter that of praise, which predominates. Both explore the potential for wholeness of temporal, finite existence. The Elegies envisage a domain of angels as totalities enclosed within themselves and as containing a world. These are the ὅλα of Neoplatonism, the intelligences of Dionysius and Dante, and angels as Thomas Aquinas understood them to be, that is beings endowed by God with such intuition that they have no need of external experience and only figuratively hold converse among themselves and with men, and finally they are the windowless monads of Leibniz. The 'narcissism' of Rilke's angels therefore can be exactly located in the Western tradition but, in contrast to that tradition, we do not find here the golden chain of emanations, hierarchies, and sendings-forth which, despite all, their domain discloses to the world of men, allowing them to partake in the heavenly totality.

---

(p. 388), in the 'Neue Gedichte': 'Der Ölbaum-Garten' (I, p. 492), the erotic poem about Magdalen, 'pietà' (I, p. 494), 'Gott im Mittelalter' (I, p. 502), in a grotesque manner the 'Auferstehung' (I, p. 524; also, in the 'Buch der Bilder', 'Das jüngste Gericht', which appears to the monk at prayer as an extreme disaster that must be warded off at all costs: I, pp. 415f.; and the later 'Jüngste Gericht', I, p. 575); in 'Der neuen Gedichte anderer Teil' once again a number of Old Testament themes (I, pp. 562–571) and a crude 'Kreuzigung' (I, p. 581), while 'Der Auferstandene' (I, p. 582) carries through the theme of the intransitive eros. Further Christian scenes are to be found in the 'Späte Gedichte': 'Himmelfahrt Mariä' (II, p. 46), 'Auferweckung des Lazarus' (II, p. 49), 'Emmaus' (II, p. 55), 'Christi Höllenfahrt' (II, p. 57), 'Worte des Herrn an Johannes auf Patmos' (II, p. 108), etc.

> Who, if I cried, would hear me among the angelic > orders? And even if one of them suddenly > pressed me against his heart, I should fade in the >   strength of his > stronger existence. For Beauty's nothing > but beginning of Terror we're still just able to bear, > and why we admire it so, is because it serenely > disdains to destroy us. Each single angel is terrible.
> And so I keep down my heart, and swallow the >   callnote > of depth-dark sobbing . . .[21]

Because the descending chain is broken, longing as eros can no longer reach upwards. Therefore there is no longer any continuity between the beautiful and the glorious, which can now appear only as the terrifying. Man's sobbing heart possesses the measure of the beautiful, which is that which the heart in its own transcendence can attain by feeling; the 'terrifying' dwells in a place beyond beauty which is not to be mastered. This is the same divide which already Goethe draws, softly but surely, between God and Nature. The angels represent God and, being unattainable, they are also unreal. They are only an X which in the appearance of dialogue serve to delimit the other innerworldly totality which remains. The summoning call of the First Elegy has become a warding-off gesture in the Seventh:

>   Don't think that I'm wooing!
> Angel, even if I were, you'd never come! For my call

---

[21] 1. Elegie, I, p. 685.

> is always full of 'Away'! Against such a powerful > current you cannot advance.[22]

The eros from below has won a decisive advantage over the agape from above: it now becomes the Absolute against which a revelation from beyond the divide cannot prevail. So there only remains the innerworldly information: 'the flowing', 'the night filled with world-space', 'the uninterrupted message which forms itself from the silence', which also sounds forth from 'the youthful dead' and contains the 'task' to be 'accomplished'.[23] When with regard to this 'accomplishment' the poet immediately points to the lovers, whose 'framed feeling' is far from being 'immortal enough', then he thinks at once of those who have been forsaken, who 'lovingly free themselves from the beloved', because otherwise the lovers merely conceal 'with each other their fate'. The Second Elegy therefore urges upon them the 'circumspection of human gestures', because the experience of 'pure duration' in mutual love happens only once and in the case of its repetition obeys the universal law of 'evanescence' ('like the heat from hot food . . . that which is ours rises from us'). But the end of the Elegy fixes our gaze on the 'strip of fruit-land between river and stone' for, although our heart outstrips us as with the Greeks, we can no longer form from our transcendence 'calming images', 'divine bodies' in which 'it achieves a greater moderation'. Our self-transcendence is open-ended, and we must cling to 'our contained human reality'. The Third Elegy shows how questionable even this is in view of the (biological-psychoanalytical) depths and complexities of the blood: the youth sinks, not to be protected by a woman's love, 'into the crevasses . . . where the terror lay', and if he cannot love the 'terrifying' angels, then he loves this deeper 'horror', which 'smiles' at him.[24] With such an underground the performance on the earth's stage—in the Fourth Elegy—can only become semi-radiant, semi-annulled. Once again our gaze is led beyond what is offered in the present, and 'angels and puppets' (Kleist's puppet play), the superhuman, must appear on the scene to pull the strings of its unresistant toy and thus to create a whole. A dying child who prior to life contained within itself death's entirety, yet without being 'angry', would be an image of the same kind of unity. The Fifth Elegy (the last to be written), 'Les Saltimbanques', introduces a second image: the skilled gymnastic figures of voyagers, which now even point to an eschatological image of hope, in which not only the forsaken ones, those estranged from interpersonal love, 'correspond' to the summoning call, but human love—contrary to Rilke's general thesis—could also find its fulfilment:

---

[22] 7. Elegie, I, p. 713.

[23] I, pp. 686–687.

[24] I, p. 695.

> Angel!: suppose there's a place we know nothing >   about, and there, > on some indescribable carpet, lovers showed all that >   here
> they're for ever unable to manage—their daring > lofty figures of heart-flight, > their towers of pleasure, their ladders, > long since, where ground never was, just quiveringly > propped by each other,—suppose they could manage it >   there, > before the spectators ringed round, the countless >   unmurmuring dead.[25]

And—in the Sixth Elegy—the hero similarly 'can'; for him, the mystery of his provenance, previously so threatening, displays itself as his election from afar to the company of the saved on the grounds that he avoids the seductive temptation towards reflexion, towards self-reflected achievement, and is 'in advance of his own smile',[26] 'a raging flood' (like Hölderlin's Titan river, the Rhine). And now, in the Seventh Elegy, there is the poet who, following the child, the voyagers, the lovers and the hero, 'launches himself' like the lark 'into the serene sky', who is 'the nature of his cry' and is the 'summons-steps up to the dreamed temple of the future':[27] he in the power of his assent dares to praise the world as glorious: 'Being here is glorious'. In this act of praise he gathers also 'the nights', all the shameful, indeed all the terribly 'suppurative' forms of love, and gathers them by transforming them into an 'inner' reality. At this point of culmination the poet dares even to thrown down the gauntlet to the technological world and to analyse in his own way its destruction of the valid and 'prayed' images of the past and its transformation into 'imageless activity' and mere 'tensive propulsion':

---

[25] I, p. 705.
[26] I, p. 706.
[27] I, p. 709.

> Though this > shall not confuse us, shall rather confirm us in keeping > still recognisable form . . .
> Angel,
> I'll show it to you as well—there! Angel, in your gaze > it shall stand redeemed at last,[28]

Here Rilke is praising human achievement—'pillars, pylons, the Sphinx', the cathedrals—in the same way that Hölderlin praised Hellas, salvaging it in his poetry. Indeed, Rilke wants to know that these achievements are preserved in the angel's vision, although he is uncertain as to whether this vision actually exists. He flees for a moment to the angels from the menacing, iconoclastic, modern world. But what an inner menace there is in the seemingly insignificant 'not yet': 'the form not yet known'! The Ninth Elegy fleshes out the achievement of the Seventh in an almost prescriptive manner: 'being here is a great deal' and yet it is only that which is eternally unique, evanescent. And yet, the transient, if it is to endure, has need of 'us who are most transient', in the trusting belief that 'we, the most fleeting of beings, possess something salvific' and this once again in the face of the rise of a technology which suppresses 'things that can be experienced', substituting for them 'an imageless activity'. 'Familiar death' as 'the secret stratagem of this silent earth' heightens to an infinite degree the intensity of the moment: for the lovers, but even more for the poet, who can 'transform' the intensified moment 'in the invisible heart'.[29] Between these two, the Eighth Elegy, written in the spirit of Bergson and of the philosophy of life, casts again a shadow over the human manner of existence which, instead of going with the stream of life and existence unreflectingly and open 'to the Open' as do animals and embryos, turns in upon itself and thus becomes spirit at the price of its own alienation. What Thomas describes as reflexio in conversio ad phantasma in a way that both limits and sets free, becomes for Rilke the tragedy of existence, and yet is not thought through deeply enough, for being distinct from something is the prerequisite for proximity to it. Secretly, however, he does not intend something philosophical here, but something that is of a theological nature: even the animals have 'remembrance, as if that for which one strives, was once closer to hand',[30] as if the creature had sunk from some primal state, forced into a place of hopelessness, and now, in its futility, trustingly believes in some salvific force in the possession of man. This is the great hope of Creation as we find it in Romans 8. The Orpheus Sonnets also note the discordance of the cries of children within the harmony of the whole ('order the cries, singing god!'). They will ask in gnostic language when the 'Demiurge' will 'ravish' the heart 'that belongs eternally to the gods'; they will lament that we are 'blades' that continually wound the 'serene and divided' God, that we 'have a grievance' and are 'parasitical teachers' for those uncertain beings who 'achieve eternal childhood'. The Tenth Elegy completes the whole by raising the lament first to the ontic level and then to the mythic; it is only in suffering that man and the world attain their glory:

---

[28] I, p. 712.
[29] I, pp. 718–719.

May a new-found splendour appear in my streaming face! May inconspicuous Weeping flower![31]

when the lover 'gave himself more freely' into the 'loosened hair' of the night, for his sufferings are 'place, habitation, encampment, ground, dwelling'. Bypassing the mendacious marketplace of the modern world, we can, by following a lament 'of glorious origin', attain to the mythic landscape of lament of actual being in which indeed 'the spring of joy' flows. Finally there is a moonlike landscape beyond life and death, static and soundless, in some way comparable to the mothers' landscape in Faust and, as backdrop to the world, infinitely disenchanting.

---

[30] I, p. 715.
[31] I, p. 721.

Rilke conceived the plan for the Elegies in 1912 and moulded the fragments later (until 1922) in keeping with the initial project. Even by the year 1918 he had grown beyond their world and had begun to devote himself to his last poems of Orphic vision and form,[32] in which existence, with all its depths, becomes glory for him through the power of his art. The words of the dying man are intended as a testament: 'Do not forget, my love: life is glory'.[33] But in the last instance it becomes glory only for the one who possesses the creative power to make it such: 'When I was inspired, then it was by the glorious spirit which does not permit itself to be summoned, not even to be pleaded with. My art possesses a glory which is beyond that of David's house . . . How must God had been with me that I can say such a thing!'[34]

In the Sonnets to Orpheus, the lament can move only 'in the sphere of praise',[35] but this space, which is the 'world-inner-space',[36] the 'double domain' between life and death, between soul and world—as that wonderful poem of breath in the spirit of Goethe's systole and diastole[37] expresses it[38]—now receives a mythic definition which is prior to all that occurs within it:

> For this is Orpheus. His metamorphosis > in this one and in that. We should not take > thought about other names. Once and for all,

---

[32] Eudo C. Masson, R. M. Rilke. Sein Leben und sein Werk (1946), pp. 96f., 100–103.

[33] J. R. von Salis, Rilkes Schweizer Jahre (1936), p. 202.

[34] Letter to Magda von Hattingberg, 18.2.1914: Briefwechsel mit Benvenuta (1954), p. 105.

[35] 1st part. 8th sonnet, I, p. 735.

[36] 'Es winkt zu Fühlung', II, p. 93.

[37] 'Im Atemholen sind zweierlei Gnaden: / Die Luft einziehen, sich ihrer entladen . . .', III, p. 290.

[38] 2,1.

it's Orpheus when there's song.[39]

'Song is existence', 'a floating in God',[40] but in a God scattered and poured out through all the world who, divided among lions and cliffs, trees and birds, sings on, and whose transcendental harmony precisely in this state of fragmentation drowns out the hatred of destruction:

You that could sound until the end, though, immortal accorder, seized by the scorn-maddened Maenads' intemperate throng, wholly outsounded their cries when in musical order soared from the swarm of deformers your formative song.

Indeed, man hears the harmony of the world and gives utterance to it poetically only because of the prior mystery of the fragmented God.

O you god that has vanished! You infinite track!
Only because dismembering hatred dispersed you are we hearers today and a mouth which else Nature would lack.[41]

It is Heidegger who will soon explain how this a priori element, this comprehensive principle is to be conceived. Rilke asks in his own way 'What surges up from grounds, serene and sacred?'[42] The Christ-mystery—as the a priori of Creation precisely in its kenotic aspect—will have lent him colour, without his wishing it, as it does in the Book of Hours,[43] but he will experience it only as an innerworldly secret in the diametrical mirror relationship of world and soul, which is fulfilled when 'clear, easeful Narcissus penetrated'[44] the mirrors. In Heidegger's language this is the bifurcation of Being (Sein) and (human) existence (Dasein). The first ten pieces of the second series develop this interdependence almost didactically, using both real and mythic images: the breathing in and out of world-space, the mirror and the losses of the earth captured in it, mirrors as vessels which select and dissipate, the imaginary unicorn, realised in the actuality of being loved, the muscle of a flower's calyx as successful pure openness to the light, the rose 'enfolding with layer upon layer a body that is nothing but radiance', i.e. an essential form which reveals only the 'glory' of Being which is beyond all form, the cut flowers in their 'relation' to the girl's hands which broke them off, the children in play who together become real beneath the 'glorious arcs' of the balls' flight, and finally (in 2,9 and 2,10) the contrast between modern tolerance and the God of 'real clemency' whose coming is wholly different, the contrast of the all-threatening machine which is everywhere manifest 'so that the more beautiful hesitation of the glorious hand is no longer resplendent' and which yet cannot destroy the true glory of Being: [39] 1,5.

---

[40] 1,3.
[41] 1,26.
[42] II, p. 162.
[43] Mason, op. cit., p. 126.
[44] 2,3.

> Even today, though, existence is magical, pouring > freshly from hundreds of well-springs,—a playing of > purest > forces, which none can surprise unless he humbly > adores.[45]

Everywhere where single forms are portrayed with the art of the New Poems, in the flowers and fruit, fountains and sarcophagi, the horse-rider, the dancer, the beggar, the gardens, the fallow earth in early Spring, in all these their clear contours are wholly transparent to the singing secret of Being whose fullness, wholly permeated by nothingness, is present in them and reveals itself there. This is the reason for the didactic sonnet which praises metamorphosis, though not as a general dissolution, but which interprets the form from the point of its transformation:

> Choose to be changed. With the flame, with the flame > be enraptured, > where from within you a thing changefully-splendid > escapes:
> nothing whereby that earth-mastering artist is captured

[45] 2,10.

> more than the turning-point touched by his soaring > shapes.[46]

This is the reason also for the advice to remain aware of abundance in the midst of renunciation, and to anticipate all departure:

> For through some winter you feel such wintriness bind
> you,
> your then out-wintering heart will always outlast.[47]

The instruction of the Book of Hours on poverty,[48] the allusion in the Book of Images to the blind and to beggars with their 'hand eternally open',[49] even the teaching on renouncing the present God in order to help engender and to build the God of the future,[50] are drawn together into the final synthesis. That which is ours is precisely that which we let go and do not wish to hold on to: this convinces us of the 'mistaken idea that there is privation'; provided that we are woven into the whole as 'silk threads . . . into the fabric' and, with whichever of the single images we are united, still feel 'that the whole, the glorious carpet is intended'.[51] 'We, who are only just when we praise'.[52] 'Praise: that's it!'.[53]

3. HEIDEGGER

THE WAY BACK

Heidegger[1] brings the period of the 'classical tradition' to a close. Like all the poets and thinkers of this intellectual family, he seeks salvation—from the fate of the world which is the product both of Christianity and of modern technology—by a return to the classicism of antiquity which need only be pursued more thoroughly than it was by the German classical [46] 2,12.

[47] 2,13.
[48] 2,17.
[49] 2,19.
[50] 2,24.
[51] 2,21.
[52] 2,23.
[53] 1,7.

[1] We quote from Heidegger's work: Sein und Zeit, 1927 (SZ), Vom Wesen des Grundes, 1929 (WG), Kant und das Problem der Metaphysik, 1929 (K, 2nd. edn. 1951), Die Selbstbehauptung der deutschen Universität, 1933 (U), Was ist Metaphysik?, 5th edn. 1949 (M), Vom Wesen der Wahrheit, 4th edn. 1949 movement and even by Hölderlin and Nietzsche. What was falsely construed by these as 'Nature' is in fact the φύσις of the Presocratics and has to be seen simply as all-comprehending Being. This philosophy of Being of Heidegger, a Catholic and briefly a Jesuit, is permeated with Christian theological motifs in changed form, just as is the case with Nietzsche, who was a pastor's son, and with Rilke, who came from a narrow Catholic background. In virtue of the fact simply that Heidegger endeavours with all his strength to leave behind the western metaphysical tradition in its entirety (from Plato to Hegel), he is brought face to face of necessity with the Presocratic myth, which however has been historically subsumed into the Christian revelation.[2] The return to primordial Greekness[3] is not historical, intended as a 'renaissance of presocratic thought', for 'such a purpose would be futile and contradictory', but as a 'retrieval of the origins of our historico-spiritual being'.[4] Thus even the 'destruction' of the Western ontological tradition in Being and Time[5] serves only the 'disclosure of a yet more fundamental, more universal horizon which could yield the answer to the question: what is Being?'.[6] The 'overcoming of metaphysics' means 'neither an elimination nor even only a repudiation of metaphysics' but its 'fundamental appropriation'.[7] And this is achieved by the disintegration of all forms of unconscious (WW), Erläuterungen zu Hölderlins Dichtung, 2nd edn. 1951 (H), Platons Lehre von der Wahrheit, mit einem Brief über den Humanismus, 1947 (P, 2nd edn. 1954), Holzwege, 1950 (HW), Einführung in die Metaphysik, 1953 (E), Vorträge und Aufsätze, 1954 (V), Identität und Differenz, 1957 (Id), Gelassenheit. 1959 (G), Unterwegs zur Sprache, 1959 (S), Was ist das—die Philosophie?, 1956 (Ph), Hebel—der Hausfreund (HH, 2nd edn. 1958), Der Satz vom Grund, 1957 (SG), Nietzsche, I/II, 1961 (N).

---

[2] Cf. above, p. 000.

[3] M, p. 10; the same rejection at pp. 133–135: that which is thought in Greek terms ought to be thought 'in still more Greek terms'.

[4] E, p. 29.

[5] SZ, pp. 19–27.

[6] Ibid., p. 26.

[7] S, p. 109. 'As that which is greatest, the beginning has already advanced proleptically beyond everything that is to come and thus beyond us too': U, p. 11.

dogmatism by 'rethinking' the tradition 'in the form of a dialogue.'[8] Metaphysics, which is concerned with the very question of Being, can be neither one academic 'subject'[9] among others nor even a science, something it first became in the hands of Plato.[10] Being, which has been reduced to the status of a concept, must be 'experienced fundamentally anew'.[11] In the many forms of Idealism (Greek, Christian, modern), thought itself has 'ascended improperly into subjectivism', and the descent to 'the proximity of the closest reality' is 'more difficult and dangerous than the ascent' away from it.[12] This explains Heidegger's rejection of Kant and of all that derives from him (a rejection which is particularly fierce in the case of the philosophy of values: to proclaim God as 'the highest value' is 'the greatest blasphemy'),[13] of Hegel (for whom Being is no more than the content of thought,[14] though 'reason, glorified for centuries, is the most obstinate adversay of thought'),[15] of Phenomenology, which has bracketed out the very thing which for Heidegger is of sole interest,[16] of Descartes' cogito, of Scholasticism and its thinking on being distorted by the theology of the schools, and, together with Nietzsche, of Plato for whom the logos of Being 'has already been covered over and lost'[17]: 'the ἀλήθειά is subservient to the ἰδέα'[18] and 'the original reality of the world, the φύσις, has been reduced to the status of a blueprint for reproductions and imitations'.[19] The entire philosophy of Spirit from Plato to Kant, Fichte and Hegel is made responsible for the decline into materialism and technicism: 'The essence of materialism does not consist in the assertion that everything is only matter, but rather in a metaphysical resolution according to which all that is serves as material for work', and this is so because of the 'objectification of the real by man in his self-experience as subjectivity.'[20]

---

[8] S, p. 124.

[9] M, p. 37.

[10] P, pp. 55–56; E, p. 33. Where philosophy becomes ἐπιστήμη, and this in turn is made into a matter of schools, 'thought is abandoned': P, p. 106.

[11] E, p. 155.

[12] P, p. 103.

[13] P, p. 99. Heidegger's only attempt to come further than idealism by using categories of idealism ('synthesis') was his book on Kant, but he disavowed this as 'mistaken' and incorrigible in the preface to the second edition.

[14] Id, pp. 38–39.

[15] HW, p. 247. This does not prevent Heidegger from following and explaining Hegel's thinking with the utmost reverence and competence: HW, pp. 105–192; on the onto-theo-logical constitution of metaphysics: Id, pp. 35–73.

[16] P, p. 87; S, p. 95.

[17] P, p. 98

The elemental experience of the mystery of reality is expressed by the Greek 'wonder' (θαυμάξειν),[21] in the face of the form of existent things, their order and radiant beauty. Behind the question concerning their appearance (εἶδος), there is the much more bewildering one as to why anything should exist rather than simply nothing at all.[22] His first work, Being and Time (Sein und Zeit), begins by locating the Da-Sein ('Being-there', 'existence': man conscious of his own existence) in the extreme perplexity, the anxiety in which all existence slips away, in order to open up access to the question of Being. It is certain that, since in this early period it is the truth of Dasein which is the central issue for Heidegger and which he interprets as finitude structured towards death and as temporality, he does not as yet fix his gaze on Being and that his later interpretations of this period (as a methodical laying-bare that permits him to address the question of Being) are not wholly convincing; although this is relatively unimportant.[23] For very soon his gaze seeks out the decisive issue: the emergence of Being. Let us say beforehand that this emergent existence is not adequately expressed in the distinction between essence and existence of Thomist scholasticism (which Heidegger opposes),[24] since as this scholasticism understands essence (in the Greek manner) in terms of a being that is intelligible in itself, to which existence can ally itself or not, at will (or at God's will). But we will still have to ask whether Heidegger's way, which is to remove the φύσις of the Greeks from the realm of essence to a more comprehensive realm, is adequate. Φύσις means for him Being which emerges into phenomenal existence from its primal ground (Urgrund) or depths (Abgrund) and which is prior to all subjectivity.[25] This emergence lends phenomenal existence (φυ is cognate with φα[ίνεσθαι]) its ontological dignity.[26] It removes time and history, which were previously rooted in human existence, to the domain of Being itself, which emerges 'cosmically' (weltend) as world and, in a primal and critical struggle (the πόλεμος of Heraclitus would then be identical to the logos which is realized in this emergence),[27] as that 'dominating and undominated becoming-present (An-wesen) to thought'. Resting within this primordial event and remaining radically open to it (in ecstasy: standing 'outside' himself), man possesses true (co-creating) history.

---

[18] P, p. 41.

[19] E, p. 48.

[20] P, pp. 87–88.

[21] Heidegger does not deny this, but intends rather that 'astonishment' as ἀρχή should govern 'every step of philosophy': Ph, p. 39.

[22] M, p. 38.

[23] Karl Löwith, in Heidegger, Denker in dürftiger Zeit (1953), has clearly set out the contradictions and incompatibilities of the two periods and thus also the essence of the 'turning' from 'Dasein' to 'Sein', esp. pp. 21–42.

If one asks which figures in the western metaphysical tradition Heidegger can spare in his all-destroying return to the primal question, then besides Nietzsche and his own radically destructive enquiry[28] we should mention the ontological poetry of Rilke[29] and 'of Trakl[30] and, more significant than either of these, Hölderlin. In his work the cognate origins of poetic creativity and thinking (Dichten and [24] P, pp. 68f.

---

[25] Interpretation of Hölderlin's 'nature' in the direction of φύσις: H, pp. 54f.; systematically in E, pp. 11f.; cf. SG, p. 102.

[26] E, p. 47.

[27] E, p. 47.

[28] But Löwith has correctly shown that Heidegger's interpretation of Nietzsche is questionable and, if one looks to the final form taken by Nietzsche as a whole, mistaken: op. cit., pp. 73–110.

[29] 'Wozu Dichter', H, pp. 248–295.

[30] 'Die Sprache', S, pp. 11–33, 'Die Sprache im Gedicht', S, pp. 37–82.

Denken) are highlighted; this is always of central concern for Heidegger,[31] as is the connection between primal language and prophecy, the essence of 'in-sistence' ('standing-in') as the penetration of Being into man and of man into Being,[32] the idea of man's 'home-coming' to Being and of his essential 'recollection' of Being,[33] the interconnection, equally significant for both, between thinking and thanking (Denken and Danken),[34] the existence of man as a self-offering to Being (as in Hölderlin's Empedocles),[35] and finally a christology and a theory of kenosis which in both are fully exploited in the service of an all-comprehending metaphysics. Goethe, too, is in harmony with Heidegger when the radical openness of man to the reality which is comprehensive and self-revealing is at issue,[36] or the mistrust of any form of Idealism, or the attitude of awe[37]—which in Heidegger too is eliminated as the condition of 'Angst'—or the knowledge of the 'meaning' of all essential forms in their orientation towards Being. But more than anyone else, Thomas Aquinas is in harmony with Heidegger, with whom he shares the insight into the transcendence of Being[38] and into the fundamental distinction between Being and existent,[39] which is fundamental for all thought, even though their respective understandings of the nature of this distinction diverge from the first point on. For both, the act of Being, which comprehends within it all that is, is illumination (and thus the original locus of truth),[40] is origin, the greatest proximity (intimum) in the greatest distance ('more existent than all that exists'),[41] and at the same time it is nothingness (the non-subsisting),[42] the unity beyond all number.[43] Behind Heidegger, and behind Thomas, there stands not Aristotle, but that Plotinus for whom Being remains a superconceptual mystery (beyond 'metaphysics', which is 'located' in the Nous).[44] This family tree shows to what extent Heidegger's thought is and seeks to be fundamentally western. Even his dialogue with the Far East is that of a Westerner rooted in the ontology of German mysticism and the 'metaphysics of the saints'. So the question arises: how far can Heidegger's philosophy give a place to the fundamental principles of classical-mythic and Christian-theological thought, together with its 'glory', which appeared to him to be so under threat in all the various metaphysics of spirit (we shall discuss this first), and how far does his thought fail to do justice to precisely the object which is the orientation of his thinking; Being itself (we shall discuss this later)?

---

[31] 'The poet's act of giving names comes from the same provenance' as 'the utterance of the thinker . . . the thinker utters Being. The poet names that which is holy': M, p. 46, Cf. Ph, p. 45; E, p. 20; P, pp. 112, 117.

[32] M, p. 42.

[33] P, p. 86, H, pp. 75–143.

[34] M, p. 44; G, pp. 66–67.

[35] M, pp. 44–45.

[36] This is the quintessence of the 'Letter on Humanism': truth is in Being, not primarily in man.

[37] M, p. 45.

[38] SZ, p. 38.

[39] WW, p. 11.

[40] WW, pp. 6–7; WG, p. 6

[41] P, p. 113.

THE MYSTERY OF BEING

Heidegger eschews metaphysics and ontology in the traditional sense in order to penetrate beyond them to the 'recollection of Being itself'.[45] And he permits the everyday Greek ousia of Being as par-ousia, as being-present, to be radically shaken and held up to question in the state of anxiety in order that the 'ground for the decision for the existent rather than for nothingness' may emerge 'as the ground for the vacillation of the existent that bears us and releases us, half being, half non-being, from which it follows that we can never wholly belong to any thing . . .'.[46] 'The participation of human existence in nothingness on the grounds of concealed anxiety is the transcending of the existent in its entirety: it is transcendence'.[47] In the evanescence of the existent, in its loss of essence the wholly Otherness of Being is intimated, which locates all existents in Being, 'mysteriously', as the 'simple proximity of an unassuming power',[48] as the 'inviolable',[49] 'the most singular reality that there is' and which 'cannot bear comparison with anything else at all'.[50] It is dominant in all forms of essence, making them possible, and yet goes far beyond them. Only by the presence and indwelling of Being is there such a thing as existence or essence. In his celebrated analysis of the essence of a jug, Heidegger shows what is meant by the 'jugness of a jug': 'The receiving of inpouring and the containing of what is poured in', 'the pouring out' (Aus-schenken), which in its turn presupposes the act of giving (Schenken) and the gift (das Ge-schenk). In the water which has been given, there remains the spring which is nourished by Heaven and Earth, which is to be drunk by mortals and yet which also, as libation (χέειν = to sacrifice), is a gift for immortals. Thus 'in the gift which is a drink poured out, the divine beings are present in their own way, and to them the gift of donation is returned as the gift of offering'. Taken together, Earth and Heaven, mortal and immortal, form 'a single quadrilateral' which, as the openness of Being and as a 'multifold yet unified consort', makes possible the 'essence of the jug'.[51] And so ousia is comprehensible only in the presence of Being (parousia) which, however, as an open space, is always an absence, an un-presence and a distance. Since Being is that which is non-essential in its distinction from the existent (essence), it attracts the kind of definitions which negative theology reserves for God. 'Being is not an existing quality of the existent . . . This, which is wholly Other to all Being, is Non-Being'.[52] We cannot say that 'there is' Being, but only that Being 'is', in the sense that all that is, is.[53] This is the case, because the existent is an indication of and towards Being,[54] a kind of 'word' or 'legend', which breaks forth from the silence.[55] The giving of Being is the 'productive appropriation . . . the event', and this is 'more creative than all functioning, acting and grounding. That which happens is the event itself—and nothing other than that.' It is not the result of something else (Ergebnis), but the self-giving (Er-gebnis) whose generous giving alone guarantees the possibility of a 'there is'.[56] Thus words appear such as the 'graciousness' or Huld ('kindness' in Hölderlin's translation of χάρις) of Being,[57] the 'favour of Being'[58] which 'preserves things in the radiance of the world', 'the world offers its favour to things'.[59] They have their origin in the place of the dispensing abundance, which 'reveals' itself in things and 'has always offered itself'[60] prior to all thought and comprehension and thus permanently enjoys the value of a 'homeland'[61] for all that exists. Language possesses the same primordial character as the emergence of φύσις, which derives directly from Being and from its history,[62] which speaks from out of Being itself and is prior to all human utterance, which speaks authentically only when it 'speaks-in-accordance-with' (ent-spricht),[63] responds (ant-wortet), echoes (nach-spricht).[64] 'This speech-in-accordance-with (Ent-sprechen) is a form of speech. It stands in the service of language'.[65] This is the 'house of Being',[66] in which it dwells, as man for Hölderlin lives 'poetically on this earth', i.e. when he co-responds.[67] The difference therefore between Being and existent (whose essence will be explicated later) is the locus and the possibility of language,[68] which can truly speak and bear weight only as a word that comes from silence and returns to silence, as the 'sound of silence',[69] and can therefore hardly take itself as its own object.[70] It is evocation.[71]

---

[42] SG, p. 93: 'Only Seiendes "is" the "is" itself, the "Sein" "is" not.'

[43] M, p. 44.

[44] Because Plotinus is usually assigned a place within the Platonic tradition, and this counts as 'forgetful of Being' for Heidegger—something that is in reality not the case for Plotinus—Heidegger prefers to begin first with the Pre-Socratics.

[45] M, pp. 8–9; P, pp. 65, 76; E, p. 31; S, pp. 109, 116; G, p. 39.

[46] E, p. 22.

---

[47] M, p. 33.

[48] P, p. 78.

[49] S, p. 148.

[50] E, p. 60.

[51] VA, pp. 170–172, with reference here to G, p. 54, S, pp. 22–23, HH, p. 18.

[52] M, p. 41.

---

[53] P, p. 80.

[54] S, pp. 114–117.

[55] S, p. 255.

[56] S, p. 258.

[57] VA, p. 204.

[58] M, p. 44.

[59] S, p. 24.

[60] S, p. 135.

[61] P, p. 84.

[62] P, p. 79; E, pp. 62–63.

[63] 'In reality it is speech that speaks, not man. Man speaks only to the extent that he corresponds (ent-spricht) to speech (Sprache) on each occasion': HH, p. 34; S, pp. 12f. and 20.

[64] S, p. 70.

[65] Ph, p. 44.

[66] P, p. 79.

The greatest effect of such a delineation of all-comprehending Being is upon the way in which we interpret Da-Sein (human kind). This is no way follows the leitmotif of eros (as it otherwise does in the whole regeneration of classical culture since the Renaissance, and still in Goethe), but follows that of serenity (Gelassenheit: indifference, impassiveness, detachment), which is the title of one of Heidegger's works, which is to say as that 'essence' which can allow Being to be itself, as a 'stepping back from the existent so that this can reveal itself in what it is and in the way that it is, and the assimilative representation can take its measure from it'.[72] This stepping back creates the possibility of unconcealedness as 'truth' (ἀ-λήθεια); this standing-out (ex-istence) is human freedom as harmonisation with the comprehensive whole.[73] Will is rooted in 'determination', and the latter is rooted in 'the disclosure of human existence with a view to the illumination of Being, and not at all in the gathering of strength which is associated with "action". But the link with Being is letting be. That all willing should be grounded in the act of letting be is the cause of bewilderment for the rational mind'[74]—but not for the mind which knows the intellectual inheritance of Christianity. For [67] HH, p. 32; VA, pp. 187f.

---

[68] Heidegger relates that his first questioning concerned speech: S, pp. 92–93.

[69] S, p. 262.

[70] S, p. 149.

[71] 'The act of naming does not distribute titles, nor does it employ words, but calls to the word': S, p. 21.

[72] WW, pp. 14–15.

[73] WW, pp. 16–18.

[74] E, p. 16.

Origen and for Scholasticism, the essence of freedom was indifferentia, which in the period from Eckhart and Tauler to Ignatius appeared as 'submissiveness',[75] as 'indifference',[76] as 'serenity'[77] and in this as 'attentiveness to the voice of Being',[78] and as 'obedience to the voice of Being'.[79] Thus a 'solitude'[80] is demanded of us or, as the medieval mystics called it, a 'detachment'[81] which first makes possible that 'insistence' (in the sense of 'standing in') towards Being,[82] and is attuned to the gifts of Being. Heidegger, who avoids the word 'spiritual' (geistig: 'of the mind, intellect or spirit') in one sense, does however make use of 'spiritual' in another sense (geistlich: here in the sense of the Spirit which breathes forth from Being as a fearful flame,[83] and which 'drives the soul to journeying . . . and to remote places'). He speaks of 'poverty',[84] of 'the nobility of poverty',[85] viz. of the 'essential poverty of the shepherd',[86] for man is the 'shepherd of Being',[87] to him is entrusted the 'custodianship of Being'[88] which he must exercise with 'care'[89] and 'patience'.[90] His thinking must be a thanking which 'does not first offer thanks for something but is only grateful that it may give thanks'.[91] It is an 'act of praise'.[92]

The relationship of self-revealing Being to the passive

[75] S, p. 70, will render 'pious' as 'submissive'.

[76] M, p. 45.

[77] G, p. 34 (with a reference to Eckhart, 'from whom however much good can be learned'), p. 51.

[78] M, p. 42.

[79] M, p. 46.

[80] M, p. 265.

[81] S, pp. 52, 58.

[82] G, p. 62.

[83] S, pp. 58f.

[84] S, p. 66.

[85] M, p. 45.

[86] P, p. 90.

[87] P, p. 75.

[88] M, p. 44.

[89] M, p. 46.

[90] S, p. 73.

[91] G, pp. 66–67.

[92] S, p. 69.

human creature who receives it is seen here in primal biblical categories, so much so in fact that the Old and New Testament category of 'glory' is also present. Thus man, as the locus and 'organ' of the reception of this revelation, becomes fundamentally the 'one who can hear',[93] whose responsibility it is to listen to the language[94] or the word or the 'silent voice'[95] of Being in order himself to master the language.[96] He is the one for whom Being is present, and present in its individual occurrence, as God is present to Moses as the 'I am present on each occasion as the one that I am'.[97] Being and man are 'bound over one to the other'[98] as in the biblical covenant, and this 'belonging in hearing' (das hörende Ge-hören) is very close to biblical faith. 'Truth' (Wahrheit) can be not only the Greek 'un-hiddenness' but also (as Löwith justifiably notes) the English 'truth' (cognate with the German Trauen and Treue, which mean 'trust' and 'fidelity'); wherever Being 'entrusts' itself, we are 'betrothed' to it.[99] This is that biblical cycle of fidelity as a precondition of truth and of revelation, which is reflected systematically in the inescapable but fruitful 'hermeneutical cycle'.[100] In the cycle of grace and homage to grace, everything is structured towards a dominant, if discreetly reserved, love (Möglichkeit [possibility] derives ultimately from mögen meaning 'to like', just as the neutral 'there is' conceals a 'there is on offer', or the neutral 'principle of sufficient reason' [Satz vom Grund] presupposes a principle which proceeds as a leap [Satz] from the ground of one thing to the ground of another). This dominant love is groundless self-giving, self-expending: 'Thought . . . exhausts itself in Being for the truth of being in so far as man entrusts his historical being to the simplicity of the one thing necessary, which . . . creates the need that is fulfilled in the freedom of sacrifice . . . Sacrifice is the pouring forth of human essence in maintenance of the truth of Being for the existent and is raised above all compulsion because it emerges from the depths of freedom. In sacrifice there occurs a concealed act of giving thanks.’[101] ‘Therefore sacrifice can tolerate no calculation, by which it can be judged only in terms of usefulness or uselessness, whether its aims are noble or base.’[102] In contrast to the usefulness of all the sciences, philosophy therefore remains essentially useless,[103] without result or effect,[104] just as the self-giving of Being unquestionably has no justification but that alone which it derives from itself. Eckhart, too, said this of God, as Being, and of all that derives from Him, and Angelus Silesius, quoted by Heidegger with regard to the ‘principle of sufficient reason’, repeats it:

---

[93] S, p. 241.
[94] S, pp. 254–255.
[95] M, pp. 42, 44.
[96] G, p. 49.
[97] On the time of Being; M, p. 16.
[98] Id, p. 23.
[99] S, p. 127.
[100] SZ §63f., 310f.; S, pp. 150f.

> The rose has no why and wherefore:
> it blooms because it blooms,
> And has no regard for itself, and does not ask > if it is being looked at.[105]

The ‘because’ here does not contradict the ‘without why or wherefore’; its blooming is self-justifying. The death of philosophy is critical transcendentalism and the nuclear age, which have obscured the ‘why-lessness’ of Being by turning it in every case into an object and subordinating it to an end, although this ‘why-lessness’ still persists in the background throughout all ends.[106] But this would mean the extinguishing of all forms of transcendental aesthetics in the classical and medieval sense, for ‘What is beautiful appears sacred in itself’ (Mörike).[107] Thus Heidegger demands a renewal of aesthetics by the philosophy of the Ontological Difference between Being (Sein) and being-there (Dasein: human existence), which is the emergent manifestation (φαίνεσθαι) of Being (φύσις from φύω) in the ecstatic space of

---

[101] M, p. 44.
[102] M, p. 45.
[103] E, p. 7.
[104] P, p. 111.
[105] SG, p. 68.
[106] SG, pp. 100–101.
[107] ‘An eine Lampe’, quoted SG, p. 102.

Dasein, and he comments on this distinction in his dialogue with the Japanese, a dialogue which ultimately in the encounter between Western and Eastern discourse and thought allows the occurrence of Being and its expression to draw near only in 'aesthetic' categories: as 'that which takes gracious form' (das Anmutende, though not in the sense of Schiller's Anmut, grace, but) as 'the breath of the stillness of radiant rapture' and 'luminous veiling'. 'Thus all presence has its origin in grace in the sense of the pure rapture of a summoning silence' in which 'however that which causes rapture itself . . . is always manifested in the unrepeatable moment with the plenitude of its grace'.[108] In this definition the Greek 'χάρις' and the German Huld ('grace' as 'favour') are married. The Huld of Being itself 'is poetic, that which truly makes reality poetic', and the poet (and thinker) merely correspond again to the language of Being, which 'addresses' us and 'is radiant for us'.[109] The mystery of Being, unrevealable even in its revelation, as the open space in which all things are gathered and exist, is 'like a region by whose magic all that belongs to it returns to the place where it rests'. Such a 'return' to the 'free expanses' of this region causes the transformation of 'objective reality' (das Gegenständliche) into an easeful resting beside the 'hearth': all these expressions recall Plotinus and Eckhart, as does man's 'waiting' which 'has no object', and which thus gives itself access to the 'open spaces' and awaits the 'arrival' which derives from the metaphysics of detachment.[110]

Here the biblical concept of δόξα is retrieved and taken into the service of Being, together with the inner tension which comes to it from its Greek usage. 'Δόξα means regard, namely the regard in which one stands. In the event that that regard is an excellent one in accordance with what it reveals, then δόξα means fame and renown. In Hellenistic theology and in the New Testament δόξα Θεου, gloria Dei, is the glory of the Lord. The act of extolling, of bestowing esteem on and showing esteem towards, has in Greek the meaning of putting in the light, and thus creating duration and Being. Renown for the Greeks is not something additional which one might or might not attain: it is the manner of the highest being'. There is a reference to Pindar here in support of this. But the concept undergoes an inner development. Δόξα is regarded in a broader sense too as 'that which every existent conceals and reveals in its appearance (εἶδος, ἰδέα). A town is a wonderful sight ... Depending on the different standpoints, the view will change'. Thus there is a shift from the objective sight to the subjective view, opinion, mere supposition, and correspondingly from manifestation to seeming appearance. 'Where there is the unconcealedness of Being, there is also the possibility of seeming appearance'.[111] The enchantment and the glory of Being in its revelation always contain seeming appearance and concealment as their counterpart; the 'essence' of truth always brings with it its own inessentiality as 'non-unconcealedness'. 'The concealment of the existent within the whole, as actual 'untruth', is prior to the openness of this or that existent. It is prior even to the "letting be" itself'. Beneath all thing there lies the abyss, the 'mystery',[112] the irredeemably mysterious character of Being. But the openness of Being in its emergence into manifestation casts so great a light that this overwhelms its nature as mystery, and concealment is itself concealed. The recognising individual rests content with what is manifest, though 'his rootedness in the transient is in itself the failure to allow the concealment to prevail of the concealed'. 'The forgotten mystery of human existence' (in the section entitled 'Man' from Being and Time) effects however its 'own presence'; it causes man to err and to make misjudgements when he takes 'the measure' of himself in accordance with his new intents and plans,[113] not just as the practical homo faber but no less so as the theoretical homo sapiens. Thus 'evil and 'ire' (Böhme, Goethe, Schelling)[114] are rooted in the ontic-ontological (non-)essence of truth as freedom so that 'error is the essential counter-essence to the initial essence of truth' and it 'thoroughly dominates man'[115] from the point of the primal historical occurrence of Being, without the necessity of postulating an historical 'Fall'.[116] Being, as something imposed, is not only graciousness but also fate. In its own nature, in its concealed unconcealedness which is eternally occurrent in the now, it is something which is self-directional (epochê), which is selfgiving and fate-forming, as destiny.[117]

---

[108] S, pp. 140–142.
[109] S, pp. 152–153.
[110] G, pp. 40–46.

---

[111] E, pp. 78–79.
[112] WW, p. 19.
[113] WW, pp. 20–21.
[114] P, p. 112.

Theologumena, which prevail throughout the entire Western tradition of thought but have been forgotten, emerge here:[118] the idea that God conceals Himself precisely when he reveals Himself is not only Presocratic but also Plotinian and patristic. Maximus the Confessor extensively glosses Gregory of Nazianzen's φαινόμενος κρύπτεται,[119] and this also constitutes the pathos of both the Pseudo-Areopagite and Scotus Erigena (dum silet clamat, et dum clamat silet, et dum videtur invisibilis est . . .,)[120] as it does in the work of Nicolas of Cusa and Ficino. But together with this there also arises the doctrine of kenosis, familiar to us from Pascal and Hamann,[121] from Tauler, Condren and Hölderlin. The openness of Being in the duality[122] of the Ontological Difference is in itself 'pain',[123] and as ec-static sense (Sinn) is 'madness' (Wahnsinn, which does not mean lunacy or Irrsinn),[124] 'downfall' and 'death'.[125] In the loss of selfgiving Being which holds to itself and withdraws, we discover its preciousness: because 'it is only in the most extreme withdrawal of Being that we glimpse the essence of Being', because 'we only recognise what belongs to us in the loss of what has been lost'.[126] In the alienness (Unheimlichkeit) of angst, we understand what home (Heimat) is; in alienation and estrangement, we know intimacy.[127] This all belongs indissolubly to the comprehensive glory of Being: the Δόξα of 'the undominated dominating coming-into-presence'[128] and of mere 'opinion' in irretrievable absence. The Greeks did not know this second aspect, only the Christians. But did Heidegger really succeed in incorporating the Christian dimension into his ontology?

---

[115] WW, p. 22.

[116] P, p. 78.

[117] Ph, p. 65.

[118] P, p. 81; G, p. 59; Ph, p. 18.

[119] See my Kosmische Liturgie (2nd edn. 1961), pp. 292f., 523, 530, Migne, Patr. Gr. 91, 1048–1049A.

[120] See above, p. 000.

[121] See Vol. III of this work, pp. 247–273 (Eng. tr.).

[122] S, pp. 118, 126.

[123] s, pp. 62f.

[124] S, p. 71.

[125] S, pp. 42. 46.

THE LOSS OF GAIN

The attempt to incorporate all aspects of the Christian inheritance within an ontology stands or falls with the interpretation of the Ontological Difference between the existent and Being. For Heidegger there can be only one distinction, which displays many aspects: first the dual aspect of the ('objective') 'illumination' ('Lichtung') of Being in existent beings and its ('subjective') 'illumination' ('Lichtung') in the ec-static locus of freedom which is Dasein (i.e. human existence); these two aspects constitute in a complementary manner a single event. A further dual aspect is best illustrated by historical delimitation. In regard to this distinction classical, Greek metaphysics remains bound to the 'existent' and thus to a thinking in terms of essences (which is 'oblivious of Being'): ὄν ᾗ ὄν, the object of metaphysics, is for Aristotle existence qua existence (and not qua Being). Although the individual existent is construed here within the context of 'existence as such', and thus with an orientation towards Being, nevertheless Being itself remains occluded,[129] and appears only as 'the general', which it cannot be because, co-differentiated, it predominates in all distinctions. And yet if we construe Being as 'God' (which marks the beginnings of the early Middle Ages and which will lead via Eckhart and [126] SG, p. 101.

---

[127] M, pp. 29–30.
[128] E, p. 47.
[129] M, p. 11.

Nicolas of Cusa to Spinoza and the modern forms of Monism), then we get the true mystery wrong and leap over it, this time by shooting too high, for this mystery inhabits the opposition between the existent and Being, the latter of which is both the abundance of all existence and yet non-substance—in such a way that existents assist Being towards its illumination objectively while man does so subjectively, although it is from Being that they receive the light in the first place. This is a mystery which cannot prevail between God and the world. There remains therefore for the genuine difference between them only that space which to some extent opens up in Plotinus (and Dionysius) and is uniquely grasped by Thomas Aquinas: the actus essendi as non-subsiting abundance which attains a state of rest and self-realisation from and within finite essences, and essentiae, which attain to reality by act, without however reducing or subdividing the infinite act. This mode of thought does not, as Heidegger says, reduce the difference 'to a mere distinction, to the potency of our intellects'[130]—that only happens when a pedantic scholasticism turns the mystery into a 'real distinction' etc. But for Thomas this structure remains the sign of the indeterminate non-absoluteness, speaking in Christian terms, of creatureliness: for how can a non-subsisting act of Being generate subsisting Beings from itself alone, and how are the essences to acquire a closed and meaningful form? Both these questions therefore point to a subsisting and absolute Being, God, who both offers a share in His abundance of Being (in the actus essendi illimitatus) and also from His absolute power and freedom (which as such presupposes nothingness as the locus of the ability to create) devises the forms of essences as the recipients of this participation in Being. Plotinus, working from a pre-Christian viewpoint, went some way towards this understanding of the difference when he construed the One, which transcends everything (even the Nous), as the mystery of Being which, for him, was transparent to the Divine-Absolute, to the extent of identification. The non-subsisting character of the act of Being fused for him with the transcendence of the One beyond ontological comprehension. Heidegger, on the other hand, who belongs to the post-Christian age, revokes the Christian distinction between limitless non-subsisting and limitless subsisting Being. He creates the notion of a superconceptual actus essendi which renders itself temporal within essences, by attributing to it the properties of the subsisting (divine) act. And because the former must be radically annihilated in order to attain temporal expression, this nothingness, which makes the subjective-objective 'illumination' (Lichtung) possible, becomes an attribute of absolute Being. In other words: Heidegger identifies the negations of the classical, Christian doctrine of God (as 'Negative Theology') with the nothingness of the act of Being which constitutes world. The consequence of this is that once again (as with Erigena, Eckhart and Nicolas of Cusa) God has need of the world if He wishes to make explicit His own implications, so that no analogia entis prevails in the distinction between Being and existent, but rather an identitas which both generates the distinction and embraces it at the same time.

---

[130] Id, p. 60.

Heidegger initially denied that Being stands in 'need' of the existent in order to become itself, although later he affirmed it in ever clearer terms.[131] 'Human essence is given over to truth, because truth needs man'.[132] It is the 'message which needs us as messengers'.[133] If world is to come into being historically, then man as agent of choice and as legislator is indispensable.[134] The ultimate reality therefore becomes 'the event' as the 'independent region through which man and Being attain to each other in their essence', a 'self-supporting construct'.[135] The difference between Being and the existent, which is the primary characteristic of createdness, in thereby raised to the status of the absolute, of God. Accordingly man cannot perform the classical act of wonder [131] On a silent alteration of the text in this sense between the fourth and the fifth editions of Was ist Metaphysik?, cf. Löwith, op. cit., pp. 39–40.

[132] G, p. 65, cf. p. 66.

[133] S, p. 155; cf. S, p. 256: 'Speech needs human speaking'.

[134] E, pp. 47–48.

[135] Id, p. 30.

in the face of the miraculous ordering of the world, nor the Christian act of a yet deeper wonder at the incomprehensibility of his own and of all earthly existence. Now he is himself a co-essential part of the mystery of Being which prevails necessarily as such. Within this identical framework, it makes no sense to distinguish men from gods; where the comprehensive principle remains impersonal (because non-subsisting), personal beings cannot be distinguished by any thoroughgoing analogy. For this reason, the borrowing of biblical categories for the purposes of a transcendental aesthetic also fails to convince; for Kabôd-Doxa in the Old and New Testaments refers to the sovereign and majestic freedom of the God of gracious covenant and absolute love. But Heidegger wishes to banish all that has to do with the will (which decides, elects, judges) from the realm of being.[136] Thus the primal act of man, despite all ec-stasy, remains a pure act of 'thinking',[137] which is to be the primal ground of existence on this side of theory and practice.

In the work of Heidegger, the true wonder at the fact that something exists rather than nothing does not run its full course, for it points to a freedom which he does not wish to perceive. However strange this may seem, his emergent and fate-like φύσις remains within the horizon of Greek, essentialist, even naturalistic, thinking. Although he grasps, beyond Aristotle, the Thomist distinction between Being and the existent as a mystery impenetrable to reason, and can from this position accuse both the Greek and the moderns of forgetting Being itself, yet he does not construe this difference in Thomist terms, viz. in the Christian way as a sign of creatureliness, and therefore he falls back from this distinction into a (non-Greek, only apparently Presocratic) identity. The two points of departure of the Christian analogia entis are divided in Heidegger's thought between the early texts (Being and Time and its dependent works) and the later texts, which are separated from the earlier ones by the 'turning-point'; and yet these two halves do not form a whole. In the one we find the 'thrownness' (Geworfenheit) of human existence, but without a throwing agent, and in such a way that the temporal structure of man leads to a finitude of Being and truth; the illumining ec-stasis generates itself into nothingness. But in the other, Being appears as the origin of the 'throw',[138] though 'thrownness' has now vanished and there remains only the principle of sufficient reason (Satz ['principle' and 'leap'] vom Grund) as the leap (Sprung) from and into the origin (Ursprung). The 'turn' merely displays the same thing from the other side.[139] Where the immanent analogy of Being which pertains between the actus essendi and essentia does not deepen to a transcendental analogy of Being between God and the world, it annuls itself by becoming identity and pays the price that it now needs to reconcile within itself the most contradictory elements—as is the case with Giordano Bruno. Here too Hölderlin's Ἓν διαφέρον ἑαυτῷ is the final word.

---

[136] G, p. 60.

[137] M, p. 12.

This does not change the fact that in the modern period Heidegger's project is the most fertile one from the point of view of a potential philosophy of glory. In the face of all unmediated forms of theism, he keeps the process of his thought firmly fixed on the main issue, which is the mystery of the immanent distinction between Being and the existent, with his question ('How does God enter philosophy?').[140] Christian theology as a science loses its entire basis if it thinks that it can develop the revelation of the living God while bypassing the mystery of this distinction, and it sinks accordingly to the status of being a science of existent things amongst others, and will properly be subject to the jurisdiction of philosophical thought. This is more true today than ever before, where theology thinks that without a pholsophical mediation, indeed renouncing even the medium of the human sciences, it can enter into dialogue with the exact and technological (natural) sciences, a dialogue in which it is clearly fated to draw the shorter straw. Heidegger's powerful warnings against technocracy and the ever more terrible philosophical nihilism which is emergent within it are justified, even if no one heeds them any more. They are heeded all the less, of course, because Heidegger has no adequate answer to the question of existence which he raises. A philosophy which will not firmly answer the question of God one way or the other[141] lacks intellectual courage, and a pragmatic and realistic humanity will pass it by and get on with daily living.

---

[138] P, pp. 71, 84.

[139] As 'Sein des Seienden' or as 'Seiendes des Seins': Id, p. 59.

[140] Id, pp. 52f. The decisive answer to the question is given by Gustav Siewerth, Das Schicksal der Metaphysik von Thomas zu Heidegger (1959), ch. 21: 'Wie kommt Gott in die Philosophie', pp. 463–508.

If Christianity, failing to preserve a theology of glory, does not itself wish to fall victim to the new naturalism (of which there are terrible signs in the triumph of Teilhard de Chardin), then it must make Heidegger's inheritance its own and thus apprehend the true intent of the whole period which we have outlined here as 'the classical tradition' and which, as Heidegger has always correctly stressed, makes the past present, not for the reason that it has historical value, but because it is essential for the philosophical task of modernity.

---

[141] P, p. 101; WG, p. 28: 'Questioning itself becomes the highest form of knowledge', U, p. 12.

6. THE METAPHYSICS OF SPIRIT

a. The Other Possibility

The return to classical antiquity, in order to find a way out of the confusion of the late Middle Ages, would have been successful in the long run only if antiquity had been understood as an Advent-like openness looking to Christianity, not as a comprehensive ('cosmic-religious') form in which Christianity was embedded as a potentiality (perhaps the greatest one of all), nor indeed as a base for an anti-Christian reaction. It also proved impossible to invest fundamentally pre-Christian forms with Christian substance in order thus to salvage them. Eckhart was the first (in a radicalisation of Augustine) to point to a second way: that of making everything dependent on the personal relationship (which the biblical revelation had opened up) between the infinite and the finite spirit, and to interpret the spirit, free and self-possessing Being, as the quintessence, the meaning and the reason for all forms of non- or sub-spiritual Being. Now it was the Christian 'stage of consciousness' which produced its own metaphysics from within itself, but without holding any longer to the pre-Christian metaphysics of Nature as a prior and grounding stage. We have already made the acquaintance of this kind of metaphysics of the spirit, still wholly within the Christian theological sphere, as 'the metaphysics of the saints', which however dwelt so much on the highest religious act of indifferentia (of the finite spirit in orientation towards the infinite one) that the philosophically grounding substructure remained largely undeveloped, thus causing their 'mysticism', which lacked a metaphysical foundation, to perish on account of its unreality. Nicolas of Cusa was the first to take Eckhart's project further by erecting a (classically construed) analogy between the primary Creator-spontaneity of God and the secondary creativity of man, both being an essential exposition of the respective unities of spirit. This seed would soon germinate, but not without absorbing into itself one further late medieval motif.

The shift of emphasis to the spiritual and personal relationship between man and God was, from the point of view of the history of ideas, not only a step forward (from 'Nature' to 'Spirit'), but also a step back. During the Nominalist period the universe lost its theophanic radiance—the devout no longer encounter God outside but only within themselves. At the same time, the universe loses its hierarchic gradation and collapses into 'matter' which, itself without essence, becomes that which is merely mathematically calculable and which is present only to be exploited by man. This is where the source of the materialist mentality lies, which was and still is both the effect and again the cause of the retreat of the (devout) spirit from the world. Thus the philosophy of spirit—in which the immediacy of relationship between the divine and the human spirit is no longer mediated by the universe—is on the one hand the fruit of Christianity and, on the other, its greatest threat, because the material conception of the world tends, of itself, towards materialism. The exact natural sciences are the progeny of positivistic Nominalism and are the dialectical counterpoint to the Devotio Moderna; they will strengthen the philosophy of the spirit with their technical triumphs and, since the latter lacks any mediating understanding of Being, will drive it of necessity into a Monism of spirit. The stages reached and the paths taken can be drawn up virtually a priori.

1. Descartes picks up the gauntlet of the natural sciences: he leaves the external world as mere matter ('extension' and thus 'automation') to the exact sciences and removes the focus of metaphysics to the 'I think', from which he extracts the existence of both finite and infinite spirit. Augustine and Christianity, even religious interiority (including that of Luther), are salvaged, and at the same time the way forward is prepared for modern research. The universe is retrieved again—in a classical universalism—by the analogy of spirit: if we are raised with Spinoza and Leibniz to God's point of view, then we can now restore the interrupted communication between God and matter occasionalistically (via God), or read matter as a mode of spirit (Leibniz) or drop it as mere appearance (Berkeley).

2. Metaphysics gains by the fact that the natural sciences are given a free hand; just as, with Nicolas of Cusa, man is established as the analogous and 'enigmatic' co-creator with God, even if only in the unreal domain of numbers. But if the external world is nothing other than extension (i.e. matter as infinite divisibility), where does the distinction lie in the long run between God's exemplary creation and man's technical calculation? The confinement of philosophy to the domain of spirit is particularly inclined to lead to an inescapable identity: 'I think—I am' is not a 'conclusion' but an immediate intuition, if not in a psychological sense, then certainly in a speculative one. The Eckhartian position of the 'spark of the soul' as a point of identity beyond all analogy is reached in Descartes by a fundamentally philosophical method and is developed in Kant's 'original and synthetic unity of apperception', in Fichte's Ich, in Schelling's point of indifference and in Hegel's process of the spirit. On account of the diversity of its forms, it is difficult to discern any possibility of halting this process. If it is to be understood, all thought-content must be incorporated into the form of 'I think—I am', which is formally unsurpassable and thus absolute (divine). Accordingly, the question must be asked: what can 'glory' possibly still mean within the philosophy of spirit? From the point of view of the unity of apperception or of the logical subject, there can be only one spirit, only one Lord; in the event that 'glory' is fitting for it, over against the material world which it 'glorifies', then this can only be a 'self-glory'.

3. The second alternative, which is that of Eckhart and Nicholas of Cusa, comes to the fore. This is the co-creative aspect of the finite subject, not only in the sense of a causa secunda, but of an immediate involvement in the Causa Prima, whose inner form it already possesses. The point at issue here can only be the distinction between the absolute character of the spirit in terms of its form and its content, a distinction which the 'world-process' must serve to eliminate, interpreted in such a way that in its 'real' aspect it is construed as the 'evolution' of Nature into 'spirit' and in its comprehensive 'ideal' aspect as that which is projected a priori from the (formal) absolute spirit itself and that through which the spirit attains its totality of content and existence. A fully-developed philosophy of spirit, whether Christian, non-Christian or anti-Christian, will always have to accept this circle as inevitable, and it does so all the more willingly when the old cosmology too seems thereby to be surpassed and to be assumed into the final synthesis: 'Nature' (which somehow comprehends the finite spirit) is not intelligible without the prior projection of an (absolute) spirit, but the source of that projection is now at the same time the human spirit, which thus also grasps its own process of becoming within the universe (in the evolutionary sciences) and thus possesses the latter definitively as its own 'material' 'beneath itself'.

There are of course many different variations of a philosophy of this kind, although it does have an ultimate destination in historical terms, viz. the ever more consistent representation of the identity which is concealed within it. In the initial period, the influence of the classical, Christian analogy is still so strong that the renewal of the philosophy of spirit has the appearance precisely of a revaluation of the most magnificent visions of the past, and this without doubt in the best faith, in subjective terms, of the philosophising Christian (or Jew). These are the great systems of the Baroque, which understands itself to be the highest dynamicisation of the Western tradition, and thus to be a 'glory as never before'. Meanwhile the primary shock of the analogy diminishes, and this alone can distinguish in absolute terms the glory of representation from represented glory. There is no possibility of coming to a halt on the path from Leibniz to Hegel. The world is philosophically constituted from the divine grounds, and the Christian thinker feels himself empowered to achieve this, indeed challenged to do so, by the biblical self-revelation of those same divine grounds. In essence this is a titanism of piety which perceives only later what it has conjured forth and which, as Heidegger remarks, will find climbing out of its pit of error more difficult than falling into it.

b. The Immediacy of the Man-God Relation

I. DESCARTES

Descartes' spare speculative system,[1] which must be viewed as the beginning of the modern philosophy of spirit, appears as a retreat from all that is subject to doubt to the last rampart of the indubitable. All that presents itself as external world might be as unreal as our dreams; all that we have are mental representations ('ideas'), which include the involuntary sense-impressions. This retreat in doubt is on the one hand the declaration of our freedom and ascetic power: 'detachment from the senses' (se détacher[2]), 'turning away' (se détourner[3]), and is portrayed as a unique and grave conversion of life (entreprendre sérieusement une fois en ma vie de me défaire . . ., commencer tout de nouveau dès les fondements[4]). We should 'pull everything down and start again',[5] and 'close our eyes and ears, turn away from all the senses and banish all the images of corporal things from the spirit'[6] in order to become free for the 'contemplation of truth'.[7] The process requires not only a period of training of 'several months or at least several weeks,'[8] but also each time afresh particulière attention,[9] grande application d'esprit,[10] soigneusement recherché,[11] circonspection[12] and 'seriousness of mind'.[13] 'Intuition' does not take place by itself, but requires un esprit pur et attentif.[14] This endeavour displays the other side: our truth is not something which is fundamentally certain; that we can doubt is not only an advantage of our freedom,[15] but proves the uncertainty of our entire existential situation. What the senses offer us as external world, even as human community, may be sufficient for a practical form of knowledge, for biological conservation, self-advancement and self-defence,[16] but the reality which corresponds to this in terms of theory remains uncertain. Disillusionment when we thought we were certain makes us extremely suspicious,[17] and even the intuitions of mathematical regularity lack ultimate inner clarity and transparence:[18] when they are before our eyes, they appear indubitable, but when we look away, we are not so sure. While proximity to intuition is a criterion of truth,[19] for the most part Descartes speaks prudently here in nuanced terms of 'sufficiently clear and distinct' and so forth, which does not wholly exclude the possibility of subjective delusion. Behind this there is only the apparently indivisible point where consciousness (pensée embraces for Descartes all the acts of consciousness, including will, endeavour, mood, imagination etc.)[20] and being coincide.[21] Of course this is possible only so long as I think,[22] but since thinking is the form of my self-possession, in which I do not perceive myself to be dependent upon any any mediating thing, therefore I think continuously, as light is always radiant.[23] In comparison with this kind of evidence for self-possession, the outer world, even one's own body, emerges only as a likelihood, and, in the event that it has extra-mental existence, it could only be the 'Wholly Other' of the spirit (Non-Self), viz. instead of pure indivisibility pure divisibility, pure materiality, pure automatism, which is true also for our own body and for the animal kingdom.[24] The classical and scholastic 'famed arbor Porphyriana' (of the degrees of Being: Existence, Life, Feeling, Consciousness) is thus 'disdained' and dropped in favour of a bald opposition.[25]

---

[1] Descartes, Oeuvres et Lettres, ed. André Bridoux (Pléïade, Gallimard 1952). Règles pour la direction de l'esprit = RE; Discours de la Méthode = D; Méditations = M; the appended Résponses = 1 Rp, 2Rp, etc.; Principes de la philosophie = P; Traité de l'homme = T; Recherche de la Vérité (fragment) = RV; Lettres = L.

[2] M, Abrégé 262.

[3] 2 Rp 370.

[4] 1 M 267; cf. P 1, 571.

[5] RV 888.

[6] 3 M 284.

[7] P 571.

[8] 2 Rp 367.

[9] Ibid. The concept recurs immediately.

[10] 5 M 315.

[11] 1 Rp 355, 357.

[12] P 576.

[13] 2 Rp 371 and frequently.

---

[14] RE 43.

[15] P 1, 6; 573.

[16] 6 M 328.

[17] 4 D 142.

[18] P 1, 5; 572.

[19] 'Ideas that are clear and distinct cannot be other than true': D 152 and very often.

[20] 2 M 278.

[21] 4 D 147; 2 M 275.

[22] 2 M 277.

[23] L (19.1.1642) 1142; 4 M 148: 'une substance dont toute l'essence ou la nature n'est que de penser' (a substance the whole essence or nature of which consists only in thinking).

And yet Descartes retrieves in another form what has been discarded. Self-possessing consciousness has the truth directly: in the intuitus,[26] which is prior to every logical conclusion,[27] 'I have never doubted truth, it always seemed to me une notion si transcendentalement claire that it is unmistakable',[38] it is expérience, témoignage intérieur.[29] Here for Descartes there presides that original clarté, which inherits and develops the classical and scholastic claritas. Nevertheless, this luminous quasi-Absolute of the unity of being and consciousness cannot ground itself. Why not? On the one hand, because I had to call everything into question in order to reach this point, and was able to do so: 'Consequently my being was not perfect, for I clearly saw that knowing is a higher perfection than doubting, and so I came upon the idea of investigating where I had learned to conceive of something more perfect than myself'.[30] Here it becomes evident that doubt is not only capacity but also incapacity (to ground the being-in-itself of the phenomenal world), that it is in no way merely a trick of method in order to isolate a phenomenon by blacking it out, but is an existential intermediate position between God and nothingness.[31] This experience necessarily contributes to the manner in which I know myself to be identical with being-[24] L (3.1638) 1003–1004; RV 896.

[25] RV 892.

[26] RE 43f.; intuitus mentis: L 1060.

[27] 'Aucun syllogisme': 2 Rp 375 and frequently.

[28] L (16.10.1639) 1059.

[29] RV 899.

[30] 4 D 148.

[31] 'Je suis comme un être entre Dieu et le néant' (I am like a being between God and nothingness): 4 M 302.

consciousness, so that time enters this circle and I cannot vouch for my subsequent being, nor, therefore, can I create myself.[32] Now these deficiences are known to me and thus the idea exists in me 'of certain perfections which I do not myself possess'. I therefore recognise myself to be 'dependent' upon an absolute consciousness of Being the idea (idée) of which is 'inborn' within me, both in my being (existentially) and in my consciousness ('objectively'), which at their root are one. The way in which we explicate Descartes' 'proof for the existence of God', whether we see it as an apparently 'ontological' proof or as a proof based upon the contingency of Being, is therefore of little consequence, for both are for him two sides of the same coin.[33] The notion that 'the concept of a most perfect being implies its existence' is always deduced from the fact that this 'concept' is present in a being whose existence is imperfect and which can draw this conclusion only because it experiences within itself through its own existence the distinction between Dasein and perfect (or necessary) Being. Only on these grounds can Descartes express the 'different degrees of reality or entity', not only of the existing substances but also of ideas and their objective content.[34] He calls for 'serious attention and consideration' in order to understand just this point: 'It is an [intuitive] première notion that all reality or perfection, which only exists objectively in ideas, must exist formally and eminently in their causes' so that if we possess the concept of a being which grounds both itself and us, then this being must also exist.[35] This idea is greater than I am[36]—it is evidently greater even than what I could ever become (for it is contradictory to suggest that I could ever be a God in the state of becoming),[37] and it is greater than my fellow men. But I know too that ideas can be merely the products of a consciousness, and thus the idea of God in me is like 'the artist's personal mark in his work'.[38] For Descartes this is wholly central in the identity of being and consciousness in so far as the occurrence of the latter is the last refuge from the unreality and dream-reality of earthly existence which presses in on all sides, which fact however recalls the quality of this being-consciousness: in the ideas of things there is much that is 'confused and obscure, since they participate in nothingness, that is, they are so confused in us only because we ourselves are imperfect'.[39] Therefore I not only know my striving for something more, but also the fact of my being radically and incontrovertibly surpassed by something that is absolutely More, something that is eternally greater than I can ever be.[40]

---

[32] 3 M 297–298. 'Were I alone and independent of everyone else, i.e. in such a way that I would have been able out of my own power to possess the little measure of perfect Being that I might have possessed, then should I also have been to give myself everything else that I was aware of lacking, and I should thus myself have been infinite, eternal, immovable, all-knowing and all-powerful.' 4 D 149; in a similar manner, 3 M 296.

[33] Cf. for example, 2 Rp 372, P 1, 13–18.

[34] 'There is more objective reality in the idea of the substance than in the idea of the accident, and more in the idea of the infinite substance than in the finite substance.' 2 Rp 394–395; cf. 3 M 290.

[35] 2 Rp 371.

[36] 3 M 290–291, 294.

Henceforth the absolute ascendency can be given to God in the cogito-sum precisely because He makes Himself present within it only through His 'personal mark' ('which does not need to differ from the work itself'), the mark, that is, of createdness. He 'created me in a sense in His own image and likeness, and I understand this likeness (which contains the idea of God) with the same faculty with which I understand myself. For when I reflect upon myself, then I not only recognise that I am imperfect, incomplete and dependent upon Another, always striving and yearning as I press on towards something which is better and greater than myself, but I understand at the same time that the One upon Whom I depend possesses within Himself all these great things for which I yearn and the ideas of which I find within myself, not only in an indeterminate way or only potentially, but in such a way that He enjoys them in reality now and eternally, and thus is God'.[41] From this emphasis upon the cogito, light falls on all the darkness in the surrounding world: from God there flows the light of its being too, and thus of its truth, for in God truth and truthfulness are of necessity one: 'Thus it is plain enough that God cannot deceive' as could perhaps an esprit malin. The cogito does not reveal a gnostic demiurge, but directly reveals the highest radiance of the Being of the Good (of Plato and Plotinus), under the Christian sign of a free and good Creator who also grounds the practical, biological interrelationship of man and his surrounding world in his own ultimate truth and truthfulness of Being. At the end of the third Meditation, the thinker Descartes worships this God, who is not however Pascal's Dieu des philosophes, in the act of philosophical adoration: before passing on to other themes 'it seems to me proper to pause for a moment in the contemplation of this all-perfect God, to take time to consider His wonderful properties, to reflect upon, to wonder at and to adore the incomparable beauty of this immense light, at least in so far as the strength of my spirit permits me, for it is struck blind before it'. Descartes speaks here of the 'divine majesty'[42]; the light falls upon him by virtue of an original counterblow, and not at all on account of any continuity or peaceful speculative transition from a likeness to its original.

---

[37] 3 M 295–296, where he takes up a position in advance against the later idealism: 'Je comprends fort bien que l'être objectif d'une idée ne peut être produit par un être qui existe seulement en puissance' (I understand perfectly well that the objective being of an idea cannot be produced by a being that exists only potentially).

[38] 3 M 299.

[39] 4 D 152.

[40] 2 Rp 374–375: 'cette puissance que j'ai de comprendre qu'il y a toujours quelque chose de plus à concevoir' (this power which I have to understand that there is always something more to conceive of): this is Anselm's formula, which we have already encountered in various adaptations in the course of our path through history.

Thus the book of Meditations is composed 'for the glory of God',[43] although Descartes is everywhere careful not to cross the border dividing pure philosophy from theology.[44] He is concerned, as was Augustine, with 'God and the soul' (the external world, the less certain reality, is deciphered only after the dissolution of this dual unity).[45] Descartes does not dare to face up to the third Kantian idea of 'immortality' because God in His freedom could still destroy the soul, although of itself it outlives the body.[46] God 'in whom all the treasures of wisdom and science are hidden' emerges from the cogito as that which is 'most intimately known',[47] and the cogito, in order to see it, requires the grande application d'esprit mentioned at the beginning, which frees itself by ascetic means from the divertissement of the persistently impinging images.[48] This endeavour causes the occurrence of that 'counterblow', by which the cogitor becomes visible in man's cogito (as Baader felicitously expresses Descartes' idea), and thereby also and for the first time (and not for instance as the inner form of the cogito!) the absolute all-grounding cogito of God.

---

[41] 3 M 299–300.

[42] Ibid. 300.

[43] 'Ce traité qui regarde la Gloire de Dieu' (this treatise which is concerned with the glory of God): L (7.1640) 1074; cf. 2 Rp 366; 'La Gloire de Dieu à laquelle tout ceci se rapporte' (the glory of God with which all of this is related): accompanying letter to M 259.

[44] L (27.4.1637?) 963–964.

The absolute primacy of the Augustinian (and Newmanian) 'God and soul' means however that for me Being, goodness and the Thou emerge only in relation to God as the 'Other', and thus there is no way that leads to God via the being of the world and the human thou. The destructive consequences of this exclusion can be felt throughout the whole of the philosophy of spirit which now begins. One reason for this is that the sum is not resolved in the cogito because all the thought-contents (idée, νόημα) which inhabit the thought process (idée, νόησις) are never more than objectified 'reality', and never present existence, and the criterion of truth is no longer situated in Being but only in the 'clarity and distinctness' of the idea, which comes to be the entire representation of the thing in itself (das Ding an sich).[49] The road to Leibniz, Kant and Hegel is open, and also to Husserl's reading of Descartes in which doubt (ἐποχή) methodically serves the purpose of bringing into light the liberation into existence of the νόημα from the νόησις. Already in Descartes, the idea of truth has become dialectical, for if the [45] 4 D 151; 3 M 286.

[46] L (24.12.1640?) 1105.

[47] 4 M 301, and already 4 D 151; cf. L (3.1637) 962.

[48] 5 M 315.

[49] Cf. what was said above about Suarez, pp. 000.

soul is really 'nothing other than thought', then we cannot see why it should not be 'pure thought' and thus contain the criterion for truth immanently within itself, as the relation between the νόησις and the 'clarity and distinctness' of its νοήματα. Nevertheless, Descartes wishes to locate the guarantee of truth in God, where essence (idée) and existence are one and thus the creaturely distinction between spirit (subject) and world (object) can be grounded and preserved.[50] The forgetfulness of Being in the thought of the cogito should cause the extinguishing of existence (sum) within the cogito, but now the latter calls the classical hierarchy of Being (the quarta via of Augustine and Thomas) to its aid in order to ground thought and being not in the ego but in God. The Ontological Distinction (between finite and infinite existence) is most clearly held by Descartes in his theory that man's reason is finite while his will (striving, eros) is infinite: a Platonic idea, mediated by the Franciscan school, which finds expression in Kant in the distinction between pure and practical reason and in the modern Christian Kantian school (including the superseding of Kant: Blondel, Maréchal, Marc, Rahner inter al.) as the distinction between conceptual knowledge and the infinite dynamism of the spirit, représentation and affirmation.[51]

But there is one other line which must be drawn from this Cartesian thought which is forgetful of Being to the various forms of spiritual metaphysics of his century (Francis de Sales, Lallement, Bérulle, Fénelon), which in a similarly devout immediacy of God to consciousness which was likewise forgetful of Being, was inclined to ignore the world and our fellow men. Because the Thou, which is the hard criterion for truth and for Being, is missing here on both sides,[52] this philosophy and spirituality of divine glory lacks the antibodies against pantheism, and hot on its heels logical atheism, in which every kind of classical and Christian glory collapses in favour of a solipsistic universal subject in which freedom and necessity must coincide. The path from Descartes to Spinoza and to Leibniz is a logical one.

---

[50] 4 D 148, 151.

[51] 4 M 305: 'Il n'y a que la seule volonté que j'expérimente en moi être si grande, que je ne conçois point l'idée d'aucune autre plus ample et plus étendue: en sorte que c'est elle principalement qui me fait connaître que je porte l'image et la ressemblance de Dieu' (There is only the one will which I experience in myself as so strong that I do not at all conceive the idea of another ampler and wider will: so that it is principally this that makes me know that I bear the image and the resemblance of God). Cf. 306, 307: all error comes from the fact that the will is broader than the understanding, so that I 'posit' things that I do not know with sufficient clarity.

2. SPINOZA

Descartes handed the external world over to 'exact' materialistic science as its 'material' in order to preserve the inner world for philosophy and religion as the site of the analogy of Being between God and the soul. This dualism cries out to be superseded all the more in view of the fact that the external world has shrunk to mere extension (which can be dealt with just as easily as 'the form of external intuition' [Anschauung]) and truth is reduced to the inner relation between the soul and its ideas ('concept' and 'intuition' [Anschauung]). Under such preconditions, it was the task of the two great Baroque philosophers to rethink the classical and traditional Christian metaphysics: Spinoza and Leibniz, of whom Leibniz is by far the stronger and more comprehensive thinker.

Spinoza[1] anchors thought and extension (spirit and body), as the two attributes of God (the only ones known to us), in His unique and absolute substance; all finite essences and their variations are the modi (or states) of these attributes. In this way, all Cartesian distinctions are assumed into an ultimate point of identity: (1) The distinction between God and the world is levelled out by becoming that between substance and the modi (accidents) which inhere within it. (2) The distinction between divine and human knowledge is reduced to that which obtains between precise (i.e. clear and distinct, spiritual) and imprecise (obscure, confused, sensual) concepts, from which the Cartesian distinction between finite intellect and infinite will (eros, dynamism) is expressly deduced.[2] (3) Finally, the distinction between essence and existence, which in God are naturally identical, is reduced to the dependence of the finite upon God directly (existence) and upon the conceptual whole (essence). Since God is spirit as well as extension,[3] He is the unity of logos and physis for which the Stoa, which dominates in seventeenth-century ethics,[4] provides the model. The contributions of Neoplatonists, such as Leone Ebreo, have to conform to this 'Stoic' identity, i.e. the eros must adapt itself to the dominant form of apatheia, all the more so since the Stoic clarity of thought (even in the philosophical and divine realm: as κατάληψις) has now taken on the modern 'exact'-scientific form. Spinoza understands a concept to be an inner conception and spawning of the spirit (per ideam intelligo Mentis conceptum quem Mens format);[5] therefore, it can wholly correspond to the object (adaequata),[6] even in so far as God is concerned as thought-content, and thus be 'real' (per realitatem et perfectionem idem intelligo).[7] In a formal sense (by the affirmation of the infinite attributes of the substance) Spinoza retains the superiority of God over the world, but since God as absolute thought necessarily knows all his modi and, on account of the absolute identity of knowledge and will in Him, just as necessarily determines them, everything possible becomes actual, and does so by necessity: God's freedom is only the fact of His not being determined by anything other than Himself.[8] 'Things could not have been created by God in any other way or in any other sequence than they were'.[9] It makes sense to speak of 'contingence', therefore, only with respect to 'our deficient cognitive faculty',[10] for 'things have been created by God in the highest perfection and proceed by necessity from the most perfect existing nature'.[11] Spinoza thus returns to Scotus Erigena's Natura naturata.[12] Philosophical hauteur has rarely expressed itself in more absolute terms than here; once again there is a preference for speaking of the vulgus, the common herd who are incapable of thought and for whom the freedom of God seems despotism; 'what I have to say will not be properly understood by anyone who does not greatly beware confusing the power of God with the power or rights of earthly kings'.[13] Actual power is only the precise knowledge which God (and the man who is a philosopher in God) possesses; no opposition to or assault upon the demonstratio ordine geometrico of metaphysical ethics is possible.

---

[52] The 'Thou' of one's fellow-man falls likewise under the category of the things in the external world that could be a dream, 4 D 151: all the 'ideas' that are not more perfect in Being than my 'ego' could have been produced by myself; this category includes not only the ideas of the things of nature, but also those of my fellow-men: 3 M 291–292. The problem of intersubjectivity is not posed, but is presupposed as a fact: 'car tous les hommes ayant une même lumière naturelle, ils semblement devoir tous avoir les mêmes notions . . .' (for since all men have one and the same natural light, it seems that they must all have the same notions), L (16.10.1639) 1059.

[1] Spinoza, Opera. Im Auftrag der Heidelberger Akademie der Wissenschaften ed. Carl Gebhardt, 4 vols. (Heidelberg, C. Winter, no date). The Ethica (in Vol. II) quoted by Pars and Propositio (e.g., III, 2); Definitio = df, Axioma = ax; Demonstratio = d; Scholium = sch; Corollarium = c.

---

[2] II 49 sch.

[3] The last point is justified in detail at I 15 sch.

[4] Cf. Vol. III of this work, p. 189 (Eng. tr.).

[5] II df 3.

[6] II df 4.

[7] I df 7.

Human thinking in constant association with extension or corporality, which is just as absolute and which plays a major role for Spinoza as dietetics,[14] must participate in the absolute thought of the Natura naturans within the Natura naturata. In the same way that God himself is all his modi, and is so in the freedom of his own being, man must raise himself above all the forms of his addictions to his 'attacks' (affections) as passions (παθήματα, Leiden-schaften) and must transform them by the clarification of their confusion and imprecision into the spiritual precision of self-possessed actions.[15] The overcoming of this distinction between passio and actio (corresponding to the Stoic path towards apatheia) is necessarily at the same time rightly ordered love of self (which is the basis of all virtue)[16] and love of God (since God is the self of my self, the achieved universal perspective of thought). The virtuous man obeys only himself,[17] and is with good conscience the perfect utilitarian,[18] precisely when he loves God for God's own sake. Altruistic love follows (in a truly Stoic or Buddhist way) only on the basis of identity of generic nature and the closest relationship in individuality.[19] In man, amor is identical with cupiditas[20] (as is being human itself) in so far as the latter (as 'eros') strives for the totality, preferring it to everything that is only partial. It is precisely for this reason that there is no amor in God, any more than there is hatred or joy or sadness, because God Himself is the totality which is complete in itself.[21] The one who loves God cannot, therefore, strive for or expect God to love him in return.[22] In so far, however, as the spiritual love of man for the absolute (amor Dei intellectualis)[23] is itself absolute and eternal (and thus also unoriginate), it is 'a part of God's infinite love for Himself',[24] and (only!) to that extent does God love men.[25] But this love remains a limiting concept, adjoining that of cupidity, which in the critical moment eliminates itself on the grounds that in absolute knowledge which is attained and contemplated ordine geometrico, it is at most only the absolute and contented assent (acquiescentia)[26] to the intuition of truth which can prevail, but not love. This is the pathos which predominates in Hegel's absolute knowledge and in Nietzsche's Song of Yes and Amen, and which can just as easily be the pathos of a ('modern'), absolutely emotionless realism that is impervious to all love, all enthusiasm and all wonder.

---

[8] I df 7.

[9] I 33.

[10] Ibid. sch. 1.

[11] Ibid. sch. 2; cf. II 3.

[12] Addition to II ax 5 (Gebhardt II 86).

[13] II 3 sch.

[14] 39 and sch.

[15] III df 3: si . . . harum affectionum adaequata possimus esse causa, tum per affectum actionem intelligo, alias passionem. Cf. Generalis Definitio at the end of III. On the form of the active taking-possession: III 1 d.

---

[16] Conatus sese conservandi primum et unicum est virtutis fundamentum, IV 22 c.

[17] Sibi parere. V 41 sch.

[18] IV appendix 8.

[19] Ibid. appendix 9f.

[20] IV 41 d.

[21] V 17 d, c.

[22] V 19.

[23] V 32 c, V 33.

[24] V 36.

[25] Ibid. c. When Spinoza says, Mentis amor intellectualis erga Deum est ipse Dei Amor quo Deus seipsum amat, this is (in philosophical pantheism) the same doctrine as that of Karl Barth in theological theopanism, because in each case the only possible mediatory position of the analogia entis is rejected. Once again, however, we must draw attention to the dangerous closeness to Fénelon. Leibniz will be aware of this, and will seek to avoid the danger.

For the Spinozian 'spirit', the world exists in an extra-human sense only as 'material': it contains 'nothing in which the spirit could find joy', 'the consideration of our interests does not require that we should be concerned to conserve it', rather, we can 'destroy it or turn it to our advantage in every possible way'.[27] The absolute technicisation of our world is demanded on the basis of this mystical form of realism; in the axiom that knowledge is power, the proximity to Hobbes (whom Spinoza has studied exactly) is established. Ethics is both at once: knowledge (as clarification of obscure sentiments) and power as self-mastery and as mastery of the world, in an equitable state of mind which forbids feelings such as compassion,[28] humility[29] and contrition,[30] judging these to be inimical to man's strength. Here, too, the path to Nietzsche lies open.

The geometric armour surrounding Being—not only in terms of method but also of content—eradicates all 'glory': everything is radically comprehended in the 'precise idea'. Unknown attributes of God possess no radiance. Spinoza knows and tolerates gloria, but only as justified renown that pertains to God and the saints.[31] When he refers to the biblical kabôd, he equates it with the acquiescentia.[32] But because ethical achievement, the ascent to God's vantage point, is difficult, Spinoza can conclude his ethics with an adaptation of Plato's χαλεπὸν τὸ καλόν, Omnia praeclara tam difficilia quam rara sunt.

---

[26] IV appendix and frequently.

[27] IV appendix 26.

[28] IV 50.

[29] IV 53, cf. IV appendix 22.

[30] IV 54.

[31] III 30 sch.; IV 58.

[32] V 36 sch.

3. LEIBNIZ

There has surely never been a Christian philosophy with such a triumphalistic claim to totality as that system which knows all things, considers all things and reconciles all things and which is the work of the Baroque uomo universale, Leibniz.[1] He is the advocate of God and of his world, who fights tooth and nail for the causa Dei (the 'summing-up' in defence of God). In the certainty of victory, the splendour of his intellectual penetration and eloquence irradiates the gloria Dei, for which he fights in every area of philosophy and theology, of traditional classical metaphysics, of the Church Fathers and scholasticism, down to the Baroque neoscholastics, as also (and more fiercely) in all fields of modern natural science, in the researches of mathematics, physics and biology, in technology, law and historical science, European politics and, of course, corresponding to his universalistic thinking, in the field of ecclesiastical ecumenism. Only Hegel will make such similar universal claims, but it is Leibniz, before him, who possesses the greater skills as scientific researcher and explorer. The ethos of his creativity is the boundless affirmation of every (partial) truth, the courage and the will for its seamless integration. In the manner of a general, he plans the most comprehensive strategies for the conquest of the whole of reality, like an architect (an image he loves), he orders the measures, the weights and the proportions. For him truth lies in the disposition of things, which dovetail together; it is in the harmony (ἁρμόττω to connect, fit together, order) of the world that its goodness and its victorious beauty lie: beauté is time and again the key word beside gloire, as the final proof of identity of the discovered truth. It is Leibniz, not Spinoza, who gave German Idealism its aesthetic ethos and, though it drew upon him, the intervening Enlightenment never acknowledged his greatness.

---

[1] Leibniz' works are quoted from the facsimile edition (1959) of the Opera philosophica omnia by J. E. Erdmann (1840), which now includes inter alia the Discours de Métaphysique. (References to page numbers and columns a, b.) We use in addition the edition by Gerhardt (=G), Die Philosophischen Schriften von G. W. Leibniz, 7 Vols., 1875–1890.

Some abbreviations: Discours de Métaphysique = DM (with paragraph); Essai de Théodicée = Th (with paragraph); Principes de la Nature et de la Grâce, fondés en Raison = NG (with paragraph).

Leibniz decisively shoulders the burden of Cartesian dualism, which is the burden of modern natural science for the philosopher. At the age of fifteen, he believes himself to have come out against the 'substantial forms' in favour of atomism, but soon he recognises 'que la source de la mécanique est dans la métaphysique',[2] that even the unity of the atom is not conceivable without interiority or 'energy' and the quality of corporality is in no way to be identified with pure extension, that all things, even including the highest spiritual beings, possess two sides, one mechanical and the other of a total and definitive kind, so that both methods, those of the 'natural' and those of the 'human' sciences (as we would say today) must be applied side by side and without mutual antagonism.[3] This is why he immediately applies himself (in 1669) to reconciling Desartes (and indeed Democritus) with Aristotle,[4] and one year later attacks Nizolius for his nominalism and for his misconception of general concepts, since there are also 'distributive totalities',[5] and no science can be based on pure induction.[6] Now everything takes on a dual aspect, which runs like a vertical intersection through everything to the very threshold of divinity and, because of its verticality, permits an astonishing degree of continuity from the highest angel to the last material atom, embracing human, animal and vegetable life. For the highest spirit is indivisible (ἄτομον) as is the lowest material particle (the atom), but so too is every form of reality lying between them, which are only gradated according to the increasing preponderance of consciousness (spirituality) over unconsciousness (materiality), of clarity and distinction (up to the precise and finally the intuitive) over the merely symbolic and the imprecise (ultimately, the confused and the obscure).[7] Spirit retains its base in Nature (and thus an element of 'inertia' as non-absolute spontaneity or materia prima), matter retains its spiritual spark: it is 'energy', which is embryonic, dormant consciousness.[8] This Pan-Atomism of the Spirit is paid for by the 'windowlessness'[9] and 'autarchy'[10] of all monads or 'entelechies', since each one is an eternally unique embodiment of Being at its own level, which is possible only on the assumption of the creation by God of a 'prestabilised harmony', as it were through the actualisation in the monads of the order of relations, which is anterior to the world, of all the individual, interrelated world-thoughts of God.

---

[2] Letter to Remond de Montfort (10.1.1714) 702a.

[3] DM 21 (826). Thus, the mechanicists 'qui s'attachent à expliquer la beauté de la divine Anatomie' (who insist on explaining the beauty of the divine Anatomy) should not mock the finalists, just as the latter should not despise the mechanicists. While 'the path of the effective causes is direct, but . . . rather difficult, when it is a matter of the individual entities', so that the philosopher recoils from it; 'the path of the final causes is easier and more frequently permits one to see important and useful truths which one would have had to seek for a long time on the other path; anatomy can offer significant examples of this'.

[4] In the letter to Jakob Thomasius 48–54.

[5] 70 a.

[6] 70 b.

The thorough-going parallelism of quantity (for every monad is univocally one) and quality (for none can bear comparison with another) is Pythagorean; as indeed the unity of mathematics and philosophy is primally Greek. To this extent Leibniz is the unsurpassed mediator of tradition to modernity, which can scarcely perceive any more the interrelationship between these two things. It is to this identity also that his attempts belong to create beside the special case of numerical mathematics a kind of spiritual universal language or science of expression (characteristica or mathesis universalis) in which all that can be the object of thought is ordered and fixed in signs and combinations of signs. Leibniz applied himself to this early on (De Arte combinatoria, 1666), worked further upon it all his life and promised himself great things from it for the progress of man's life in the spirit. But the idea of progress already finds its foundation in the dynamic chain of the universe, which is based upon an increasing drawing-out of the dormant unconscious into the light of ever deepening consciousness. In metaphysical terms everything is prepared here for a total evolutionism; even the step from animal to human life is included by careful and exact thought.[11] Thus Leibniz sees (and thus anticipates Hegel) the history of philosophy as unambiguous progress (including reverses) from its origins in the East and among the Greeks via scholasticism to Descartes (who is the 'antechamber' of truth),[12] and to Leibniz himself (in the 'audience hall' between l'antichambre et le cabinet).[13] Every systematic endeavour is thus made in order to forge ahead in the sciences and in philosophy and to smooth out all differences of opinion which serve to hinder that progress,[14] and thus,it is not a static apprehension of God which emerges as the highest bliss in an eschatological vision of eternal felicity but, as for Gregory of Nyssa, an eternal progress of the spirit: for 'of course the highest bliss, whatever enrapturing vision or knowledge of God accompanies it, can never be perfect because God is infinite and cannot be known in His entirety. Therefore our joy can never and will never consist in a full enjoyment of God in which nothing is lacking, for such a thing would dull our spirit, but in a perpetual progression towards new joys and new perfections'.[15] Leibniz already senses an unparalleled degree of progress which is soon to be, when the treasures and blessings of Nature and spirit given by God will be exploited in a much more rational manner.[16] The future of the earth, the perfect kingdom of spirits which is to be founded, fuses with the traits of the eschatological kingdom of God.[17] [7] Meditationes de Cognitione, Veritate et Ideis (1648), 79–81.

---

[8] De ipsa Natura sive de Vi insita actionibusque creaturarum (1698), 154–160.

[9] M §7.

[10] M §18.

---

[11] In the 'theory of preformation', with reference to A. van Leeuwenhoek, e.g. Th §91, M §74.

[12] To Remond 702 a, b.

[13] To a friend on Cartesianism (1695) 123 b.

[14] Cf., e.g. Préceptes pour avancer les Sciences, 165–171. Discours touchant la Méthode et la Certitude et l'Art d'inventer, pour finir les disputes et pour faire en peu de temps de grands progrès, 172–176.

[15] NG §18 (718 b).

[16] Schreiben an Gabriel Wagner vom Nutzen der Vernunftkunst oder Logik, 421 b.

Of God: for Leibniz opposes every form of pantheism,[18] whether of the Stoic or Averroistic, Cabbalistic, Spinozean or Quietist kind, and neither Weigel nor Angelus Silesius escapes criticism. The experience of contingency vis-à-vis wordly being is fundamental. It is true that there exists in the first stage of his thought, as revealed in the seventeen-year-old's first work on the principle of individuation (1663), a form of nominalism which is never fundamentally recanted (omne individuum sua tota entitate individuatur),[19] which is blind towards the Thomist distinction between essentia and esse, which it presents in a way that gets it wholly wrong;[20] and in later works too the monads are described as (Scotist) haecceitas.[21] But the absolute question of Being nevertheless breaks through with vehemence. In De rerum originatione radicali (1697) it appears somehow prior to all well-ordered philosophical principles (of 'sufficient reason', as Leibniz himself formulates it): cur aliquis sit potius mundus, et cur talis?, (cur) aliquid potius existit quam nihil? [22] Simply rendering this entire world-content eternal would in no way solve the problem. It cannot even be solved by finding reasons for the ways things are, why one potentiality rather than another 'forces' its way into reality, 'demanding' existence (in ipsa possibilitate vel essentia esse exigentiam existentiae), which is the higher perfection invested in existent things. For it is impossible that pure potentiality should create its own existence: ratio existentis non est nisi ab existente. The experience of the non-absolute, merely 'hypothetical' necessity of all worldly being is primordial and cannot be referred to a prior cause; it lies deeper than Leibniz's attempt to support the form of the ontological proof for the existence of God, which Descartes in his eyes had inadequately presented, by seeking to show the conceptual possibility of a wholly perfect essence from which alone its existence can be deduced.[23] For Leibniz, the gulf between absolute (divine) to hypothetical (worldly) necessity can only be bridged by absolute, divine freedom, before which there lies open to its choice—and contrary to the identification of God's knowledge and will which we find in Spinoza—an infinite abundance of possible forms of imitation of the divine essence where the best possibility presents itself for realisation, which freedom however is in no way reduced by the choice and realisation of the best. In the Causa Dei, Leibniz depicts the 'becoming' of the divine willing of the world (with a brilliant reworking of the late scholastic distinctions between voluntas antecedens and consequens, inclinatoria and decretoria) as the integration[24] of single acts of volition orientated towards partial goals into an ultimate, supreme will (partly accepting, partly excluding), which as such is subject to a single law worthy of God, indeed is identical with this: to create in freedom the best of all possible worlds. The world, that is, which can most reveal God's absolute grandeur (i.e. His power and wisdom) and His absolute goodness (as love for all creation, desiring the happiness of all).

---

[17] Leibniz becomes intoxicated with the thought of the eternal progress of culture, and finds the highest beauty therein: 'In cumulum etiam pulchritudinis perfectionisque operum divinorum progressus quidam perpetuus liberrimusque totius universi est agnoscendus, ita ut ad majorem semper cultum procedat. Quemadmodum nunc magna pars terrae nostrae culturam recepit, et recipiet magis magisque' (the perpetual and utterly free progress of the whole universe is to be recognised also into the highest peak of the beauty and perfection of the divine works. In the same way, the great part of our world now receives cultivation, and will receive this more and more). If one were to object that the world would thus become paradise, then Leibniz replies that there remains ever more slumbering Being 'in the abyss of things' that 'is to be awakened', 'nec perinde unquam ad terminum pergressus perveniri' (and hence one would never reach the end of the progress), 150 b.

[18] Considérations sur la Doctrine d'un Espirit Universal (1702), 178–182.

[19] §4 (1).

[20] §13f. (3).

[21] DM §9 (819–820).

[22] 147 a, b.

Thus on the one hand the Christian idea of God is applied here as the idea which is philosophically true, because it is the greatest one possible: 'important truths, of which the ancient philosophers had insufficient knowledge, were divinely well expressed by Jesus Christ'.[25] Christianity is included in the philosophical process of the knowledge of God, as is the case in Hegel. In the Definitions Ethicae we find sentences such as this: Justitia est caritas sapientis. Deus omnia creavit secundum maximam harmoniam sive pulchritudinem possibilem. Deus amat omnes. Deus amat amari. Qui non quaerit Dei Gloriam, Deo non oboedit. Qui putat Deum agere optimo modo possibili, iste Deum agnoscit perfectum. Qui Deum amat, amat omnes, etc. [26] It is metaphysical (Spinozean) and Christian ethics in one. On the other hand, metaphysics predominates in so far as the deduction of God's willing of the best of all possible worlds is considered as Mathesis quaedam Divina seu mechanismus metaphysicus,[27] as an intuitively evident law in God's absoluteness which permits the competence of reason to extend to the sphere of revelation in a stricter sense than we find in Anselm or Thomas [28] The transition from Platonic absolute goodness to the Christian love of God appears so simple that the latter has the effect of an 'enlightenment of reason' and of an invitation now to deduce the relationship of God to the world metaphysically on the basis of this principle. A great light is thereby cast, quite unexpectedly, upon the constructions of the theologians, which are often groping, text-centred and fraught with controversy. This is the light which shines forth victoriously in the Causa Dei, fades again in the Enlightment, increases in Schleiermacher and Hegel and their schools, and totally triumphs in theological terms in Karl Barth's dogmatic teaching about election. A light in which Leibniz not only perceives all evil in the world to be comprehended by God's always greater love,[29] but also discerns the grace of God, won by Christ, as offered to all people, nations and religions, [30] even to unbaptised children, [31] a fact that obliges us to cultivate an open, non-exclusive trust in God [32] that radically negates the idea of an arbitrary and despotic God to whom it might occur to predestine certain of His creations to Hell for the sake of the glory of His justice,[33] or even 'to create poor wretches in cruel pity in order that there might be beings to whom He could show mercy: all that is tyrannical and remote from true glory and true perfection, whose worth is to be found not so much in majesty as in an abundance of goodness'.[34] 'Therefore, besides the belief in a despotic God, I would most like to refute the doctrine of [double] predestination',[35] for 'Christ is the grounds for the choice', and is so as Saviour,[36] as 'the head of the created world, through whom the whole of creation will be set free from the slavery of sin into the glorious freedom of the children of God'.[37] In this light, which illumines and shines forth from the depths of God, the philosophically-recognisable primal law, according to which God chooses the absolutely best thing possible, merges with the Pauline exclamation of wonder at the utter profundity of God's wisdom in the working out of salvation history; all this incomprehensible power is in any case contained within this comprehensive primal law, which follows from the philosophical-theological concept of God.[38]

---

[23] Cf. the scholion to the sketch Quod Ens Perfecissium existit (G VIII, 261–262), which Leibniz read before Spinoza in The Hague.

[24] CD § 24–27, ending in §42 (654 b–655 a, 656 a).

---

[25] DM §37 (833 b).

[26] 670 a, b.

[27] De Rerum Originatione redicali, 148 a. The law can be formulated thus: ut maximus praestetur effectus minimo sumptu (that the greatest effect may be furnished at the least cost), 147 b. One may question whether these 'economies' in the divine housekeeping do not in fact express precisely the Christian dimension of God's love, i.e. the 'costs' of the passion of Jesus.

[28] Discours sur la Conformité de la Foi avec la Raison (as introduction to the Theodicy): 'La Raison est l'enchaînement des Vérités, mais particulièrment . . . sans être aidée des lumières de la Foi' (reason is the linking of the truths, but particularly . . . without the helps given by the lights of the Faith), 479 a.

This triumphalism in the defence of God against all possible objections by His creatures entirely corresponds to the philosophical apriorism, which—supposedly without threatening human and divine freedom—assists in the construction of the world in the Divine Spirit itself (between God's intellect and His will) from what is externally necessary. Although Neoscholasticism had long tolerated, permitted and practised such a penetration of human thought into absolute thought, it takes on a new aspect in Leibniz on account of his vertical parallelism in method of mechanism and finalism. This parallelism, which extends from the lowest atom to the highest spiritual monad, should as such be limited to the dimension of created reality; but because this innerworldly space is not dominated by the concept of analogy (from spirit to matter) but by that of identity (in the univocal unum of the monad), it is impossible for the law of analogia entis to prevail effectively between the absolute monad of God and the created monads. It is impossible, in other words, for the activity of the finite spirit, precisely when it is concerned with numbers, to have a merely enigmatic character in Nicolas of Cusa's sense. The question of destiny which is raised there in conclusion (knowledge as conjectura or as 'absolute knowing'?) is decisively answered in favour of the latter term. And from the point of view of logic, this happens not only through permitting the thinking of the natural sciences to enter the province of metaphysics, but also because this realm has already fallen a defenceless victim to a form of mechanistic thought on account of its nominalistic point of departure (which alone makes the monad concept possible) and the neglect of the Ontological Difference of the Thomist school. Herein lies a paradox: the apparent 'turn towards the world' of the natural sciences can only catalogue 'phenomena' which are devoid of Being and for which an aprioristic phenomenism is ready to hand as a saving context.

---

[29] CD §33–39 (655), 2nd and 3rd part of the Théodicée.

[30] CD §110–112.

[31] CD §87.

[32] CD §48, 133; cf. NG §18 (718 a).

[33] §74ff.

[34] CD §76–78, cf. §117. On God's justice, which includes equity and mercy: §50.

[35] CD §131.

[36] CD §134.

[37] CD §49.

[38] DM §31 (830 b–831 a).

The windowless monads communicate with the other monads only in God; they do not view Being and their fellow existents from their own standpoint, but rather intuit them from above, in artificial isolation, as an essential totality within themselves: 'Just as if we were stars which see earthly things far beneath'.[39] We meet once again this classical and [39] Von der Glückseligkeit, 673 a.

---

Dantesque image!

Thus it is the worldly existence of man without the real existence of world, i.e. without the vulnerability of his 'defenceless' being to other beings, primarily his fellow-men. The boundless need to communicate which Leibniz feels is that of a scholar who wishes to gather, order and define the entire culture of spirit in itself. L'âme doit . . . penser comme s'il n'y avait que Dieu et elle au monde. This la met absolument à couvert de toutes les choses exterieures, puisqu'elle seule fait tout son monde, et se suffit avec Dieu.[40] This 'autarchic' 'protectedness', 'non-vulnerability' of human existence lends to Leibniz' 'consciousness of glory' a character untouched by, and beyond the reach of, every kind of tragedy. The finite spirit knows itself to be the expressio[41] of God and the primal light shines in its knowledge, so that between (the light of) Nature and (the light of) Grace once again only harmonia can prevail, which was already the fundamental innerworldly law between the material and the spiritual side of Being.[42] Indeed, the tension between Nature and spirit coincides precisely with that between 'the realm of Nature and that of the spirits': the 'perfect civitas Dei under the best monarch', who inclines towards his subjects and is essentially open to them in love, who shows himself to be humane and gracious (en cela qu'il s'humaine, qu'il veut bien souffrir des anthropologies),[43] is no longer the Augustinian civitas Dei but has already become the universal, human and divine 'realm of spirits' of Hegel.

Nowhere in the classical Baroque does the thought arise that God might have need of the world or of man in order to attain the full abundance of His own being[44] (Böhme is an outsider, and certain utterances of Angelus Silesius are clearly taken from Eckhart), and even the greatest 'thrusting' into reality of the best of all possible worlds does not eliminate for

---

[40] DM §32 (831 a).

[41] DM §35 (832 b).

[42] NG §15 (717 b); M §87 (712), 'harmonie entre le règne physique et le monde moral de la grâce' (harmony between the physical kingdom and the moral world of grace).

[43] DM §36 (833 a).

[44] DM §35 (832 b): 'sa gloire [externe] et notre culte ne saurait rien

Leibniz the freedom of God, and therefore never permits the coincidence of absolute and hypothetical necessity. On the other hand, man is initiated into the thought of God to such a degree and is able to express it with such strength of spirit that with the progress of his discoveries and inventions he can contribute things 'for the benefit of the human race and to the glory of God' which directly further the cause of true religion.[45] Leibniz wishes to see the direct application to theology too of the mira theoremata which he commands, and whose claritas and pulchritudo fill him with the greatest delight (voluptas);[46] and if some thinkers have fallen away from God on account of rigorous science, then it is precisely scientific rigour, taken to its ultimate conclusion, which must lead them back to Him.[47] Here, something of the brilliance of the spirit of great Baroque art is discernible: a certainty in faith, which views the radiance of world harmony as one with the radiance of love of the self-revealing God, which therefore expresses itself in a language which is indistinguishably both of the world and above the world, imposing itself indeed triumphantly, understanding itself to be God's representative, party to all His secrets, and to which it never occurs that the Christian can know not only too little but also too much, thereby forgetting two things: in philosophy Being and in theology the Cross. As in the sacralism of the early Middle Ages, Leibniz constructs an enormous monstrance, but one from which the central monstratum, the night of the Passion, is absent.

4. MALEBRANCHE

Malebranche,[1] a disciple of Augustine like Descartes and like Bérulle, whose Oratory he enters in 1660, is seduced by the ajouter à sa satisfaction, la connaissance des créatures n'étant qu'une suite de sa souveraine et parfaite félicité' (his [external] glory and our worship could add nothing to his satisfaction, since the knowledge of creatures is only a consequence of his sovereign and perfect happiness).

---

[45] On the general characteristics: 164 b.

[46] De vera methodo Philosophiae et Theologiae, 109 a.

[47] 110 b.

[1] Malebranche, Oeuvres Complètes, Vols. 1–20 (Vrin 1858f.), as far as these have been published; otherwise, older editions are used.

play of forces between these two into adopting that extreme form of pre-Kantian philosophy of spirit which turns it into a pious, worldless realm of ghosts which cannot but expose the fundamental flaws of the 'metaphysics of the saints' in the Grand Siècle, and which falls foul of the court of the French revolution as necessarily as Hegel's realm of ghosts will fall victim to Feuerbach and Marx.

From Bérulle he has thoroughly learned the pathos of creaturely nothingness before God and the pure adoration of glory, which he experiences and performs in the interior dialogue of contemplation. Descartes on the other hand persuades him of the importance of retreat from the exterior world to the pure ego with its cogitata, and of the only possible guarantee of truth through the retreat from ego to God. But now the differences begin. While for Descartes the idée is only a (psychological) fact of consciousness, provisionally secured in the cogito-sum, for Malebranche it is originally a self-evident form of (Platonic-Augustinian) objectivity which cannot be derived from the ego, something beyond the ego's powers of invention, and objectification already 'given' with respect to the ego, so that even a provisional guarantee in the thinking subject collapses and behind it there at once arises the form of an absolute 'thinker', which gives the self-evident its clarity, or which reveals itself there—as in its own ideas. Ideas are that which is objectively revealed by the intellectus archetypus to human reason; they are the 'real' in the sense which this word possesses for Descartes and Leibniz: as that which offers itself to the spirit's perception clearly, distinctly and without contradiction. But Malebranche sees more: individual ideas for him are the delimitations of the unlimited divine Being which, as the background to all ideas, is reality itself.[2] But because unlimited, infinite and universal Being cannot be glimpsed by any idea, i.e. by any individual being that is distinct from universal and infinite Being,[3] then it must present itself directly to the cognising spirit: the latter therefore perceives a priori (that is, from God's point of view and not from that of worldly experience) the Ontological Difference (Realdistinktion) and sees thereby truth, which exits primarily in the relation (rapport) between Being (God) and essence (the ideas of God) and secondarily in the relation between the ideas themselves.[4]

---

[2] God is absolute Being who knows himself and everything in himself that is imitable. Vol. 15, 21–22. 'The idea of God or of Being as such, of infinite Being, is no mere construction of thought' . . . since it is evident 'that Being (I do not say, one particular existing being) has its existence through itself, and that Being cannot be without reality, since it is impossible and contradictory to assert the true Being is without existence'. Recherche de la Vérité, IV/II §2 (Vol. 2, 95).

Whether this idea in God is also 'real', viz. created outside God, need not be a matter of concern for man, first because his cognition is in any case far more immediate in this cognitio matutina than it is in any a posteriori form of knowledge; second, because the knowledge of ideas is not only intellectual but also imaginative and sensory (since all perception of ideas is pure 'receptivity' towards the self-revealing absolute Being and its delimitations and the Divine Being can touch the perceiving spirit both through the mind and through the senses); and third, because according to Malebranche and Descartes alike, existing bodies are pure extension (with their various delimitations), so that the ideas of bodies are also 'pure intelligible extension': but now it is inexplicable, or at any rate insignificant, how a 'thought' pure extension is to be distinguished from a 'real' one. Besides, Malebranche wants God Himself, as the origin of all His body-ideas, to be 'infinite intelligible extension', the (spiritual) archetype of all extension therefore. In this he approaches Spinoza but without going the whole way, since by the notion of divine extension he means only that which is the primal idea in God of all worldly extension, as Baader and Schelling would have it, that in God which (in contrast to the created 'spirit') corresponds to created Nature.[5]

Leibniz will criticise this doctrine above all on account of its passive understanding of spirit; it is the same criticism, though with some justification, which Aquinas made of Augustine.[6] Nevertheless, Leibniz cites both Aristotle and Augustine in support of his argument when he speaks of how through the 'light' of insight truth addresses us as with a voice:[7] and it is this experience of the Divine Being, which reveals itself immediately to us, speaking to and touching us, which is Malebranche's chief concern, as it will also be for Heidegger. Leibniz' criticism may well hold true, for without spontaneity there can be no openness of the spirit to the reception of Being. But even worse is the fact that such a pious theologisation of metaphysics—ultimately it is Jesus, God's Word and Son, who comes to meet us immediately in all sensible and intellectual knowledge—is forgetful of every worldly encounter of actual Being and springs over this, if all spirits communicate only in God as their common sun. Thus this philosophy of spirit also lacks the decisive experience of reality: the shock of a head-on encounter with another ego, a dialogue between an I and a Thou which is radically open to its own vulnerable depths of being. This shock was missing also in Bérulle, Condren and Fénelon, which is why their elevated spirituality retains something spectrally unreal, journeying in a world of ideas without a basis in Nature, crudely stated: something élitist for spiritual aristocrats for which, not without reason, the merciless guillotine of the real 'comrades' stands waiting.

---

[3] Recherche III/2, 7 §2 (Vol. 1, 449).

[4] Médit. Chrét. IV, 7–8 (Vol. 10, 38–39); Traité de l'Amour de Dieu [Vol. 14, 7–8].

[5] Entretiens sur la Métaphysique I and II.

c. Kant

I. GLORY 'UNCRITICALLY'

The solitary figure of Kant stands between the epochs.[1] Prior to the publication of his critical masterpiece in 1781 at the age of fifty-seven, the paths of his thinking followed those of Leibniz, Newton and Wolff, in terms not only of morality but also of metaphysics. Thus he fundamentally shared—though under attack by Hume—the Enlightenment's vision of glory: adoration of the absolute divine Ego (Descartes), the beauty of the world order in its progression from matter to spirit as the radiance of God's love (Leibniz), together with the pride of the spiritual autarch, who believes himself to be the representative of the absoluteness of God in the world (Leibniz and Spinoza), matter as 'energy', simultaneously objective and 'phenomenal', the cosmic goal of an eternal progression and the emergence of a world which eternally becomes in an asymptotic relation to God (Leibniz and Lessing). Baumgarten creates for it in addition the first 'Aesthetics' as science: a delimited field of the human καλόν (the confused perception of truth through the senses), which is however progressively 'enlightened', as it emerges into an area of clear and distinct truth, which is still experienced, as with Leibniz, entirely by analogy with the transcendent καλό ν of the classical world. And what Kant takes in with his philosophical mother's milk, he passes on to the generation of Schiller and Fichte, Hegel and Schelling, whose views of the world culminate always in a form of aestheticism in one way or another, in a radiant, eschatological 'world of spirits'. Indeed, Kant himself, who at first acts as a critical interruption in this, constructs the overarching vault of his own work with the Critique of Judgement (and with the Philosophical Theory of Religion), in which he makes himself at the highest level the link between the Enlightenment and Idealism.

---

[6] Discours de Métaphysique (Erdmann 829a) and other works about Malebranche.

[7] 'Deus est enim lumen illud quod illuminat omnem hominem venientem in hunc mundum. Et veritas quae intus nobis loquitur, cum aeternae certitudinis theoremata intelligimus ipsa Dei vox est, quod etiam [alongside Aristotle] notavit D. Augustinus' (For God is that light which illuminates every man who comes into this world. And the truth that speaks within us when we understand the theorems of eternal certainty, is the very choice of God, as St Augustine noted) (Erdmann 82b).

[1] Immanuel Kant's complete works in six vols., Grossherzog Wilhelm

Nevertheless, the critical rupture goes deep; most evidently for us in the fact that together with the fundamental self-

---

Ernst edition (ed. Felix Gross), Insel, Leipzig, 1921. Some abbreviations: Kritik der reinen, der praktischen Vernunft, der Urteilskraft = KrV, KpV, KU; Anthropologie = A; Streit der Fakultäten = StF; Allgemeine Naturgeschichte und Theorie des Himmels etc. = ThH; Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten = GMS; Die Metaphysik der Sitten = MS; Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft = RGV.

limitation of pure theoretical intellect we now see the restriction to the human world of the sphere in which aesthetic utterances are possible: 'Beauty is only for man, i.e. for an existence which though animal is also rational', and not for animals who know only 'gratification', nor 'only for . . . spirits'.[2] The definition of the field of the beautiful, and correspondingly of the material realm of the science of beauty, which begins with Baumgarten (Aesthetica, 1750–1758), is radicalised by Kant's quite different critical delimitation of reason: it is in him that we first find aesthetics as a specific science in the modern sense.

Whatever the nature of Kant's concluding emphases, 'critical Idealism' no longer permits space for an experience of worldly Being as an epiphany of God's glory. But when the theoretical horizons of the rational faculty are narrowed, then there is yet more cause for amazement at the unlimited breadth of its practical outreach: 'glory' is replaced by moral sublimity (Erhabenheit), which finds expression in aesthetic sublimity, and in which the intense experience of glory of the younger Kant is preserved in a wholly positive way. The celebrated sentence in the 'Conclusion' to the 'Critique of Practical Reason' ('Two things fill the mind with a sense of admiration and awe which is ever fresh and ever deepening, the more frequently and persistently it is concerned with them: the star-filled sky above me and the moral law within me . . .; I see them before me and I associate them directly with the consciousness of my existence',[3] can be understood only if we know Kant's growing admiration for the star-filled sky in the Natural History and Theory of the Heavens (1755), a work, full of pathos, which was dedicated to the King of Prussia, where we similarly read in the 'Conclusion': '. . . the view of a star-filled sky on a clear night [gives] a kind of pleasure which only noble souls can know. In the universal stillness of Nature and of the senses, the hidden cognitive faculty of the imperishable spirit speaks an ineffable language and conveys inarticulate concepts which cannot be described but only experienced'.[4] Prior to this, he writes: 'The structure of the world inspires in us a state of silent wonder on account of its immeasurable grandeur and the infinite variety and beauty which radiates from it on all sides. When the idea of all this perfection touches the imagination, then the intellect is seized by another kind of ravishment as it reflects on how so much splendour, so much grandeur flows from a single universal rule in an eternal and precise order'.[5] Until the very end, the 'contemplation of the star-filled sky is sublime';[6] it is the example of the 'splendour in which there is something sublime which is at the same time beautiful'.[7] But the young Kant[8] sees in the infinity of the stellar world the process of creation which is never concluded in time or space and which occurs in each present moment; whereas Newton still saw the movement of the constellations as a primal phenomenon which pointed back directly to the guiding hand of the Creator, Kant (and soon after him Lambert and Laplace) takes a step back to the idea of atomistic primal matter, which, however, is understood as energy and is thus of itself the author of its own space.[9] This primal matter is organised

---

[2] KU §5 (Vol. 6, 61). Cf. §29: The expression 'intellectual beauty or sublimity' is 'not quite correct because these are aesthetic forms of representation, which, if we were mere intelligences . . . would not be found in us at all' (6, 136).

[3] KpV, conclusion (5, 302).

[4] ThH III, conclusion (2, 421–422).

[5] ThH II, 7 (2, 353).

[6] KU (6, 135).

[7] A I, 2 §71 (1, 435).

[8] Since the later Kant reduces the aesthetically sublime sight of the sky to what is truly seen by the sense, excluding that which the understanding presumes to read into this sight: KU (6, 135).

[9] Kant had begun in his first work from this Leibnizian concept of power: 'Thoughts concerning the true estimation of the living powers and the evaluation of the proofs which Herr von Leibniz and other mechanicists have used in the controversy' (1746). The powers bring about their own space: §9 and 10 (2, 30–32); thus 'the dimension of the extension will derive from the laws in accordance with the substances, thanks to their essential powers, seek to unite themselves'. Thus still in ThH II, 7 (2, 355): '. . . the coexistence which makes the space by binding the substances through mutual dependencies', and in the Monadologia physica (1756), Proposition 6: 'Monas spatiolum praesentiae suae definit non pluralitate partium suarum substantialium, sed sphaera activitatis . . .' (the monad defines the little space of its presence, not by the plurality of its substantial parts, but by the sphere of activity) (4, 63).

within the universe purely by the natural laws of attraction and repulsion, forming a central body together with the spheres which orbit around it, and in an unending process (because the extension of matter and of space is infinite) gradually draws sphere after sphere into its ordering movement. This step beyond Newton,[10] whereby matter has been given the power to bring itself progressively from chaos into order, seems to Kant to be far more worthy of God, especially when the general qualities of Nature, which is 'fruitful with fruits both perfect and beautiful', do not form a system enclosed within themselves, but 'harmonise well with the interests of men and the glorification of the qualities of God' in such a way that the worlds of Nature and of spirit 'must have their common origin in a single intellect as the ground and the source of all beings'.[11] 'But in a mechanical form of explanation the beauty of the world is glorified no less than the revelation of omnipotence'.[12]

The particular perspective which characterises Kant and which links him to Leibniz (although Kant goes beyond him) is the thought that matter at its (fiery) central point is at its most dense,[13] and then, as it moves from one orbiting sphere to the next, becomes looser and finer so that life-forms which inhabit the (now habitable) spheres,[14] from Mercury and Venus to the Earth and Mars, Jupiter and Uranus, must have ever finer bodies and thus a higher state of intellectual life.[15] A further consequence is that 'sensuality' and 'confused ideas' submerged in matter come to predominate on those spheres which are closest to the sun, while a precarious balance exists between senses and spirit on Earth and Mars and, on the bigger planets, it is spirit which gains the upper hand, for which reason the cause of sin appears to diminish or even to be destroyed.[16] Because the creative process is progressively unending,[17] and because life moves on stage by stage by virtue of the infinite 'fertility' of Nature[18] and approaches the Godhead asymptotically[19] so that the kingdom of God is progressively revealed within Creation and 'the Godhead Itself appears . . . gloriously . . . in all creatures',[20] the human spirit can look with confidence, 'even with a kind of pleasure' into 'these terrible convulsions', cosmic peaks and troughs;[21] indeed, it can endure the fact that the worlds which are involved in the process of becoming also grow old progressively and fall back into their suns, because in this way Nature rises like a phoenix from the deaths of the worlds, as the suns gain new regenerative strength.[22]

---

[10] ThH II, 8 (2, 390). [11] Ibid. 384, cf. III (417).

[12] Ibid. 389.

[13] Ibid. III (411).

[14] Ibid. (411).

[15] Ibid. (412). So that 'the perfection of the world of spirits . . . should grow and develop in a correct sequence of stages according to the proportion of their distances from the sun' (413).

[16] Ibid. (419–420).

'The fully developed world is consequently hemmed in between the ruins of Nature [once again destroyed] and the chaos of nature [as yet] unformed'.[23] This is of course a feeling for the world which leads far away from Leibniz and the Enlightenment and which even anticipates extreme experiences of insecurity manifest in the 19th and 20th centuries. In a truly Enlightenment manner, Kant wishes to view the 'inadequacies' and threats, which he sees in the fertility of Nature, from the divine point of view, as 'total security',[24] for 'the inadequacies themselves are a sign of superabundances'.[25] It is the Platonic-Augustinian vision of that universe 'which is perfect even with its left-hand side': 'It is the same unlimited fertility . . . which has produced the inhabited heavenly spheres, as well as the comets, the serviceable mountains and dangerous cliffs, the habitable landscapes and the bare deserts, the virtues and the vices'.[26]

---

[17] Ibid. II, 7 (356f.). 'Creation is never accomplished. It has indeed once begun, but it will never cease' (362).

[18] The word returns again and again (361, 365, where he speaks also of the 'unexhausted capacity of generation').

[19] Conclusion of II (381).

[20] Ibid. III (413).

[21] Ibid. II, 7 (367).

[22] Ibid. (370).

[23] Ibid. (368).

[24] Ibid. (371).

[25] Ibid. (390).

[26] Ibid. II, 8 (400).

But it is Nature which needs death as the increase of life and as the fertiliser for life, which in its sun-kernel must be an immense combustion which cannot be approached by any living thing, as Kant depicts it for us in a description which is more than a masterpiece of visionary, Dantesque poetry, but is rather a piece of Welt-Anschauung in the manner of Giordano Bruno's universo, Goethe's Earth-Spirit (Erdgeist) or Nietzsche's all-generating, all-destroying universe:

'With a single glance broad seas of fire can be seen, which send their flames up towards the heavens, raging storms whose violence redoubles that of the flames, storms which, while causing the flames to break their banks, at one moment cover the raised regions of this cosmic body and, in the next, force them back within their boundaries; burnt-out cliffs whose soaring peaks emerge from the flaming gorges and which cause the alternating appearance and disappearance of the sun-spots as they are submerged or exposed by the flooding element of fire; thick clouds of steam, which smother the fire and which, fanned by the violence of the winds, form dark rain clouds, which then disgorge fiery squalls pouring from the heights of the fixed terrain of the sun into the flaming valleys as showers of burning rain; the crashing of the elements, the rubble of burnt-out matter and Nature in mortal combat with is own destruction, Nature which with the most horrendous condition of its own devastation effects the beauty of the world and the profit of creatures.'[27]

Kant does not want us to see the Godhead in this cosmic centre, or even merely 'a God-like Being';[28] he wants to sing the praises of the fortunate soul 'which, seated upon a height amongst all the tumult of the elements and the ruins of Nature, can see the devastations . . . roar past at all times as if beneath its feet'.[29] But it is only by chance that he takes so great an interest in earthquakes, in the empty space beneath our feet, and the 'maze of multifarious passages' through all of which 'a blazing fire' passes,[30] and interest too in a theory according to which yet more volcanic craters should be artificially created in order to give air to the fire that presses against the earth's thin crust from within,[31] since the fire 'is perhaps increasingly gaining the upper hand beneath the uppermost layer of crust . . . and is already nibbling away at the foundations of the highest vault'?[32] In addition, the enthusiastic analogies drawn with regard to the infinity of other worlds and their similarly infinite evolutions are close to what Kant will condemn ten years later (1766) in Swedenborg as the Dreams of a Spirit-Seer, summoning metaphysics back to the small land with many boundaries which it can oversee and (with 'honest Candide') cultivate in a responsible manner.[33]

---

[27] Ibid. II, 7 (377–378).

[28] Ibid. (379).

[29] Ibid. (370–371).

[30] Second Erdbebenschrift (1756) (2, 484–485).

Leibniz had solved the difficulty which metaphysics experiences in coming to terms with modern natural science by the master stroke of his vertical intersection which lends all monadic worldly being a quantitative (exact scientific) and a qualitative (metaphysical) dimension. This was possible, apart from other questionable matters (such as phenomenism and prestabilized harmony), only on condition of an essentialistic understanding of Being as 'essence' or, in other terms, as a concept which is either distinct or confused. In the Inquiry into the Distinctions of the Principles of Natural Theology and Morals (1764), Kant relinquishes this parallelism between science and philosophy in so far as he demands for the latter its own ideal of clarity which can no longer be imitated by exact science (mathematics): while exact science can proceed synthetically with self-constructed definitions, metaphysics can only analyse our given experiences of reality by resolving confused knowledge analytically (or 'phenomenologically' as we would say today).[34] In spite of such modesty of method, Kant does not at first hesitate to portray the possibility of the step from this analysis of experience to the positing of an

---

[31] Third Erdbebenschrift (2, 530–531).

[32] The question whether the earth grows older, consider from a physical point of view (2, 467–468).

[33] 1, 156, 160.

[34] 4, 282f.

'absolutely necessary Being', although it is of the kind which he had outlined shortly before in his work, The Sole Possible Proof for the Demonstration of the Existence of God (1763): i.e. not from the contingency of human existence (for what does human existence mean in this context?—it is not the predicate of a thing but only its absolute position, which the scholastic essentialists described as extra causas), but a priori from the concept of possibility: is it not impossible that nothing should exist, for otherwise there would not be any possibility, which however does exist, even if I think away all worldly being. But that, the elimination of which would also eliminate all possibility, possesses necessary existence.[35] This idea implies an experience of Being, of course, which permits existence to be eliminated, even if only theoretically, while 'possibility' still remains, with the result that the superiority of possibility then points to an absolute existence and, at the same time, to a form of thought which conceives only of 'what is possible', whether it exists or not. This late-scholastic, Descartian, Leibnizian essentialism pervades Kant's thought all the more because the phenomenism which follows from it becomes for Kant the most pressing philosophical problem on account of the English empiricists and sceptics; neither Leibniz nor Hume nor even Kant is primarily interested in the reality of the 'external world': everything turns on the importance of mental knowledge and of the 'objectivity' or 'reality' of the concept. The reason why there remains an unknowable thing an sich in Kant's critical solution, despite the guarantee of this objectivity, has less to do with a conceptually unresolved remnant in Being itself than with the subjective experience of receptivity, which for the time being remains as the irreducible primal phenomenon of knowledge, until the absolute idealists take the necessary steps for the reduction even of this.

2. THE CRITICAL RECALL AND NEGATIVE THEOLOGY

Could the philosopher not have contented himself with the point of view of the Inquiry into the Distinctness of the Principles? Could he not have allowed mathematics its formal triumph, and withdrawn as philosopher to the other, his own, kind of certainty and developed a phenomenology of finitude, with an a priori proof of God in the background and, at its side, the foundation of morality in 'feeling' (of value and obligation) in the manner of Shaftesbury and Hutcheson?[36] But that was not enough for Kant; for how would the modest empiricist and analytical work of reason relate to the grandiose a priori synthesis of mathematics? And how was a reason of this kind capable of entertaining an a priori proof for the existence of God? And how does this (very problematical) proof of God relate finally to the moral sentiment of absolute obligation? All this demanded a far more consistent architectonics, which Kant is determined to provide for the very first time in the consciousness that while the history of philosophy 'offers edifices', they are 'only in ruins'.[37]

---

[35] 4, 129f.

'Mathematics is the outstanding example of a form of pure reason which develops happily of itself without the aid of experience. Examples are infectious . . . with regard to the same capacity', which is reason itself.[38] But if mathematics possesses in space a medium of a priori sense experience in which it demonstrates, though solely by means of quantitative elements, 'the self-generation, so to speak, of our intellect (together with reason), without first being impregnated by experience',[39] then the philosopher, who possesses true knowledge of qualitative reality only when he works upon the a posteriori experience of the senses (omnis cognitio incipit a sensu),[40] may not allow himself to be dislodged from this. The manner of human knowing, the site of human truth, is the interrelationship between the 'chance' experience of the senses (mediated by the cognitive forms of space and time) and the 'necessary' related processes of ordering within the cognitive faculty. This is an interrelationship which can be graded in a number of synthesis—simple perception and productive imagination, the phenomenal form of sense and category, the total objective unity of experience and the total unity of consciousness which grounds and connects it; but these can never supersede this reciprocity,[41] only deepen it. Experience becomes human only within the illumining intellect; but the 'reason' of this intellect recognises the inner finitude of this light, without being able to broaden it into an infinity of true knowing. It is 'burdened with questions which it cannot reject, for they are posed to it from the very nature of reason itself, and which it cannot answer either, for they exceed all the powers of human reason'.[42] Kant now dares to clarify this paradoxical situation by recourse to an even more paradoxical analogy which of necessity provokes contradiction: 'If I imagine the surface of the earth (as it appears to the senses) to be like a plate, then I cannot know how far it extends'. But if (with Columbus) I have got as far as establishing by experience that it is a sphere, 'then I can also determine from even one small section . . . the diameter and, on the strength of this, calculate according to a priori principles and know the entire limits of the earth, i.e. of its surface area'.[43] In the same way, 'our reason is not a plain of indeterminable dimensions . . ., but must rather be compared with a sphere, whose radius can be deduced from the curve of the arc of its surface (a priori to the nature of synthetic principles), but from which one can also state with certainty the content and the delimitation of the same'.[44] A form of reason, therefore, which experiences and even calculates its own finitude, an experience which is far less 'Copernican' than 'Columbian'. Or which is also a version of that experience of Being mentioned above which is located 'between the ruins of Nature which has been destroyed and the chaos of Nature not yet formed'. Although there are a priori synthetic judgments of understanding (a fact that wards off scepticism), there are no a priori synthetic judgments of reason (so that every form of theoretical metaphysics becomes impossible); although reason erects 'secure principles', it does so 'never more than indirectly' by relating the intellectual concepts 'to something quite accidental, namely potential experience'.[45] It is a world of reason which is enclosed within itself but which is also aware of its own indeterminate situation: 'Here we do indeed see philosophy in a precarious position which is supposed to be secure, although it is supported neither by anything in Heaven nor by anything on Earth'.[46]

---

[36] Kant mentions the latter explicitly at the end of the text: 4, 312.

[37] KrV II, 4 (3, 639). Already in 1763, Kant had spoken of metaphysics as a 'bottomless abyss' and a 'dark ocean without shore and without lighthouses' (4, 115).

[38] KrV II, 1, 1 (3, 543).

[39] Ibid. II, 1, 2 (579).

[40] First sentence of the introduction to KrV (3, 35).

---

[41] The principle is expressed clearly for the first time in the last pre-critical text, De mundi sensibilis atque intelligibilis forma et principiis (1770) (4, 327–368).

[42] First sentence of the preface to the first edition of KrV (6, 690).

[43] KrV II, 1, 2 (3, 575).

[44] Ibid. 3, 577.

If reason did not understand the finite nature of its cognitive faculty, and if there were not in this an act of 'peaceful self-gratification' with a 'limited but indisputable possession',[47] 'the sole value of all philosophy: Not to discover truth . . . so much as to protect against error', in spite of its 'irrepressible desire to find solid ground somewhere beyond the limits of its experience',[48] then it would not truly be reason, it would not be, in Thomist terms, a reflexio completa. But the fact that in this process of taking the measure of itself it no longer knows itself as the faculty of absolutely transcendent Being (as is always the case in the classical period, in the Middle Ages and still somehow in Descartes), but also not as the faculty which causes the generation from itself of all that exists (as later in Fichte and Hegel), because the indispensable half of perception in it is receptive: all this gives the whole dimension of 'transcendentality' in Kant a hybrid character which at no point offers itself unambiguously to interpretation. On the one hand reason, in order to be reason, must perceive the finitude of its theoretical knowledge in

[45] KrV II, 1, 1 (3, 560).

[46] This principle, uttered by the practical reason, holds good first and especially of the theoretical reason. GMS 2 (5, 55).

[47] KrV II, 1, 2 (3, 581).

[48] Ibid. II, 2 (3, 600–601).

order to pass beyond it; on the other hand it cannot achieve this as 'pure reason', for it has no experience of that which is beyond the senses and thus no means of objectifying it, but has only unverifiable 'ideas'.

Now according to Kant, this antinomic structure of reason should compel man to leave the field of theory for that of praxis in order to win ontically and by action, in venture and in self-commitment, what he cannot achieve by conceptual and contemplative means—and yet what the nature of reason demands that he must achieve. Herein lies the value, still viewed entirely in Enlightenment terms, of an enforced self-limitation. 'Everything which Nature orders, is good for some purpose. Even poisons serve the purpose of eradicating other forms of poison which are produced by our own fluids, and these should therefore not fail to be included in a complete collection of medicines'.[49] Metaphysics, an area barred to theoretical reason, is not only permitted to practical reason but is even forcefully implied by it, on account of the fact that practical reason can only reach an understanding of itself when transcendent (not transcendental!) presuppositions apply.[50] But the fact that it was not permitted to theoretical reason to be a faculty for the apprehension of Being in general (in whatever way we define the delimitation of the precise object of a 'finite reason'), means for practical reasons that it can only 'postulate' its transcendent presuppositions (because it cannot prove them theoretically), and indeed can do so only on the basis of its own dimensions, as these reveal themselves in its self-apprehension as absolute obligation. But this now means that it is the inner sublimity of reason which, despite all its finitude, has penetrated to the Infinite, which reveals God to it, and not for instance God's own sublime glory, which reason in its pure form cannot perceive.

This form of thought points back without doubt to negative theology both classical and Christian. God (together with those human qualities which belong to His realm: eternal decision-making in freedom, eternal existence in immortality) is beyond all superficial familiarity the more profoundly Unknown; in all His revealedness, He remains more profoundly concealed. Since this was the expression of the analogia entis, it was not put in question or superseded by the Christian revelation, but rather comes to perfection in it. After all the rationalistic forms of scholasticism and neoclassicism, but also after the metaphysics of spirit in the wake of Leibniz, Kant's critical summoning back brings with it a cleansing and a liberation. But it occurs at a late point in history. Leibniz' vertical intersection through all existing things (quantity—exact science, and quality—metaphysics) has the consequences that setting the limits of natural science automatically means setting the limits also of theoretical metaphysics. The marrying of these two (in the philosophy of spirit) led to phenomenism: even metaphysics 'receives' (in its receptivity) only phenomena, not Being. This is why the practical faculty, when it opens up the way to the Absolute, cannot mediate any objective ('external') knowledge, and if religion exists at all, it can do so only 'within the limits of pure reason'. The intersection, which in Leibniz was aimed at the highest synthesis (of exact and religious knowledge), now cuts man in half: since he can no longer recognise God objectively as the 'Wholly Other' (and thereby indeed as the 'Non-Other'), the positing of God in the ethical law with its categorical imperative does not lead to a making-present which corresponds (even non-objectively) to the human cognitive faculty. Once again the lateness of the project becomes evident: on the one hand the echo of Ockham's and Luther's mistrust towards the excesses of the whole Reason; but even more clearly the philosopher appears, against his will, to be bound to the form of knowledge which is that of the natural sciences, as being normative for all forms of rational knowledge: the categorical ordering of phenomenal world-matter, knowledge therefore as domination, without any consideration of what it is that 'appears' (since this is in itself unrecognisable) or why anything should appear at all. For the category of the 'Why' (causality) merely serves to impose order upon what has already become manifest and is thus not competent to explore beyond this level (the third and fourth antinomies of pure reason).[51] When to know means to dominate, then of course God remains that which is definitively indomitable, and thus unknowable. Under this condition, which however introduces a significant distinction, Kant takes his place among the great representatives of negative theology, echoing in fact Anselm's precise formulation (rationabiliter comprehendit incomprehensibile esse)[52] when he says that reason 'cannot render comprehensible' the freedom from contingency of its practical law 'in its absolute necessity ... and so we do not comprehend the practical absolute necessity of the moral imperative, but we comprehend its incomprehensibility [and thus the sign of God], which is all that can fairly be demanded of a philosophy which presses on in its principles to the very limits of human reason'.[53]

---

[49] Ibid. II, 1, 2 (3, 564).

[50] GMS 2 (5, 56).

When Kant says that we can still speak with justification in the 'tone of a firm faith', even if we have been 'obliged to give up' the language of knowledge,[54] then this faith as 'the pure faith of reason'[55] is again to be compared with Neoplatonic πίστις as the highest form (beyond knowledge) of devotion to the Deity. This 'pure faith of reason' or 'religious faith' (Jaspers: philosophical faith) is the highest interpreter of the faith of the Church: it posits that which stands over and against itself and which is essential to it in the ethical self-apprehension of man. But Kant is always concerned that the postulates of practical reason (God, freedom, immortality) should not appear as ('psychological', 'empirical') needs on the basis of inner (religious) 'experiences'—such things are merely forms of enthusiasm. In order to make this distinction clear, he calls them 'transcendental':[56] the pure conditions of the possibility of the ethical act, where the latter is understood in its totality. To the same end, Kant distinguishes time and again between the pure and the empirical ego: the former is nothing other than the unity of perception, the subject of thought, pure spontaneity, while the latter is the experience of self, and thereby the object of empirical perception by the inner senses:[57] and Kant warns against self-encounter of this kind. But this distinction, which has its own good reasons, suffers from a systematic handicap, for what man as a natural being experiences, in his experience of the external world for instance, in his contact with his fellows, is, as such, not the object of metaphysics, which begins only when the transcendental standpoint is taken.[58] This 'purification' of philosophy from all empirical experience turns transcendentalism into an unadulterated formalism.

---

[51] KrV I, Dialektik II, 2, 2, 2 (3, 354f., 418f.).

[52] Cf. Vol. II, p. 228 (Eng. tr.).

[53] GMS 3 (5, 101).

[54] KrV II, 1, 2 (3, 565).

[55] RGV 3, 5 (6, 516).

[56] KrV II, 2, 1 (3, 605).

3. THE ETHICAL-AESTHETIC SUBLIME

THE ETHICAL SUBLIME. No one, with the exception of Eckhart, has conceived with such clarity of the essence of moral freedom as the self-apprehension of the spirit-person and has held to this idea with such persistence as did Kant.[59] And it was by this act, which he though to align with religion, even with Christianity (and against everything that belongs to the ethical eudaemonism of the Enlightenment), that he released the pantheistic speculation of Fichte and Schelling. The central point of morality cannot in its purity be approached 'by any example',[60] nor can it be superseded by anything, even by religion (rather religion can originate only from this central, innermost point):[61] this is where that 'synthetic a priori judgment' occurs (of which at a theoretical level not pure reason but only understanding, in opposition to sense experience, was capable); first in so far as this free self-apprehension removes (inner-ethically) the distinction between obligation (Sollen) and desire (Wollen),[62] and second because the existence of God emerges a priori (in the ethical-religious sense) in the absolute character of the moral imperative.[63] Just as in Plato and Plotinus the eros must raise and purify itself until it loves and strives for the good only for the sake of the good, and as in the 'metaphysics of the saints' from Eckhart and Tauler to Ignatius and Fénelon the detachment and indifference of amour pur becomes perfect as love solely for the Beloved, in the same way Kant demands the performance of good for the sake of the good, without a primary consideration of happiness or goal or reward. It is not the material coincidence of commandment and deed ('legality') which serves as the measure here, but only the formal acting from duty ('morality'). Man's understanding of the freedom from ends which is characteristic of the good brings him to an understanding of himself as his own end: in this moment he is 'released from the womb of Nature' (which can be a paradise in its own way: Rousseau is right only thus far) in order then to 'fall' into freedom, the freedom, that is, to apprehend himself—in the choice of the good, and in submission to its law.[64] The fact that the good appears as an imperative for many shows that obligation does not from the outset coincide with desire: 'Thus there are no imperatives for a divine, or indeed for a sanctified will; "having to" is out of place here because "wanting to" is necessarily of itself in harmony with the law'.[65] But man in history must first actualise himself as his own end (and thus himself as person) by apprehending that which is truly its own end (the good) and identifying himself with it in an act of obedience; though this, since it is a matter of a human deed within the world, happens in such a way that in his action he presupposes in his fellow-man this identity of obligation as the measure of his action: 'Act in such a way that the humanity both in your own person and in the person of everyone else serves as an end for you and never as a means'.[66] [57] A I 1 §4 (1, 305 n., 303f.); §7 (314).

---

[58] 'The question whether I as a thinking being have cause to accept, apart from my own existence, the existence of a totality of other beings (called "world") which stand in fellowship with me . . . is not anthropological, but merely (!) metaphysical': (A I, 1 §2 (1, 300). Or: 'Ultimately all moral philosophy rests on its pure part, and when it is applied to man, it borrows nothing at all from the knowledge of man (anthropology)': GMS, preface (5, 11).

[59] Kant speaks of this as a 'disgusting hodge-podge': GMS 2 (5, 36).

[60] Ibid. 2 (5, 47).

[61] KU, Allg. Anm. (6, 395).

---

[62] Therefore the categorical imperative is 'a synthetic-practical principle a priori': GMS 2 (5, 49 and note: the obligation cannot be deduced analytically from the act of willing, 'for we do not have such a perfect will').

[63] RGV, preface (6, 406, note).

[64] Presumed beginning of the history of mankind (1786) (1, 277f.).

[65] GMS 2 (5, 41).

This is curious: from the distinction between the ego which knows obligation and the good which is obligatory there springs in an elemental way the reality of the 'other' (whose self-intention is just as radical as my own); while the eudaemonists are all 'practical egoists'; 'pluralism', the way of thinking 'which is not to see oneself as being the whole world, but to see oneself and to behave as a citizen of the world', is opposed here to egoism.[67] The same event whereby I determine upon being myself makes of me a fellow-man in the ethical and altruistic sense. By apprehending myself through respect for the good,[68] and by making myself an object of this respect,[69] on account of my own possession of value, I base my action on respect for the value of my fellow-man. The logical generality of this postulate is at the same time of internal necessity a sociological one. Kant puts it nicely: 'Doing good is duty . . . If it is said: You should love your neighbour as yourself, then this does not mean: You should (first of all) love and (then) on account of this love you should do good. What it means is this: Do good to your fellow-man, and this doing good will effect an altruistic love (as practical fulfilment of the inclination towards doing good in general) in you!'[70]

But now, as we have already shown, religion springs from the synthetic element in ethics; only in so far as I obey the law, do I become ethically autonomous. The law will exist within me if, and as long as, I acknowledge it to exist above me. The attribution of identity of the sacred will to himself or to man in his historical occurrence, occurs so little to Kant that he postulates rather an unbridgeable gulf at the outset:

[66] Ibid. 2 (5, 59).

[67] A I 1 §2 (1, 300).

[68] 'The feeling for the inappropriateness of our capacity to attain an idea which is a law for us, is respect': KU §27 (6, 119).

[69] MS II, Anfangsgründe der Tugendlehre, introduction d (5, 539).

[70] Ibid. 5, 538–539.

that 'radical form of evil' which does not exist in man by natural derivation (since it is a matter of freedom) and which is enigmatic and inexplicable. Neither the life of the senses as such is evil, nor is reason, nor is the combination of both which is natural in man a fateful one (as if the natural love of the self were bound to oppose the ethical principle), and yet in practice there exists in him an inexplicable disorder as far as the orientation and subordination of the senses to the spirit is concerned. Kant agrees with St Paul: 'There is no difference here; they are all sinners. There is no one who does good (following the spirit of the law), not even one'.[71] Thus morality and religion will represent a continuous struggle for the victory of the good (or the kingdom of God) over the bad in man and in mankind, in an eternal approximation[72] to the idea of the saint whereby an 'ideal image' 'descends' from God and works as grace (embodied in Christ) together with the permanent and struggling principle of the good in man. Although there is an 'imputation by grace', a 'justification' ('as consolation and hope, not as certainty') which derives from that very ideal image to which we contract ourselves in our actions, and which can thereby gain a final predominancy over our 'disordered heart',[73] the very fact that the idea of a 'representation' for the sinner intervenes here in a mediating role, shows clearly enough that a simple identification of obligation and desire has no place in Kant's religious ethics.

Rather, Kant desires at all times to humble the human spirit in order to raise it up again in a pure way. In The Natural History of the Sky men are 'humbled by the knowledge of their own baseness'[74] at the sight of more highly developed spiritual beings on the higher planets. They are also 'humbled' by great natural catastrophes, such as earthquakes,[75] and man's impotence in the face of nature's superior power despite all his technical resources 'leads him finally to the humbling memory, from which he should begin, that he remains only a man'.[76] But the true 'humiliation' for man is the critique of pure reason, which requires a constant 'discipline', which needs 'as it were a system of caution and self-examination' in order not to exceed its own limits in an excess of enthusiasm.[77] For it is 'humbling for human reason that it can accomplish nothing in its pure application'.[78] Therefore spontaneous 'humiliation' also belongs to the 'purest moral attitude', linked with 'gratitude' and 'obedience';[79] the optimism of moral autonomy, as Kant understands it, altogether retains this perpetual premise and, precisely in so far as it is the consciousness of duty, is not in contradiction to it.

---

[71] RGV 1, 1–4 (6, 419–448).

[72] '. . . that which in us in our life upon earth, and perhaps in all coming ages and in all worlds, is never more than merely in the process of becoming, viz. being a man pleasing to God . . .': RGV 2, 1 (6, 484–485).

[73] Ibid. 470f., 483f.

[74] 2, 412.

[75] 2, 483.

Contrary to the widespread view, Kant greatly esteems the incarnation of morality within social custom, the Platonic-Aristotelian ἐθίζεσθαι (the moralisation of the senses) and not only in the cultural but also in the moral sense, as his considered response to Schiller shows, who believed that he had produced something new in his ideal of an aesthetic harmony between duty and inclination, dignity (Würde) and grace (Anmut: charm). The question, according to Kant, is only whether the highest ideal can lie in such an aesthetic harmony (which as it were yokes together duty and inclination in order to create a third principle common to both), or whether the absolute character of duty and thus its sublimity, might not in this way be forgotten: 'I am happy to confess that I cannot allow the concept of duty any grace on account of its dignity. For it contains unconditional necessity, to which grace stands in direct opposition. The majesty of the law (like that on Sinai) fills us with awe (not with shyness, which repels, nor with allurement, which invites intimacy), which awakes the respect of the underling for his lord but which, in our case, since the latter lies within us ourselves awakens a sense of the sublimity of our own nature, which ravishes us more than any thing of beauty. But virtue, that is the determination to perform one's duty exactly, is also beneficial in its effects, which are greater than those which nature or art can achieve in the world, and the glorious image of humanity, erected in this its form, permits the companionship of the graces . . . But when we consider the gracious effects which virtue would have in the world, if it found access everywhere, then reason which is morally oriented immediately involves the senses (through the powers of the imagination)'. And when we enquire concerning the 'aesthetic constitution', the state of mind in which man is supposed to perform his duty, then, according to Kant, 'an answer is hardly necessary': 'the joyful heart' in the performance of duty is a 'sign of the authenticity of a virtuous spirit'.[80] The mention of Sinai is not without significance: the appearance of the absolute nature of the commandment is 'sublimity' in the moral sphere while, in the religious sphere, it is glory, kabod. 'When morality recognises an object of the highest esteem in the sanctity of its law, then at the level of religion, in its highest cause which is the fulfilment of those laws, it sets up (!) an object of adoration and thus appears in its own majesty'.[81]

---

[76] 2, 531.

[77] KrV II, 1 (3, 541–542).

[78] Ibid. II, 2 (3, 600).

[79] KU §86 note (6, 351).

Kant speaks in all seriousness of this 'adoration'. If he is full of mistrust of those practices of prayer which are useful in religions, 'thought to be the means of grace', and calls them 'superstitious illusion', because God has no need of formal declarations of the desires and feelings of the one who prays and prayer does not 'serve' him, and further because man believes that he has achieved something with his prayers while in reality it is a question of realising the good in practical living, then Kant demands in place of this the 'spirit of prayer, which can and should take place in us "without ceasing"', and which 'through the contemplation of the deep wisdom of the divine creation in the smallest of things and of its majesty in the greatest' effects in us the mood both of 'adoration' and of 'a power which lifts the soul', 'so that in the face of this words must vanish like empty noise'.[82] In Kant this 'contemplation' bypasses all that is 'statutory' in the positive religions and is transfixed by the mystery of Da-Sein (existence), which he sought to defend from the attacks of pure reason by his critique and, by his ethics, to expose to the bold enterprises of practical reason. He makes the decisive statement concerning his intent when he says, 'Enquiry into the inner nature of all forms of belief which refer to religion necessarily comes up against a mystery, that is against something sacred, which, though it is familiar (gekannt) to each individual, cannot be publicly recognised (bekannt), which is to say generally proclaimed. As something which is sacred it must be a (moral) object of reason and must also be capable of being privately counted adequate for its practical application, and yet, as something which is mysterious, not so for its theoretical application: because it would then have to be communicable to everyone and would have to be capable of being recognised outwardly and publicly'.[83] But Kant also knows of the urge in man to make concrete for himself the absolute and thus divine mystery of Being in a 'carved image', through and beyond which he may also glimpse that which hovers before him in its mystery: here there is the justice and the limitation, the necessity and detestability of natural religion: 'It sounds questionable, but it is in no way reprehensible to say that everyone makes his own God, indeed, . . . must make one in order to honour in him the God who made him. For in whatever way one being is proclaimed and portrayed as a god by another, or when even such a being manifests to another in this way (if this is possible), then the latter must first of all hold it up against his ideal in order to ascertain whether he is justified in regarding it and honouring it as a god. There cannot therefore be a religion based on pure revelation, which in its purity lacks for its foundation any prior concept as a criterion of judgment, for then all divine worship would be the worship of idols'.[84] Thus we may sum up in conclusion: the absolute Good is manifest within the sphere of practical reason in me (autonomy) and above me (sublimity, which can only be approached and never attained); at the 'religious level' of morality, this absolute Good in and above me appears as mystery (beyond all the carved images of theoretical reason), which in its glory (Sinai) demands adoration, but of which I carry within myself such a consciousness (autonomy) that I can measure all that is statutory-religious against it. But this means that there can be nothing 'supernatural' for Kant (despite all his genuine consciousness of mystery) in the sense that it could be located fundamentally beyond the human spirit in its opening as practical reason. Thus it is man who (in his freedom, which touches and contains the Absolute) finally measures out the space between himself and God: 'There is something in us which we can never cease to wonder at . . . that which raises mankind in its concept to a value which one would not suppose to exist on the basis of the individual as the object of our experience . . . That we possess the capacity to make the great sacrifice of our sensual nature to morality, that we are capable of doing what we easily and clearly see that we ought to do, this predominance of the supersensual man in us over the sensual man, the predominance of that man face to face with whom the other is nothing (when it comes to conflict), even when the latter in his own eyes is everything, this moral structure in us, which is indivisible from our humanity, is the object of the highest admiration, which only increases the longer we contemplate this true (and unimagined) ideal: so much so that they are to be forgiven who construe this supersensual element in us, on account of its incomprehensibility and its practical nature, to be supernatural, that is to be something which neither stands in our power nor is our own possession, but is rather the influence of another and higher spirit; though they are grievously mistaken in this . . .'.[85] [80] RGV I, note (6, 423–424). Kant's underlinings. Schiller's reaction to this in the letter to Körner, 18 May 1794.

---

[81] RGV I, preface (6, 407). Kant's underlining.

---

[82] RGV IV, 2 (6, 625–629).

[83] Ibid. III, 2 (6, 558–559).

[84] Ibid. IV, 2 §1 (6, 594).

It has already been pointed out that Kant is thus renewing in a much profounder way (and in the general context of the

---

[85] StF I, 2 (1, 609).

Enlightenment) the concern of Shaftesbury and his school: morality as the criterion of religion. But he adds to this the manner of questioning which belongs to late antiquity, and which was introduced in the image of the 'unfinishable bridge': a human religious project with an orientation towards revelation (since the 'supersensual' element in man opens towards a Divine Absolute), but which serves as the criticism of all revelation on the basis of man's ethico-religious capacity, whereby the whole of positive Christianity (as the highest 'mythical' religion) falls victim to this criticism. With this problem Kant initiates the whole tradition of German Idealist religious philosophy and does so in such a way that a priori all theology will be dragged before the judgment seat of philosophy.

THE BEAUTIFUL. If for Kant the core of the person, that which constitutes the 'human' in him or her, is the point where the autonomic-moral opens into the mystery of the relationship of God and man, then it is true also that his aesthetics, as developed in the concluding third critique, which is that of judgment, balances on the concept of the (aesthetically) sublime. But the 'sublime' in its true character becomes comprehensible only in connection with and in contrast to the 'beautiful'. It is the beautiful therefore which we must first address.

If theoretical knowledge consisted in the reciprocity of perception and concept in relation to an object, then aesthetic knowledge is that same reciprocity but in relation to the subject. 'We have accordingly two forms of perfection: one that is logical and one that is aesthetic. The first form of perfection obtains when my knowledge coincides with the object, and the second when my knowledge coincides with the subject'.[86] This means in negative terms that aesthetic judgment has no 'interest' in the objective existence of the object, and relates to its manifest form 'in a purely contemplative manner'.[87] Yet when this beholding 'pleases' the subject disinterestedly, then 'we linger in the contemplation of the beautiful because this contemplation is self-enhancing and self-propagating'.[88] The experience of the beautiful thereby differs from the merely 'pleasant', which arouses a predilection with vested interest for that which gives pleasure; it differs also from the 'true', which is interest in the existence of the object, and from the 'good', which is interest in the Dasein of an object or an action. In positive terms this means that the judgment of taste makes a secret claim to universal validity, despite its relation to the subject, and thus does not remain purely empirical and subjective as does the judgment of what is appealing to the senses (here, 'Everyone to their own taste' holds true). It touches rather on something in the transcendental structure of the subject, that is, it triggers the 'free play' of the cognitive powers—sensual imagination and intellectual concept—and, affecting them in their inner objective 'harmony', it sets them resonating, the beautiful pleasingly and the ugly displeasingly. This is what accounts for the 'claim to subjective universality'.[89] But it is only the cognitive powers as such which resonate, the understanding only as unity of the concept, without a particular concept being formed (which would immediately lead to 'interest' in the object), and the imagination not found as when receiving a given reality but in its free creative play with it. Therefore this resonating harmony of the cognitive faculty,[90] its 'mood' or 'proportion',[91] also stands in opposition to all forms of the 'schematism' of pure reason,[92] but it derives from a 'deeply hidden ground of illumination in the judgment of forms, which is common to all men'.[93] Thus the aesthetic judgment of taste of the individual is 'suggested' to all, without being able or wishing to be 'imposed' upon all (as is the case with moral judgments).[94] This communicability of feeling for the beautiful implies a 'common sense', and it does so without recourse 'to psychological observations', 'but as the necessary condition of the universal communicability of our knowledge, which must be presupposed . . . in every form of logic'.[95] [86] This short formulation stands in the posthumous Vorlesungen über die Metaphysik, Erfurt 1821, p. 169. One should note the expression in this of the equilibrium between both forms of knowledge, which for Kant stand de facto (in their critical, although quite different limitations) to the left and the right of the practical reason.

---

---

[87] KU 1 §5 (6, 60).

[88] Ibid. §12 (6, 76).

[89] Ibid. §6 (6, 63).

[90] Ibid. §9 (6, 71).

[91] Ibid. §21 (6, 96).

[92] KrV, Analytik 2, 1 (3, 152f.).

[93] KU §17 (6, 88).

But now every relation of interest with regard to the object must be set aside in order to isolate the phenomenon fully, that is both what the phenomenal thing is in itself (truth) and what it is good for (goodness), or whether it corresponds in itself to its own concept (perfection). In thus linking the beautiful with the true and the good, Kant speaks of a beauty which is 'bound' or which 'merely adheres' (pulchritudo adhaerens), from which however the distinguishing formal character of 'beauty' does not yet clearly emerge. This occurs only with 'free beauty' (pulchritudo vaga), with which a 'consonance of taste with reason, that is of the beautiful with the good' is not presupposed— a consonance however in which 'perfection gains nothing through beauty nor beauty through perfection', despite a reciprocal and accidental 'heightening' of each other,[96] but only the 'form of purposiveness' is presupposed without the concept of a purpose.[97] Pure beauty is formal in a double sense here: in so far as it ignores the link between the true and the good (which is unheard-of with respect to the classical, Christian tradition), in order to distil in 'pure' form the concept of the beautiful, and in so far as it correspondingly 'abstracts' (this word is Kant's own)[98] from every object and every ethical interest, in order to enjoy the form, as unrelated and possessing meaning only within itself, with the pure formal harmony of our cognitive powers. In this Kant is without doubt the first theoretician of abstract art. Although the scholastics also attempted to expose the distinguishing ratio of each transcendental (unum, verum, bonum, pulchrum), even when they viewed the pulchrum as being realiter one with the bonum, its distinguishing aspect nevertheless emerged. But there all the transcendentals shared in the common being of which they are the transcendent and universal modalities, which fact served also to distinguish them one from another. This objective communication demands within the field of artistic activity the principle of unification rather than of separation. In Kant the 'transcendentals' relate to the transcendental constitution of reason in its critical self-understanding, and the individual aspect emerges clearly only when we disregard the others. This is so because reason, taken in its purity, hovers indeterminately in its finitude (as interrelationship of finite perception and finite concept) and loses every anchorage in in-finite esse. Therefore beauty, whose essence is the pure interrelationship of the powers of the subject (an interrelationship which prescinds from the true and the good), possesses exactly the same indefinite character of the finite in itself which, when the rigour of the ethical imperative wanes and is no longer seen, can at some point lead to the pure play of finite existence in nothingness with itself, a play which is not only disinterested and without purpose (l'art pour l'art) but also ultimately lacking in meaning.

---

[94] Ibid. §8 (6, 65f.).

[95] Ibid. §21 (6, 97).

[96] §16 (6, 84–86).

[97] Ibid. §10–11 (6, 73–75).

[98] Ibid. §16 (6, 87).

Because it is the freedom from a specific concept which is the precondition for the beautiful, its universal validity can only be 'by example', the representation not of a knowable content but merely of an 'idea', so that 'the highest pattern, the archetype of taste, is only an idea'.[99] Everything beautiful is only 'the example of a general rule, which cannot be stated'.[100] Thus although regularity, symmetry and so forth can be the 'necessary condition' for the beautiful, they can never be its essence, as Plotinus knew best of all.[101] The true centre of the soul's powers is here the creative play of the imagination, which remains incalculable in concept and which, in theoretical thought, stands at the service of the regulating reason, while 'reason serves the imagination . . . in the free and indeterminately purposive converse of the mind's powers with that which we call beautiful'.[102] Therefore Kant develops his astounding theory of genius, which alone can be the rule of art—despite all demands for technical skills: it is 'Nature' which is the creative agent in genius 'and through the harmonising of its powers', so that 'originality must be its first quality', whose 'products must be models, that is they must have an exemplary character, though not one that functions through imitation', and yet the author 'does not himself know the origin of his ideas, and does not have the power to have these ideas at will or according to his own plan . . . Thus presumably the word "genius" (Genie) derives from genius, the particular spirit which is given to man at birth and which defends him and guides him and which is the inspiration of those original ideas'.[103] Thus the poet's images signify the truth, but they do not permit themselves to be elucidated as concepts; and for the philosopher Kant 'there has perhaps never been anything said which is more sublime' than 'the inscription above the Temple of Isis (of Mother Nature): "I am all that there is, that there has been and that there will be, and no mortal has uncovered my veil"'.[104] Schiller, who makes his youth lift the veil from Saïs and thus become infected with melancholy, and Novalis, who must also raise the veil in order to discover behind it an erotic mystery of identity, possess for Kant too great a knowledge.

---

[99] Ibid. §17 (6, 88).

[100] Ibid. §18 (6, 94).

[101] Ibid., general note to the Analytik (6, 100).

It needs to be stressed concerning the 'adhering beauty' however that its freedom from ends enjoys a particular affinity with man, who alone in Nature possesses himself in moral terms as his own end. But two kinds of idea or ideal can be formed of man: a 'normal idea', which in practice presents his average measure (as of an animal species, in the particularity of the various races, etc.), and for this Kant adduces the aesthetic canons of the Greek sculptors and of the Renaissance (though with their variations on normal expression for the characterisation of psychological personality etc.); and then a 'rational idea', which lies within the moral sphere: 'the visible expression of moral ideas' puts new questions to the artist which have not previously been glimpsed in the understanding of beauty,[105] for here the beautiful must be drawn beyond itself into the form of 'sublimity'.

---

[102] Ibid. (6, 101).

[103] Ibid. §46 (6, 181–182).

[104] Ibid. §49 (6, 192–193).

THE AESTHETIC SUBLIME. A glance backwards is called for here. At the beginning of the Christian era, an anonymous treatise. On the Sublime, was written with reference to rhetoric which also served to sum up the classical philosophical inheritance. Then the concept disappears. In 1756, the young Edmund Burke published his A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and the Beautiful; the work, in Garve's translation, immediately attracted the, albeit critical, notice of Lessing, Mendelssohn and Herder, and was a stimulus to Kant: already in his early Observations on the sense of the Beautiful and the Sublime (1764), and even more in his mature reflections in the Critique of Judgement.

The late classical work Peri Hupsous[106] also deserves mention in this connection for it too views the aesthetically sublime as being substantially determined by the ethically sublime of the 'elevated attitude of mind' and 'magnanimity'. Truly elevated speech lifts the soul, filling it with such pride and joy as if it had itself invented what it has heard,[107] and this is so because the soul thus becomes aware of its own nature (πρὸς ἃ γεγόναμεν): man is not only introduced into the entire universe (as citizen of the world) as into a great festive gathering in order to participate eagerly in the sporting competitions, 'but in his soul there is an invincible love (ἄμαχος ἔρως) for all that is eternally great and all that is more divine than we are. So not even the universe can satisfy the flights of human vision and thought, but his mind often soars beyond the limits of the world which houses him'. He inclines by nature to the contemplation not of small rivers, but of the Nile, the Danube and the Rhine; the contemplation not of the small lamp, but of the star-filled firmament or of Mount Etna spewing forth rocks and fire.[108] All great men have raised themselves above mortality; all other qualities belong only to the human, while the sublime draws near to divine majesty.[109] But the beautiful and the sublime are not explained on the basis of a polarity but rather of a process of heightening, and so 'a mutal relationship' is striven for,[110] and 'harmonia' is praised as being 'a wonderful organon' of the sublime and the pathetic.[111] Finally, the writer complains that life has become bourgeois and constricted and the world has turned decadent: there is no more room in the world for human greatness and thus for artistic sublimity. At the end of his idealist aesthetic, Hegel too will consign sublimity completely to the (archaic Greek) past.

---

[105] Ibid. §17 (6, 87–93).

[106] Text and trans. by H. Lebèque: 'Du Sublime', Belles Lettres, 2nd edn. 1952; quoted by chapter and paragraph.

[107] VII, 2.

Burke[112] therefore starts something new in so far as he grasps the sensations of the beautiful and the sublime as pure polarities: in the one 'pleasure' (cf. Kant's Lust) and in the other initially 'pain' (Kant's Unlust) on account of something threatening (and thus terrifying), which then in a second phase, when it becomes evident that no direct danger threatens, finds release in 'delight'. Burke removes the ethical from these fundamental aesthetic experiences, as he does sensual desire and utilitarian interest, in so far as pure consciousness is concerned. Meanwhile he interprets the phenomena against the background of a theory of instinctive drives (self-preservation and sociability, Freud's Ego and sexual drive)[113] and interprets them ultimately in a mechanical and physiological way: the slackening of the fibres (love, pleasure)[114] or their tensing (fear, pain).[115] But this materialism is accompanied by a notion of God; if all that is sublime 'is a certain modification of power', which seems to us superior, then we find in the idea of God the greatest heightening of such a power and thus on the part of the creature an insuperable fear of absolute majesty. In the presence of the thought that the universe lies in the hand of the almighty and 'is everywhere filled with His presence', 'we shrink to the diminutive dimensions of our own nature and are as it were destroyed before God'. And when we are heartened by the thought of God's wisdom and mercy and our elemental terror is dissipated by the awareness that God does not threaten us, 'then we rejoice, but with trembling'. Burke quotes not only Horace and Lucretius but also many passages from the Old Testament. It is only with Christianity that talk of the love of God really begins, as the Platonists had only intimations of it, and the other heathens not even that.[116]

---

[108] XXXV, 2–4.

[109] XXXVI, 1.

[110] XXXVI, 4.

[111] XXXIX, 1.

[112] Edmund Burke, Vom Erhabenen und Schönen, trans. and ed. Friedrich Bassenge, Berlin 1956.

[113] 1, 9 (74f.).

[114] Although the desire in love introduces an element of pain into the pleasure.

[115] 4, 6 (174f.).

Kant's analysis of the beautiful and the sublime owes much to Burke, above all the principle of opposition (instead of mere heightening), which in his transcendental contemplation becomes a polarity between 'proportion' or 'harmony' (between the cognitive faculties: imagination and reason) and a primary 'disproportion' (now between sensuality and rational idea), which is resolved secondarily in a consideration of the nature of man into a higher harmony which has need of inner contrast. The sublime cannot lie in Nature as such, for the mathematical sublime is so only for the imagination, which when it takes a fundamental measure and imagines what will always be greater than it, can no longer find a place for this latter. But the intellect can consider every solar system as an atom in further systems, and here the sublime is transferred to the subject: 'the sublime is that which, in being able to be thought, proves a capacity of the mind which transcends every measure of the senses'.[117] But it is the fact that this 'being able to be thought' also refers to the unknowable ideas, which arise with the nature of man, that first truly throws light on the 'dynamic sublimity' of Nature, since it appears to physical man as an awesome preponderance of power: this terror is countered in some degree by the consciousness of not being directly threatened, and space is created for wonder at the 'sublime' drama of Nature; but ultimately and more profoundly man meets this superior power only in reflection on his own moral nature. The failure of the imagination when it encounters the idea is 'displeasure', but it is precisely this 'displeasure' 'which awakens in us the feeling of our supra-sensual nature, according to which it is purposeful, even the source of delight, to find every norm of sensuality inadequate with regard to the ideas of reason'.[118] Thus 'the subjective play of the powers of the mind . . . is itself shown to be harmonious' through their contrast.[119] Now it is no still, contemplative delight, as was the case with the beautiful, but a 'movement' of the spirit: that which is sublime (das Erhabene) is at the same time, as Schiller will say, that which uplifts us (das Erhebende).[120]

---

[116] 2, 5 (99–107).

[117] KU §25 (6, 111).

And yet this expression of Schiller's goes one step further than Kant. For it is true for the latter that the dynamic sublimity of Nature raises man up to himself by allowing his ethical nature to emerge; and thus that the sublime is located more in man than in Nature.[121] But Schiller does not speak of God any more, whereas Kant at least takes up Burke's idea of God as absolute power as an objection: do we not imagine 'God in His wrath and, at the same time, in His sublimity too, when we imagine Him in the tempest, in the storm, in the earthquake and the like'? 'Here it is not a feeling of the sublimity of our own nature, rather our subjection, our abandonment and the feeling of our own impotence' which appears to be the proper frame of mind. Kant responds to this in accordance with his notion of the religious as the ultimate dimension of the ethical. Against Burke it needs to be said that the response of the creature, which consists entirely of terror at the total superiority of God's power, is by no means a religious one as yet: 'The person who experiences genuine fear . . . is not in the right frame of mind to wonder at the greatness of God . . . Even humility as the unsparing condemnation of his faults . . . is an elevated state of mind'.[122] But against Schiller Kant would still hold to his 'sense of awe at the sublime' which belongs not only to human nature but also to God, with whose sanctity the human will, which is bound to eternal struggle, can never conceive itself to be one. Thus Kant demands that 'the Good, aesthetically judged, must not only be represented as being beautiful but also as being sublime, so that it evokes the feeling of respect (which spurns charm) more than of love and intimate inclination, because human nature does not accord of itself with the Good, but only through the violence which reason inflicts upon our sensual nature'.[123] Despite all the 'Enlightenment within him', Kant does not cross the threshold of German Idealism with its aesthetics of identity, since he refuses to interpret the 'violence' which must be inflicted upon man as a yet higher form of beauty. He retains a Christian sensorium which, however concealed, still has knowledge of the Cross.

---

[118] Ibid. §27 (6, 120).

[119] Ibid. (121).

[120] Zerstreute Betrachtungen über verschiedene ästhetische Gegenstände (1793).

[121] KU §28 (6, 125).

d. The Self-Glorification Of The Spirit

1. SCHILLER

With Schiller, that form of Idealism continues which fundamentally transcends the open-ended non-identity of Kant—between phenomenon and the Ding an sich, between finite and infinite intellect, and in particular between ethical duty and desire—in Spirit's ultimate conquest of Being, so that all glory of Being now becomes a self-glorification of the Spirit. This marks the end of that philosophical flight which began with Parmenides: the divine standpoint is taken up for the sake of the truth of Spirit, which must ultimately coincide with the absolute freedom of the Spirit. It is Schiller who clearly signals this, although others took the field at the same time. By discovering antiquity for himself as a thinker and poet, though in such a way as to incorporate it into his own philosophy of Spirit, he takes up a position in the stream of modern thought which is opposed to that of Goethe: fruitful complementarity within a common fate. Only Goethe remains ultimately more peacefully contained within that classical principle of comprehensiveness which is physis, while Schiller must place man beyond it as the Absolute Spirit in a process of becoming, in that he can live only with reference to an end which he himself constructs.

---

[122] Ibid. (6, 127).

[123] KU, general note, after §29 (6, 137).

THE FORM OF HIS WORK AND HIS POINT OF DEPARTURE. As a thinker Schiller begins, as did Kant, with Leibniz, whom he understands in terms of pietism and enthusiasm.[1] But the vertical section of the world (devised in order to overcome Descartes and the English and French materialists), which Leibniz extended through all things in order to grasp the world quantitively and materially as well as qualitatively and spiritually, is resolved in the young Schiller's hands (as it will be in those of Jean Paul and the Romantics) into two starkly opposed world-views: on the one hand the day and on the other the night side of the universe, on the one hand Idealism (corresponding to the phenomenism which extends from Descartes to Malebranche), and on the other materialism and radical transience. The abrupt shift from one perspective to the other determines his early lyrics, in particular the odes to Laura.

Since the poetic influence of Klopstock is immense, the pathos of the admiring, moving, adulatory praise of the glory and majesty of God who reigns in the infinite universe initially remains: The Evening (1766)[2] multiplies the addresses to God, and Nature is called upon to be silent, thus permitting God to sound through its harp. The Glory of Creation[3] leads the poet away like Ganymede into a universe which is alive with God's presence; he often sees laid out before him 'the whole splendour of Creation, the glory,/ which the All-Highest conceived in the solitude of dark eternity' and listens to 'the great song of praise' of Nature which rings forth from the universe 'lost in harmonies/ like a sweet death'. The Grandeur of the World[4] is a poetical counterpoint to the young Kant's enthusiasm for infinity in his Theory of the Heavens, while To the Sun[5] (first draft in 1773) praises the creative light and 'worships its work'. But this mood of worship was enthusiasm in the spirit of Shaftesbury,[6] behind which, unrecognised but of like kind, the greater figure of Giordano Bruno appears. If it is the case that the Theosophy of Julius, which is the subject of discussion in the Philosophical Letters (1786) between Julius, the idealist, and Raphael, the sceptical thinker, refers back to Schiller's early life and that thus Leibniz and Shaftesbury, in an enthusiastic combination, set the tone, then the existential consequences set out in his youthful dramas must also be taken into consideration in order to balance the ensuing image. In the Theosophy we read: 'All the perfections of the universe are unified in God. God and Nature are two forms of greatness which are perfectly alike to each other.'[7] This is the scheme of Plotinus, Erigena and Nicolas of Cusa: the world as the self-manifestation of God is interpreted here unashamedly in terms of identity. There is equally bold talk of both the division of God into the (Leibnizean) universe of spirits and the synthesis of the latter into deity: prismatically 'the Divine Self has divided itself into innumerable sentient substances', whereby 'a Divine Being emerges from the unification of all these substances . . . If it ever pleased the Almighty to destroy the prism, then the dam between itself and the world would collapse and all spirits would . . . bring forth God.'[8] Significantly, Hegel concludes his Phenomenology of the Spirit with a quotation from the poem which follows this. Love is the name which the young Schiller gives to this unitive force: 'it is only the reflection of the unique primal power . . . founded on a momentary exchange of personality, an exchange of essences'. The category of the Platonic 'moment' (ἐξαίφνης)[9] causes the universe to appear through the 'cyphers' and 'hieroglyphs' of the cosmos, eros anticipates identity and thus demands total selflessness (amour pur), the renunciation of reward and the dedication of one's entire life to the point even of losing it.[10] Is that all only a dream 'perhaps real only in the brain of your Julius'? But then can reality be less than the idea? 'Are my ideas then to be more beautiful than those of the eternal Creator?'[11] It is not the finite, conceptual clothing which is important here, for the vision which is darkly expressed therein is divine, indeed unsurpassable (id quo majus cogitari non potest): as ideal-idea in us (as the analytical breakdown of God) it is necessarily 'real-idea' therefore within the 'active omnipotence',[12] and therefore merits 'veneration'.[13] [1] Schiller's works quoted from the edition by Fricke-Göpfert-Stubenrauch, Hanser-Verlag, 5 Vols., 3rd edn 1962. The letters according to the critical general edition (F. Jonas, 7 Vols.). Some abbreviations: WL = Wallensteins Lager; Picc = Die Piccolomini; WT = Wallensteins Tod; AW = Über Anmut und Würde; EM = Über die ästhetische Erziehung des Menschen; NSD = Über naive und sentimentalische Dichtung. The verse dramas are quoted by the number of verses, the prose dramas by act and scene.

---

[2] 1, 9.

[3] 1, 43; cf. 'Hymne an den Unendlichen': 1, 83.

---

[4] 1, 84.

[5] 1, 40.

[6] Schiller came to know him through the mediation of Garve in the school of his first philosophy teacher, Abel.

[7] 5, 352.

[8] Ibid., 353.

But in existential terms the man who wants to see himself and to move within the scheme of identity enters the dialectic of the Eroici Furori: eros becomes the gaining of the self as God, and thus self-destruction; but the prismatic analysis of God can be lived and experienced (in the Christian and the Idealist way) as the spontaneous decline of Primal Being and innocence into alienation, revolt and hell. Thus, and especially in a temperament such as Schiller's, the philosophical contradiction (which inheres in all philosophies of identity) necessarily becomes an existential one: it becomes flaming revolt against all that is non-divine, non-autonomous, alien to the Spirit, untrue and unfree in the world order (The Robbers), but also the absolutisation of the same contradiction within man himself (the non-identity of ethical imperative and desire which is heightened to a Promethean No to God: in The Spiritual Libertarianism of Passion, where God stands accused as a 'Wüterich' and a 'Nero', who feeds Himself on human suffering, because He does not permit the coincidence of duty and inclination).[14] [9] The word is everywhere in the section 'Idee': 5, 346f.

---

[10] 'Aufopferung' 351.

[11] Ibid., 355.

[12] Ibid., 348.

[13] Ibid., 355.

It is exactly here that the primary orientation of the whole form of his work lies. For here two possibilities emerge from a single root. Either man is measured by his 'heroic' greatness, with which he lives out the tension or the split between God's Being and the being of the world (or the ego), which means that the ideal is given the name 'Prometheus'; then the formal, purely dynamic greatness of the hero, of the (original) genius is determinative, and it is virtually of no consequence whether this greatness is represented as rebellious strength or the strength to effect reconciliation and unity. Or the present fact of his 'no longer' or 'not yet' being God prescribes a 'law' for man, the law which is of course that only of his own freedom and liberation, the prescription of his (individual or social) self-realisation, to which he must subordinate himself in order to win the laurels of true spiritual existence. If it was a question in the former case of a static dynamis of formal greatness, then in the latter it is a matter of a final dynamism, which forces a 'process' upon man: that of gaining himself through transcending himself. It can be seen here that this second possibility, which will later lead Schiller to Kant, by virtue of its connection with the former possibility constantly serves to distinguish Schiller greatly from Kant, who as a Christian could never genuinely take the Promethean, Brunoesque attitude into consideration, never seriously having thought in terms of a scheme of identity.

If we consider the form of Schiller's work in general from this point of view, then we see that this dialectic causes a rupture at its heart, in a similar fashion to Goethe but for different reasons. The early period (around 1780–1787, with the fading cry of The Gods of Greece, 1788, and The Artist, 1789) ends with the long-worked-over Don Carlos. Then historical and philosophical studies dominate the poetical interregnum until the late period (around 1797–1805) which begins with the similarly long-worked-over Wallenstein, and which was then to be followed by plays and poems to the very end. Schiller called these two great cornerpieces of his work 'infelicitous', and the wrestling with their meaning always seemed to him a 'deep crisis'. If we substitute for human greatness the Kantian notion of the sublime, then two forms of the sublime wrestle one with the other: the greatness of the soaring flight (Prometheus) and the greatness of humility, obedience and subjection. In the poem The Knights of Malta (1795), the uniting of what appears irreconcilable is the preserve only of Christianity:

---

[14] I, 127–129.

> Religion of the Cross, you alone unite in one
> Wreath the double palm of humility and strength.[15]

Looking back from Don Carlos to the early works, we see without doubt that the ideal of formal Promethean absoluteness predominates, which is recognisable in the fact that genius remains identical with itself, whether it takes the form of the complete rebel or of the free hero who subjects himself to the law (Karl Moor, Fiesco). Looking ahead from Wallenstein, it is the second version of the human ideal which predominates, but with an increasing artistic formalisation and a consequent loss in the existential force of the scintillating Wallenstein. The ambiguous, fragmentary character of Don Carlos and Wallenstein remains the centre of the work, which casts uncertainty also upon the clarity of the early and late periods. We can now offer an outline of the different periods in their chronological sequence.

The Robbers presents the 'majestic sinner' who plays with 'the dangerous aether ray of genius', the 'bold Phaeton' whose 'shame' is erased in order to make place for 'admiration'.[16] Both brothers are 'honourable villains, majestic monsters: spirits who are attracted by terrible vice for the sake of the greatness which attaches to it, for the sake of the strength which it demands, for the sake of the perils which accompany it'. Schiller wants us 'to learn, even to love, my robber's majesty'.[17] In remembrance of the aesthetic rule 'that the [15] 1, 248.

[16] Monument Moors des Räubers 1, 98–100.

[17] Suppressed preface to the Räuber 1, 481–484.

good are thrown into sharp profile by the wicked and virtue is at its most life-like when contrasted with vice', he wants to depict vice 'in its colossal grandeur', and its representatives are to be 'detested and loved, admired and pitied'; they are to be like Milton's and Klopstock's Satan, like the classical Medea and Shakespeare's Richard.[18] 'We are more inclined to read the mark of the divine from the grimaces of vice' than we are from a 'harmonious portrait'.[19] In Franz Moor it is the Titanism of a direct struggle against God, the devising and the practice of an evil quo majus non cogitari potest, which only has meaning when the deeds are performed at every stage in the face of eternal damnation, which is simultaneously challenged, denied and accepted; the fact that the warrior against God must finally pay for his protest by his succumbing to a whining fear of death is part of his paradoxical greatness. On the other hand, it is Karl's Titanism that makes him wish to impose order, through judging and avenging, on God's hopeless corrupt world. He is the 'arm of higher rulers'[20] and he carries within himself the memory of the lost child's paradise of innocence, which is for him 'Elysium', a 'holy temple' and 'unclouded joy'.[21] He feels the infinite distance that separates him from this lost world: 'And I so unlovely in this beautiful world—and I a monster on this glorious earth'.[22] With a Hölderlin-like pathos he asks whether the 'inspiring green valleys' will ever return to him, the childhood scenes 'ever cool my burning bosom again with sweet sighings'?[23] But the way back is closed, which is why Karl can only crown his Promethean rebellion with a yet more astonishing final act in the purest Promethean style: 'But still there remains for me something with which I (!) can once again reconcile the offended laws and mend the abused order. A sacrifice is needed—a sacrifice which will reveal its inviolable majesty before the whole of humanity (!)—I myself am this sacrifice . . . I go to place myself in the hands of the law.'[24] The Moors are the 'giants and peaks' of 'liberty';[25] they achieve nothing less and feel themselves to be majestic beings who, both in rebellion and in penitence, can act as a counterbalance to the majesty of the world order.

---

[18] Preface to first edition 1, 484–488.

[19] Self-criticism with reference to the Räuber 1, 623.

[20] Die Räuber IV, 5.

[21] Ibid., IV, 1.

[22] Ibid., III, 2.

[23] Ibid., III, 2.

In Fiesco's Conspiracy at Genoa, the amphiboly of genius becomes yet more evident as through adaptation of the final scenes the poet chooses first to give the formal 'greatness' of the hero the face of a titanic tyrant and then of a cringing republican. 'The noble head knows temptations not of the common order';[26] 'To win a diadem by struggle is a great thing, but to cast it away is divine.'[27] But also the other way around: 'It is unspeakably great to steal a crown. Shame lessens with an increase in sin.' The greatness of the 'moment', which measures in one leap the abyss between 'obeying and ruling', is the decisive thing, which lends existence its meaning and its form: 'A princely moment has swallowed the whole domain of being . . . (he walks heroically up and down)'.[28] All the other major characters are affected by Fiesco's contradiction: Julia, Leonore, even Verrina: at some point the Promethean measure is applied to them all.

In Intrigue and Love, the poet himself becomes accuser and avenger on behalf of Moor; the inextinguishable impressions of childhood—the terrible distortions of the world order by the presumptuous majesty of the absolutism of Baroque princes, the obedience to absolute law profaned and reduced to the religiously flavoured drill of Karl Eugen of Wüttemberg's military academy—explain the revolutionary pathos of liberty, which endures from this point to Carlos and even to Wallenstein and to William Tell. Even the Conquerer (1777) curses with 'the curse of a burning thirst for revenge',[29] which will one day in the Last Judgment cast the tyrants into Hell. The 'evil monarchs' prowl as 'gods of the earth', as 'the giant puppets of God', and are 'faded royalty', who cover 'high shame with the night clothes of the right of majesty'.[30] Thus in the play the mendacious world of the court is 'abhorrent glory';[31] Luise wishes 'to scream without mercy into the ears [of the rascals who destroyed her love for Ferdinand] that even the lungs of the gods of the earth will rattle in the hour of their death and the Last Judgment will shake both kings and beggars through the same sieve.'[32] Once again Hell must serve to deepen the darkness: the intrigue drives the lovers into the despair of suicide and reveals there their own abysmal depths. The Lady, still of course Promethean, saves herself by simultaneously renouncing intrigue (life at court) and love (for Ferdinand): 'My glory dies with my love.'[33]

---

[24] Ibid., V, 2.

[25] Ibid., I, 2.

[26] Fiesco III, 2.

[27] Ibid. II, 19. In the Mannheim stage version, this word becomes the expression of the definitive victory over self on Fiesco's part: herewith he breaks the sceptre and throws the pieces among the people. 1, 951–952.

[28] Ibid., III, 2.

[29] 1, 14.

This leads to Don Carlos, which stands in close spiritual proximity to the former drama: a family tragedy between inflexible absolutism and freedom, the latter for the moment as the 'free love' of a son for his step-mother. Then it expands into a great historical tragedy of the transition between two epochs. The king and the queen are ennobled, Posa appears as 'a delegate of the whole of humanity', and finally (in Schiller's friendship with Körner) the accent shifts completely to Posa's eschatological proclamation of a 'new state' which is worthy of man and to the expiatory and provocative sacrifice of his own life for his friend the Prince, who is thereby to be healed from his love-sickness and made capable of realising his social vision. But the plans do not cohere, the old forms of motivation underlie the new and the whole is played to the last in the context of the court milieu and remains confused intrigue. Posa's death for love lacks motive, the Prince's passion drags meaninglessly and destructively on, the conceptual world of Philip II oscillates between authentic and distorted representation and the religious background too takes on a corresponding form: the Inquisition, which pulls the strings, is a hellish abomination, while Posa is a noble Knight of Malta. The accent shifts from the formal Prometheus ideal to obedience to that ideal, but this is still the result of an enthusiastic self-esteem. Since Posa wishes to die, Carlos, mindful of the king, calls out: 'No, no! He will not . . . resist so noble a deed . . . It will move him.'[34] And the words 'God' (for the king),[35] 'divine',[36] are always close at hand.

---

[30] I, 104–108.

[31] Kabale und Liebe II, 1.

[32] Ibid., III, 6.

[33] Ibid., IV, 8.

Don Carlos reaches across the long gap in Schiller's creativity to Wallenstein; after long hesitation Schiller gave it preference over the Knights of Malta, a drama on the Order which stresses obedience and love of sacrifice and thus, once again, favoured the Promethean theme. Why? On the one hand, the poet wished to create a modern counterpart to classical tragedy: the revealing of a tragic situation which is already in existence, of hybris and nemesis; and to this extent it is a play concerning the blindness (atê) of the clear-sighted:

He went his evil way with soft steps,
And vengeance followed him as softly;
It stands, unseen and dark, behind him.[37]

Further, it was to become a central episode in German national history: the destiny of mankind changes in the Reformation 'and this is indivisibly associated with the Thirty Years' War'.[38] But finally it was the Promethean theme which drew the poet, even if it presented him, now that he was steeped in the thought of Kant, with an impossible tangle of questions. Prometheus represented the sublime: 'Great is he who overcomes the terrible. Sublime is he who, even when succumbing to it, does not fear it. Hercules was great, when he undertook and completed his twelve tasks. Prometheus was sublime when, though in chains in the Caucasus, he did not rue his deed nor confess transgression.'[39] And still more strongly: 'Tragedy does not make gods of us, for gods cannot suffer; it makes heroes of us, that is divine men, or, if you like, suffering gods, Titans. Prometheus, the hero of one of the most beautiful tragedies, is as it were a symbol of tragedy itself.'[40] And so Wallenstein is depicted thus even in his 'camp': [34] Don Carlos (last version) 4720.

---

[35] 'Feel . . . the desire to be God', 790. 'And today God is what man was only yesterday', 950. 'His divinity lasts as long as his dream', 961. Philipp is 'a god' (2932); he presents himself to men as God (3114); he is a god at the price of his uniqueness (3123); Posa challenges him to give up 'the unnatural deification' (3205).

[36] 'The divine Mathilde', 560. Carlos' heart is a 'divine gift' 1833. The Marquis dreams of 'the divine birth of friendship', 4279. The poet can also speak of the 'divine appearance of virtue', 1937.

[37] Picc 2477–2479. 'Oh, you are blind with your seeing eyes!', WT 890. Buttler in Eger: 'He is within, led by doom', WT 2428.

[38] To Körner, 28.11.1791 (III 170).

> He wanted to found a kingdom of soldiers,
> To set the world on fire,
> To dare and to attempt everything . . .[41]
>
> He has a ruler's soul
> And sits on a ruler's throne.[42]

Thus speaks Max. And Wallenstein himself, as he finally includes his guilt in the uncommon character of his life's form:

> Who calls fortune false? For me it was true
> And raised me from the ranks of men
> With love, bore me with a god's > Strong arms through life's stages.
> There is nothing common in the ways of my fate,
> Nor in the furrows of my hand. Who could > Read my life according to the ways of men?[43]

Who is speaking here? The deluded man directly before his death—or the poet? If in the first draft (September 1790–January 1791, concurrent with the develop of the historical work on the Thirty Years' War)[44] Wallenstein was only the ambitious strong man who seeks to avenge himself against the emperor for his demotion to Regensburg, later (1796), under the influence of Goethe, he will emerge at the psychological level as the realist to balance the idealist, Max, and will finally be idealised (in the 'greatest crisis' of the following winter)[45] as the symbol of humanity as such:[46] who bears within himself his lost paradise (like Karl Moor) as his permanent measure of things. In this sense Max was a part of himself: 'for he stood beside me like my youth,/ he made reality into a dream for me'[47]—for whom of course the way back was open, but who stormed ahead, trusting to his 'star', acquiring guilt, but who, like Goethe's harpist and his Faust, can yet be saved, on the grounds of his dark longing, as Thekla, a Spirit Voice (1802) proclaims from the beyond:

---

[39] Vom Erhabenen. 5, 502.

[40] Tragödie und Komödie (sketch from the posthumous works), 5, 502.

[41] WL 332–334.

[42] Picc 412–413.

[43] WT 3566f.

[44] 4, 365ff.

> There too is the father, free of sin,
> Beyond the reach now of the bloody murder
> And he feels that he was deceived by no illusion
> When he gazed up at the stars . . .
> Dare to be wrong and to dream:
> Nobility of mind often lies in children's play.[48]

In a seemingly classical manner the blindness of Wallenstein, the consequence of his terrible traitor's guilt, is interpreted in a conciliatory way as 'madness'.[49] The astral world is also seemingly classical (as the epiphany of divinity), as is the destiny which it governs and which for Wallenstein is decisive. The stars are his daimon, and he sees the origins of the whole disorder of his betrayal in their macrocosmic order, and places himself on 'The spiritual ladders which rise up out of this world of dust/ To the world of stars with a thousand rungs/ and along which the heavenly/ Powers wander up and down'[50]— not as clever as Faust, who keeps well clear of the macrocosmic world. And so Wallenstein justifies himself by the coincidence of his empirical person with his universal daimon and thus proves Terzky right, who wants to instil in him a good conscience:

---

[45] To Goethe, 24.1.1797 (V 146).

[46] Thus in the Prolog, where art is to 'bring' Wallenstein's controversial figure 'nearer to your hearts in a human manner': 'Denn jedes Äusserste führt sie, die alles/ Begrenzt und bindet, zur Natur zurück,/ Sie sieht den Menschen in des Lebens Drang/ Und wälzt die grössre Hälfte seiner Schuld/ Den unglückseligen Gestirnen zu' (For all that is most extreme leads her, who limits and binds everything, back to nature; she sees man in the pressure of life and attributes the larger half of his guilt to the unhappy constellations); thus art elevates itself in a general manner above the ethical decision: 'nature' and 'constellations' (WL 106), cosmic harmony, is given the last word. We shall return to this theme immediately.

[47] WT 3445–3446.

[48] I, 460–461.

[49] WT 2559 and 2564, and in such a way that even in the case of the boy it was not certain 'whether madness or a god had spoken out of him'.

> For every character is right who > Is at one with themselves; there is > No other wrong but self-contradiction.[51]

Wallenstein submits to this philosophy of the identity of guilt and innocence:

> What must be, must be.
> Destiny still possesses the right, for the heart
> In us is its imperious executor.[52]

He pretends to 'seek peace',[53] and to this end to strive for the 'whole', for the synthesis of Emperor and Swede and with this synthesis to embody the objective world-spirit.[54] It is for this reason that the philosophy of Max Piccolomini, which rests upon the 'tug of the heart' as truth,[55] finally fails with Wallenstein.[56] And the poet wants us to believe that the latter is a great power in the world:

---

[50] Picc 978f.

[51] WT 600–602.

[52] WT 654–656.

[53] WT 1950.

[54] 1976, Picc 1180f.

[55] 'Der Zug des Herzens ist des Schicksals Stimme' (the tug of the heart is the voice of destiny), Picc 1840. 'Dein Urteil kann sich irren, nicht mein Herz' (your judgment can err, but not my heart), 2547, cf. WT 1247. Against this, Octavio says: 'Hier gilts, mein Sohn, dem Kaiser wohl zu dienen,/ Das Herz mag dazu sprechen, was es will' (Here, my son, the important thing is to serve the emperor, no matter what the heart says about it), Picc 2460.

[56] WT 717–718: Max must 'make a decision . . . between you and my heart'. Ultimately he admits that his father is right: 'You have indeed spoken the truth, father,/ I trusted my own heart too much' (2283), and Thekla teaches him one final time to let his heart decide, to follow his 'first feeling', to do his duty' (2342): this makes the separation from the beloved, and from the house of Friedland irrevocable.

For this royal man, when he falls,
Will drag a world down with him.[57]

His evil deed must give birth to yet more evil,[58] and he treads the happiness of his own people into the dust without concern, as Max points out to him,[59] but this does not prove the status of Wallenstein as world-spirit. And so it is not clear what must finally happen and be proven, and what would justify such a poetic venture. The lines crisscross and confuse each other. We must put these questions to the philosophy which Schiller at the same time pursues and with which he struggles to ascertain the meaning of existence.

THE NEW INTERPRETATION OF THE SUBLIME. In a laborious, essentially autodidactic struggle, the young Schiller achieves an aesthetic credo which he expounds programmatically in his great didactic poem The Artists (1789) and to which in essence he still holds six years later in the Letters on the Aesthetic Education of Man. Between these two points there occurs his study of Kant with all its fruits, which extend from the lecture on aesthetics (1790) to its further elaboration under the growing influence of Kant (1791), to the Callias Letters (1792), On the Sublime and On the Pathetic, and to his masterpiece On Grace and Dignity (1793). The important supplement On Naive and Sentimental Poetry, which first began to mature through his relationship with Goethe, draws out more clearly the historical and philosophical aspect which could already be seen in The Artists. Kant, who with his aesthetic teaching is received in his entirety, finds a place in a scheme of things which is already present in the earlier sketches (1789): in these the early enthusiastic and sceptical philosophies, the core of the medical and the fruit of the historical studies, and finally the encounter with antiquity had all coalesced into a unity. Artistic beauty is reserved for man in a vertical universe: he shares his labour with the animals and his knowledge with the spirits.[60] But it is also the median point in the horizontal development of history: between the crude condition of nature and the epoch of theory with its scientific analysis of nature. One year previously, The Gods of Greece had lamented the 'loss of gods' in the modern image of the world; divine beauty survives only in immortal song, but must perish in life.[61] In The Artists, on the other hand, the realm of the beautiful and the poet's office are presented as the comprehensive form even in the face of modernity. What is true historically, above all in relation to Greece:

---

[57] Picc 2638–2639.

[58] Picc 2451–2452.

[59] WT 2088–2090.

[60] Die Künstler, verses 30–34 (I, 174).

> Only by passing through the morning gate of the >   beautiful
> Shall you enter the land of knowledge—[62] is true also today: man has his centre in the harmony between the elements. The medical writings had sought the same centre between Nature (body) and spirit, but now it is entrusted to the creativity of artists, who alone can incorporate into the material dimension the law of harmonious proportions: only when presented with a perfected form does the Spirit abstract from ends and desires. Through the beautiful it sees and contemplates truth disinterestedly and learns to love. Only through art does the spirit become religious, for artists are the first to project the values which are palpable to man into a divine image; they represent for him an ethical world-order in narrative and drama, and by the 'immortality' of their creations they even scale the 'prison wall' of mortal existence, discovering thereby immortality. Finally, human beauty must serve to express that of the gods.[63] The historical kairos of the beautiful (The Gateway of Morning) remains from now on the ontological centre, which is affected by every spiritual step forward:

> Advancing man bears art aloft
> Thankfully on raised pinions,
> And new worlds of beauty
> Spring forth from enriched Nature.[64]

---

[61] Die Götter Griechenlands 127–128 (1, 173).
[62] Die Künstler 34–35 (1, 174).
[63] Ibid., 210–265 (1, 179–181).
[64] Ibid., 270–284 (1, 181).

The laws of Nature which the scientist discovers are those of the aesthetic harmony which he already bears within himself; and so 'he lends the spheres his harmony': the latter hovers before him and lights his way in his search as the idea and ideal of a sacred fulfilment. He projects it to the end and bends his path towards it as explorer.[65] This is already that vision which will lead Schelling's early philosophy just a few years later to its final form: art as the inner fulfilment of science and philosophy, beauty as the eschatological ideal of the history of the world and of mankind:

When his science, matured into beauty,
Shall be ennobled as a world of art.[66]

The artists are told: 'The dignity of mankind has been put into your hands'; here everything, even moral value, is firstly embraced by 'beauty': as is religion itself. And this is so in Schiller in an emphatically anthropological sense. It is mortal man who 'with endearing deceit paints Elysium on the walls of his prison',[67] and 'brightens wretched life with the cheerful shadow-world of poetry'.[68] In the artistic act, man creates himself as man, leaving pure Nature behind, and thus establishes the harmony of the world which, with his incorporation of the universe into the world of spirits and of men, goes before him as an ideal.

The further Schiller goes, the clearer the premise for such an experience of the world becomes. Man is alone in the universe, and all myths and religions were his own projections.[69] Schiller likes to depict man in his finite condition: beleaguered and under attack, as in the Knights of Malta,[70] lonely and exposed to the threat of death as in the

---

[65] Ibid., 292–293 (1, 182); 383–392 (1, 184).

[66] Ibid., 404–405 (1, 185).

[67] Ibid., 76–77 (1, 175).

[68] Ibid., 339–340 (1, 183).

[69] Love 'likes to believe in gods, because love is divine. The beings of the ancient fables exist no more', and so the heart invents new names, new beings, which it projects into heaven: thus Max to Thekla, Picc 1634f. (2, 368).

[70] 3, 155–189.

Knight's Song,[71] risking all vaingloriously as in The Diver ('and plunges down to life or to death'),[72] also as an isolated community left to its own resources, as the sea dramas (The Ship, The Pirates, Sea Drama) were to depict,[73] doubly endangered in their passage through history which leads them slowly out of the protection of Nature, as in The Walk, leaving them to themselves and leading them into a place from which there is no escape:

> But where am I? The path is hidden. Precipitous >   depths
> Yawn behind me, and I must go on.
> I have left behind me the familiar accompaniment of >   the gardens and hedges,
> And every trace of human hands. . .
> It is wild here and fearfully barren. In the solitary sky
> There hangs only an eagle, linking the world and the >   clouds.[74]

The conciliatory ending with its reference to the comprehensiveness of Nature is both weak and false. Schiller's beauties and ideals flash in the middle of the night, and it is only the projections of the heart that light up and overwhelm this dark. Tartarus and Elysium, as eschatological possibilities, are just such projections.[75] But in The Pilgrim, who wanders in the hope that earthly beings 'would be divinely immortal there', it is finally understood that Heaven has no point of contact with the earth and 'There is never here'.[76] So everything hangs on the 'favour of the moment': 'all that is divine on earth/ is only a dream',

> So every beautiful gift
> Fades like the lightning flash,
> And is quickly enclosed again
> In night's dark grave.[77]

---

[71] WL conclusion (2, 309–311).

[72] 1, 373.

[73] Fragments: 3, 259–266.

[74] 1, 233.

[75] 1, 90; 1, 103.

[76] 1, 412–413.

[77] 1, 428–429.

Thus the moment is for Schiller not only what it was for Plato, or even for Goethe, which is to say the gracious confluence of the forces of Nature, but is the flash as beauty and Spirit—and in Spirit also as God—of that which remains night beyond man. Therefore there is the repeated statement that truth is terrible and is only endurable when it is clothed in beauty. This is the case in The Words of Madness,[78] in Cassandra,[79] in The veiled Statue of Saïs[80] and in The Sayings of Confucius ('The depths are bottomless . . . and truth dwells in the abyss').[81] In addition, there is the insight into the radical impermanence precisely of that which is the basis of all our hope for eternity: in Nania ('Even what is beautiful must die . . .')[82] and, in the form of a question, in To Emma.[83] The idea of the radical demythologisation and dedivinisation of the world endures to the last—and very clearly so in the poem The Four Ages of the World.[84] The ideal becomes real according to the measure of the strength of the human heart (The Words of Madness: 'It is in you, you bring it eternally out').[85] Significantly we find the symbol of 'Columbus', which anticipates Nietzsche: the coast must appear, because it is a projection of the spirit and is its goal.[86]

Before Schiller came into contact with Kant, therefore, he had already grasped the idea of the radical finitude of reason, the unknowability of things an sich, the unverifiability of ideas and ideals and also the aesthetic 'median force' between the animal and the spiritual parts of man. Even more, he had understood the vulnerability of man within the universe, and the absolute anthropocentrism of the world is for him the basis of the idea of the sublime: the human heart, that is, which, cast into the void, transcends itself as it ventures forth into an unfathomable reality. This heart is the sole glory. All that Schiller learns from Kant, he assimilates into what he already possesses. His introduction through the Critique of Judgment, which depicts a third, mediating force between perception and intellect, will assist him in this. Initially Schiller is concerned—while preserving Kant's tension between beauty and sublimity—with emphasising the role of the aesthetic as the (higher) centre of man and of humanity: firstly in the Kantian sense as 'harmony' between Spirit and the senses (grace: Anmut), but then, going beyond Kant, as the harmony between the harmony of 'beauty' and the disharmony of 'sublimity' (dignity: Würde), and finally as the balance between the historically anticipated totality (of the Greeks) and the totality which is to be retrieved as a higher harmony by passing through the modern disharmony (in the 'aesthetic education'), or as the balance between the naive (Goethe) and the sentimental (Schiller). All four forms of balance are only variants of a single basic rule, which is made possible by the fact that the (Christian) rigour and 'sublimity' of the Kantian categorical imperative which, compelled by the 'radical evil' within man, always orientates the will beyond itself to a transcendent sense of duty (Sollen), is rejected in favour of a fundamentally achievable identity, a complete harmonisation of ethical man with himself, whereby in a radical anthropological reduction every apprehension of the theological dimension is made redundant. Here the spirit of Fichte is already present: between the absolute and the empirical subject there is no longer any analogical relationship (of God and creature), but identity in a state of tension. It is now possible to speak as a matter of course of 'our divine nature' as the site of freedom and of 'God in us' as the 'law-giver';[87] 'man bears incontrovertibly within himself in his personality the makings of divinity', while he possesses in his senses 'the path to divinity' within himself in infinite approximation:[88] the absolute point, where the Spirit and the senses bifurcate lies within man himself. The 'predisposition' in man to synthesis is God as Nature ('everything that wholesome nature does is divine');[89] but it is not the will of man alone (voluntas ut natura), but his 'moral will which makes him divine'.[90] Where moral freedom can attain harmony with sensible nature, it can at times even 'unfold an unlovely and oppressed form with divine glory'.[91]

---

[78] I, 213–216.

[79] Verses 57–64 (I, 358).

[80] I, 224–226.

[81] I, 226–227.

[82] I, 242.

[83] I, 406.

[84] I, 417–419.

[85] I, 215–216.

[86] I, 247.

---

[87] AW 5, 483.

[88] EM 11; 5, 603.

The essay On Grace and Dignity attempts to shed some light precisely on this mystery of a harmony between the senses and reason (with its non-sensible ideas and imperatives). The body (in man and beast) has a technical perfection of nature for the purposes of life and spirit: this concerns the intellect and hence, for Kant, not the disinterested enjoyment of aesthetic taste. Being disinterested, the form can be of sensual beauty only when it is viewed as an architectonic structure. And it is only when moral freedom employs this naturally beautiful structure as its means of expression that Anmut (grace; harmony) results. But what is the form of the schematism between the two realms if man as a moral person must be capable of renouncing the whole of the sensual realm, and thus no overarching law (which would be natural) can embrace them both—and yet 'where moral sentiment finds satisfaction . . . the aesthetic sense will not be curtailed'?[92] The answer is: 'that the representation of interests and aims in man has turned out to be more beautiful than in other organic formations, is to be seen as an act of grace (Gunst), which reason, as legislator of the human structure, has shown to Nature as executor of its laws,'[93] a kind of grace or favour, that is, which Nature repays by allowing the Spirit to express itself harmoniously even in herself where, being moral, Spirit is bound to contradict sensuality. What is possible as Grace—the representation of the free person through a sense medium by playing with architectonic beauty—bridges even the potential 'contradiction' of the two spheres. And so it is true that 'grace is a form of favour which morality shows to the senses just as architectonic beauty can be considered the consent of nature to its technical form'.[94] In this sense beauty is the 'citizen of two worlds'.[95] Schiller speaks at this critical point, which of course he believes to be governed by a 'law which we cannot fathom',[96] of 'liberality',[97] of 'indulgence'[98] and, naturally, time and again of 'play', where 'freedom governs beauty'[99] without abusing it, where the person takes the place of Nature, and assumes 'together with its rights a portion of its obligations'. It is here without doubt that the deepest mystery of Being for Schiller lies, for it now emerges as charis: at once grace, favour, beauty, elegance, felicity, mutual gratitude and enrichment: Pindar seems to be present again. One of Schiller's most beautiful poems, Fortune, takes charis as its theme: the gift of the beneficent gods, granted to their favourite 'before he has emerged victorious from his labours':

---

[89] ND 5, 704.
[90] AW 5, 471.
[91] AW 5, 447.
[92] AW 5, 458.
[93] AW 5, 443–444.

I call that man great who, his own fashioner and creator,
Commands the Fates with force of virtue
But cannot command fortune and, what Charis jealously denies him, labouring courage can never win.
A serious will can protect you from the unworthy,
The all-highest, a gracious gift from the gods,
As your beloved loves you, the heavenly gifts descend,
Grace reigns in Jupiter's realm above as it does in the realm of Amor.

The gods, it continues, love youth but 'only the blind man has seen their glory'. And charis is raised above the gods themselves: 'felicity alone has crowned the god'. Grace and beauty are the highest things of all, and so

Do not begrudge the beautiful its beauty or that, undeserving,
It is as replendent as the lily's calyx by Venus' gift,

[94] AW 5, 459.
[95] AW 5, 442.
[96] AW 5, 459.
[97] AW 5, 477.
[98] AW 5, 477.
[99] AW 5, 446.

> Let that be blessed which, as you gaze upon it, blesses
> you,
> And transports you by its unearned splendour.

So no one should envy the poet his art:

> Because he is blessed, you can be happy . . .
> Where there is no miracle, there can be no > happiness.[100]

This highpoint in his understanding of the world is quite different from that of Kant. Schiller stands by the absolute character of the moral imperative; but why 'the imperative form', which 'accuses and humiliates mankind' and 'transforms the most potent expression of moral freedom into a more glorious kind of servility', and which imposes 'the appearance of an alien and positivistic law'?[101] The free person belongs to himself and to no one else. And further: Why the desire to view the ethical only in specific cases as a single absolute deed; is it not better on balance and in the long term to establish the ethical, if possible, rather within the context of the whole man (the Aristotelian ethizesthai) and to achieve the habitus of the good, the virtus: 'Virtue is nothing other than an inclination to duty'?[102] 'For the excellence of man does not at all consist in the greater sum of individual rigoristic and moral actions, but in the greater congruence of the whole of the natural structure with the moral law.'[103] Reconciliation is more than conquering the foe.[104] If the situation of 'sublimity' must reveal the 'great soul' and this situation is precisely the 'infallible touch stone' of the 'beautiful soul',[105] in which it is not 'grace' (Anmut) any more, but must prove its 'dignity', and we must show it 'respect' and not only the 'love' of 'benevolence',[106] then the shades and degrees which Schiller erects between grace (Anmut) and dignity (Würde) show that he regards both as being the forms of play of the one single indivisible sensual-ethical human nature, in which (and nowhere else) the divine appears: both as the enchantment of charis and as majesty. Schiller reinterprets this too in anthropological terms: 'The highest degree of grace is the power to enchant; the highest degree of dignity is majesty'. This 'presents a law to us which obliges us to look within ourselves. In the presence of the god we cast our eyes to the floor, become oblivious of everything beyond ourselves and experience nothing but the heavy burden of our own existence. Only the holy possesses majesty. And if a man can represent this to us, then he possesses majesty; and our spirit will fall to the ground before him, even if our knees do not follow'.[107] A portrayal of this kind is quite alien to the spirit of antiquity and to that of Christianity.

---

[100] 1, 240–241; cf. also Das Geheimnis 1, 404, Die Gunst des Augenblicks 1, 428–429.

[101] AW 5, 467.

[102] AW 5, 464.

[103] Über den moralischen Nutzen ästhetischer Sitten 5, 787. The entire essay is concerned with ethizesthai.

[104] AW 5, 465.

[105] AW 5, 474.

[106] AW 5, 482.

In essence, the letters On the Aesthetic Education of Man add only the historical dimension to these insights, as this was already revealed in The Artists and as it remained normative for Idealist philosophy. It is a paradoxical work because it places a major objection at its centre, which it is scarcely possible to rebut. If the historical division into periods shows the passage of three epochs, which emerge clearly with the Greeks for instance: the archaic and mythic period in which the divine appears primarily as fearsome and 'sublime', followed by a classical and aesthetic age in which the world becomes familiar and is the object of a fearless contemplation (theôria) and the gods and their images are characterised by beauty, and finally by a post-classical, philosophical and abstract age in which the gods diminish,[108] then is it not the case that the age of beauty is merely a brief period of transition and in actuality the herald of the end of a truly strong and elevated culture? And can this law not be proven almost without exception: in Athens and Sparta, with the [107] AW 5, 485–486; cf. Über die notwendigen Grenzen beim Gebrauch schöner Formen 5, 670.

[108] EM Letters 9 and 20f.; the division into periods is sketched out more clearly in NSD 5, 708f.

Romans, the Arabs, in Medici Florence and into the present? 'Indeed, it must be a cause for concern that in virtually every historical period in which the arts flourish and taste prevails, mankind is debased, and that there is scarcely a single example of a high degree and great profusion of aesthetic culture existing in a people which possesses both political freedom and bourgeois virtue, where mores are both beautiful and good and behaviour is both refined and honest'.[109]

This is an almost fatal objection for Schiller, who has to refrain from going back beyond the classical period of beauty to the world of living myth (when the gods were not only the serene projections of human ideals, but were also truly believed to be divine epiphanies), in order to find there, in authentic myth, to which the authentic Christian revelation in the later West corresponds, the provable source of the aesthetic. Schiller will nevertheless oppose the law which he himself as historian discovered and which as philosopher he must also acknowledge to be an empirical law ('perhaps experience is not the judgment seat before which a question such as this can be solved') and will pledge himself to prove by an a priori deduction of the essence of beauty (as the synthesis of man and thus of the world), that it must—despite history—be the central concept of all culture.[110] Man is and remains spirit-body, and a culture, which—be it religious, scientific or technological—strives away from the body and towards spirit must be his destruction. The interrelationship of these, anticipated by the Greeks in a way that has become paradigmatic, remains a guiding idea for every potential culture, according to which and in orientation to which mankind must be educated, if we are to be true to ourselves. The names of the poles vary: (the drive to) form and (the drive to) matter, structure (Gestalt) and life, state and action, state (Zustand) and object (Gegenstand), relaxation and tension; but we are concerned always with the same mystery of human wholeness, which remains ultimately the mystery of beauty, in the highest tension between grace (Anmut) and dignity (Würde). The artist projects this highest synthesis, as idea and ideal, into his concept of the god: form that is so dominant as to permeate matter utterly, matter that is so transformed that all sensual desire is banished and everything has become a representation of the Spirit which is the object of a pure and disinterested contemplation. The god is the exuberant and perfected form of man of which Schiller—with 'the glorious countenance' of the goddess in Goethe's reception room before his eyes—speaks with evident passion: 'It is neither grace nor dignity that speaks to us from the glorious countenance of a Juno Ludovisi; it is neither the one nor the other, because it is both at the same time. While the female deity demands our devotion, the god-like woman arouses our love; but even while we yield ourselves utterly to the divine loveliness, the divine self-sufficiency thrusts us back. The whole figure rests and remains within itself, an entirely closed creation, and it does so as if it were quite beyond space, neither yielding nor resisting: here there is no strength which ever fought with others' strength, no vulnerability where temporality could gain entrance. Irresistibly seized and drawn by the one, yet held at a distance by the other, we find ourselves both in a state of the highest stillness and in a state of the greatest movement, and that wonderful sensation is born for which the understanding can find no concept and language find no name.'[111] That which comes closest to this ideal in the human world is the agôn, the idea of which Schiller (anticipating Nietzsche) traces through different cultures as 'the ideal of the play instinct', which has assimilated gravity into itself.[112] When he depicts the aesthetic synthesis as indifferentia, as 'zero', but precisely thus as the prefigurement of the highest reality, he anticipates Schelling; but this formula gives him the possibility of seeing the human ideal as being both the youth of an individual person and as the historical past of human kind (Greek culture) in so far as this aesthetic indifferentia is the true point of departure for the realisation of the True and the Good,[113] and yet also to see it as the eschatological goal for the integration of all distinctions in the comprehensive indifferentia.[114] Since the latter leading idea imposes law upon all endeavour, art also demands at first the ethical self-realisation of the artist: 'Nothing but that which is already a living deed within us, can become so outside us, and it is the same with creations of the spirit as it is with organic structures; the fruit proceeds only from the blossom.'[115] In his review of Bürger's poems, Schiller, who is clinical to the point of cruelty, highlights this lack of an ethical standpoint as the reason for their aesthetic deficiencies.[116] [109] EM Letter 10; 5, 598f.

---

[110] EM Letter 10; 5, 600.

---

[111] EM Letter 15; 5, 618–619.

[112] EM Letter 15; 617 and note.

[113] EM Letter 23; 5, 641–643.

On Naive and Sentimental Poetry wrestles with the same anxious question addressed to historical development: does the latter not move hopelessly away from an aesthetic culture to one that is abstract and technical, and does the orientation to antiquity or even our nostalgic love of Nature not remain pure and lifeless romanticism?[117] The reply can point to the miracle of Goethe and, next to him, to the endeavours, almost equal in status, of Schiller. In the one there is the naive attainment of a human totality, a creation from the gift of balance, from the charis of abundance; in the other there is a lively integration into the totality which serves as a leading idea. From the point of view of the historian, Schiller can favour the latter form. 'Nature makes him [man] one with himself, while art [i.e., culture] divides him so that he returns to unity through the ideal. But because the ideal is infinite, eternally beyond his reach, the cultivated man can never become perfect in his way . . . And if we compare the different types with each other, then it appears that the goal which man through culture strives for is infinitely preferable to that which he achieves through nature',[118] because in infinite 'progress' the real integration of the True and the [114] In this aspect, it will then be quite possible for Schiller—as in his polemical Horen essay against Fichte Über die notwendigen Grenzen beim Gebrauch schöner Formen (1795)—to characterise the sober, strictly material truth as the 'source of all true beauty' (5, 686) and thus to remove all playful dilettantism from his idea.

---

[115] Über die notwendigen Grenzen, etc., 5, 682.

[116] 5, 970f.

[117] NSD 5, 708f.

[118] NSD 5, 718.

Good of the total person occurs. Within the naive sphere there is 'the art of limitation' while in the sentimental we have 'the art of the Infinite'.[119] But since the latter too must speak in concrete images, Schiller planned an eschatological idyll,[120] in which the final deification of man was to be portrayed: 'The marriage of Hercules and Hebe would be the content of my idyll. The poet has no material beyond this, for he is not permitted to abandon human nature, and the idyll would deal precisely with this transformation of man into god. The chief figures would themselves be gods, but through Hercules I can bind them to humanity and introduce a sense of movement into the picture. If I succeeded with this undertaking, then I would hope to celebrate thereby the triumph of sentimental over naive poetry'.[121]

Hegel will raise man to the level of absolute spirit, whereby all aestheticism which depends upon the senses remains before the door of the Holy of Holies. But Schiller sees the aesthetic counterpart to the Christian eschatology of the resurrection of the flesh into God: not, however, as the miracle of the grace of the personal God, but as the miracle of the divine charis of man (who always has been divine). The sentimental poet leads us 'not backwards to our childhood . . . but . . . forwards to our coming-of-age' since he 'guides man, who can no longer return to Arcadia, as far as Elysium'.[122] Schiller's Titanic nature comes to the fore again here: man is to become God, not by the eradication of his finitude, but by retaining and transfiguring it. And if we ask what in all seriousness finitude means here, then its ultimately questionable character will emerge, as with Kant. Does this finitude (as beauty's small pool of light) contrast with an 'infinite' dark abyss (of 'truth')? Or is finitude itself the True, since the finite human figure has eschatologically integrated within itself all that is true and good?[123] The answer to this [119] NSD 5, 719.

[120] The three forms of sentimental poetry as satire (distance from the ideal), elegy (alternation of attaining and distance) and idyll (attainment), and their deduction from the human capacity: see the note, 5, 744–46.

[121] To W. von Humboldt, 29.11.1795 (IV 338).

[122] NSD 5, 750.

[123] This must then be the meaning of the well-known verses (429–432) question will determine whether Schiller's kalon is a transcendental property of Being or not. Kant restricted the latter to a harmony of the subjective powers; Schiller follows him in this by making the beautiful the primal measure of the human (for even the sublime does not vacate the sphere of human proportions). Now is this primal measure also the ultimate measure of Being? The origin of Schiller's thought in Leibniz argues for this, as does the reduction of the infinite process of the becoming of the world towards God to the progress of mankind towards its highest (perhaps unattainable, only approachable) idea,[124] and finally the provenance of the ideal from the Greeks. Against this, on the other hand, is Schiller's determined halt at Kant's ignorabimus, his refusal to go the way of absolute Idealism, because he would thereby be obliged to relativise the beloved finitude of spiritual-sensual man and finally to abandon it altogether. Thus the inquiry into Being and God is lost to sight, and the spotlight falls on man actively involved in the agôn and in tragedy: on a being who possesses ideals but not gods, on a being who possesses its majesty and its glory within itself. Man has no need of myth; he is his own myth. And as such, face to face with the Greek hero, Schiller now leads him on to the stage.

THE REMAINDER OF THE SUM. If beauty is supremely charis, favour and grace, then Schiller is honest enough to pose the question whom man must thank for this grace which comes to him unhoped-for and undeserved. The answer is an incomprehensible universalising principle which, despite the whole philosophy of Spirit, the philosophical texts unashamedly call 'Nature' and which, in the action of the dramas, receives the name 'Fate'. What is the source of this category which forces its way into an Idealism of freedom? What are the stars to which Wallenstein entrusts himself? Above all, what is the inherited curse, unstoppable in its effects, which forms the tragedy The Bride of Messina?

---

in the Künstler, that man 'at last, at the mature goal of the ages' will creep 'poor in the truth', 1, 186.

[124] 'Through ever purer forms, purer tones,/ through ever higher heights and ever more beauteous beauties': Die Künstler, verses 426–427; 1, 185.

'Nature' as sensation obeys the Spirit, although it does not include this (as it does in Goethe or Heidegger, for whom Nature as physis represents something quite different). Fate in Schiller can be interpreted only in one way: it is the form of degeneration[125] of the mythical and theological reality which determines the existential drama of antiquity. But while the fearsomeness of fate in the classical period together with the obscure guilt which went with it led ultimately to praise of the god, whose glory is affirmed even in what is terrible (and hideous), in Schiller it is man who, in suffering the terrible, makes of it something which is both beautiful and sublime. 'We call an object sublime, the idea of which makes our sensual nature perceive its own limits and our rational nature its superiority, its freedom from limits'.[126] But then man owes the transformation of the fearsome into something sublime not to the glory of the gods but to the glory which he himself possesses. In the Bride of Messina oracles become necessary, as in the Oedipus,[127] prophecies are made, and the Euripidean curse against the gods and their utterances is spoken by the mouth of the unfortunate princess.[128] And further: the world of the divine is addressed as a person, and is so either in a Christian way—Maria is the 'high Queen of Heaven',[129] she is 'divine',[130] the action takes place between 'monasteries', 'churches', 'high masses', 'requiems', 'pilgrimages'[131]—or in a classical manner as 'gods',[132] a suspect indifferentia. What is more important is that the mother, who steps before her temporarily reconciled sons, can describe the picture set up for all to see as 'beautiful', 'glorious', 'divine'; that her dead sons can be described as 'gods';[133] that Don Cesar understands his necessary expiation for fratricide to be an act which he alone can perform and which necessarily demands his life.

---

[125] This becomes completely clearly in the follies of the so-called 'dramas of fate' which imitate Die Braut von Messina.

[126] Von Erhabenen 5, 489; 'All that is sublime comes only from the reason' (Über das Pathetische, 5, 517). Schiller knows no other concept, in all the variations of the conceptual breadth, than this purely anthropological concept. On the theme: Karl Viëtor, 'Die Idee des Erhabenen in der deutschen Literatur' in: Geist und Form, Berne 1952. E. Cassirer, 'Die Methodik des Idealismus in Schillers philosophischen Schriften', in: Idee und Gestalt, Berlin 1921.

[127] 'The oracle has a share in the tragedy that is quite incapable of being replaced by anything else': to Goethe, 2.10.1797 (V 271).

[128] Die Braut von Messina, 2327–2397 (2, 896–898).

[129] Ibid., 294.

[130] Ibid., 1077.

[131] Ibid., 721, 2618f., 2709f., etc.

[132] Ibid., 2386, 2396, 2508, etc.

> Bloody murder is expiated only by blood . . .
> Only free death breaks destiny's chains . . .
> I pay for my guilt first to the gods of death,
> Let another god care for the living . . .
> Honour the head of the luckless one,
> Which is sacred even to the gods . . .[134]

We cannot guess at the meaning of the words 'God', 'gods' and 'divine' here, since there is no longer any distinction between man and God; nor indeed what that Fate is which distinct from men reigns obscurely for itself alone. We may presume that, as in Wallenstein, it is first and foremost a projection into the universe of human grandeur and guilt.

The anthropocentrism of Mary Stuart and The Maid of Orléans is more evident. Although the Christian atmosphere is even more pervasive here, it remains throughout no more than that, an atmosphere which surrounds a Kantian, even a super-Kantian problem. Mary acknowledges her previous guilt,[135] though she denies the ostensible grounds for her being held in captivity,[136] and by rising above herself, after her meeting with Elizabeth and her condemnation, she becomes united within herself and finds that she is able to accept the unjust as a higher form of justice and that 'she will die as a queen and a heroine'.[137] In her death she forgives Elizabeth,[138] as Ferdinand in his death had offered his murderous father his hand. The Catholic sacramental decor with confession, Eucharist ('blood'), and crucifix remains metaphor in the realm of the senses for 'sublimity', and all the more so in that Mortimer had allowed himself to be converted to Catholicism in Rome through this decor and had been initiated into Jesuitical sophistry in France. The maid of Orléans remains a purely Kantian saint, who can be God's emissary and the one favoured by Him for as long as she remains united with herself, or can live in her pure ideality; she loses her Platonic identity with herself through a single sensual glance, although she can return to her original 'sanctity' by a process of self-purification through penance and renunciation.[139] This time there is much talk of 'glory': Johanna has seen 'the glory of Heaven';[140] 'The king himself with his crown/ Is no more radiant than you',[141] she has 'perfected all this glory',[142] on coronation day her sisters see her 'in glory',[143] and Margot says to her: 'We come to see your glory',[144] and the king asks her: 'Show yourself in your form of light,/ As Heaven sees you and we in dust/ Honour you devoutly'.[145] But Schiller calls the play 'a romantic tragedy', and the religious clothing together with the miraculous element is again nothing but a folkloristic form of symbolism for the inner action, to which chivalry, sheep-rearing,[146] and the Amazons also belong, as well as speeches about the gods.[147] What is essential is that Johanna is permitted to wear without guilt the avenging sword of God which Karl Moor bore, as long as she 'casts all around the glory of Heaven',[148] as long as she performs His task 'as a blind tool of God' and 'with blind eyes',[149] and remains the pure transmitter of divine revelation and action. The Amazonian virginity which is essential for this lacks all the humanity which characterises the Christian and Marian element—as the precondition of motherhood. The frosty air of the Kantian-Fichtean absolute formal Self surrounds her. Thus, unassailed by the 'sinful flames of vain earthly delight',[150] as 'a goddess of war'[151] and 'a woman warrior of the highest God',[152] she can wield the 'avenging sword of my God'.[153] By renouncing earthly love, which tempts her for only a moment, she, who 'has seen the immortal one with her own eyes',[154] can retreat through the experience of divine abandonment into her own ideality,[55] thus becoming united with herself and, like Samson when he was blind and bound, break her fetters[156] and, through her own destruction, conquer for herself and for France, with the result that she is proclaimed a saint already by the king.[157] Rarely has there been a greater distortion of Christian sanctity than here, where the word, which in Christian terms expresses our participation in God's own sanctity, becomes the expression of moral self-sanctification.

---

[133] Don Cesar to his mother: 'Flee to our grave/ and cry to the divinity of your son,/ for then we are gods and hear you', 2759–2761.

[134] ibid., 2637f.

[135] Maria Stuart, 271f.

[136] Ibid., 863f.

[137] Ibid., 3380.

[138] Ibid. 3781f.

---

[139] The poem Das Mädchen von Orléans gives the key to the drama: 1, 460–468.

[140] Die Jungfrau von Orléans, 2633.

[141] Ibid., 2666–2667.

[142] Ibid., 2534.

[143] Ibid., 2804.

[144] Ibid., 2880.

[145] Ibid., 1967–2969.

[146] Ibid. I, 2nd scene.

[147] 'Child of the gods', 'voice of the gods', 'gods of death', 'without the gods there falls no hair from man's head', the comparison of Johanna with the 'severe Pallas' etc.

[148] Ibid., 2252.

Meanwhile, there is a counter-motif which is palpable through the whole of his literary work and which draws Schiller into a close proximity to Christianity. This is the motif of obedience which, at least in its dramatic representation, must appear not as obedience to self (of the empirical to the intelligible self), but as interpersonal, truly committed obedience, and which thus contains within itself secretly or openly a point of unconditional love. This motif must have taken root deep in the poet's soul, if even the drill of the hated military academy could not assail it. It is, corresponding to the amphiboly in the notion of the 'great personality', either a blind devotion to the strong, or the unconditional offering of self to the ideal commandment. Thus its sources lie just as much in the enthusiasm of love and friendship (in the Enlightenment 'Theosophy') as they do in Kant's Prussian categorical concept of duty. Karl Moor demands absolute obedience; 'Who hesitates when I issue a command?'[158] This is even more true of Franz Moor: 'With your blind obedience!'[159] And also Wallenstein:

---

[149] Ibid., 2578–2579.

[150] Ibid., 412.

[151] Ibid., 956.

[152] Ibid., 2203.

[153] Ibid., 2257.

[154] Ibid., 3191.

[155] Ibid., V, 6th scene.

[156] Ibid., 3470f.

[157] Ibid., 3523.

'The deed is mute, obedience is blind,
These are his very words'.[160]

And his words to Illo: 'They must give me words, in an oath, written down/ that they will devote themselves to my service, unconditionally'.[161] And to Max:

'Duty to whom? Who are you?
If I do the emperor a wrong, then it is My wrong and not yours. Are you
Your own possession? . . .
You are rooted in me, I am your emperor'.[162]

Gordon says to Buttler: 'We subalterns have no will', to which Buttler replies: 'But the narrow way of duty is sure'.[163] Formal ethics can cover both elements in these cases: the demonically evil and the objectively justified. Johanna's 'blind obedience' to the 'God' who wishes to work through her also remains formal. The pseudo-Catholic obedience of Mortimer and Philip to the Grand Inquisitor is formal and demonic, not to mention the secret order in The Man who saw Ghosts. The situation is different concerning the motifs of The Knights of Malta, where Christian themes predominate over the Kantian ideology. Two motifs interprenetrate each [158] Die Räuber II, 3.

[159] Ibid., IV, 2.
[160] WL 340–341.
[161] Picc 897f.
[162] WT 2178–2183.
[163] WT 2507, 2515.

other: the commitment to a religious idea which extends as far as the total obedience of the professed religious—a self-offering of which an ideal love is an essential part—and the devotion of a friend for a friend, as real love and at the same time as ideal imitation. This unconditioned love between friends may take on homoerotic traits in the The Knights of Malta (Schiller consciously wanted to introduce a Greek motif, including in this drama the Greek choir), characteristics which are absent from Don Carlos or from The Pledge, where we find only a pure representative death for love ('Now he will be nailed to the cross').[164] And that obedience which is mediated through that incomparable fatherliness of a spiritual superior, which is glorified in the 'battle with the dragon', can be truly understood only in a Christian way, as Schiller expresses it in the final lines, and almost solemnly confirms in the poem The Knights of Malta quoted above. Yet it is not the Knights of Malta drama which was performed, but Wallenstein, and then the series of dramas in which formalism penetrates the artistic element like mildew. The Mary Stuart is good though coldly calculated theatre; the Maid of Orléans borders on kitsch, the Bride of Messina is hollow and unconvincing; William Tell is shallow despite all its pure inspiration and Demetrius is only another variant on the Maid (like the planned Perkin Warbeck): that is to say, only man united within himself can act 'divinely'.

Schiller, the educator of the people, driven by his own dialectic and in contradiction to all his traditional drapery (be it classical or Christian), places man on his own without remainder: as a finite spark of beauty without a containing shelter. In this he is ahead of his time, which however will not hesitate to grasp the premisses of his vision and to draw the consequences from it.

2. FICHTE

While Kant and Schiller stop short at the finiteness of the human spirit in a way that might be judged to be more

---

[164] Die Bürgschaft 98 (1, 355).

'modern', the three Titans Fichte, Schelling and Hegel want to conceive of man within the wholeness of the Absolute, as its centre. This expressly demands that all philosophy, above all that of antiquity, should be fulfilled and transcended through the philosophical appropriation of the Christian revelation. If the starting point for Fichte is the principle of the self, as perfect free self-possession in action, this is a demonstrably Christian point of departure. It is in the Bible that for the first time God becomes 'I' and man His 'Thou', and a πρᾶξις πράξεως is opposed to the Aristotelian νόησις νοήσεως. But since it is a question of philosophy and knowledge and not of theology and faith, there can be no distinction between 'Nature' and 'Grace' (in the theological sense): the historical (biblical) revelation of God coincides with the revelation of Being, and so the finite becomes the revelation of the infinite, God and world together construct—once again—the totality of simple and complex Being, which in aesthetic terms is that total work of art in which God is the 'light' and the world the 'form', in which God is the life and the world the structure. The categories of artistic (secular) aesthetics is also the prime source, especially in Schelling and Hegel, for the language of metaphysics. The world is the 'expression' of God. But Idealism remains a reading of Kant: it is not objective world-systems which are the focus of attention (as in Erigena or Spinoza), rather, the totality needs to be developed from the transcendental art-structure of the thinking and acting subject. In terms of method this act must remain the principle and the fulcrum; in so far as it is the Absolute in its depths, or in so far as it implies and envisages it, the Absolute is relevant; and this remains true even when it opens itself to thought in revelation. The 'retreat to the man as the centre' is in no way retracted; for the first time it is 'Titanically' pressed home, and is so with an appeal to Christianity as the point of the turning of the world to subjectivity. But this means that even when the idealist systems are at their closest to Plotinus (as the final figure of the classical age), the situation with regard to the open and Advent-like decision, which predominates in Plotinus, does not return; rather, everything is finally decided through the determination to conceive Christianity (in a post-Christian manner) as pure philosophy and ultimately as the potentiality of man, history and culture. Even the (much weaker) opportunity for decision in Nicolas of Cusa (conjecture or absolute knowledge?) is now clearly decided in favour of the latter. The die is cast. It is true that Schleiermacher, who in the spring of 1802 heard Fichte lecture on his philosophy of the absolute sense of dependency, will similarly attempt to interpret this teaching in Christian terms, as Augustine aimed to deepen the teaching of Plotinus by christianising it; but the point of departure for both remains quite distinct, for in Plotinus the decision has not been made (or not clearly so) for the 'living God' of the Bible, while Fichte passionately rejects precisely this form of aliveness. No Christian school of thought, be it Protestant or Catholic (Maréchal, for instance, and his followers), will in the long run be able to resist the strength and the pull of the fundamental acts of decision in the three idealist systems when they 'engage' with the latter in order to effect a dialogue with them. Neither can we be deceived by the fact that, compared with the philosophy of Spirit of the Enlightenment, we find in all the Idealists a feeling for the dimensions of negative theology: God cannot be reduced to an object and yet is precisely as such (pace Kant) the One who manifests Himself in the world: does not this draw very close to Plotinus, Erigena and Nicolas of Cusa? But philosophical necessity binds God and his revelation, man, one to the other. Man is himself the manifest God, and therefore these titanic cathedrals must always lack what is decisive in Christianity, although they have absorbed all else from it: viz., that which is called in the Bible 'glory'. Being, God, is ultimately overcome. The Old Testament, which is the site of emergent glory, is rejected in favour of the Johannine final form of the New Testament, disassociated from Paul and the synoptics, in order to be able to reinterpret agape directly and freely in the direction of gnosis. 'Glory' stands and falls with the unsurpassability of the analogia entis, the ever greater dissimilarity to God no matter how great the similarity to Him (Denz.-Schönm. 806). In so far as German Idealism begins with the identitas entis, the way back to Christianity is blocked; it cannot produce an aesthetics of 'glory' but only one of 'beauty': and the 'aesthetics as science', which was rampant in the nineteenth century, is its fruit.

Fichte's[1] point of departure is the self which, in the appropriation of its freedom (in its sense of duty) is self-possession (autonomy) and self-contemplation. Thus Fichte radicalises the point of perception and the autonomy which we find in Kant, beyond that the cogito of Descartes and beyond that still, though unknown to him, the speculative project of Eckhart.[2] This project, as we stated above, would have been impossible in the classical period, since it presupposes Christianity, not only because the Absolute appears as a self (ego) but also because it is not eros (longing) but duty (the will of the Absolute) which determines the autonomous point of freedom. This is a descendant of the 'metaphysics of the saints' and it concentrates the classical ethic of Being (which is distributed through the hierarchical universe, as its immanent order) in an indivisible personhood: man is he who knows and can perform the very will of God.

But if we enquire who that self is which is identical with itself and which serves as Fichte's point of departure, then we shall have to reply: it is neither God nor man. It is not God because it stands beyond every form of reflection which presupposes a non-self and every form of self-appropriation of freedom which presupposes an obligation, and thus cannot ever be conceived of under the motif of self-consciousness or personality. But neither is it man, for he is always finite consciousness of self, never pure itself, to which the philosopher only attains 'by drawing a conclusion',[3] as to 'the basis of all experience'.[4] 'The form of selfhood, reflexive action, lies solely in the self as intellectual perception . . . The self exists in this form only for the philosopher':[5] a point necessarily constructed in such a way that a progression is possible from it as pre-supposition to a real consciousness of self. In order to possess reality, it requires the world as that opposing (through the creative powers of the imagination) non-self, which permits it to achieve self-consciousness through reflection on itself and freedom through action. And in so far as this process must always continue in order that consciousness and freedom should emerge through what is opposite, the scheme of the pure self remains only at the level of the 'idea'.

---

[1] Collected works, ed. J. H. Fichte, Berlin 1845f., 8 Vols. (textual form following the edition by Medikus, Leipzig 1908, 8 Vols.). Cf. my Apokalypse der deutschen Seele, I (1937), pp. 158–203.

[2] Cf. above, pp. 000, and note 117.

[3] 2nd introduction to the Wissenschaftslehre, I 464.

[4] 1st introduction to the Wissenschaftslehre, I 423.

This accounts for the simple aporia: how can something which is not real make the real world a prior premise of consciousness in order that it should attain self-realisation in its process? There is no possibility of an appeal here to God as primal reality, since He is neither a person (and cannot therefore be Creator), nor—for the young Fichte—does He attain reality other than through the eschatological 'synthesis of the world of spirits'. In order to attempt a solution to this aporia one could say that the world in Idealism is not real in the sense of a reality which is independent of the Spirit, but that it is pure appearance from the Spirit and for the Spirit. Then the difference between unreal and real is reduced to the inner vitalisation and filling out of an initially hollow idea, and our manner of thought will then be utterly oblivious of Being as mere 'essences' or 'concepts' turn into a single totalising concept. This kind of thinking has predominated since Descartes, Leibniz and Malebranche: for at least the (external) world was reduced to mere 'appearance' in the presence of the Spirit, just as it was for the Empiricists, and became mere 'material' whereby the Spirit, through projecting itself and conceiving of itself and acting in a practical and a technical way, raised itself above the world. This way of overcoming materialism (cf. Hobbes), whereby matter is either ignored or denied and the 'manifestations' are then handled as the material of the Spirit, profoundly influences Fichte and makes him a father of the modern technical work ethos and of 'domination over the world'. For such an external world is no longer one that God created and thus is in no way theophanous any longer, but is only the inner dimension of the self (as it were its entrails) and consequently stands utterly at its disposal: in order to be dominated and subjected. This does not stop Fichte from somehow interpreting the world (as genesis of consciousness) in organic and teleological terms, thus approaching Goethe. But still it is oppositions which predominate: if for Goethe physis (with the mystery of God in its depths) remains the comprehensive principle of finite consciousness, then for Fichte it is solely the Spirit (with the mystery of God in its depths) which comprehends all physis. It should be noted however that that ethos of the domination of Nature—with which Fichte's entire cultural ethics is linked—remains bound to the presupposition that it is the (absolute) self which imagines Nature for the sake of man (for it is not God who does this) and thus grants him complete power over Nature, so that in this respect Idealism and materialism lead to the same ethos. But it is precisely this presupposition which is problematical.[6] [5] 2nd introduction, I 516. 'In the act thus described, the ego is . . . transposed into the possibility of self-awareness': I 459.

---

The young Fichte, who begins with the absolute point of the self, cannot conceive of God above this point (because there can be nothing beyond identity), nor beneath it, because God certainly cannot be placed beneath the concrete, and so he can be conceived only within it, as the convergence point of man's infinite approximation, or rather that of the spirit world together with its necessary morality, for which in Kant and Schiller the individual has to commit his or her entire existence even, if necessary, to the point of the ultimate sacrifice: 'That living and effective moral order is itself God'.[7] When Fichte said by way of explanation that this order is 'absolutely the first kind of objective knowledge', and beyond this that to capture the Absolute in a single concept (such as 'personality' or 'consciousness') is contradictory ('and how could the finite grasp and comprehend the infinite?'),[8] then it was this statement which sparked off the 'atheism conflict', on account of which Fichte lost his chair in Jena and which forced him to revise his fundamental position, although without abandoning it entirely. The result was that the form of seity, which was the basis of all consciousness of self and of the world, found itself dependent for its completion on a base which Fichte now calls 'Being', 'Life' and 'Light', and whose (supra-)reality is again understood best in practical terms: when man takes hold freely of his eternal determination (both personally and in the community of selves) and becomes himself, then that supra-reality is that whereby he is determined in his own determination and is called to his own vocation.

---

[6] On this problema, see my review of Karl Rahner's Geist in Welt (Z. kath. Theol. 63, 1939, pp. 371–379); Rahner, with Fichte and Maréchal, thinks from the standpoint of the same problem, naturally with the presupposition of a creating God. But even so, one must ask who is ultimately the creator of nature.

[7] Über den Grund unseres Glaubens an eine göttliche Weltregierung, V 186.

How are we to understand such an idea? The 'metaphysics of the saints' had interpreted the act of reason precisely as this correspondence to the call of God and demanded detachment (indifferentia) as its transcendental premise. But who in Fichte's world can call out in such a way that the finite person can know himself to be determined by this call and to be able to take hold of it in total obedience? How can that which is beyond language and beyond all seity possess within itself the ground for the differentiation of the calls? For the differentiations of personal vocations in the 'world of spirits' may not and cannot be determined from below, from the concrete world (individuum ratione materiae). Thus the Christian expression 'vocation' and 'summons' are to be taken metaphorically, and their relation shifts definitively towards Plotinus: God as the super-spiritual, super-vital and pure mystery (called 'Being'), and Spirit as the act-perception which emerges from this ground, which strives in eternal movement (longing) from into this ground and, for the sake of this movement, releases the concrete world from itself. The sole essential difference with regard to Plotinus is the fact that the ancient thinker does not go beyond the contemplative description of the powers—albeit in a kind of deduction and reduction—while the modern thinker conceives of the process—in a way that corresponds to Christian historicity—as evolution (of the self from the universe, which in turn presupposes the principle of self) and as revolution without end: the ever fuller awareness of God in the world and the ever greater self-giving of the world in God.

---

[8] Ibid., 187.

The view that God is the Unknown, who defies reduction to any concept and who is mysterious even and above all in His creation and revelation, has been the substance of all significant forms of Western metaphysics; and it is unworthy of a Fichte to fancy that he can refute this idea of God through the wholly shallow (really objectified) deistic concept of God which we find in the Enlightenment. The choice of two possibilities characteristic of Western thought did not, as Fichte thought, mean Spinozean fatalism or the Kantian doctrine of freedom, for Augustine and Dionysius implanted by way of explanation the more profound idea of the God of the Bible into the classical notion of God in all above all. Nicolas of Cusa too held firmly to the non-polarity of God and thus to His non-objectification even in the context of the biblical God-world relation; and thus the elevation of the living God of the Scripture with his elevated freedom of love over the God of Plato and Plotinus could in no way threaten His absolute, His all-transcending and all-comprehending nature, but could only enhance it. For only now was every kind of divine dependency upon his appearances both in the world and in the realm of spirits definitively denied, and the sublime light of mystery of the ineffable One becomes the glory of the unapproachably holy God who reaches down to us out of love. If we choose to have nothing to do with this elevation through Christianity (which implies the freedom of the creation), then the nous, which is now called the form of the self, or reason or freedom, again becomes the 'necessary' revelation of the One, so that the One forms the Absolute in its greatest possible revelation only in cooperation with the self—in their original identity. In other words: christology becomes the inner form of the philosophical theory of 'creation' (and will necessarily remain so even with Schelling and Hegel). Thus what began with Eckhart has become definitive: the assimilation of the God-man relation back into the inner-divine generation process, which as such is called upon to give formal expression to the God-world relation, or to the schematism of philosophy. Christ is only our elder brother, and we are all capable by virtue of our human nature of standing in his place. But it is Jesus who has the merit of first illustrating this principle within the historical process and of bringing it to the point of breakthrough, which is why 'all intelligent people bow deep before him, and everyone, the more they are themselves, will acknowledge all the more humbly the exceeding glory of this great phenomenon'.[9] The truly glorious aspect of what Christ has shown is the place of human freedom as the expression of the ineffable mystery of Being as love. Love, that is, because the form of the self experiences itself as pure grace in so far as it perceives itself as 'freedom' which has emerged from Being and stands as Dasein (existence) before Being, and thus can pay back its debt only by the return of its freedom to Being. Thus Fichte becomes a link between Ignatius and Heidegger. Reflection (Spirit) is accompanied by the sense of indebtedness, 'and since it is a bond', it is 'love', 'and since it is the bond of pure Being and of reflection, it is the love of God. In this love Being and Dasein, God and man, are one, wholly fused'. 'Thus alternating love, which is neither his nor ours, but which first divides us into two and binds us into one' is the origin of a concept of God. 'What is it then that leads us beyond all recognisable and specific existence, and beyond the whole world of absolute reflection? It is our love which no specific existence can satisfy.' It does not desire God as object, and leaves Him nothing 'but pure negation of all comprehensibility, side by side with the eternal condition of being loved'.[10] But this statement, since it is not analogy but identity which is the point of departure, necessarily becomes dialectical: first of all God was absorbed into the pure self (first phase, which lasts to around the year 1800), then the self (Dasein) is reduced to a pure and empty space in God, even to the extent of sacrificing personal immortality.

[9] Die Anweisung zum seligen Leben, 6th lecture, V 485.

[10] Ibid., 10th lecture, V 540.

Quite clearly the veil lifts from you,
It is your Self; let die what can be destroyed
And then only God will live in your striving.
Penetrate with your gaze what survives this struggle,
Then you will see the veil as a veil,
And unveiled you will see the life that is divine.[11]

There can be no doubt about it: where Fichte's teaching is pantheistic, because 'God and man act as vital life' and 'form',[12] we can, as with Hölderlin, suddenly discern—in the middle of the lecture—an authentic note of Christian love and prayer within the existential realm through the dialectic between the finite and the infinite. 'Simplicity, which is child-like and devoted to you, seizes you best . . . You are a father to her, who always means her well . . . Do with me what you will, she says, I know that it will be good, as long as it is certain that you are the one who does it. Brooding reason, which has only heard of you and never seen you, wishes to teach us of your essence in itself . . . I veil my face before you and place my hand on my mouth . . . You differ from the finite not in degree but in kind . . . But your relations with me, the finite, are open to my eyes: let me become what I should be!—and they surround me in a clarity that is brighter than the consciousness of my duty . . . You know and recognise the substance of my thought and desire . . . You desire, for you desire that my free obedience should have consequences in all eternity . . . But you are not a being which I shall be able to conceive throughout all eternity.'[13] And if this dialectic ought really to destroy man, since on the one hand he is, as freedom and act, the necessary 'form' of God and, on the other, he transcends himself in orientation towards God as knowledge of the unknowable, then this dialectic between titanic act and devout contemplation finally undergoes a Christian transfiguration in the thought of a stilled, almost unconscious activity which arises from the ecstatic gazing of the one who has been sent upon the source of his calling. It is in this paradox that for Fichte the heart of the ethical lies, and here too, although he speaks of it rarely, is the aesthetic dimension, which has a distinctly Plotinian tone:

---

[11] Sonnet VIII 642.

[12] Anweisung, 4th lecture, V 454.

[13] Die Bestimmung des Menschen, 3rd Book, II 304–305.

'Think, for instance, of a holy woman, who, raised up to the clouds, borne aloft by heavenly hosts, who gaze at her enraptured, surrounded by all the radiance of Heaven, whose highest ornament and bliss she herself is, who, alone of all, can observe nothing of what happens about her, being wholly taken up and dissolved in a Single Thought: I am the handmaid of the Lord, let it be to me always according to His will; and if you form this Single Thought in these surroundings into a human body, then without doubt you possess beauty in a specific form. Now what is it that makes this form beautiful? Is it its members and parts? Or is it not rather the Single Thought which is diffused throughout all these members?'[14] The ultimate pathos of Fichte is not so much to be the 'possessor of the idea'[15] as 'being seized by the idea';[16] this too is why he sees the 'vocation of the scholar' for the contemporary scientific age as descending from the vocation of the prophets and great artists of an earlier, mythological period.[17] the affinity with the enthusiasm of Shaftesbury is evident, even if it is wholly transposed into the Kantian mode: firstly, because here the ethical becomes the yardstick of man and of his religion, and secondly, because, in consequence of this, the ethical lies absolutely and indivisibly in the love of the good for its own sake. It is a form of Plotinian thought enlightened in the direction of John (or of Augustine too at his purest). This deep piety of Fichte is classical and Christian, and it shines victoriously through his whole idealist form of thought.

But the logic of this form of thought thrusts further: if the self is absolute act and absolute knowledge, and yet possesses an indomitable Being as its 'base', then does not God Himself, in so far as He is conceived of as Spirit, possess an obscure base from which He emerges? And would this obscure base of all beings and all forms of sensory life not perhaps be the Void, the unconscious Nirvana, and would the things which emerge from it constitute the beautiful, but only as the tragic, which must eliminate and transcend itself (aufheben)? How easy a task it is to interpret Fichte in terms of Schopenhauer, for whom there is no longer any glory and for whom in the last instance beauty can lie only in contradiction and in self-elimination!

---

[14] Anweisung, 9th lecture, V 527.

[15] Über das Wesen des Gelehrten, VI 353.

[16] Ibid., 355, 382, 423.

[17] Berliner Vorlesungen über die Bestimmung des Gelehrten (1811), Vol. III of the posthumous works (1835), pp. 167f.

It was Schelling who bore Fichte's idea of the irrational base through all the transformations of his own thought. The philosophical perspective thus changes from a 'prophetic' one into one that is 'sibylline': it becomes a gazing into the abyss.

3. SCHELLING

The point of identity as point of departure determines everything in Schelling even up to his late period: the point at which the self (as subject) posits itself in the primal act and thus comes to know itself (as object). Here it is 'established that the essence of man consists only in absolute freedom, that man is not a thing nor, in his own being, an object'.[1] He is (as the title of his first book has it) unbe-dingt (unreified, unconditioned) which means to say that which 'cannot be turned into a thing . . . certainly cannot be thought of as a thing'.[2] Consciousness coincides with being: 'The self is not conceivable without at the same time conceiving of its being'.[3] The predicates of the Absolute as we find them in ancient metaphysics are attributed to it: freedom, total unity, the embodiment of reality, substance, omnipotence, immortality.[4] It is evident that by this Absolute Schelling centrally means God (The Absolute or God).[5] This explains his

[1] Collected works, ed. K. F. A. Schelling, 1st section Vols. 1–10, 2nd section Vols. 1–4 (in what follows, the second section is numbered as Vols. XI–XIV). I 157.

[2] I 166.

[3] I 168.

[4] I 179–202.

[5] V 373.

emphatic riposte to Jacobi, the ineffective advocate of the classical and Christian formulation si comprehendis non est Deus ('a God who could be known could not be God'),[6] when he states that an assertion of this kind is unworthy of philosophy, which can have no other object or perspective than that of the knowledge of the Absolute, and that it offers a free passage to atheism. It is not that Schelling lacked a sense of the 'wonderful' and the 'mysterious' aspects of Being; for him philosophy is insight into the 'true mysteries',[7] 'which though celebrated in the brightest light of day still remain mysteries',[8] and whose first act is altogether that of thaumazein.[9] He counters the fears of Jacobi 'that science and understanding will destroy what is worthy of wonder' with the words: 'The feeling of the philosopher can be called wonder only in so far as he strives passionately to find what is the ultimate, the absolutely wonderful, which is the point at which science draws to a halt and the unknowing, which clearly you do not understand, begins'.[10] Only an 'unknowing' which is understood, a docta ignorantia (Nicolas of Cusa), a comprehendere incomprehensible (Anselm) is worthy of the philosopher. In his final metamorphosis Schelling appears to want to go beyond this thought when he says that philosophy experiences the drive 'to advance from what it can judge to be necessary and which therefore does not inspire wonder, to what lies beyond and above all necessary understanding and knowledge. In fact it will not rest until it has advanced to that which calls forth absolute wonder . . . to that which by its nature eliminates all further thinking because it transcends all thought . . . God is greater than we think, and has nothing to fear'.[11] And yet this 'positive philosophy' will no more escape the framework of the idealist point of departure than does Fichte's primal life (Ur-Leben). What could in principle lie beyond an absolute point of identity? Who could call the self into question in this, its own point of origin, object-ify or otherwise threaten it?

---

[6] VIII 79.

[7] Philosophie und Religion, VI 17.

[8] VIII 111.

[9] 'Existence by itself, without taking into consideration the manner and form of the same, must seem a miracle to whomever looks upon it, and must fill the mind with astonishment: just as it cannot be denied that it was the observation of pure existence that, in the earliest presentiments, struck the minds with terror and a kind of holy fear': Aphorismen über die Naturphilosophie, VII 198.

[10] VIII 124–125.

It was Schelling's first intention to introduce the old 'objective' metaphysics, which he believed had found its final form in Spinoza, into the new Idealism and thus to eliminate (aufheben) it (Philosophical Letters on Dogmatism and Criticism: 1795). If Spinoza's final position was that he conceived himself to be 'identical to the Absolute Object and to be lost in its infinity' (in that amor intellectualis in which the self transcends its own limits in order to allow the Absolute, God, to enjoy an absolute predominance), then this contained an element of self-deception: 'By viewing himself as being annihilated within the absolute object, he still views himself. He could not view himself as being annihilated without conceiving of himself at the same time as existing'.[12] Absolute self-sacrifice to the object (love which is its own reward) is at the same time the highest and freest self-possession; Schelling envisages the point of coincidence of subject and object which is everywhere implied as being also existential: as the blending of two ultimate attitudes in both of which, of course, the self has the final word (for the self is the identity of S and O). 'This step is difficult, difficult: setting forth from the final shore',[13] In mystical and Eckhartian terms: 'Where the creature disappears to itself and becomes transparent to the Creator, there is reason'.[14] Or in Fichte's terms: 'Only in the highest science does the mortal eye close, and it is no longer man who sees but the Eternal Sight which has acquired vision in him'.[15] It can be stated with reference to Fénelon and to his entière indifférence même pour le salut (as Schelling quotes it),[16] so that the highest detachment in orientation to God is then experienced at the same time as the highest victory after the highest active struggle. Finally we can express it in biblical terms: 'Here all which is finite, which is still an existent, must be left behind, and the final dependence must disappear. Here everything must be left behind—not only, as it is said, wife and child, but whatever is, even God, for God too at this point is only an existent . . . Here we say: Whoever wishes to keep something, will lose it, and whoever gives it up, will find it. Only he who has left all, and has been left by all, has attained his own ground and has known the full depth of life'.[17] But as we are urged to give up all that exists, be it world, or God, it at once becomes clear that the idea of Being as we find it in Avicenna, Scotus and Suarez (as the univocal and neutral principle which is beyond both God and world) has been transposed to the transcendental mode: the indifferentia (of subject and object), wich was essentially Schelling's point of departure, beyond the biblical and Ignatian, Alexandrian (apatheia) and Fénelonian form, is now that univocity which is 'oblivious of Being' and on the basis of which it is possible to 'construct' both absolute Being and the Being of the world. The old metaphysics was also oblivious of Being, in so far as it believed that it could establish an abstract concept beyond essence and the act of Being, beyond the real distinction of creaturely being and God's identical Being; and this old obliviousness of Being surfaces in Schelling in a logical progression as idealism which, because it gains an intellectual apprehension of God Himself and can construct Him exactly from His specifications, becomes 'a kind of ideal atheism'.[18] [11] Phil. der Offenbarung, VIX 12–14.

---

[12] I 319–320.

[13] Erlanger Vorträge, IX 218.

[14] Kritische Fragmente, VII 247.

[15] Ibid. VII 248.

[16] Phil. der Mythologie, XI 557.

The irredeemable obliviousness of Being is apparent in the fact that the opposition between the ideal and the real which is fundamental to Schelling's thought (in the dissolving of the original identity of subject and object) cannot be fixed according to its sense content, at least not at a point beyond what is meant by Kant's opposition between concept and perception (or in Husserl's noesis and noema). The ideal is the universal, 'while contraction is the beginning of all reality'; by contracting Himself from the 'universal' (or from 'Being') to an 'existent', God becomes real, which contraction however is also His 'condescension'[19] from the level of an ideal 'existent' to that of a mere premise or ground or basis for it, namely to 'being', and thus the possibility appears of a 'created' world, to which the possibility of a 'participation' in God's Being is granted, without its thus becoming identical with the 'authentic God'.[20] It follows therefore that God, as the Absolute within identity, is the 'non-real', while 'reality exists in the non-identity of the general and the specific',[21] and that consequently God, in order to be existent, has need of the world as His basis of reality, so that 'the entire process of the creation of the world . . . is actually nothing other than the process of a fully developing awareness, the complete personalisation of God'.[22] But the fact that the 'Creation' can be God's 'free' condescension, remains the mystery of this thought which is oblivious of Being, in which everything (ideal and real) ultimately goes its way only in the context of a comprehensive ideality or conceptuality in which that which in the realm of the authentically real would be simply contradictory, appears to be 'constructable' in consequence of the loss of the decisive dimension of Being.

[17] Über die Natur der Philosophie als Wissenschaft, IX 217–218.

[18] Emanuel Hirsch, Geschichte der neuern evangelischen Theologie, 4 Vols. (1952), p. 414.

We can make the situation clearer by making a comparison with Nicolas of Cusa. The central problem for him, who thereby only sums up the whole of the classical metaphysics, was how God can be 'everything' when there is also a 'world' (consisting of innumerable finite things); or again: how God can be all in all without being in the formal sense the Being of things. Following Nicolas, Schelling poses the same question in the terms that God cannot be a 'discrete and individual' being—that would be dogmatism, and God would not be the Non Aliud—nor yet can God, according to the 'general pantheistic view', have 'no discrete, individual and self-sufficient existence', such that he would be only 'a general substance', only a 'bearer of things'. Schelling's solution is as follows: 'God, however, is both; He is first and foremost the essence of all essences, but as such He must also exist, that is . . . he must have a basis for himself. This God in his sublime dignity is the universal essence of all things, but this universal essence does not hang in the air but is grounded and is as if borne by God as individual being—the individual element in God is thus the basis or substratum of the Universal'.[24] Clearly the perspective here has changed: the 'highest dignity' is the 'universal essence of things', and the 'individual element', the 'for itself' is only the prerequisite for this. But can God as an 'individual' being still fulfil the requirements of the 'Non Aliud'? In Nicolas, God is the Non Aliud in so far as he Possest, the One in so far as He is the Unique One, the Universal in so far as He is the Omnipotent, to whose identity of subject and object, posse and esse, there belongs power over all that is possible (for Him and through Him). Now if God and the world, each for themselves and according to their own nature, are 'constructed' from the point of an identical point of indifference on reason's part, then God is necessarily projected according to the scheme of the universe, or that of man: 'If we desire a God whom we can see as a wholly vital, personal being, then we must also see him in a completely human way. We must assume that His life has the greatest analogy with human life, that there exists in Him not only an eternal Being but also an eternal Becoming, that He . . . has everything in common with man but for dependency.'[25] This 'greatest analogy' contradicts the fundamental law of the classical metaphysics concerning the

---

[19] Stuttgarter Privatvorlesungen, VII 429.

[20] Ibid., 429–430.

[21] Philosophie der Kunst, V 370–371.

[22] VII 433. We remember from Fichte that personality is possible only in the Infinite. Schelling too says: 'In that which is without ground, or indifference, there is of course no personality'. Philos. Unters. über das Wesen der menschlichen Freiheit, VII 412.

---

[24] Ibid., 438.

[25] Ibid., 432. Cf. ibid.: 'All living being begins from unconsciousness . . . Just so does the divine life too begin'. 433: 'God has the same two principles in himself that we have in us . . .' 'The whole life is . . . a process of coming into consciousness at ever higher levels . . .the same is true of God also'. In the Jacobi text (VIII 71–72), the parallel is set out very clearly: while God makes himself the ground of the creature, he also makes himself the ground

'ever greater unlikeness' in the God-world analogy. But this, for Schelling, is the only way it is possible to avoid the decline of our world into an 'unnatural God and godless Nature',[26] in favour of which not only Böhme and Baader, but also 'the great Hamann' is called as witness.[27] But the 'intimacy' (Hölderlin) between God and the world in a common all-embracing Being which is apparently achieved thereby is purchased only at the cost of a duplication or even a triplication of God: God as all-embracing identity ('the undeveloped God'), then 'God sensu eminenti'[28] (or 'God in the strict sense'),[29] and finally Nature as a 'divine phenomenon of a lower order'.[30] It is evident that the 'eminent God' who lies enclosed in the universal must give way to the universal in the same way, for instance, that the Demiurge of the Timaeus gives way to the universal good. But the clock of history cannot be put back: today it is only the 'irrational abyss', the 'horrendous depths', the Void which can enclose God.

Schelling lets God and man evolve (each in his own way, God above time and man within time) out of their common depths into the light of their ideality; thus, not only does he allow the light and the night to coincide, as does Bruno, but he also allows the night to be the primal womb of the light. This is quite different from the idea of the Christian Romantics that night for the creature is a containing and maternal womb, a darkness which in a mysterious unity is unconscious Nature and the incomprehensible God (the 'brilliant darkness'). In Schelling, God Himself rises as Spirit from His pre-divine dark, which as such He offers at the same time to the 'creature' as the ground of becoming. This ground of his own self, 'since he lives above the world only to the extent that he subordinates this part of his essence (the non-intelligent part) to the higher part, and lives with this part free from the world . . . just as man transfigures himself truly to intelligence, to the ethical life, only by subordinating the irrational part of his essence to the higher part'.

---

[26] VIII 70.

[27] VIII 114.

[28] VIII 81.

[29] VII 436.

[30] VII 441.

'is matter (not of course matter which is already formed) and matter is nothing other than the unconscious part of God'.[31] So the ideal is thus ultimately the 'superstructure' above matter: materialism resurfaces here too (as already with Descartes and his followers) as the logical consequence of the conceptual thinking of a univocity which is devoid of Being.[32] The final stance of the philosopher is thus for Schelling that of a heroic defiance in the face of the sibylline vision of the abyss, which even here (as later in Freud and Scheler) is called 'the anarchic', 'primal instinct', 'hunger', 'dependency', 'dark will' (='drive'), and which pours out a form of melancholy over all that is.[33] One must hold out against the 'truly terrible thing', one must 'descend into the horrendous depths',[34] which is why Dante has such importance for Schelling:[35]

> The heart wavered at the fearful word:
> 'Give up all hope, ye who enter here'.
> But still you passed on through the terrible gate . . .
> Through the earth's very heart to the eternal light.[36]

But the ethos remains wholly distinct from that of Dante, who wanders through Hell not as an absolute philosopher but as a Christian pentitent and for whom therefore Hell is anything but the 'base of Heaven'. But Schelling's thought contains the seed of complete materialism as unequivocally as that of Fichte contains the seed of an irrational philosophy of life, as this was called above, with reference to Simmel. And both fall victim to this dialectic in that they seek to render univocal the mystery of the Thomist actus essendi in its distinction from the existent and in its mediation between

---

[31] VII 435.

[32] This is just as true as the closeness, often noted, between Schelling and Schopenhauer. Cf. Eduard von Hartmann, Schellings positive Philosophie als Einheit von Hegel und Schopenhauer, 1869.

[33] VII 359f., 399.

[34] VIII 124.

[35] Über Dante in philosophischer Beziehung, V 152–163 (originally as part of the Philosophie der Kunst: V 687, note). Schelling's translations from the Divine Comedy: X 441–446.

[36] An Dante, X 441.

God and the world by substituting at this point a conceptual identity, while in truth the actus essendi is neither God nor the neutral concept beyond both God and world, nor is it the potency of matter, but rather—and here Schelling is right—it is that first mystery in which God gives a share in Himself and which therefore appeared to the ancients as the θεῖον of the world (he names it in a way that serves to make it univocal: 'the divinity of the universe').[37] And it is only from within Being and with reference to Being that can we speak of the existent, which is transposed in Schelling into the principle that it is only possible to conduct philosophy from within the Absolute.[38]

But in so far as the highest point of identity between subject and object, the ideal and the real can be realised only through the process whereby the real becomes idealised step by step and vice versa, the whole of philosophy becomes the dialectic of an evolutionary philosophy of Nature (in which the Spirit rises through the realms of the organic until it becomes conscious within man) and a philosophy of Spirit (in which the Spirit becomes ever more actively incarnate in the real world through mores and culture and thus rises above Nature in realisation of itself, thus 'transfiguring' it in itself). Thus within absolute identity distinction is nevertheless postulated and, being transcended (aufgehoben) in its very postulation, is 'transfigured': the Infinite appears in the 'form', while the latter is interpreted and understood with reference to the Infinite. But that is the form of the beautiful. More so than any other modern philosophy, the philosophy of Schelling, as a philosophy of the balance between the Infinite and the finite, is an aesthetic one. Though it is not a philosophy of glory (for that is what a philosophy of identity can never be), but emphatically a philosophy of art.[39] It can unite the classical and Goethean perspectives (organic Nature which embraces the Spirit) with those of Schiller and in part those of Hölderlin (Spirit which submerges itself in Nature), and it can harmonise both in that highest identity of consciousness and unconsciousness which, for both schools, constitutes the essence of the genius, whose features now necessarily fuse with those of God.[40] Nothing is more characteristic here than the way in which the Kantian subjective 'sublime' (itself a relic of the objective 'glory') in its distinction from the 'beautiful' is first brought by Schiller to an uncertain state of balance with regard to the beautiful, only to be submerged in Schelling entirely within universalising 'beauty', for within the system of identity there can no longer exist any 'true and objective polarity between beauty and sublimity': 'that which is truly and absolutely beautiful is always also sublime, and the sublime (when it is authentic) is also beautiful'.[41] Thus the vital problem which arose with Kant is extinguished; for Hegel the 'sublime' is only the past. Certainly the kalon appears again here—in contrast to its anthropologisation by Schiller—as an absolutely transcendental property of being; following the Timaeus, the universe (here including God) is seen 'as a divine work of art', in which once again the chief aspects are total forms of beauty, and Nature is the 'eternal organ and document of philosophy'. 'But in the true work of art there is no single beauty, but rather beauty belongs only to the whole'.[42] Thus Schelling constructs first 'the universe in the form of art, and the philosophy of art as the science of the universe in the form or potency of art'[43] in order to understand the individual instance of beauty as such from this absolute perspective. And thus the mutual interpenetration of

---

[37] VII 140.

[38] 'The unconditional is the element in which alone demonstration is possible . . . Only in the absolute can everything be set forth': Stuttg. Privatvorlesungen, VII 423.

[39] The principal documents: 1., 'System des transzendentalen Idealismus' (1800, with a concluding section on the 'Deduktion eines allgemeinen Organs der Philosophie oder Hauptsätze der Philosophie der Kunst': III 612–669), 2., the dialogue 'Bruno' (1802, IV 213–332), 3. the great unfinished 'Philosophie der Kunst' (1802–1805, from the posthumous works, V 353–736).

---

[40] III 616f.; V 460.

[41] III 621, likewise V 468f.: 'only a quantitative antithesis'. On the whole theme, cf. Karl Viëtor, 'Die Idee des Erhabenen in der deutschen Literatur', in: Geist und Form (1952), pp. 234–266; on Schelling, p. 264.

[42] V 359.

[43] V 368.

the Transcendentals is again achieved: 'truth and beauty [are] merely two different ways of contemplating the Absolute One',[44] and in Philosophy and Religion (1804) in particular the identity of the True-Beautiful and the Good-Holy is highlighted.[45] And it is precisely the aesthetic identity between the Infinite and the finite, between God who is manifest in the world and the world itself which is transparent to God, which becomes for Schelling the true key to the religious dimension, for distinction (Differenz) within identity (Indifferenz) allows the construction of historical religion: aesthetics as the manifestation of the Infinite within finite form (or Nature) is 'mythology', pre-Christian religion, while aesthetics as the assimilation of the finite into the Infinite is 'revelation', Christian religion (and religious philosophy).[46]

This kairos of an 'aesthetic theology' in Schelling is decisive for our theme, because it appears (more fundamentally than even in Hegel) as the recapitulation of that which was developed in our first volume (Seeing the Form), and also as the idealistic representation of the primary matter of the present volume. 'Mythology' is characteristically the first concern of the young Schelling, with which his first work,[47] 'On Myths, Historical Sagas and Philosophemes of the Ancient World' (1793), is concerned.[48] It is a theme which evolves throughout the complete work[49] until the final 'Philosophy of Mythology and Revelation' (Vols. 11–14). And because God's timeless becoming takes temporal form within world consciousness, therefore the religious principle must initially appear in the finite (Nature) form of mythic beauty, from which Schelling correctly derives the art of the pre-Christian period, before it becomes transfigured within the infinite (Spirit) form of revelatory beauty in which God first becomes man, authentically suffers in his finiteness, only to return by resurrection to the eternal world of ideas where he assimilates the real man into this new reality. Thus Christ is the end of mythology, 'the summit and the end of the old world of the gods'.[50] For the gods themselves were nothing other than the powers of the Godhead: 'The same unified forms of the general and the specific, which viewed in themselves are ideas, that is the images of divinity, are gods, when viewed in real terms'[51] (when these taken over from the sphere of Nature into the Christian sphere of Spirit, they will appear as 'angels').[52] But in so far as there was a change of direction in Christ, when the 'true Infinite entered the finite, not in order to deify the latter but to offer it in sacrifice to God in his own person and thus to effect reconciliation', religion becomes historical for the first time, the esoteric spiritual kernel of the event becomes decisive while, on the other hand, the mythological, symbolic and sacramental side of the new religion remains 'exoteric'.[53] 'Mysticism is the innermost dimension of Christianity'.[54] It appears here that Schelling's understanding of myth, which was initially wholly influenced by the Enlightenment (myth as an imaginative form of envisaging the divine at a child's level of consciousness), remains rationalistic in his mature period too and that his conception of revelation and faith correspondingly remains a preliminary form contained within philosophical understanding and knowledge. Where the Infinite predominates over the finite (revelation), the finite (which as myth once functioned as the valid vessel of the Infinite) can only serve for its aesthetic contemplation: as 'the outer forms under which religion exists',[55] and as the aesthetic necessity 'to make exoteric what is esoteric within Christianity',[56] in short: the mythic dimension has been wholly absorbed into the philosophy of art. The ultimate reason for this, as with Fichte and Hölderlin, is the fact that the situation of Christ as the revealing God-Man coincides with the philosophical relationship between God and man, indeed between the Infinite and the finite, which, from the perspective of an ultimate point of identity, from an ultimate common root even of this differentiation, is open to an aesthetic overview. Other 'truly divine men' can also stand where Christ stands, including for example that universal German, whose coming is awaited by Schelling, as it is by Hölderlin, Fichte and Schiller:[57] 'Had he appeared, he would have filled the whole people with reverence as a radiant light and an emissary from Heaven, and he would have suddenly, wonderfully and divinely united those who have been divided.'[58] The distinction between God and the world from their original root is the necessary 'self-duplication of God' in His enduring unity. This can thus be understood both in a trinitarian way and, at the same time, within God as a trinitarian economy. And this is so again both within Nature (as the Son of God who succumbs to finitude and death) and within history, where Christ as the recapitulating man displays the self-stripping of God. The synthesis of all contradictions 'lies only in the idea of a God who endures suffering of His own free will' in contrast to the gods of mythology, for the latter 'do not suffer, but are blessed in their finitude'.[59] Thus all the mysteries of faith have become philosophy, and Hegel is prefigured in his entirety. But this apparent subordination of theology to philosophy was possible only because of the failure to elevate theology above philosophy: in aesthetic terms, because the graciousness and freedom which the divine revelation shows towards man, the creature, has always been included within the necessary process of God's emergence as God and man's emergence as man, which also means that God becomes man and man becomes God. All this talk of 'freedom of will' cannot mean anything more here than the 'fundamental character' of the beautiful, under the systematic primacy of which the truth and the goodness of Being are interpreted.

---

[44] V 370.

[45] But this is already so in the last Vorlesung über das Akademische Studium, V 344f. Schelling has therefore every reason (beyond Plotinus) to demonstrate that Plato's struggle against the aesthetic culture of the poets is merely the rejection of a lower form of the beautiful at the service of a higher form which appears in Plato's last works and points ahead to the future Christian 'art of the infinite': V 346–347.

[46] V 430.

[47] After the Latin dissertation for the degree of Magister on the likewise mythical character of the narrative of the fall in Genesis: I 1–40.

[48] I 41–83.

[49] Adolf Allwohn, 'Der Mythos bei Schelling', Kant-Studien 61 (1927).

---

[50] V 292.

[51] V 390.

[52] V 436f.

[53] V 293–294.

[54] V 443.

[55] Philosophie und Religion, appendix, VI 65f.

---

[56] V 294.

[57] 'Deutsche Grösse': 'Every people has its day in history, but the day of the Germans is the harvest of the whole of time': Werke, I 477.

[58] Über das Wesen deutscher Wissenschaft, VIII 15.

[59] V 432–433.

It is entirely integral to the monistic point of departure that finitude and the division of the earliest distinction which conditions it can also be read as a fall (of the existent from the idea), and thus also as guilt, and the emergence of the ego in the concentration of freedom appears not as pure creatureliness but as the Promethean principle. This is first postulated in Philosophy and Religion (1804), and developed in the Enquiries into the Nature of Human Freedom (1809). This kind of emphasis inheres within the nature of every system of identity: it can be seen to derive from Plato, is present in Plotinus (although with counterbalancing elements) and emerges sharply and titanically in the work of Bruno. Distinguishing philosophical 'mediation' into identity from Christian 'reconciliation', before synthesising these to form a complete metaphysics, remains the principal requirement of Christian discernment.

The dispute as to whether Schelling—in reaction to Hegelian panlogism—really adopted a new point of departure in the philosophy of his old age, which he describes as the transition from a negative philosophy to a positive one, can hardly be resolved; but the balance (following the researches of Walter Schulz)[60] tips towards a negative answer. For philosophy in Schelling's eyes coincides in its concept with the univocity of reason. It is only at a second stage that reason recognises that it can construct God only as an idea and not as a living reality and, reduced to 'ultimate despair', generates God from itself. For the rational self does not want its idea, but 'God Himself': 'It wants Him, Him, the God who acts, the God of providence . . . in short, He who is the LORD of Being . . . God must draw nearer with his help, but it can desire Him, and hope to attain a state of blessedness through Him which . . . cannot be a blessedness which is deserved, which is proportionate, as Kant wants, but only undeserved, and therefore incalculable and immeasurable'.[61] Who can fail to hear the cry here with which thought asks itself questions it cannot answer and, acknowledging its own limits, posits something beyond itself that alone, by drawing near, can bring it to completion. Of itself, it grasps eternally only the 'How' (the 'existing'), but the 'That' of Being, the 'wholly transcendental Being',[62] the reality beyond all ideas, transports reason 'absolutely ecstatically' out of itself,[63] so that here it must absolutely 'surrender', die to itself and allow Being precedence. But we must listen carefully to how this process is described. 'According to its mere nature, it (reason) posits only what has infinite existence and, inversely, in the positing of the same it is motionless, as if stunned, quasi attonita, but it is rendered numb by all-conquering Being only in order to attain by this act of surrender to its true and eternal content, which it cannot find in the world of the senses, and to attain to it as to something which is truly known and which it will now therefore possess in all eternity'.[64] The 'in order to'[65] shows that this ecstasis, this 'taking leave of everything' and 'allowing its approach' is still ultimately understood to be an enterprise of reason. In Hegel, Schelling tells us, reason takes itself as object, to which act there corresponds as 'content only the infinite potency of Being', although if Being is taken entirely seriously, then it itself becomes the act, 'of which no thought can find the ground or beginning', and to which therefore reason can relate only as a potency. If it is in its own essentiality, 'then only the infinite act can correspond to its infinite potency of knowledge'.[66] Not only Heidegger could agre slumbering view, but also Thomas, and here Maréchal has no difficulty in transposing both the ontological and the transcendental mode of metaphysics one into the other. But this is so only under the condition that the 'negative philosophy', which extends as far as the construction of the idea of God, is established as the realm of the 'natural doctrine of God' (or fundamental theology), and the historical deeds of the living God who draws near of his own free will are valid as the object of theology and not once again as that of a 'philosophy of revelation'. To proclaim seriously the possibility of a philosophy of this kind—as do the Enlightenment and the entire German Idealist tradition—presupposes that the univocity (identity) of reason also survives the salto mortale of 'positive philosophy', making use of it as a form of its own self-mediation which is necessary purely in methodological terms. But then this extreme and unique salto of Schelling would be nothing other than Hegel's constantly-repeated (with the erection of every serious antithesis) mini-death of reason: the 'speculative Good Friday'.[67] [60] Die Vollendung des deutschen Idealismus in der Spätphilosophie Schellings, Kohlhammer 1955.

---

---

[61] XI 566–567.

[62] XIII 127.

[63] XIII 163; the word Ekstasis for absolute transcendence had already appeared: IX 229–230.

[64] XIII 165.

[65] Which recurs repeatedly on the following pages (cf. XIII 170).

[66] XIII 165.

4. HEGEL

Schelling had made a contribution to the building of the 'uncompletable bridge' by understanding revelation to be a higher form of myth; but where it was necessary to lay the final stone, he became unsure of himself and the measure of the distances eluded him. But Hegel's hand did not waver; he calmly completed the arch, strode across it and dedicated it to the future. Hegel knows that he is commissioned by the World Spirit to open up the future. 'Ours is an important age, a time of fermentation in which the Spirit has jolted forward and outgrown its old form, and acquires a new one. The whole mass of former ideas, concepts, the bonds of the world are loosened and collapse like a dream. A new emergence of the Spirit is underway.'[1] The determined transformation of the entire Christian πίστις into a definitive γνῶσις is thus in Hegel's consciousness not only a long-overdue synthesis of the entire past religious history of the world, but also certainly the laying-bare of the path into the future. His way of thought runs in an opposite direction to that of Fichte and Schelling: if they began with the principle of identity, and, slowly considering their point of departure, struggled back to a Christianity of the Johannine type, Hegel in his early period struggled to make sense of Christ, and the meaning of Christ's life and of the institution he founded, in order then, with clear decision, to absorb that which is of philosophical value within it into his own system and to reject the indigestible remains.[2] He long believed that he could interpret divine life and its evolution in the world under the leading idea of love; but finally this notion disappears modestly into the interior of absolute knowledge, to rule now only as the rhythm and brilliance of its 'bacchantine' movement with which 'there is no limb which is not inebriated'.[3] Hölderlin, his friend from early days in Tübingen, comes close to this change in Hegel around 1800 in the teaching of his fictional character Hyperion: hen kai pan is the call. Instead of remaining as if paralysed at the point of identity as do Fichte and Schelling, the 'One' is dissolved into the 'Whole' and emerges thereby simultaneously as abundance of love (πλήρωμα) and exiguous poverty (πενία, κένωσις)[4]—in order finally to return home victorious with its whole full-grown truth and glory into the undivided One. In Hegel as in Hölderlin, Christianity is now absorbed into the element of the omnipresent kenosis of Being in which, for both, the unsurpassable 'glory' of reality occurs. For Hegel therefore glory is nowhere to be found more than in the [67] Hegel, Glauben und Wissen (Werke I, 1832), p. 157.

---

[1] G. W. F. Hegels Werke, complete edition in 18 Vols., 1832–1840. Herm. Nohl, Hegels theologische Jugendschriften (= N). Hegel, Jeneser Logik, Metaphysik und Naturphilosophie (= Hegels sämtliche Werke, ed. G. Lasson Vol. 18a, 1923 = J). Dokumente zu Hegels Entwicklung, ed. Joh. Hoffmeister, 1936 (= D).–D 352.

---

[2] 'In Swabia one says about something that happened a very long time ago: it is so long ago now, that it will soon be no longer true. Thus Christ died for our sins such a long time ago now, that it will soon be longer true', D 358.

[3] II 37.

[4] See above on Hölderlin, pp. 000.

totality of the Absolute Spirit itself; absolute thought radiates it in a triumph which can be compared only with that of Leibniz, though it is now no longer theodicy but noödicy.

Viewed retrospectively, therefore, Hegel represents the final conclusion to that interpretation of the world which understands the universe to be the self-manifestation of God: the Stoa, Plotinus, Dionysius, Scotus Erigena, Nicolas of Cusa, Ficino, Spinoza, Herder, Goethe. 'The object of religion as well as that of philosophy is . . . God and the explication of God.'[5] 'Philosophy has the aim of knowing truth, of knowing God, for He is absolute truth and therefore nothing else is worth the effort in comparison with God and the explication of God.'[6]. But if we wish to find the particular intuition of Hegel, since all this is still too general, then this can best be understood on the basis of Nicolas of Cusa's non-aliud as the name of God. All that is finite is the aliud of an 'other' and demands this other in order to be itself, thus it transforms itself, if it is itself to be the object of thought, into the other and, when it is itself the thinking subject, retrieves itself (together with the other) into itself. This movement permeates the universe of finitude and only ceases when the last possible other becomes integrated into the Absolute, which can have no opposition since it comprehends all opposition within itself. The pan itself as the fullness of integration can no longer be opposed to the hen as its other; rather the kai is indicative of their identity. But in so far as the movement which in each case embraces the One together with its Other in a single comprehensive unity is one of truth and knowledge, all knowledge of truth must be rooted in the non-aliud, that is in absolute knowledge. That is its point of origin and it is there that it must return. But non-aliud means as negation that every aliud must be posited in the Absolute in order to be integrated (aufgehoben: transcended while Being preserved): positing and transcending (Aufhebung) are one and the same process—'appearance is a process of being born and passing away which itself is neither born nor passes away, but which exists an sich and constitutes the reality and the movement of the life of truth'.[7] 'Faith' (or 'representation': religion) and 'perception' (i.e. art) belong to the manifest dimension of God; both see through the finite to the Infinite which appears and is concealed within it. Philosophy as 'knowledge' embraces and supersedes both, without destroying either, and while they look up towards glory, philosophy or the knowledge of God is itself glory. Hegel reaches this conclusion by virtue of the fact, first that his point of departure is the biblical revelation, second that he removes the biblical glory from this in three stages, and third that he equates the surviving doctrine of the 'Holy' Spirit with the 'Absolute' (God-world) Spirit.

---

[5] XI 5.

[6] XII 287.

1. The Early Theological Writings were influenced on the one hand by Lessing (that 'the contingent truths of history' cannot satisfactorily ground the 'necessary truths of reason') and, on the other, by Fichte (that the divinity neither can nor may be conceived of 'objectively'); so that 'everything which is expressed in the form of reflection concerning the divine is meaningless'.[8] God is—as Jesus experienced and taught, and as John understood—pure and eternal love, light, life. He is therefore the absolute unifying principle which transcends (aufhebt) the duality (which it presupposes): 'In love man has found himself again in another; because it is a bond of life, it presupposed a separation, an evolution, and the developed multifaceted character of the same. And the more forms in which life becomes vital, the more points there are at which it can unify itself and be sentient, and can be love all the more intensely.'[9] Finitude as such is 'pain',[10] opposition between beings is 'death'; but only when placed within a comprehensive and living whole, which posits the contradiction in order to transcend it. Hegel says in his exegesis of the Prologue of St John's gospel, which begins with the first setting up of an opposition between God and the Logos: 'The infinity of the real is infinite division as the

---

[7] II 36.

[8] N 306.

[9] N 322.

[10] 'The pain is the course taken by finitude': XII 77.

real, everything is through the Logos. The world is not an emanation of the divinity, for then all reality would be divine; but, as reality it is emanation, a part of the infinite division, but also, in the part . . . life. What is specific, limited, in opposition or dead is at the same time a branch of the infinite tree of life.'[11] 'That which is contradiction in the realm of the dead, is not so in the realm of life . . . It is true only of objects, of dead things, that the whole is different from its parts; but for the living, a part of the same is just as much One as is the whole.'[12] In the parable of the true vine Jesus extends this mystery of the integration of the members to the level of the whole of life.[13] The polarity of the members has meaning only from the point of view of that which unites them, which is the perspective from which they are understood; whereas for the members as such their unification is the object of belief: 'The unification is the activity; this activity, reflected as object, is the object of belief . . . That which opposes can be recognised as such only by virtue of the fact that it has already been united; unification is the measure by which comparison occurs . . . Unification itself . . . is the object of belief; though it cannot be proven, for those things which stand in opposition are dependent, and unification in respect to them is independence.'[14] If we further postulated that 'unification and Being are identical in meaning', then it would follow that 'Being can be only the object of belief'.[15] That means, in his later language: the synthesis, which as truth is the real, surpasses mere (discriminating) reason. Living reason contains the element of love within it and is one with it. Now, in proximity to Hyperion, we can say: 'In love, that which is separated still exists, but no longer as what has been separated—as something standing alone by itself, and the living feels the living . . . Thus lovers can distinguish themselves one from the other only in so far as they are mortal . . . The separable causes the lovers embarrassment. It is a kind of conflict between total devotion, between the only possible annihilation, the annihilation of opposites within unification—and the self-sufficiency which is still present; each feels itself to be hampered by this—love resents what is still separated, what is still a private possession; this indignation of love at individuality is shame.' The promise of inseparability is the child, who testifies to unity as something eternal.[16]

---

[11] N 307.
[12] N 308–309.
[13] N 314.
[14] N 382–383.
[15] N 383.

If we raise ourselves in this eros to the absolute standpoint, then 'the vision of God as Himself is . . . the eternal creation of the universe', the 'separation of the real, this grounding of diversity is the goodness of God', the self-transcendence (Selbstaufhebung) in love of what has been individualised, 'the absolute turning-point'; it is 'the justice of God, which as absolute power over the real shows its negative side', the reintegration into God's consciousness 'is the eternal wisdom and blessedness' of God, which of course, as the transcendence of the real, is 'the judgment'; but this 'cannot judge abstractly, precisely because the individual is limited: God's heart, as judge of the world, must be brought to breaking point, because He is the absolutely universal totality. He cannot judge the world; He can only have pity upon it.'[17] A comparison between this 'pantheistic' Christianity and that of Origen and Evagrius is instructive and shows the distance of the ages: in the latter, the division of the original divine monas into the multiplicity of the world was 'krisis, judgment', and its reunification through Christ in love is called 'pronoia, loving providence'. But in Hegel, the self-unfolding of God's 'goodness' and the return, which must break and destroy the particular, is 'judgment': though this judgment too ends by becoming mercy in the mystery of universal integration. The judge's heart breaks, in sympathetic suffering with the limitation of the individual. The new hen kai pan has passed far more deeply than the patristic one through the mystery of the Cross.

---

[16] N 379–381.

[17] D 349; cf. in the Religionsphilosophie: 'The righteousness is the element of negation, i.e. that the nothingness may be revealed; this righteousness is a determination like the coming into being and passing away of Shiva . . .': XII 48.

But Hegel is no timid thinker. From Schelling he inherits the sibylline glance into the abysmal depths (the only thing which Schlesinger's portrait of the aged Hegel still shows); as in Bruno and the young Goethe, enthusiasm can show its dark side: 'God, who has become Nature, who has extended Himself into the glory and the silent circulation of the formations, becomes aware of His expansion and of His lost precision and becomes enraged at that. He finds . . . his essence is poured out in restless Infinity, where there is no present but only a barren thrusting beyond the limit, which always comes into being where it is transcended. This wrath . . . is the destruction of Nature . . . and is likewise an absolute going into the self, a process of becoming the mid-point. In this, the wrath devours its formations into itself . . . Its limbs are thereby crushed and its flesh pressed into this liquid.' Hegel names the 'wrath of God at Himself in His otherness' the 'fallen Lucifer', who rises up against God and whose beauty makes him arrogant. But finally, as with Hölderlin, 'disfigured Nature rises up in a new ideal form as a realm of shadows', and its new form is 'having endured the fire of pain at the mid-point where, now purified, it has left all the flakes in the pot'.[18] Such sweeping formulations are later moderated; the issue remains the same, even when it is expressed in Christian terms: if God takes finitude upon Himself in Christ, 'this finitude which at its most extreme point is evil', then it is 'infinite love, that God has made Himself identical to what is foreign to Him in order to destroy it. This is the meaning of the death of Christ.' But because it is God who dies, death, the negative, conveys for us that 'the original sublimity is postulated as having been attained', and it is understood 'that the human, the finite, the debilitated, the weak, the negative are all an element within the divine; they are all contained within God Himself'.[19]

In the Spirit of Christianity and in the so-called Fragment of a System written in Frankfurt in 1800, which is close to Hölderlin and also to Schiller and which forms the transition to the system of the Jena period, the classical and Christian dimensions are magnificently combined. Infinite life (God) and finite life (world) now appear as 'Spirit' (already in the elevated sense of the 'vital unity of multiplicity') and 'as its form', which is not 'just dead variety separated off from it', but in which, rather, 'individual lives' become the 'organs' of infinite life. If someone can look at the universe in this way, then he 'prays to God'.[20] But because the individual form as such must nevertheless die, the whole appears to it as 'fate', which it must suffer willingly, and through which it can reconcile itself to God in the spirit of love.[21] Here we have Schiller's unillumined fate whereby the fragmenting human form matures into its ultimate beauty; even more, Hölderlin's 'dumb cliff' against which the heart's wave breaks and becomes Spirit; and for Hegel too the final word at this point is beauty: 'beautiful unification'.[22] It is into this fundamental aesthetic law that Hegel now interprets what is distinctively Christian: the unconditioned openness to reconciliation, the love of our enemy, which can glimpse the life of love through the apparently irreconcilable forms of life and fate and can carry it through. Although the otherness of fate can be construed as 'punishment' for the alienation of the finite consciousness from God, it is precisely this otherness that transforms love, which yields and offers itself, and by suffering and dying makes its peace with fate. That is perfect freedom, and at the same time it is beauty: 'the highest freedom is the negative attribute of the beauty of the soul'.[23]

---

[18] D 365.

[19] XII 250–253.

2. But this reconciliation of the Greek spirit with the Gospel has one precondition: the complete elimination of the Jewish dimension. In his insatiable and hateful polemic against the Old Testament, Hegel pursues the one element for which he has no use in his otherwise all-reconciling system: the sovereign and lordly elevation of God above the world, who acts, elects and rejects in complete freedom of will; and thus he has no use either for the distinctively Old Testament form

[20] N 347.
[21] N 348.
[22] N 351.
[23] N 286.

of the divine glory: the Kabôd. It was precisely this kind of anti-semitism which necessarily had to appear at the end of our history of the Spirit in which the elevation of God above the world—first in terms of classical antiquity and then of Christianity—is reduced step by step until it becomes a structure of implication and explication. Even in his maturity, when he no longer engages in polemics, Hegel will tear the Bible down the middle and insert the whole of antiquity between Judaism and Christianity. 'The Jewish principle of opposition' pulls God and the world apart:[24] and thus the idea of God becomes abstract, 'empty and without content', 'lifeless, not even dead, a nothingness' which nevertheless as 'infinite object' claims for itself all truth, freedom and justice so that man is reduced to a 'mere possession of his God', who jealously demands veneration and worship, who hates all other cults and commands then as far as possible to be destroyed, while allowing his own servants to live in a 'sad, unfelt unity' before Him and to serve him, but without beauty and without participating in 'anything eternal'.[25] He stokes up within them the 'demon of hatred'; 'a people who despise all foreign Gods must bear the hatred of the whole of the human race in their hearts'.[26] Accordingly, Israel as a people 'have descended to Hell in the infamy of their hatred', and what remains of this today as a sign among the Gentiles is the 'ideal of the one who is most rejected', like Thersites among the Greek heroes.[27] They are the 'hapless people',[28] as later in the Phenomenology the disjunction between God and the world is designated as the 'hapless consciousness'. Israel's religion is pure 'positivity', since it constantly exists in servile dependence upon the tyranny of its abstract God, and that is 'immorality'.[29] Hegel's total rejection is to some degree relativised by his placing of the Jewish tradition within that of the Orient in general with its abstract and empty idea of

---

[24] N 308.
[25] N 251–253.
[26] N 377.
[27] D 265.
[28] N 350.
[29] N 276.

God (India, Islam) and its multiple compensations for this by 'an acquired and alien splendor' (Kabôd): it is from this sphere that the dialectic arises between 'sovereignty over all and the willing surrender to every form of slavery',[30] which was the source later for the greatly influential chapter of the Phenomenology on the master and the servant. Here too a place could be found finally for the Jewish tradition, as a wholly relative phenomenon, in the interpretations of the 'philosophy of religion', of 'aesthetics' and the 'history of philosophy'. But this does not change the fact that we find in essence a fundamental rejection of the biblical and theological reality: of the elevation of the God of Israel above every harmonising reciprocity of complication and explication.

Thus the concept of sublimity within classical German aesthetics is definitively allocated to the past. It occupies a place in the great 'aesthetics' after the 'unconscious symbolism' of the Persians, the Indians and the Egyptians, as well as the Islamic 'pantheism of art': in the 'symbolism of sublimity', 'external existence, in which the substance is brought into view, is degraded vis-à-vis the substance, since this reduction and manipulation is the sole way in which the one God who is in Himself formless and who resists expression by anything wordly and finite according to His positive nature, can be rendered visible through art.' The external dimension is so subordinated that the internal one 'does not appear within it, but passes beyond it in such a way that nothing can attain expression but an act of being beyond and a proceeding beyond'.[31]

Against the Jewish abstractness, which fosters a loveless and 'godless' legalism and ceremonialism, the Jesus of the Early Theological Writings sets up the principle of love: as the inner against the outer, the moral against the legal, the reconciling against the dividing, beauty against sublimity. Whoever believes in Him, whoever grasps the principle which He brings, enters the light; and whoever rejects Him, pronounces his own judgment in that he remains within the zone of contradiction and division.[32]

[30] D 257–261.

[31] X/1 479.

[32] N 261f., 285f., 311.

But Hegel must advance to the point of a second denial: the denial of the Church, which through the tragic dialectic of history is led to the point of objectifying by the divinisation of Jesus the wholly abstract element which shines forth in Him,[33] of introducing a permanent contradiction into Jesus Himself and into devotion to him by the belief in the Resurrection,[34] and from there gradually to fall back into the outdated legalism of the Old Covenant:[35] into canon law which soon necessarily mingles with secular law[36] and thus leads to all the forms of medieval abuses.[37] Hegel thus (N 214–231) strikes a note of invective which is fully equal to that of Nietzsche against Christianity.

But does that not demand yet a third denial, that is, of Jesus Christ himself, who, on closer inspection, sought only to overcome the abstract positivity of the Jewish religion by opposing it with a new form of positivism: the link of faith to his own person? 'This constant, uniform thrusting forward of the self in John is a point of distinction from the Jewish character' and, in Jesus' intention, only a transitional stage on the way to complete unity in love and in the Eucharist with his friends; but then the abandoned group of disciples (as in Hölderlin's late hymns)[38] become attached to this too insistently isolated ego with its unique (and thus historical and positive) experience of God. The Graeco-Roman world of myth is shattered for the sake of this one man, without however creating in its place a satisfactory replacement in keeping with the world,[39] for the ancient Jewish legends are alien to the Western world, and Jesus' attitude to suffering, which in his disciples becomes a flight from the world,[40] lacks force of action and world-form.[41] The sacraments do not become an authentic form of life (as were the Gods of the Greeks):[42] everything points to an initial deficiency in Jesus himself, which had fateful historical consequences and which today points imperiously beyond itself. In his final judgment of historical Christianity, Hegel shows how the latter has failed in all its forms (Catholic, Protestant, Enlightenment) to create a calm and fulfilled form of beauty between God and the world, since it has not been able 'to find peace in an impersonal and vital beauty', but has hovered restlessly between the 'extremes . . . of friendship, of hatred or of indifference towards the world' and thus turned in a circle.[43] The God-world 'opposition' is nowhere 'transcended in a beautiful unity',[44] and the 'imagination can never synthesise it in beauty'.[45] That which should have effected this unity, the divine consciousness of Jesus Christ, becomes destructive and eternally divisive in the theory of the two natures and in the doctrine of the Resurrection. Instead of vanishing in transparency to God and yielding place solely to the sanctifying and unifying Spirit, the transient historical form of Jesus is made eternal, and thus absolute reason is prevented from ever dealing with the positivity of Christ. From this point on, Hegel is determined to throw away the husk in order to preserve the kernel. In the Phenomenology of the Spirit (1807) the 'husk' (the historical Jesus and the historical Church) is dispensed with under the title of the 'hapless consciousness' even prior to its entrance into the realm of 'reason',[46] while the philosophically serviceable kernel, the unity and mutual openness of God and man, is reserved for the highest realms of reason ('manifest religion').[47]

---

[33] N 156f., 175f.

[34] N 384.

[35] N 208.

[36] N 183.

[37] N 315.

[38] See above, pp. 333f.

[39] N 215.

[40] N 328f.

[41] 'The Christian religion has produced many martyrs, heroes in endurance, but not heroes in action': N 357.

And so it is not the historical and positive element which is philosophically assimilable, but the dogmatic one: christology as the general final formula of the relationship between God and the world; and thus what in the third book of Nicolas of Cusa's work (Docta Ignorantia) is represented as unification of the supreme divine principle and the supreme divine-world principle, but linked to the person of Christ. The uncertainty evident there (in the relationship between Christ and 'spirit', between 'conjecture' and 'knowledge' as the fullness of faith) is clarified in Hegel. What was historically 'revealed' (offenbart), is forever 'manifest' (offenbar). 'Revealed religion is manifest religion, because God has become wholly manifest in it. Here everything accords with the concept; there is nothing mysterious any more about God.'[48] 'God is absolutely manifest'.[49] One can therefore also say: 'Religion is the Spirit's knowledge of itself as Spirit'[50]—in Christian terms: as identity of the Holy Spirit in God and in the person who has been saved, of that Spirit which 'searches the depths of God' and which 'we have', in which 'we judge all things and are judged by no one' (1 Cor 2.9–16), and 'know everything' (1 John 2.21,27). This is the justification for the 'transition of faith into knowledge . . . the transfiguration of faith into philosophy'.[51] 'For faith is also knowledge, only in a particular form',[52] which begins with a sense-representation (in an historical phenomenon, a sacramental symbol, a dogmatic formula) but which yet already substantially contains the spiritual knowledge within itself. In this it is distinguished from myth, where the divine is viewed and attained only in a finite form. For Christianity the statement is true: 'The form, the determination, is not only finiteness . . . it is itself the concept as totality of form, and these forms are necessary and essential'.[53] This position allows Hegel to be generous and tolerant in his response to the still remaining forms of ecclesiastical and positive Christianity. At the same time he can illuminate them all in his final Philosophy of Religion with the light of absolute knowledge. That God [42] Cf. the fine but also dismissive reflections on the Last Supper in: N 299–300.

---

[43] N 342.

[44] N 351.

[45] N 300.

[46] II 159–173.

[47] II 561–593.

[48] XI 44.
[49] XII 152.
[50] XII 156.
[51] XII 258.
[52] XII 262.
[53] XII286.

becomes man—and man always means a particular, individual person who as such reveals the 'subjectivity', indeed the 'uniqueness' of God;[54] that God dies and 'is dead' (this 'most terrible idea that everything eternal, everything true does not exist, that negation itself is within God, the greatest suffering'[55]: that too is true and must be considered) and that this finally is only the means whereby God gives us His own eternal Spirit,[56] that God shows Himself to be the Three in One in this movement:[57] all this is absorbed into philosophy so that 'it only stands above the form of faith, while the content is the same'.[58]

If God is wholly manifest to man, without any mystery remaining unrevealed, then precisely the thinking of the totality of Being is a form of glory into which all that was previously 'sublime' is submerged. Previously, glory was the fact that 'God is at the same time above this manifestation, both within it and distinct from it',[59] that God in His 'manifestation in the world . . . shows Himself at the same time to be raised above this manifestation';[60] this 'in' and 'above' is reduced to a total 'in'. With that, the concept of 'miracle' has also changed: 'The true miracle is the Spirit itself. Even animal life is a miracle beside vegetable Nature, and Spirit even more so beside life, and purely sensate Nature'.[61] But when Spirit is present, there is no further need for any external miracle in order to validate its absoluteness: it is itself sufficient to this end. Its own totality, in which it comprehends itself step by step, is the id quo majus cogitari non potest, which has already been proven and attained.[62]

3. Hegel's thought always takes the achieved totality as its point of departure; for him, this is no longer only the formal

---

[54] XII 236–237.
[55] XII 249.
[56] XII 257–288.
[57] XII 283.
[58] XII 288.
[59] XII 51.
[60] XII 50.
[61] XII 256.
[62] Hegel's loyalty to Anselm: XV 162–169.

point of identity we find in Fichte and Schelling, but something that has integrated within itself all the tragic world-distinctions in the world of Nature and of Spirit. A characteristic of this consciousness of unsurpassable abundance is that it can be approached from all sides and can be developed in all directions: in one instance as a total metaphysics (as in the Jena lectures and in the Encyclopaedia), and in another as the genesis of total consciousness (or reason) from the implications of simple consciousness and of the consciousness of self (as in the Phenomenology of the Spirit), or again from the inner rhythm of the conceptual laws and structures themselves (as in the great Logic), or as the evolution of unconscious into conscious Spirit (as in the Philosophy of Nature), or as the increasing development and self-integration of the conscious Spirit (in the Philosophy of History), as the self-apprehension of absolute reason through its different stages (as the History of Philosophy), and finally as the completed self-contemplation of the absolute and infinite Spirit within the finite worldly-human Spirit: as Aesthetics. These are the final forms, whereas the Philosophy of Religion has in comparison with these only a provisional character, in so far as the transformation of the religious principle into absolute knowledge contains something more radical than the self-contemplation of thought in the Aesthetics or the recapitulation of all the premisses of its abundance in the other forms of philosophy. Precisely the Aesthetics—one of the richest and most successful of Hegel's works—is virtually no more than the portrayal of an awareness of the radiant blessedness of absolute knowledge itself, which can comprehend all things (even the most difficult and the most painful), justify all things and approve all things.

The fact that the beauty of Nature occupies within this work a minor and quite provisional place is understandable, since it is only in man's struggle for the fullness of spiritual insight that the spiritual gleam of the Absolute breaks forth from finitude: aesthetics becomes—since Schiller and Schelling ever more strongly, and now definitively—the theory of artistic beauty. Art is representation of the idea, which means to say 'of the concept which is concrete and absolute to itself',[63] of the spiritual (divine) truth which in its own freedom comprehends itself in the fullness of its finite and natural explication. As with Kant and Fichte, the universe is no longer theophanous, but actually anthropophanous; and man is theophanous not in his natural being but in his creative self-idealisation. He produces himself in art not only as the 'image and likeness of God' but also, as we find fundamentally in Fichte and Schelling too, himself as the God-Man, the unitive centre of God and the world. And yet the aesthetic contemplation of the idea (as the full embodiment of the Infinite in the finite) is for reason not the ultimate thing (as it was for a while for Schelling), but philosophy dissolves this contemplation too by comprehending its true meaning; and so the aesthetic principle has already had its kairos in the world history of the Spirit: with the Greeks, when consciousness did not yet strive beyond the contemplation of the beautiful divine form. The very fact that there is a science of art today (from Baumgarten, Kant, Schiller and Schelling onwards) is for Hegel the certain indication that the high point of art has been passed: firstly by the (Christian) era of religion, then by the (present) era of absolute science. We have 'passed that stage at which art is the most sublime way in which we become aware of the Absolute ... Ideas and reflection have outstripped the beauty of art'. Thus 'art in the sense of its highest calling remains for us a thing of the past'.[64] 'One can indeed hope that art will rise ever higher and will perfect itself, but its form has ceased to be the highest necessity of the spirit'.[65] It is at this point, if anywhere, that for Hegel the saying concerning Minerva's owl is true, which begins its flight only in the dusk—and invents aesthetics. And so the happy insouciance of his untroubled three volumes of aesthetics is something like a game of relaxation.

But then where does his seriousness lie? In the idea that when absolute thought occurs in man, the axis of Being runs through him, and his concept comprehends absolute totality within itself. Therefore he can construct 'the realm of pure thought', and 'this realm is truth, unveiled, as it exists in and for itself without concealment', and thus is 'the representation of God, as He exists in His eternal essence before the creation of Nature and of a finite spirit'.[66] The question as to whether this God is real or merely a creation of the mind is just as insoluble in Hegel as it is in Schelling, since for both the concept of 'Being' (or of actuality and reality) can emerge only as a counter and complementary concept to that of Spirit, and thus the question is utterly submerged within forgetfulness of Being. The Being, with which logic begins, and which is unmasked in its absolute emptiness as the void, in order finally to mediate itself into becoming is, like all subsequent mediations, precisely as such a concept. The whole of the metaphysics of Spirit and Being is developed within the framework of the Kantian opposition between concept and intuition, and thus ultimately between the general and the particular, which are—within an unsurpassable univocity—matter and form to each other. It is for good reason therefore that the Jena Logic has an explicitly aesthetic foundation which rises from 'simple association' to 'relationship' (in Being as in thought) and to 'proportion'. And even the primary law of the simultaneity of a posited and a transcended distinction, of stasis and movement, which prevails within it is in its balanced equilibrium (in imitation of true eternity) thoroughly aesthetic. 'Polarity', it is said here, 'is altogether the qualitative element, and since there is nothing other than the Absolute, then it itself exists absolutely and only by virtue of the fact that it is absolute does it transcend itself within itself, and the absolute is in its still state of being transcended just as absolutely the movement of Being or the transcending of absolute polarity'.[67] But this self-mediating identity is reason: 'Recognition itself is the universal'.[68] It is inevitable therefore that where reason begins to evolve as Nature, it offers itself as universal matter, also called 'aether', for all the forms which realise themselves from within it, corresponding to the way in which, for Spinoza (and later for Malebranche) pure space (extension) was an attribute of God. 'The aether is the absolute Spirit in its dimension of absolute self-identity . . . not the living God, for it is only the idea of God . . . It is Nature, and the self-identity of this Spirit, this Other of the living God, is absolute matter which, as the absolute universality of Nature, is the essence of life itself . . . it is nothing other than this absolute process of fermentation or absolute turbulence which is that both of being and of not being'.[69] Sentences of this kind show, more than with Schelling, and in the clearest possible manner, that the progression from logical univocity (the 'universal') or from logical materialism to the materialism of the natural sciences is itself both logical and unstoppable. And since man in his own thinking possesses the total concept of reality, there is no reason not to draw the atheistic consequences of the Hegelian Left.

---

[63] X/1 120.

[64] X/1 14–16.

[65] X/1 135.

---

[66] III 35–36.

[67] J 13; cf. ibid. 31 on the duplex negatio (as affirmatio): the positing of what is other and, since this is a positing, simultaneously its removal (Aufhebung), lead to a reciprocal proportion the members of which are what they are only through the Aufhebung.

[68] J 128.

Where in addition the divine has become the 'universal' (and no longer enjoys any primacy over it), it becomes inevitable that the individual thing, which has been posited for the benefit of the self-consciousness of the Spirit, is transcended (aufgehoben) as an individual thing in favour of the whole: physically by its death, and aesthetically by its death, aesthetically by its self-sacrifice to the whole. What lies beneath this act is treated as 'the mental realm of creatures' in the Phenomenology, that is as natural forms of individuation which believe they have a claim to absolute value (as 'person'). But the Jena metaphysics already knows: 'For the monad its Beyond is the highest essence, and as individuality it is transcended. But the highest essence is in fact the species in which individuality exists as something transcended, not destroyed, but which has gone through the zero of infinity, although, for the monad itself, it is something which has been destroyed; the self-preservation of the monad is only a longing which seeks to save individuality through that zero'.[70] If one considers that Hegel's earliest concern was the concrete (i.e. national) Spirit of the People (Volksgeist) which mediates between total Spirit and the monad,[71] and that this indeterminate Spirit of the People appeared to him later as the formed Spirit of the State, then it is clear that Hegel had to become the intellectual point of departure for the later socialism of the Left and of the Right, both of which in their own way have gathered the glory of absolute Being into the absolutist claims of their own 'party'.

---

[69] J 197–198.

5. KARL MARX

While the unnatural combination of the 'Spirit of the People' (Blut und Boden: blood and earth) with the abstract Hegelian idea of the State, together with artificially warmed-up myths, could only engender an obstructive form of madness which was contrary to all the authentic tendencies of the age, Karl Marx performed an historically necessary act by turning the Hegelian philosophy 'on its head'.[1] And yet, as is always the case with violent negations, the 'No' remained closely bound to that which was rejected, a fact that decisively influenced the world-wide movement which he began and essentially formed.

Initially linked to the group of Hegelians of the Left, following and furthering 'the decomposition of the absolute Spirit'[2] in the 'break-down of the Hegelian system', he soon pursues his own, solitary path. It is precisely the imposing and impenetrable closeness and perfection of the Philosophy of Spirit which is most suspect; could the 'reality' which the Spirit posits and then transcends be only a phantasmagoria, the striking proof of how alien this whole thinking about Spirit was to actual reality? The absolute philosopher contains the World-Spirit in his head, but he no longer sees the man who stands beside him. But the latter emits the cry of need which sunders all the webs of Idealism. 'Need which can no longer be waved away, which can no longer be glossed over and which is absolutely imperative'[3] infinitely outweighs every purely cerebral system. It is not our task to depict the world or to 'construct' it in thought, but to 'change' it.[4] Certainly it was Feuerbach who earlier made the first breakthrough: rational man first really comes into being in his encounter with his fellow-man, where absolute reality appears, and the synthesis is created which engenders the Eternal, the Divine. But according to Marx, Feuerbach is not yet free from the Kantian categories of concept and intuition (object and reality); he 'remains with the abstract "man" and can only acknowledge the "actual, individual, physical man" within his experience . . . as love and friendship, and thus in an idealised form'.[5] He has not heard the cry of need, the need of the proletarian who has become wraith-like in his material and mental deprivation and who represents the physical self-alienation of man in such a way that only the unconditional act, as the active negation of this kind of negation, can be an adequate answer to it. None of the philosophers of Spirit ever encountered Spirit in order for it to reproach him for his own spectral character. Marx is little concerned with unmindfulness of Being as a philosophical problem; but he has encountered the forgotten dimension of reality fundamentally, in the form of need. This is the primal Christian situation, and beyond that the primal Israelite, Old Testament and prophetic situation which Marx, a Jew, rediscovers on behalf of the Christian community and which forms the theological a priori of his entire thought, and thus also of his aesthetics. But the need of man who is alienated from himself is again the only point at which he advances to the horizon of Being; for he borrows all his conceptual material again from the Hegelian Philosophy of Spirit, which is 'oblivious of Being', in order to find an answer to that

---

[70] J 177.

[71] Volksreligion und Christentum: N 3–71.

[1] Karl Marx, Die Frühschriften, ed. Siegfried Landshut, Kröner 1953. Cf. M. Lifschitz, Marx und Engels über Kunst und Literatur, Henschel, Berlin, 1948; Georg Lukács, 'Einführung in die äesthetischen Schriften von Marx und Engels', in: Beiträge zur Geschichte der Ästhetik, Berlin 1956, pp. 191–216.

[2] 343.

[3] 318.

[4] 341.

[5] 353.

need. This means in practical terms: his thought takes its point of departure from human need and proceeds forwards (to the remedying of the problem) and backwards (to the reasons for its existence); the question as to why we exist, or the world, or Being is entirely submerged behind this. The problem of (total, material and mental) deprivation keeps his gaze firmly fixed on the sphere of 'material' production.

Man becomes distinct from the animal at the point at which he 'begins to produce his own food, a step which is determined by his bodily organisation'. By doing this, man also 'produces indirectly his own material life itself'.[6] He forms Nature in such a way that it returns to him in a human form and thus furthers man in his own humanity. 'Man as subject [is] both the result and the point of origin of this movement':[7] by divesting himself of himself in his work, he humanises Nature and integrates it again as such into himself. Fichte was thus right to understand man to be the self-positing act which can succeed only by passing through a process of objectification, and 'the great thing in the Hegelian "Phenomenology" together with its end results . . . is . . . that Hegel grasps the self-generation of man as a process, objectification as de-objectification, as expropriation and as the transcending of this expropriation, that he therefore comprehends the essence of labour and sees objectified man, who is true because he is real, as the result of his own labour'.[8] Man is expropriated in his work firstly through the giving of himself to the business at hand and secondly, and far more radically, through the law of the division of labour, which make of some masters and exploiters and of others serfs and the exploited. In his Master and Serf, Hegel had presented a fundamental delineation of how this second process too leads to self-elimination (Selbstaufhebung). Marx's life work consisted in the detailed exploration of this in the material process of the self-actualisation of man as a social being. 'Material' in this context means fundamentally that it is objects which (moved by men!) make history and that these [6] 347.

[7] 237.

[8] 269.

objects in their man-made reality are more than just 'intuitions' but rather stand in a relation to man of existential effect and counter-effect. It is this, and not a metaphysical materialism, in the sense of the Atomists, which interests Marx. The horizon of his thought is the principle that man produces himself by working himself into Nature and thus working Nature into himself. This interrelationship of man and world is both the Absolute dimension and the eschaton of the historical process in which the polarities cancel each other out: 'We observe how it is only in the state of society that subjectivism and objectivism, spiritualism and materialism, activity and passivity lose their mutual opposition and thus their existence as polarities of this kind', and do so through 'the practical energy of man', through the completion of his true life-task, 'which philosophy could not solve'.[9] Marx here calls the 'state of society' that state in which man has fully realised his social being in so far as 'a particular individual (and it is precisely his particularity which makes him an individual and a genuine individual social being)' gives expression at the same time subjectively within himself to 'the ideal totality' of the species,[10] and thus where 'society' is no longer abstractly fixed in contradistinction to the individual.[11] Marx is—hardly surprisingly—held fast by Hegel's horizon of essentialistic thinking between the 'general' and the 'particular' and, at the same time, in an anthropological reduction, through the scheme of expression of the general (the 'idea' as something which has been concretely fulfilled) within the particular (which integrates itself into it), which represents within this unity the Absolute, the Divine.[12] His eschatological ideal is therefore not that of vulgar Marxism. The idea of 'the elimination of private property' is as such 'only a generalisation and completion of the same', as also the idea of a 'community of women' as 'universal prostitution' would be only the completion of the prostitution of the human person by capitalism, 'only the concealed form in which greed is produced and is satisfied only in another way', only an 'abstract negation of the whole world of education and civilisation, the return to the unnatural simplicity of the poor man unencumbered by needs who, far from going beyond private property, has not even arrived yet at that point'.[13] The ideal lies rather in such a total humanisation of Nature that the latter, as the 'concretely developed wealth of human nature' wholly discloses to him, in its return, his five senses in the fully human sense, beyond 'immediate gratification', and 'not only in the sense of possession, in the sense of having'. Here in a grandiose vision Marx glimpses the ultimate meaning of the painful process which has led humanity out into the 'absolute poverty' of self-expropriation: through this poverty, humanity had to learn an attitude to existence as a whole, which leaves mere 'having' behind. 'The simple alienation of all our physical and mental senses, the sense of possession, has therefore (through private property) taken the place of all these senses. The being of man had to be reduced to this condition of absolute poverty in order that it should give birth, of itself, to its own inner wealth.'[14] For it is through the labour process that the world is humanised, while man is liberated from the subjective constraint upon him of 'wanting to have and to enjoy': 'The eye has become a human eye, as its object has become a human and social one . . . The senses have therefore immediately become theoreticians in their praxis. They relate to the object for its own sake, but the object itself is a concrete and human form of relation to itself and to man and vice versa . . . In the same way, the senses and the spirit of other men have become my own appropriation.'[15] And so Marx can say: 'The education of the five senses is the work of the [9] 243.

---

[10] 239.

[11] 238.

[12] True 'communism is, as perfected naturalism, humanism; as perfected humanism, it is naturalism; it is the truthful resolution of the struggle between man and nature and between men; it is the true resolution of the dispute between existence and essence, between objectification and self-affirmation, between freedom and necessity, between the individual and the genus': 235.

[13] 233–234.

[14] 240.

[15] 240–241.

whole of the world's history to this day'.[16] But this fulfilling encounter between man and world is completed in the archetypal encounter between man and woman; for Marx, for whom his deep, life-long love for his wife Jenny von Westphalen was virtually the one bright area in his terrible existence, it is the exact opposite of the happiness we find depicted in the Politeia. 'In this relationship, therefore, there appears at the level of the senses, reduced to a visible fact, the extent to which, for man, human essence has become Nature or Nature has become the human essence of man.' The as yet unveiled, eschatological 'mystery of this relationship' has its 'unambiguous, decisive, manifest and revealed expression' here.[17] In his own way, therefore, Marx has the 'disinterestedness' of the highest Platonic eros and that of Kant's ethical and aesthetic dimension in view, when he wishes to see 'having' and 'enjoying' transcended in interpersonal love.

Of course, man cannot be spared the passage through class division and class conflict, which necessarily becomes ever harsher; for this is the only way in which man can interpret himself to himself. Even the age of the 'universal whore', viz. of money, the power which inverts all things—'it turns fidelity into infidelity, love into hatred, hatred into love, virtue into vice, vice into virtue, the serf into the master, the master into the serf, stupidity into intelligence, intelligence into stupidity'[18]—this too cannot be avoided, any more than the 'universal prostitution of the worker'[19] can. It is through his debasement and humiliation that man attains his true worth.

This is the thrust of the early work, especially the essay on National Economy and Philosophy which first became known in 1932, and which represents the high central point between the Hegelian philosophy of the first years and the later economic work on Capital. But the question cannot be surpressed: who is ultimately the subject of this real, material process? No unconscious-conscious Spirit as with Hegel (as the relic of a classical-Christian divinity). But neither is it man, since it is only out of necessity that he initiates the labour process, which only leads him into yet greater need before finally releasing him from it. Who then? Marx ceased to philosophise when he renounced Hegel, and so the question of meaning in its entirety is no longer asked. The fact that man is, suffices. No light falls upon this fact. And so ultimately, this is a process which only absolute necessity can guide. It is neither God nor man but the logic of the matter, of capital, which directs history, which concentrates the titanic energies of material power and causes them finally to collapse. Nor does the material dimension govern because it has at its base a philosophical Atomism, but because the reduction of reality to the material dimension of the Spirit (within the philosophical tradition from Descartes on) is accepted as a fact and is not corrected by any philosophy of Being. The two main protagonists in the drama, the capitalist and the proletarian, play the utterly passive role of persons who are driven, in their relationship to the sole active power, which is capital. Thus the hour of a world-historical advance is missed: by the Christians, who did not see the presence of need, and by those who wished to teach the Christians a necessary lesson. That it should have been a Jew, Marx, who taught that lesson, is a just riposte to antisemitism of Hegel and—despite Lessing's Nathan—of most of the great figures of the age of Goethe. The very thing which was alone excluded from the Hegelian synthesis, the people that resists integration into any world-historical synthesis, toppled him from his throne. Marx, however, did not enthrone the glory of God, but once again absolute man as the centre of the world and of Being. And so once more the 'beautiful' Jewish synthesis hangs unsupported within the void.[20] [16] 242.

---

[17] 234.

[18] 299, 301.

[19] 237–238, note.

---

[20] Cf. the very informative essay 'Zur Judenfrage', 171–207.

7. AESTHETICS AS SCIENCE

That which deserved the name of glory in the sphere of metaphysics has been lost to view. Being no longer possesses any radiance, and beauty, banished from the transcendental dimension, is confined to a purely worldly reality where tensions and contradictions, encompassed only by univocity, still remain to be overcome. It is only under this premiss that aesthetics as a strict science becomes possible. This no longer belongs to the object of our enquiry, which took the 'glorious' as its concern and not the dimensions of an innerwordly beauty (which can extend in one direction to the 'sublime' and in the other perhaps to the ugly'). German academic research has mapped out this area with great precision, from Rosenkranz. Solger and Weisse to Carrière and Schasler and Eduard von Hartmann, from Lotze and Vischer, Zimmermann and Fechner to Häberlin and Nicolai Hartmann. Major contributions by other peoples are rarer; even as his opponent. Chernishevski remains under the influence of Hegel and Croce also radicalises German Idealism, while John Ruskin once again strives to establish the wholly transcendental character of beauty.

While German aesthetic science concerned itself deeply with the criteria of good taste, German and virtually all European art—with the exception of French painting—sank into an unimaginable lack of taste, which can only be explained on the basis of the depths of the metaphysical confusion: as the deluded belief in the secure illumination of the cosy 'room of existence' while it had long since grown dark 'outside'. It was Hegel who lent a good conscience to the awareness of this supposed absolute light—'the spirit has overcome every opposition in its self-consciousness', and it 'has ceased to be a seeking form of knowledge'.[1] And yet Schopenhauer, his dark shadow, soon gains the upper hand:

---

[1] Documents, p. 350.

the whole light-filled and beautiful world of the 'ideas' is only the manifestation of a dark and blind will, and thus the paradoxical and perverse site of the self-denial of Being and its disintegration as a return into nothingness. Schopenhauer's perfumed nihilism of the salon, which was further propagated by Wagner, Eduard von Hartmann and Thomas Mann, gives off an ever greater stench of putrefaction and thus requires the more pungent essences which Nietzsche, the late Scheler, the early Heidegger, Sartre and his disciples provide. It is in fact only against this background that 'Aesthetics as a strict science' can evolve.

For when Being in its classical and Christian sense is understood analogically, together with that elevation of the Infinite and the Divine above the finite and the worldly which remains unsurpassable for all forms of finite being and thinking, when therefore the worldly dimension hovers in an incalculable distinction between Being and entity, there the transcendental properties of Being—the One, the True, the Good and the Beautiful—are so affected by this analogy and by this distinction that any reduction of metaphysics and of the metaphysical doctrine of truth, goodness and beauty to an 'exact science' is rendered impossible. Although, in the domain of aesthetics, the transcendentalising analogy causes worldly beauty gradually to become metaphysical, mythical and revelatory splendour, nevertheless this hovering within the world between Being and entity, as determined by the metaphysics of Thomas and to some extent again by those of Heidegger, again prevents any fixing of beauty to a particular concept or to a readily-grasped system of concepts. It is sufficient to state this negatively, since the concluding section will have to develop this distinction again positively. The deduction for our theme is that every 'exact aesthetics' which treats of the beauty which is to be encountered within the world, still sees only a fragment and an aspect of the total object for which worldly beauty is only a 'part', and can thus necessarily offer only 'fragments' and 'aspects' that cannot become a whole. This incapacity is no objection to the authentic albeit fragmentary, truth which it contains; partial perspectives do yield genuine glimpses of the comprehensive whole, and aesthetic rules can gradually be raised to the level of metaphysics, of myth and ultimately of revelation because, seen from the other perspective, metaphysics, myth and ultimately revelation can in their descent make use of the worldly and the fragmentary in order to become manifest at that level and indeed to achieve self-expression. In this sense, it is also possible to extract benefit from 'exact aesthetics' for the purposes of a theory of glory, but this, of course, does not go significantly beyond those aspects which have been previously developed. Three areas of motif can be distinguished from each other, if not marked off 'exactly'; it is these which will provide the perspectives for the analysis of the theological dimension in Vols. VI and VII of this work.

1. The beautiful is without doubt appearance (Erscheinung), ἐπιφάνεια. It was viewed from this perspective by the Greeks, Plato, the Stoa, Plotinus and, after them, the great aesthetic theologies of the Middle Ages which understood the world's 'beauty' to be the appearance of the One who does not appear, and who shows His transcendence in the unitive ordering of the Multifold. This idea is developed by the German Idealists, but in such a way that the absolute (God-) Spirit which remains concealed in its appearance coincides more and more clearly with the human spirit, so that the axis of the epiphany runs through man as its centre: man as Spirit appears as body, as thc universal (idea) he appears as the particular, as God he appears as man. Corresponding to this anthropologisation of the epiphany, exact aesthetics will go back from Hegel's standpoint to that of Kant and Schiller, that is, to a subjective and psychological idealism whose dimensions extend on the one hand from the 'idea' which is still visible to man to the 'embodiment' of the idea which is made possible by man's sense structure, on the other. It is this path from Hegel to Schiller, from the absolute to the psychological idea, which is followed by Friedrich Theodor Visher, who is the most important German aesthetician of the last century.[2] For him the aesthetic synthesis of idea and appearance, the infinite and the finite, clearly runs through the man as centre and of course, since man is himself microcosm, he secondarily reveals the macrocosm too. From this central axis, exact aesthetics in the most various forms copes with the extremes which require synthesis, since for Solger the beautiful is fundamentally 'constituted by component parts which are self-eliminating and which must be grasped in the 'act of transition':[3] idea and appearance, spirit and body, freedom and necessity, subjective and objective, divine and earthly, sublime and beautiful, tragic and comic, and, in the extreme case the ugly. Precisely this borderline case, which was drawn into the discussion by Rosenkranz's Asthetik des Hässlichen (1853), reveals the problems of 'exact aesthetics' more deeply than it would itself like and realises: can beauty which appears, or that which appears in beauty, make of its own opposite (ugliness) one of the poles of its expressivity? And if not, is then its idea limited, and it itself seriously threatened by the unloveliness of the real or by the dark backdrop of the world? The threads become confused, and this line of questioning points clearly beyond itself to a region where aesthetics must assume a theological form. If the lines point back historically to Schiller (and his universal dark fate), synchronically to Marx and his exposure of (Vische's) aesthetics as bourgeois ideology,[4] and forwards to the attempts of our own time to draw attention to the limits of beauty within the world through the 'ugly' and thus to allow something more profound to come into view, whereby it still remains unclear what that more profound element may be: God, or nothingness.

---

[2] Ästhetik oder Wissenschaft des Schönen, 3 vols., 1846–57, and many later writings.

Nevertheless, the central concept of idealist aesthetics, 'appearance' (Erscheinung), is still only the half of itself, as long as it is not explained why that which appears in its form is experienced as beauty: And so the aesthetic scene of appearances necessarily gives birth to a complementary aesthetic science of form. We find it present among the Greeks from Pythagoras onwards: it must be possible to enquire into the aesthetic qualities of formal structure (harmonia) in space and in time (rhythmos). Thus Schiller knows 'architectonic beauty', to mention only this last figure in the Western theory of harmony (from Boethius to Alberti and Dürer). Herbart and his school endeavoured to interpret this element with exact scientific method. Herbart, whose starting point was the Kantian unknowability of das Ding an sich and who chooses to define philosophy as the 'elaboration of concepts', accepts by way of complementarity simple aesthetic judgments which are formed on the basis of an irreducible pleasingness or otherwise in perception (aesthetics in the broader sense) of relations of the will (ethics) or in original forms (aesthetics in the narrower sense). Here, there is born the theory of 'values' which are free both of Being and of concepts, and which have played a mostly fateful role down to our own day: they are in fact nothing but the emergency substitute for Being, together with its transcendental modalities, which has been hollowed out and suppressed by Rationalism and Idealism alike. And so however useful the researchers of the Herbart school have been (above all the contribution of Robert Zimmermann in his Geschichte der Ästhetik als philosophischer Wissenschaft,[5] Gustav Theodor Fechner in his Vorschule der Ästhetik,[6] Karl Stumpf in his Tonpsychologie,[7] as well as the work of Hanslick and others), in that they have sought to expose the primal elements of the beautiful and to describe at least their initial combinations, they have necessarily not advanced beyond a pure science of experience, or 'phenomenology', of the beautiful, since the values are simply 'given' to the forms and their relations without their being in any sense derivable.

---

[3] Karl Wilh. Ferd. Solger: Vorlesungen über Ästhetik, 1829 (repr. 1962), pp. 108–109.

[4] G. Lukács: 'Karl Marx und Friedrich Theodar Vischer', in: Beiträge zur Geschichte der Ästhetik (1956), pp. 217–285.

Unless, that is, we follow the Pythagorean path of an original identity between the law of quantity (the measurable intervals of the monochord strings) and the psychic law of quality (the hearing of the pitch), whereby the identity of both would lie in the objective-subjective 'tension'. This is the point of origin for many different possible paths: some lead to Gestalt psychology (which Stumpf was already approaching) and further to a pure functionalism,[8] while others lead to an aesthetic-religious Pythagoreanism, such as was developed by A. von Thimus in the last century[9] and magnificently so by Hans Kayser in our own.[10] The limits of these paths are evident as soon as they are made absolute: the Pythagorean identity of the physical and psychic harmony of the world does not permit in principle anything which is superior to it, and thus no form of epiphany, but rather turns in pantheistic and atheistic circles within itself. Plato, who endeavoured to approach this identity in his old age by equating the Ideas with numbers, and again Kepler (Harmonices Mundi, 1619), who depicted the mystery of the world in numbers and attributed to them 'powers' (rather than to the moving intelligences), or Leibniz with his pre-established harmony cannot escape the inner logic of the Pythagorean system: the imprisoning of the freedom of the act of appearing within the ordered structures (Gesetzlichkeiten) of the appearance.

---

[5] Vienna, 1858.

[6] Two parts, Leipzig, 1876.

[7] Two vols., Leipzig, 1883–1890.

The direct, i.e. unmediated, parallelisation of Spirit and matter in Descartes, Leibniz and Spinoza prevents the emergence of that distance by virtue of which the Spirit could create a genuine expressive form of itself within the sphere of the material. Its superiority is expressed at most now in the fact that it groups matter into 'pleasing' configurations. Therein the Kantian ideal of the non-signifying and abstract beauty is foreshadowed with which, as we have said before, the ideal of modern 'abstract art' first consciously appears. In so far as this emerges as a demanding and perhaps exclusive programme, it is without doubt a product of modern thinking which is oblivious of Being and in whose train Spirit has become functionalised and can achieve expression only within the counter-image of material functions. Significantly the median point between Spirit and the senses which is touched by beauty does not bear the concrete name of 'heart' in Kant, but the abstract name of a 'harmony of the powers of the mind.' This abstract relation already begins to waver in his work in the face of the forms of abstract art, and thus clearly betrays its deficient and fragmentary character.

---

[8] Cf. Vol. IV of this work, pp. 28–32 (Eng. trans.)

[9] Die harmonikale Symobolik des Altertums, 2 vols., Cologne, 1868–1876. Cf. above, Vol. I of this work, p. 108 (Eng. trans.)

[10] Lehrbuch der Harmonik (1950), Harmonia Plantarum (Basel, 1943), Akroasis, Die Lehre von der Harmonik der Welt (Stuttgart, 1947).

The entire aesthetics of form and value remains a fragment within what is a greater, though no less fragmentary, aethestics of epiphany. For this too would have to depart as a whole from its own essential sphere for that of total Being, and answer the question, not what the human spirit on its own can conceive and embody in terms of ideas (before what horizon?), but what Being as a whole epiphanically heralds and brings into view. But precisely in so far as these two questions cannot be made to coincide, the mystery of a total ontology and aesthetics opens up in such a way that it makes impossible any systematic analysis of appearance.

2 If 'appearance' (the appearance of that which does not appear) remains enigmatic—for example: what becomes known in a perfectly beautiful person?—then a further principle seems to be of help. We know of the production of the beautiful by someone who is capable of achieving this, namely the artist (ποίησις, ποιητής). There exists this primal act of generation and of genesis within the spirit, as an act which is above the rational and discursive faculties of thought, since the form is suddenly present in an original intuition and inaccessible unity (a good deal of testing the way can be involved by way of preparation, but the work never crystallises from below) within a single moment which is experienced as being 'given', in a 'μανία', as Plato has it, in which the Plotinian ἔνδον εἶδος is at once 'found' (gefunden) and 'devised' (erfunden), 'seen' (Ficino), 'stolen' (Shaftesbury and Goethe), 'posited' (Fichte and Schelling) in the unconcious or super-conscious mind of the 'genius', which Herder, Kant and Schiller described or in the phenomenon of 'inspiration' as described by Nietzsche and Dostoievsky. Chr. H. Weisse developed in his System der Ästhetik (1830) a theory of 'genius' which can be taken as an idealist counterpart to the classical daimon. In his Aesthetics (1902),[11] Benedetto Croce by idealist means raised this act of aesthetic and creative intuition to the level of the fundamental act of the spirit and thereby again proclaimed the identity of contemplation (Schau) and expression (Ausdruck): 'Intuitive knowledge is expressive knowledge',[12] 'intuitive activity possesses intuitions to the extent that it expresses them,'[13] 'When we have achieved the world within us, conceived definitely and vividly a figure or statue, or found a musical motif, expression is born and is complete'.[14] Expression is free inspiration.'[15] Actus purus and forma pura coincide. It is evident that no more space is left here for religion, i.e. for the analogy between the original (urbildlich) Creative Spirit (God) and the copy abbildich) in creative spirit (man), as Nicolas of Cusa envisaged this. And yet only this analogy contains the true problem which weaves its way through the history of Aesthetics as the question concerning the artist's 'imitation of Nature', the problem that stands in the tension between the artist's gazing upon the 'works of God' in the Natura naturata—and the assimilation of the artist's genius into the activity of God in the Natura naturans. The instinctive genius we have described above will always incline towards the second, even if no serious artist will lack the first element—that of observation and practice. Goethe shows both of these within himself in a good balance, and transposes both elements (as a 'chain' and 'flash of lightning') on to the twofold unity of 'Nature' and 'God'. But in the Prometheus fragment it was the twofold unity of the poet (as self-discoverer) and of his goddess (as inspiration): the motif which will become central for Spitteler. The analogy with the prophet (poeta vates) was drawn even in classical times.[16] Hamann[17] and Karl Philipp Moritz[18] saw the connection between artistic and sexual generation. And thus it becomes clear that whoever grasps the beautiful in an original manner is directed to a point of the origin of Being, and is caught up close to it. From this perspective, existence as a whole appears justified, whatever terrible things it may perhaps bear in its womb. The eternal striving in the moral sphere, the ceaseless dynamism of reason in search of truth are embraced and mysteriously superseded by the aesthetic gaze which approves and justifies the whole, entirely as it is.

---

[11] Aesthetic as Science of Expression and General Linguistic (London 2nd edn, 1953²) trans. D. Ainslie.

[12] Ibid., p. 11. [13] Ibid., p. 8.

[14] Ibid., p. 50. [15] Ibid., p. 51.

[16] E. Fascher: Prophetes (1927); ThWNT VI, 781–782.

[17] Cf. Vol. III of this work, pp. 239ff.

[18] Schriften zur Ästhetik and Poetik, ed. H. J. Schrimpf (Tübingen, 1962), pp. 46f.

This is the main idea of Paul Häberlin's Allgemeine Ästhetik,[19] in which he renews the insight of Schelling's middle period and links the aesthetic affirmation of Being closely to that of religion. But in Schelling the emphasis lay emphatically on the identity of subject and object, and Schiller in his Letters on the Aesthetic Education of Man underlined the formal and historical instability of such felicitous indifferentia and understood this explicitly to be a pre-ethical stage. Thus the path to Kierkegaard already lay fundamentally open: he views the pre-existent aesthetic totality, where this pronounces itself absolute, as the rejection of the ethical dimension, which is authentic existence. It will therefore be necessary to see the indifferentia of creative genius in its inner polarity, as described earlier by Goethe and Spitteler, which is that ambivalence which Plato as philosopher lays at the door of prophetic and poetic enthusiasm. Here Moritz again becomes relevant: the vacillation which he describes between the proximity and the distance of the artist to the macrocosm; and Jean Paul is even more relevant with his theory of genius in the Vorschule der Ästhetik (1804), which distinguishes the receptive and passive genius, which apprehends the inner life of the universe in a holy and open soul as a 'mute of Heaven', from that active and divinatory genius which in its apprehension of totality creates an inner form with potential for the future, which, in a state of calm reflection, it brings to concrete expression in an external form.[20] It is Jean Paul too who, while leaving open the tension between self-giving (to the objective) and generation (in the subjective), refrains from constraining the ethical into the aesthetic (in any way whatever) and thus is the first theoretician able to analyse in depth the phenomena of the comic and the ridiculous, of humour and of wit. Long before Kierkegaard and Marx, he sees the impossibility of resolving the tension between the idea and the (individual) existence, and when in Hegel the idea enriches itself through the elimination of existences, then e contra the infinite weight of existence can call the idea into question and thus, on the grounds of its own particular incomprehension, show the entire wisdom of the world of ideas to be folly, to be 'infinite incongruity'.[21] This is more than that 'romantic irony' which can be derived from the Fichtean elevation above the world as Non-self (something which never produces true harmony), but implies rather the ultimately Christian dialectic of a 'finitude applied to infinity',[22] which in its whole limitation nevertheless possesses enough weight to unmask the relativity of the 'infinite reason'. 'Humour as the inverted sublime does not destroy the finite . . . there exists for it no single insistence of folly, no fools but only . . . a mad world. It topples the great . . . and raises the small on high, but, contrary to irony, it does so in order to set the great at its side and thus to destroy both, since in the face of the infinite all is one and all is nothingness.'[23] In this sense, Cervantes set his 'twin star of folly over the whole of mankind',[24] not in order to turn his back on the world as a whole but as a 'seriousness which descends' from Heaven to Earth. In contrast to the arrogant claims of the philosophy of Spirit, humour becomes the existential testimony of the unbridgeable nature of the relationship between idea and existence, it is the reason why the true and warm light of Being is preserved and the cold and false light of an absolutist speculation and its consequent destructive irony is held at bay. Jean Paul himself depicted [19] Basel and Leipzing, 1929, especially pp. 288–322.

---

[20] Vorschule (1804) I, para. 10–14

[21] Ibid., I, 155.
[22] Ibid., I, 174.
[23] Ibid., I, 175–176.
[24] Ibid., I, 178.

the ultimate unbridgeable polarity of genius, indeed of man as such, through his heroes, all of whom are ordered in pairs (Siebenkäs—Leitgeber, Albano—Schoppe, Walt—Vult, etc.). As a theoretican of folly, he also assimilated (more clearly than Erasmus or Hamann) the intuition of Christian artists from Wolfram to Grimmelshausen and Dostoievsky into theoretical aesthetics and thus showed once again the openness of this science to what ultimately belongs to the sphere of religion and theology.

The whole nexus of problems of the 'exact aesthetics' with references to the subjective premisses for an apprehension of beauty must be accordingly transposed into this openness. First comes everything which is described by the concept of 'empathy' (Einfühlung: Theodor Lipps) as that prerequisite of powers, dispositions and expectations of the subject, whereby it draws the object into its own sphere, clasping and permeating it with its sentient organs which bestow both light and warmth in order thus to enjoy it as its own possession. This point of view, although not false, is so evidently limited that it virtually transcends itself by its own nature, since the open and unresisting self-giving of the subject increasingly guarantees space to the object and allows it to appear in its own aesthetic structure. And so the psychology of empathy becomes virtually of itself so a phenomenology of the self-'giving' object (Moritz Geiger), which in turn can itself receive a stress that is more subjectivistic or more objectivistic and the more profound question occurs here as to in what way and to what extent the subject wishes and is able to be open and to give itself, in order to experience 'strata' of life and of Being as a whole (as Nicolai Hartmann carefully distinguishes them) as beautiful, although these appear uninteresting or ugly to the spectator who is only superficially receptive. The quotation from Rilke which stands at the beginning of this work clarifies once more precisely what is meant here, not only because a progressive aesthetic empathy into the whole of existence is prescribed as possible and feasible, but also by virtue of the fact that this attitude is understood to be a precondition for the capacity of the objective value of Being to become manifest.

This is where there lies the full aesthetic significance of the metaphysical eros which is treated in so many ways in this book. As erotic eros, it is the magical transfigurer of lovers and of the whole surrounding world: 'Everything is glorious for me today—if only it would remain like this! I see the world today through the lens of love.' But all those to whom this lens has been offered and then withdrawn, know its subjective character. But the lover has the freedom to purify the natural love into one which is spiritual and to make it universal: Plato performed this metamorphosis in the Symposium and raised eros up to become the contemplation of the absolutely Good and Beautiful, which can be glimpsed through no other lens. In this ascent, he purified it of all forms of egotism—up to the threshold of what we have called 'detachment', which is that positive self-giving of the subject to Being in its entirety (and to all its possible revelatory forms), which has to be interpreted as an a priori state of assent, as 'Yes and Amen' to eternity. At the precise point at which the a priori 'Yes' mutates from one which is categorical to one which is transcendental, the beauty which encounters us in the world becomes (metaphysical) glory. It is also the point at which, for the religious person, Being becomes theophanous, whether the divine appears in the form of a mythic image (with all the provisional character of such images), or whether his 'mental (geistige) senses' (as Marx also called them) as 'spiritual (geistliche) senses' make him capable of hearing and of seeing the mystery of Being as a whole. It is only this background of the metaphysical eros which prevents the particular eros from misapprehending itself as a bitter illusion and a scurrilous trick of Nature, on which the individual who has been informed and made a fool of avenges himself through his a priori 'frigidity and insolence'.

3. The third element within the beautiful explicitly highlights that characteristic for which the unresisting eros creates a space: charis. This word has always processed a certain polyvalence which makes it appropriate for a transcendent application, and which emerges particularly clearly in Pindar. It begins as the victorious loveliness of youth, before becoming the radiant aretê (virtue) of the whole person, in which the grace of the gods once again appears, and then finally the grateful exchange between the gift of victory and the return gift of recognition, especially through the poet. It is loveliness, dignity, brilliance, favour, grace, gratitude all in one. And so charis is allegorically open to the more earnest, world-historical agôn of pius Aeneas and open again to the wholly different agôn of the crucified Christ, which is comprehensible only on the grounds of the living God of love. In biblical terms too, charis will extend from the eroticism of the Song of Songs and the nuptial psalms—diffusa est gratia in labiis tuis—to the justification of the sinner through pure charis, which is no longer comprehensible to the understanding of the world.

Charis as the miracle of grace which encounters us remains to such an extent a mystery that the 'exact science' can scarcely dare approach it. The ancient Stoic, Augustinian and scholastic definition sought to take account of this miracle when it added to the mathematical and rational element (partium convenientia) one which is intentionally vague (cum quadam coloris suavitate). This sweetness of colour, of the teint, as indeed the simple qualities of sight and sound, remain an enigma for the aestheticians of form. But this incomprehensible element is only a pointer, and remains so precisely in its fragility (Solger), since if we take hold of it too roughly, it escapes our grasp; it exists only as a breath of wind that has passed by; it does not remain long with the one who thus receives its favour; it is more remembrance and promise than actual presence, more a spur to memory than a gift, offered to Tantalus and yet at once withdrawn from his grasp and, being thus inaccessible to 'exact scientific method', it can only be interpreted from the point of view of the Being which embraces it. If one element within beauty is a fragment, then this is certainly charis which shines forth only from within the unbridgeable Ontological Difference and is most properly that which primordially blazes forth through this opening. When it is not remembrance of the mystery of Being itself, it causes the person who views it to sink into the helpless melancholy of eros. It is, as Claudel says, the hook with which the angel draws the bleeding heart towards eternity. And so the 'exact science' of the beautiful would be more a science of the guardian angels than a science of men.

The three elements we have discussed—epiphaneia, poiêsis, charis—offer the perspectives from which to discuss a biblical and theological aesthetics.

3. OUR INHERITANCE AND THE CHRISTIAN TASK

A. THE SITE OF GLORY IN METAPHYSICS

1. THE MIRACLE OF BEING AND THE FOURFOLD DISTINCTION

The direction of the meandering historical paths of Western Metaphysics becomes straightforward and simple if we centre the chaotic fragments around the authentic metaphysical question: 'Why is there anything at all and not simply nothing?'. This question is not posed seriously by any 'science' because science always presupposes its subject matter as objectively given thus. But it is also only rarely examined thematically by philosophy or, when thus examined, is not pursued in depth, in that philosophy either begins with description rather than wonder or, if it does begin with wonder, then also with the impulse to answer the astonishing question as to why things should exist at all, from the fact of their existing in such and such a way.

Without doubt the phenomenal world contains on all sides an objective order which is not imposed by man, and thus a beauty; the legitimacy of the premise is repeatedly confirmed for him that there is within Nature a greater objective ordering of things than he had previously recognised. Every theoretical science with a practical application, such as medicine or physics, lives from this perennial assumption which forever proves itself anew. So much is this so, that on this basis philosophy dares to make an ultimate forward leap by projecting a totality of sense upon the totality of the actuality of Being in such a way that now necessity is predicated of the latter. Then Being becomes identical with the necessity to be, and when this identity has been taken up by reason, then there is no longer any space for wonder at the fact that there is something rather than nothing, but at most only for admiration that everything appears so wonderfully and 'beautifully' ordered within the necessity of Being. This is the beauty of the theios kosmos in the late Plato, as earlier in Parmenides and Heraclitus, and again the beauty of the world contained in the Aristotelian noêsis noêseôs, and further still it is the beauty of the world order of Boethius and the School of Chartres and of most of what is conveyed in modern times under the titles 'the classical tradition' and 'philosophy of Spirit'. We can also give this 'beauty' the name 'glory' in so far as the total order of phenomena always remains a boundless limiting concept (as for instance K. Ph. Moritz and Goethe put it) for the lived experience of the finite spirit—which strives towards it as 'eros' and proceeds from it as 'intuition'. But 'glory' which is understood in this way is nothing other than the totality of beauty; its 'superiority' over the individual instances of beauty which we encounter derives only from the fact that the categories of rhythm, polarity, the harmonisation (ἁρμονία) of what is apparently lacking in harmony and misshapen, can as yet only be applied to the totality by way of conjecture (in the devout vision of Erigena and Nicolas of Cusa, or in the titanic vision of Heraclitus and Bruno), where they can be monitored in their individual parts by sight and sound (as in a symphony).

A leap forward like this remains in a tension between piety and titanism: a piety which believes that all in essence is good, even when the rhythm of the world and of existence overwhelms that of man, and a titanism because man imposes his own rhythm upon the totality. And if the leap forward in antiquity remained predominantly 'pious', since man experienced above all the superabundance of the universal καλόν and yielded himself to it, in the modern period it becomes visibly more titanic, because man enforces his own καλόν and its rhythm ever more energetically upon the (material) universe.

But such a forward leap towards apprehension of the identity (of Being and meaning), in the very first step of thought, gets the phenomenon wrong. Wonder at Being is not only the beginning of thought, but—as Heidegger sees—also the permanent element (ἀρχή) in which it moves. But this means—contrary to Heidegger—that it is not only astonishing that an existent being can wonder at Being in its own distinction from Being, but also that Being as such by itself to the very end 'causes wonder', behaving as something to be wondered at, something striking and worthy of wonder. Reflection, while holding fast to this primal wonder, must be the fundamental aim of metaphysics; here we are attempting to approach it in four stages, which witness to a fourfold distinction and which together reveal for the first time that which in the realm of metaphysics deserves the authentic name 'Glory'.

1. The fact that I find myself within the realm of a world and in the boundless community of other existent beings is astonishing beyond measure and cannot be exhaustively explained by any cause which derives from within the world. In surveying Western metaphysics in its entirety, we must be amazed at how little the enigma of reproduction—not only of organic natural creatures but above all of man, who is Spirit—has concerned philosophers. From the infinite prodigality of an act of generation—prodigality in the male as well as the female organism resulting in a 'chance hit'—a 'new' being is created which, reflecting upon its personal ego, cannot interpret itself in any way as a product of chance; for it possesses in fact the capacity to view the world as a whole, indeed Being as a whole, from its unrepeatable perspective and thus to effect a unification of what it sees (Leibniz). Nothing within (world-)Being indicates that this had the 'personal' intention of producing precisely this unique and as such irreplaceable person through that game of chance; there is nothing to prove that this unique person receives a kind of necessary place through his incorporation into a (wholly hypothetical) series of monads, as a number receives its necessity within a totality of a series of numbers. I could imagine (and there is nothing to conflict with this idea) that an infinite number of 'others' could have occupied this 'same' place in the universe instead of me. Why it should have been me, I do not know.

Of course, the child does not awaken into consciousness with this question in its mind. And yet it lies, unacknowledged but alive, in the first opening of its mind's eyes. Its 'I' awakens in the experience of a 'Thou': in its mother's smile through which it learns that it is contained, affirmed and loved in a relationship which is incomprehensively encompassing, already actual, sheltering and nourishing. The body which it snuggles into, a soft, warm and nourishing kiss, is a kiss of love in which it can take shelter because it has been sheltered there a priori. The awakening of its consciousness is a late occurrence, in comparison with this basic mystery of unfathomable depth. It finally sees only what always has been, and can therefore only confirm it. A light which has been perpetually asleep awakens at some point in to an alert and self-knowing light. But it awakens at the love of the Thou, as it has always slept in the womb and on the bosom of the Thou. The experience of being granted entrance into a sheltering and encompassing world is one which for all incipient, developing and mature consciousness cannot be superseded. Therefore it is right that the child should glimpse the Absolute, 'God' (Parzifal, Simplicius), first in its mother, its parents, and that only in a second and a third stage does it have to learn to distinguish the love of God from the love which it has experienced in this way. It can awake only in Paradise or in what Plato depicts as that Heaven which is the contemplation of the Ideas. The fact that it experiences Being (Sein) and human existence (Dasein) (why should it make a distinction between the two?) as the incomprehensible light of grace, is the reason why it engages in play. It could not play if—like a beggar at a marriage feast—it had been allowed to come out of a cold and dark outside by the 'grace' of a condescending mercy into a place to which it had no 'right' (these are later experiences, for those who have become guilty, which remain only parentheses within the totality of human experience). It gives itself to play because the experience of being admitted is the very first thing which it knows in the realm of Being. It is, in so far as it is allowed to take part as an object of love. Existence is both glorious and a matter of course. Everything, without exception, which is to follow later and will inevitably be added to this experience must remain an unfolding of it. There is no 'gravity of life' which would fundamentally surpass this beginning. There is no 'taking over control' of existence which might go further than this first experience of miracle and play. There is no encounter—with a friend or an enemy or with a myriad passers-by—which could add anything to the encounter with the first-comprehended smile of the mother. 'Unless you become as a child, you cannot enter the kingdom of Heaven': this statement is a tautology. The first experience contains what cannot be surpassed, id quo majus cogitari non potest. It is an experience in which distinction slumbers in the unopened unity of the grace of love—at once before and after the tragedy of its dissolution. However it prevails even there, because that which is 'a matter of course' is not the 'de facto' with its constraining and finite narrowness, but the graciously-opened whole in which every space is granted to tumble around as much as one wills: existence as play.

Certainly, the distinction will soon become apparent. There is the compulsion of duty, which leads to a divided will, and there is, definitively in puberty, the tragic opposition of a world which goes its own way and in whose constraints I shall have to find my own place if I desire to exist at all, together with my dream of love and of being 'a child of God', which in the face of this world seems the illusion of a fool; and, for my part, I shall despise and reject the world for the sake of my dream and for the sake of the dream I have of the world. But nevertheless, that first mystery prevails even here; it has only unfolded. Neither my parents nor the whole of the surrounding world are substantially that love to which on the grounds of my being and my consciousness I owe the fact of my being in the world, which is to say both myself and the world. That Angst which Heidegger depicted, in which Being as such disappears for me and with it my sense of self, becomes the methodical way in which to pose the question as to why Being should exist at all.

In any case, for the thinker nothing would be altered in the first metaphysical distinction, even if the generative act were to be performed in a way which is technically more closely guided and planned: determining the 'character' and the 'conduct' does not reach the point of selfhood where the person knows that he is more than the creation of a genus consciousness which is either accidental or which can be regulated in its contingency. And yet I can never conceive of myself as part of the organism of the world in such a way that this organism could not exist and properly function without me. I cannot attribute to myself the dignity of Being and the degree of necessity which the world as a whole possesses. And thus there occurs an opening within me as Spirit to the light-space of Being, which is in no way directed to the Being of the world as a whole: if in the first aspect my spirit 'nihilates' with respect to the Being of the world into which I find myself to be thrown and constrained, then in the second aspect the Being of the world 'nihilates' within the opening of my spirit, which can attribute to the Being of the world no necessity within itself which would excel our wonder at its existence: both are related to each other, but they do not coincide.

2. But in so far as I am one existent among others, in so far as I am Spirit, I now understand that all other existents stand in the same relation to Being as I do myself. It evidently follows from this that, although all existents partake in Being, yet—to whatever extent we were to multiply them—they never exhaust it nor even, as it were, 'broach' it. In their individual finitude as fragments they can indeed form a greater, perhaps somehow even the greatest whole, which however hangs as much in the air (of Being) as a total configuration as do its constituent parts. I can imagine this total configuration to be quantitatively and qualitatively as extended and as perfect as I will, but still it cannot match my most primitive experience of Being, if indeed I were to see in it the unsurpassable abundance of Being: id quo majus cogitari non potest. The nothingness through which all its parts pass does not dissolve within the whole; and on the other hand Being, in which a world totality participates, possesses its own mode of 'nihilating', that is an indissoluble identity with respect to every participation within it (Proclus: amethektôs metekhetai). The Neoplatonists are therefore right when they refuse to identify the 'beauty' of the totality of that which is with the 'glory' of Being itself which prevails beyond it, and who glimpse within the former only a 'reflection' of the latter. And in the same way Thomas Aquinas is right when he attributes to the actus essendi its own bonum-pulchrum in which the individual essentiae and the world which is constituted by them only participate. But if my spirit is conformed to this act of Being in which it participates and also performs the act of thinking (intellectus agens) in the light of this superessential (and thus incomprehensible, or as Rosmini has it, 'idea-like') act of Being in order to grasp what is essential, then it understands at the same time that it is not the act of Being which has the responsibility of bringing essences into existence from itself, just as it is not my intellectus agens (without the conversio ad phantasma) which constructs the real world; not only 'concepts without intuition are empty', but the 'idea' or the 'light' or the 'abundance' of Being remain so too. What this means, once again, is that I cannot appease my primal and overpowering wonder at the fact that 'something is' through gazing at Being, in which those things participate and thus exist. Rather, my wonder is directed at both sides of the Ontological Difference, whether this is construed in Thomist or Heideggerian terms, for the fact that an existent can only become actual through participation in the act of Being points to the complementary antithesis that the fullness of Being attains actuality only in the existent; but the fact that (Heideggerian) Being can only be interpreted within existence (Spirit) points to the complementary antithesis that existence (Spirit) grasps the dependence of Being upon beings and thus its non-substantiality.

3. Precisely by virtue of this dependence (which Thomas, Hegel and Heidegger equally see) of Being upon its explication in the existent (or in the human existent, which is to say man), it is impossible to attribute to Being the responsibility for the essential forms of entities in the world. The indifferentia of the abundance which is characteristic of the Being of the existent fundamentally contradicts any form of planning, located within Being, in order to actualise itself in substance through a specific ascending sequence of stages of essential forms, which contain it first as 'vessels' and then (as Heidegger says) finally shepherd it. For the 'plans' lie in the entity, not in Being, however true it may be that there are no entities which do not participate in Being. Thus all those forms of interpretation must be rejected as 'oblivious of Being' which conceive of the totality of the world-entity-reality as the (self-)explication of Being: whether Being (God) explicates itself statically in a world as the unitive implication of all entities (Plotinus, Nicolas of Cusa, Böhme), or whether Being (God) as the non-subsisting epitome of all entities actualises itself dynamically through a world (Fichte, Hölderlin as philosopher, Schelling, Hegel, the early Soloviev). And correspondingly, the category of 'expression' must be rejected as a precise statement of the relationship between Being which prevails without substance as abundance, and the participating entity; for 'expression' presupposes a responsible decision to express oneself, which Being as such does not make, because it attains such decisiveness only within the existent Spirit. Only in an analogical sense (which however is not considered in the systems mentioned above) can it be said that every form of actuality—whether as individual existent or world totality—expresses something of the fullness of reality (but precisely without the latter's expressing 'itself').

A biological and evolutionary sequence of stages—if there ever could be such a thing as a self-sufficient system—would at best be able to allow the ascent of the individual essential form, say that of a bird, from its preformations in an earlier form, say that of the fish, but it would never be able to derive the inherent necessity of a single perfected essential form in which—in a wholly anti-Kantian manner—pulchritudo and perfectio evidently coincide, from the ends of a total evolution of the whole of life or the whole of Being in movement towards itself. The entities, precisely the sub-intellectual art works of the prakriti, of creative Nature, bear the mark of an unconditionedly original imaginative power to which one must be blind if one—I do not say classifies their forms within the evolutionary process, but explains them entirely on the grounds of their position within this process. To this degree the realm of forms of sub-human Nature remains a singularly illuminating touchstone for the value of a metaphysics: anyone like Descartes and the Materialists, who explains animals in a purely mechanical way has already lost, but so too have those who, like Schelling and Hegel, interpret the forms of Nature as the ways and stages of the Absolute Spirit in search of Itself—or in the more ancient version of Erigena and Nicolas of Cusa—as the Absolute Spirit which explicates Itself. The first approach cannot interpret the glorious freedom of the essential forms, indeed not even the necessity of such forms, while the second does not explain how the Spirit which is still only in search of Itself achieves such perfection which presupposes, not only a luminous intelligence (and not mere unconscious powers of imagination), but a superior and playful freedom beyond all the constraints of Nature; and the third approach again fails to explain why a divine abundance of Being should explicate itself precisely in beetles and butterflies and not also in entirely different, unpredictably various, forms and figures.

Heidegger also offers us no information regarding the underivability of the interrelation between essential form and Being; in his work, sub-human Nature receives as little metaphysical interpretation as it does with the other thinkers named above. Rather, the 'pivot' of Being and of the existent (Sein-Seiendes) receives the whole of its meaning from the pivot of Being and human being (Sein-Dasein: man as shepherd of Being). And this interrelation is then so loaded with meaning that the original question as to why there should be something rather than nothing is finally submerged, and metaphysics must yield its place to a phenomenology of Being in the realm of its distinction. But this priority of Being over human existence does not mean that responsibility for the essential forms (as 'presuppositions' for the 'essence-less' character of human existence) can be attributed to Being. If we close the circle, no matter how, between Being and essence (the existent), then 'glory' as a metaphysical category is lost: it dissolves on the one hand into the beauty of order that prevails within the world (the totality of which then becomes 'explicated' Being), and on the other it is submerged in the necessity of an ineluctable self-explication of Being, governed by no ultimate form of freedom, in order simply to be itself. In both cases, the primal phenomenon is not treated appropriately, and not even the most soaring metaphysical towers can conceal this; and it is something of this failure which is understood by those Materialists who reject such speculative systems as conceptual dreams. But the Materialists themselves fail even more fundamentally to do justice to the primal experience, since they do not in the least want to enquire into why matter should exist at all in the first place.

Within the world, 'expression' remains a category of the 'beautiful' whose radiance and charm easily brings the word 'glorious' (herrlich) to our lips, but which can only inauthentically lay claim to the sense of 'lordship' (herrschaftlich) and 'majesty' (hehr) which inhere within it: in as much, that is, as the 'ground' of a living entity—be it a plant, animal or person—is always 'more' than what is projected on to the phenomenal surface, and this mysterious More can also be read in a mysterious manner from that surface,[1] most supremely in the free spiritual being which, in expressing itself, remains the sovereign capacity (mendaciously) to conceal itself all the while. And yet this is not at all sufficient to characterise the incomprehensible 'freedom' of Being itself, which plays indifferently over all things and is bound to nothing, and on the grounds of which the elevated, sublime (transcendental) radiance of glory is justified, that radiance which streams intangibly through everything which is. Just as Being does not mould everything which is to itself, but lets it be, in the same way all that is must correspondingly allow Being to dwell in its imperturbability, in order that its light should rise over all. To press oneself too closely against Being, as Hölderlin did, is to conceal it further and to confuse it with God Himself. In the space of the distinction which opens up when Being allows us to be and we Being, two things can happen: first, the elevation of Being above us can cause it to appear to us as something which is alien, indifferent and even fearful, and we can be tempted to view it as neutral, value-less, meaningless, and thus to give precedence to non-Being, when the darkening of our human existence in guilt, illness and death, and the horrifying aspects of the existent world as a whole seem to authorise us to pronounce such a curse against Being itself. This fearfulness is no less when we become shudderingly aware of the nameless waste of individual and personal life through the whole, when not only Nature appears as the Calvary of life, but also History as a Golgotha of the Spirit (Hegel), and when man must trample down his own heart in order to justify, against his own self, the World-Spirit which lacerates him. And yet: in the same distance of letting be, Being can appear to us in its glory, for which the relation of expression is now only an image (although the most important one), in a glory which excels in mysterious elevation all the beauty and order of the actual world, although the latter is equally a reflection and an indication of it; possessing a value so infinite and so fundamentally unsurpassable (capable at most of being unfolded) that all lordly 'power' (in the victory over the impotence of what is only-possible), all light (in the victory over the darkness of nothingness), all 'grace' (in the infinite gift of participation) are gathered in it.

---

[1] Cf. Wahrheit I (1942), pp. 233–255.

The Western metaphysical systems of light ultimately opt for the second possibility, a homage to Being which lets Being in its totality be. Virtually the whole of Greek myth and philosophy is bathed in this enfolding light: Homer's gods and men stand in it together, Pindar's victories, Sappho's devotion, high sculpture is bathed in it, Plato's allegory of the cave expresses it, Aristotle's quintessence, the Stoic primal fire, the Plotinian stream of Being. Throughout Greek patristics, throughout Boethius and Erigena, and again the natural philosophies of Grosseteste, Albert, Ulrich, Nicolas of Cusa, Ficino, Descartes, Patrizzi, the Enlightenment (siècle des lumières), Goethe.

But the other, the first possibility of the deepest alienation from Being and darkening of Being can overtake whole epochs; it does so extensively in the period of late antiquity, more tragically in the late Middle Ages, and more fatally still in our own late modernity. It is like a fateful loss of sight which befalls whole generations: the extreme questionability of the existent world distorts our view of encompassing Being, and the primal metaphysical question is no longer asked with regard to the latter, so that the light of Being no longer shines over the world. Too much is demanded of the latter in this case when its own essential light is supposed to suffice for Being as a whole and, since this excessive demand lies clear to view, the forced optimism of the forced worldliness turns perpetually into nihilistic tragedy. The injustice of the world is directly transferred to Being as a whole, which thus itself appears unjust. The scholastic metaphysics which derive from the late Middle Ages and which have achieved only a neutral concept of Being, of which of course the καλόν cannot any more be asserted, no longer form a bulwark against this nihilism.

4. The preceding dimensions of distinction necessarily diverge. I find myself in a world in whose necessity my accidental existence cannot find a place as pars integralis. But all existents are in an analogous situation, since they too—either as fragments or as world-wholes—do not fit into Being as partes integrales. Here a third point comes into view: namely, that Being as a whole or the actuality of all that is actual does not generate from itself the actual entities, for the responsible generation of forms would presuppose a conscious and free spirit. It is therefore impossible to allow, as Heidegger does, the distinction between Being and the existent to be suspended as an ultimate mystery, resting within itself. It is precisely this which points inexorably beyond itself to the fourth and final distinction, which alone provides an answer to the opening question. One's gaze must seek to penetrate beyond the Ontological Difference (which is not far removed from the Thomist distinctio realis in its systematic significance) to the distinction between God and world, in which God is the sole sufficient ground for both Being and the existent in its possession of form. The primal question of the Da-Sein (human existence: 'being-there') which finds itself present proceeds from its own non-necessity, and its counterpart, which is the greater necessity firstly of the world and then that of encompassing Being, does not prove to be strong enough to provide an ultimate foundation for Being, which is thus left suspended, or to overwhelm it by means of integrations (Hegel). It appears rather that the third distinction leaves actual Being just as much, indeed for the first time fully because finally, hanging in the air, as I found myself to be hanging in the air. The consequence is that the grounding in God of this Being which does not depend upon any necessity, points to an ultimate freedom which neither Being (as non-subsistent) could have, nor the existent entity (since it always finds itself as already constituted in its own essentiality). And so on the one hand, the freedom of non-subsisting Being can be secured in its 'glory' in the face of all that exists only if it is grounded in a subsisting freedom of absolute Being, which is God; and so, on the other hand, the dignity of an essential form evades being threatened by the encompassing act of Being and thus being swallowed up and devoured as an invalid 'stage of Being' only if its valid contour can be referred back to a sovereign and absolute imagination or power of creation. If the Ontological Difference must already, as bifurcation, be referred back to a unicum (as Plotinus correctly and definitively saw), then it will be secured as the authentic 'site of glory in metaphysics' in its deepest affirmation of Being under the condition that the 'gloriousness' of its floating in the air, its oscillation, is not hardened into a mathematical necessity (as ultimately happens in Heidegger) but remains the event of an absolute freedom and thus of grace within its open-ended sway, in which each 'pole' has to seek and to find its 'salvation' in the other pole: Being arrives at itself as subsistence only within the entity and the entity arrives at its actuality (and thus at the possibility of its self-generation and perfectio) only within its participation in Being.

And so in what is actual there reigns a mystery beyond fullness and poverty,[2] each of which expresses it accurately but still inadequately. Nothing is richer and fuller than Being in its incomprehensibly glorious and absolute victory over nothingness (Being without this fullness is inconceivable; it would be only spectrally present in the first beginnings of thought), and yet this fullness can unfold absolutely only once: in God. But since there is nothing against which it must assert itself (for nothingness is nothingness), it does not need, holding on to itself, to enclose itself in the casing of an entity in order perhaps to break out from this and communicate itself beyond its borders (which it does not have). Rather, fullness as such is pure power (Nicolas of Cusa: Possest) from whose potency (Macht) all that is potential (das Mögbare) proceeds as rich abundance (das Vermögliche), which is thus pure freedom and, as freedom which does not hold on to itself (or gather itself together into an 'entity'), is also pure gift and love. This mystery of the streaming self-illumination of Being, which was glimpsed by Plato and Plotinus and which alone explains the possibility of a world (that is, the paradoxical existence 'alongside' Infinite Being which fills all things and which stands in need of none), attains its transparency only when, from the sphere of the biblical revelation, absolute freedom (as the spirituality and personality of God) shines in: but not in such a way that the personal God encounters man as one existent marked off from another existent (with the omission of Being; as one could suppose if one were to interpret the Old Testament without recourse to philosophy), but rather in such a way that the personal and free depths of self-giving absolute Being first bring the mystery of Creation, the 'fourth distinction', into the light. God is the Wholly Other only as the Non-Aliud, the Not-Other (Nicolas of Cusa): as He who covers all finite entities with the one mantle of his indivisible Being in so far as they are able to participate in his reality at an infinite remove—as 'entities', which are not Him, but which owe their possibility to His power, and their wealth (to grasp Him as the One who is actual and to shelter in Him) to His creative freedom.

---

[2] For the following see: Ferdinand Ulrich: Homo Abyssus. Das Wagnis der Seinsfrage (1961).

God-given Being is both fullness and poverty at the same time: fullness as Being without limit, poverty modelled ultimately on God Himself, because He knows no holding on to Himself, poverty in the act of Being which is given out, which as gift delivers itself without defence (because here too it does not hold on to itself) to the finite entities. But equally, the created entities are simultaneously fullness and poverty: fullness in the power to shelter and to tend (as 'shepherd of Being') the gift of the fullness of Being within themselves, however 'poor' they may be on account of their limitation, and poverty again in a double sense in as much as the container experiences its inability to scoop out the whole ocean with its small bowl and, instructed by this experience, comprehends the letting-go of Being—as letting-be and letting-stream, handing on further—as the inner fulfilment of the finite entity. Here, through the greater dissimilarity of the finite and the infinite existent, the positive aspect of the analogia entis appears, which makes of the finite the shadow, trace, likeness and image of the Infinite. And not in such a way that the finite 'first' constitutes itself as a 'closed' entity or subject (through the seizing and hoarding of the parcel of actuality which it is able to take into oneself from the stream of finite Being) in order 'then' (and perhaps for the rounding-out of its own perfection) to pass the surplus on. But rather in such a way that the finite, since it is subject, already constitutes itself as such through the letting-be of Being by virtue of an ekstasis out of its own closed self, and therefore through dispossession and poverty becomes capable of salvaging in recognition and affirmation the infinite poverty of the fullness of Being and, within it, that of the God who does not hold on to Himself. Only on this level and in this medium can the event take place which the Bible describes as the process from (God) person to (man) person: predestination, election, vocation, justification, sanctification, glorification (Rom 8, 28–30), for all these are modi of radiant and universal love and have as their basis the breadth of the world's creation as a whole (Rom 8, 18–25) and of its painful (painful for God and for the world) concealment in the mantle of the divine Being which encompasses all things (Rom 8, 26–27).

2. THE THEOLOGICAL A PRIORI ELEMENT IN METAPHYSICS

If in this manner biblical revelation rests on the basis of the primal God-world distinction, and thus on metaphysics, and radiates from this point, then metaphysics correspondingly attains fulfilment in the event of revelation, if it does not want to make a definitive halt at preliminary stages and thus become fatally fixed. The possibility, sketched out above in the third distinction, of a choice in the interpretation of the detachment of Being still remains unresolved. Could the glory of Being which soars above all that exists not be understood in its unsurpassable alienness in another way: as abandonment, instead of simply letting-be? Where is the guarantee that the finite entity is genuinely sheltered in the infinite indifference of Being? And if it experiences the incomprehensible alienness which prevails within the distinction and yet still gives precedence to its encompassing character, must it not then necessarily petition for its own self-elimination and, in so far as this is its concern, also strive for it, as happens in India and in so many areas of Western metaphysics too?

The 'choice' of the interpretation of Being is not something that can be decided by man, because both sides of the choice (which are mutually exclusive) each commend a truth. Both protective accompaniment and uncanny alienation prevail. It is impossible to merge the two into one on the same level (as Heidegger does); one can see from this that metaphysics in itself defies completion and, in the event that it nevertheless wants to attain completion, must make the different levels of the Ontological Difference identical—as we have shown.[3] The confusion is complete if in the end the negations of Negative Theology, the inner-divine mystery of self-outpouring (as basis for the following two aspects), the [3] Cf. above, p. 447.

'noughting' of the communicated fullness of Being in its non-subsistence, and ultimately the kenosis of Christ are partially or wholly equated; thereby the ultimate theologoumenon is totally shorn of its theological character and cannot therefore be fruitful for metaphysics either. There exist at least tendencies towards this in the mysticism of the Rhineland, in Böhme, Hölderlin, Hegel and Heidegger. But such equations absolutise what belongs to the world and reduce God to world. The onset of confusion occurs where the events of historicity between God and man (to which also the event of an alienation of man from God belongs) are equated with the 'event' of the destiny of Being (Heidegger) or with the inner dialectic of the absolute Spirit (Hegel).

But where could metaphysics derive the authority to make a distinction between the levels—essentially those of 'creation' and 'grace'—before the Ground, which releases from Itself both Being and all that is, has manifested Itself as such in a personal and sovereignly free manner? Metaphysics can at most refer back to myth and attempt that hybrid synthesis of the 'unfinishable bridge', which is all the more hybrid in that myth itself persists in indissoluble ambiguity: a spirit-like cry from the depths of Being—or projection of the human personality on to impersonal Being? The claim of metaphysics to critical self-responsibility through reason will necessarily tend towards the latter and will explain man's address from Being as man's address to Being ('eros'). Thus the relationship between 'metaphysics' and still-surviving 'religion' which is not content with a mere transcendence of human longing becomes unclear. But to the extent that it holds to one kind of revelation or other, it alienates from itself the scientistic metaphysics which, as Plato said, tends increasingly to Titanism. Thus this becomes entirely man's own achievement, retrieves eros into itself as man's own potentiality and is no longer essentially distinct from any other science, whereby it effects its own elimination.

In distinction to this, the taking seriously of the address from Being tends in the direction of making the individual myth, as finite myth, transparent to the entire language of Being, which thus does not allow the individual to be submerged in anonymous ordinariness but can draw him out into the hearing of a personal address. This happened most magnificently in Virgil, but it was prefigured in Homer and Pindar, as it was in Greek tragedy. The hero of the Aeneid is pius as one who listens to and obeys his unique and yet universal task (the founding of the Roman empire), and his devotion to this mission is his achieved self-transcendence. In the same way, Alcestis in her self-sacrifice for her lover accepted an opportunity opened to her by God, Pindar's hero conquered in a grace which flowed from Being, the wandering Odysseus followed a path of providence, which he himself could not see, under the guidance of his protective goddess. This particular path has become integral in Aeneas as 'spoken Being' (fatum), containing within itself all the particular utterances of the gods. Virgil recapitulates in this the actual historical fate of the world—beyond the faded possibilities of metaphysics and religion. He unites in his allegorical image what could no longer be fused by the power of thought alone. As a poet, he therefore describes the point at which, without any possible anticipation, God begins to speak from the depths of His own heart.

All the fragments of meaning which inhere in metaphysics are contained in this unforeseeable speech: above all, the first dismayed astonishment at the fact 'that I am', which refuses consolation from any philosophical assertion of its necessity. Then it contains the hovering oscillation of the unbridgeable difference, to which there adheres need as well as glory, poverty as well as the fullness of true reality, and which cannot be grounded anywhere but in an absolute freedom which sanctifies the oscillation as such. And then the other oscillation—comprehensible only within it—between universality and unique personality: every existence in the world, every mission which gives fullness of meaning to a human life, all noetics, ethics and aesthetics. The ineluctable polarity of failure and success, of wound and healing, of sacrifice and happiness which prevails in reality as it is; the deep will to death and self-sacrifice which cannot be outweighed by the simultaneous will to life and self-fulfilment. So much are these concerns of the heart, which have been gained and understood on the basis of the Ontological Difference, contained in the biblical word and forever held open there, that mankind would like above all to appropriate and to interpret this revelation itself as the central projection of his own self-transcending heart. But the word of God prevents this by the unyielding force with which it turns upside-down the person who begins to listen to it. It convicts him first of his disobedience; it makes him responsible for his alienation from God; it imposes upon him an initially quite alien ('positive') commandment and law; it says disconcerting things about him which would otherwise never have occurred to him in his self-reflection. And precisely in this inexorability lies salvation for him, for it is only in this way that it is forcefully impressed upon such a person that 'Another' than himself is concerned about him, and that his famed concern (for himself or for Being) has long been surpassed by the concern which 'Another' bears for him and on his behalf. But the question of which form this concern has desired to take lies quite beyond the realm of metaphysics. We will speak of it in the final volume of this work.

But however at odds revelation may be to all that is foreseeable, and however little it may appear to be the supplying of a missing fragment, it must nevertheless enter into the distinctions as a form of completion: the word of God must be written into the word of Being, the word of Being into the words of creatures which are exchanged as comprehensible words among existent creatures. Thus the distinctions as such are obediently at the disposal of God's revelation. And they are so in so far as the highest distinction (between God and the Being of the existent) is only the oscillation between the giver and the gift, whereby gift signifies the being given (and being received) of the giver. Nothing substantial and subsistent, therefore, but the radiant fullness of God's Being in the condition of its being given to the finite recipient. The scholastics of the Franciscan school tentatively circled around this mystery, nor was it unknown, via the Plotinian and Dionysian tradition, to the Dominicans. The non-subsistence of the actus essendi is the creative medium which suffices for God to utter His kenotic word of the Cross and of glory and to send it as His Son into the world to experience death and resurrection. This word (which brings with itself its own grace) will ultimately be grasped only by those who hold out within the oscillation of distinction and who do not make themselves guilty of the 'essentialisation' (F. Ulrich) of defenceless and radiant Being—an 'essentialisation' which is the death and paralysis of both Being and the word.

To overlook the noughting of Being in favour of essences which with its help attain the power to be, is inevitably to blind oneself to the mysterious shining which inheres within Being: a shining which in its transparency contains the 'flowing light of the Godhead' (Mechthild) and raises the world of finite essences into its brightness. Being itself is 'not the light' but gives 'witness to the light' in so far as it points to it by virtue of its own non-subsistence. When therefore in Western philosophy Being is posited as the horizon of the cosmos, it is itself either understood to be the sphere of the shining (Aristotle) or better, as the 'first emanation' of a light of the 'Good' which prevails beyond Being, as the absolutised self-emanation. Thus the highest distinction is expressed in words which are still accessible to metaphysics at its extreme limits. But here it becomes clear why the pre-eminent spirit-place from which the shining of Being—in its serene elevation beyond all finite essence—becomes visible, has to be that 'poverty of spirit' which is distinguished in the history of metaphysics as ἀπάθεια—detachment or impassivity—and which is demanded by Plato too for his highest degree of eros: varied forms of self-stripping which, though accessible to false kinds of absolutisation are, as the renouncing of one's own self-interested power for the sake of harmonising with Being, also capable of being changed into evangelical poverty. But where the attitude of renunciation hardens to a defence against pain and death—and thus also against love—it becomes self-deception and deprives itself of its sensitivity to the light. Only rarely do metaphysicians entirely escape this danger; but Christianity by its own nature possesses the power and the responsibility of arming the spirit against this kind of abuse of detachment and to disarm the heart so that it becomes purely receptive—even, and precisely, to pain and deprivation. That which is thus received is not anything neutral, or abstract, but is a food which is worthy of the spirit. We can call it the 'word' of Being, if we understand that to be a communication which points beyond all formulated and formulatable speech to the origin of the communication and thus also to the origin of the facility of speech of spiritual beings. It is only necessary to distinguish this speech of Being clearly from all free revelations of the word from the heart of the Godhead, as well as from the free creative speech of existent beings. The communication of Being lies, as we have already seen, simply enclosed in the child's wonder at reality with the first opening of its eyes: in the fact that it is permitted to be in the midst of what exists. This condition of being permitted cannot be surpassed by any additional insight into the laws and necessities of the world. It emerges within the first distinction, communicates itself in the second to all co-existent entities and, in the third, grasps Being itself. Because no existent thing can be deduced by necessity from Being, but nevertheless exists in that it partakes in Being, and because this participation and sharing are two aspects of one and the same incomprehensible (because not able to be grounded within itself) oscillation, therefore the word of Being is itself the permission to be. This is recalled every time man raises his eyes above the pseudo-necessities of his empirical and transcendental activity. It encourages us to believe in an encompassing grace beyond all laws, categories and schematisms. The categorical imperative of Being does not only consider, as does that of Kant, our own human fellow-world upon which the human agent is supposed to impose a law, but it considers Being altogether, since this rises up above every law into grace. In this, it is even more demanding than Kant's system, in which man exists alone and forgetful of Being. Act in such a way, we are now told, as if you yourself, your fellow-man and fellow-object owed your existence to a boundless grace. To a grace in which Being itself bathes in its primal distinction as an emergence both dark and luminous, through which it reveals itself. It is not difficult to see how the language of intellectual beings evolves in descent from this primal word of the world, as the sign of having heard that indication and as its application to the sphere of spiritual freedom, which in speech always opens itself up with grace in its background, while in ascent from it the revelatory Word of God becomes possible, which now first reveals both the foundation for the fact that Being proclaims grace, and where the origin lies of the permission to be.

B. LOVE AS CUSTODIAN OF GLORY

1. THE LIGHT OF BEING AND LOVE

Let us consider again the distinction which opens up in four different ways: for the four phases shown were only the ever greater extension of the same thing which is already present in the first act of consciousness of the awakening child. This first act, journeying towards transcendence, immediately touches the final end: there can be nothing more beyond the love which wakens me and shelters me, and which greets me in the smiling face of my mother. Many things can interfere: incomprehensible departure and abandonment, privation, disappointment, not being understood, pain, death. But all that is only an interpolation. Perhaps it will appear infinite, perhaps interrupted by lightning recollections of the origin: but I have been given a measure for all that is called distance and distinction. However excluded I may be, I remain primally someone who has been permitted entry. And then comes the second insight: we have all been permitted entry. Our mother too. And the animals with which I play. There is much that is real, and yet Being overarches everything, sublime and serene; nothing of all this had to be as it is. Everything stands in an open light which is greater and more glorious than the essence of this world with all its terror and beauty. Thus there is the third point: what would happen to this light if none of us existed to see it? Does it stand in need of us? No, I, all of us, are 'accidental' with respect to it. Taken altogether, we are not a sufficient explication of being; it is free to manifest itself in an infinite number of other ways and to be a light for an infinite number of other entities. Nevertheless: what would light be if there were no one to see it? Are we then both necessary to one another: Being to existents and existents to Being? Do we both experience the process of noughting? Is the permission to be, the being given entry, a beginning both for me and for Being? Does it become glorious only by virtue of its being in need? Is it serene only because it has been given entry—into us? Do we then both hover in oscillation, and is this hovering that which has been freed, which is unconditioned? But how can this double dependence, and so mutual conditionedness, produce an Absolute? And so gingerly, almost against our will, we must posit the fourth opening of distinction: beyond the still conditioned, mutually dependent freedom of the existent with regard to Being and the freedom of Being to shine unconstrainedly as a light within the existent: an unconditioned freedom, or one which is at most one which is conditioned through itself, and which is untouched by nothingness, an actus purus, which is posited in the first instance only in order to preserve the light of openness between Being and the existent as a free and unconstrained light so that the individual entity is not submerged within the exigencies of a process of explication and Being does not lose its freedom in the same 'Odyssey' of its cosmic evolution towards itself. Otherwise the primal experience of the child is false and is contradicted by the ingenuity of adulthood and the wisdom of metaphysics. But if the most precious thing which must be preserved in Being can only be preserved by God, viz. its miraculous and glorious character, then must not God be pre-eminently the guardian and the shepherd of this glory: in direct contradiction to what the finite spirit imagines as necessity and absoluteness? And then is not that which we experience in the contingent and dualistic nature of the world as possessing the greatest beauty, that oscillation which is wholly unconstrained, both within itself and to others, which comprehends and grounds all justified and satisfying necessities, incomprehensibly, that which we find again, new and different, in God? If He creates the world without constraint and imparts to it, with its unconstraining unconstrainedness, something of the manner of His freedom and sovereign power of gift, and if this bestowing freedom deserves no name but love: then from what other ground could God 'be' than 'from' love? Any attempt other than this to approach the 'Absolute' beyond the Ontological Difference would have to ascribe less to the Absolute than to what derives from it.

The fundamental metaphysical act is love within the Ontological Difference (that is, the third distinction, which includes the first two within itself); the fundamental Christian act is love within the God-world distinction (than is, the fourth, which contains the first three within itself): in each case love means here the total human act which comprehends the totality of mind and body and, in particular, percipient intelligence. As metaphysical intelligence, it perceives the relation of the existent and Being which defies formulation and, as Christian intelligence, it perceives God's free word of absolute love which utters itself as a medium within this relation. But we must guard here against both false distinctions and false equations. We are following the right path when we genuinely locate the metaphysical act within the Ontological Difference—even if it naturally points to God as its depths—and understand the Christian act as a new response to the new word of God which, of course, contains the metaphysical act within itself and, beyond that, contributes also to its fulfilment. It is necessary to elucidate this once again by running briefly through the history of metaphysics. In distinction to the intellectual limitations and impoverishments of present metaphysical thinking, this must above all be a history of metaphysical love. In distinction to all the reductions of the metaphysical act, it is however necessary to pay attention at every point to the distinguishing of the degrees of distinction in order to unmask confusions and over-simplifications.

In Homer, the distinction arises elementally between those who are self-luminous (gods) and those who stand in the light (men); the self-luminous gods are at the same time both elevated and unconcerned, and illumining and involved in events, while those who receive their light become their true selves (heroes) the more they go beyond themselves (becoming ek-sistent) into the divine light through a posture which is prayerful and trusting. The light is common and reciprocal, and the darkness which it encloses (moira), though remaining unillumined, is also affirmed.

In the Tragedians, the distinction is affirmed in a similarly elemental way, but for man, in the radicality of his exposure, the light turns to darkness: the moira-darkness is assumed into the will of the gods and his luminous ek-sistence is experienced as the extreme form of unshielded vulnerability. But whatever the outcome of this encounter may be, man's salvation or his downfall, it is at any rate affirmed (tragedy is liturgy), and the ultimate self-sacrifice of man is reckoned in the statement of affirmation.

In the case of Pindar, the unity (identity) of the affirmed distinction is attained in the high-point of the agôn: the grace of the gods and the achievement of men coincide in the 'victory'. The first philosophers, for their part, pursue the unity of the distinction in proud soarings: Heraclitus when he includes the dark remainder within the law of harmony of the Logos, Parmenides when he eliminates the darkness of distinction as the non-existent; both do so in order to be able to utter a whole-hearted Yes and Amen to Being. The Pythagoreans appropriate the whole for themselves by numbers, in which quantity and quality harmonise.

By means of his questioning, Socrates keeps the distinction open and dies on account of his love for the immalleability of truth; Plato also holds it open in his chôrismos (the division between idea and thing) and stretches between them the eros which, bearing within itself the source (identity) as recollection, yearns for wisdom (philo-sophia). On the other hand, comprehending reason (ἐπιστήμη) discovers that the Being which is visible to our eyes is itself inwardly permeated with nothingness (dialectic). The final form (in the Timaeus) becomes indecipherable: eros is fulfilled in full affirmation within the perfect and rounded universe (which comprehends both gods and men), whose grounding through the Demiurge in accordance with the ideas can be narrated only in a 'sacred language of images' (myth). And only from its margins does the aroused eros of the entire universe become visible in Aristotle as all-grounding and self-reflecting mind together with man's participation from outside in Spirit (θύραθεν). But God, the universe which circles upon itself (κυκλοφορία), and the encompassing Being (οὐσία) together indivisibly form the object of metaphysics, and the second, third and fourth distinctions merge into one another. Not until Plotinus does the light arise afresh in greatness, since here the Spirit (the world of the ideas) is moved in a hitherto unheard-of manner by the eros of a yearning which is both needy and not needy: towards the Inconceivable, the Unique and the Good, which is the primal source of all beauty, although it does not itself even 'deign to be beautiful'. Here thought and love are one, and both are the light of the world, although this light breaks forth from an inaccessible place, which as a fathomless ground and source is a non-light or a darkness or a superabundant light. It is true that here Being is equated with thought, but both exist by the grace of the One, both too, in so far as they are eros-like, are permeated by nothingness (the doctrine of intelligible matter), and only in this way are both the ground which generates what exists as 'soul' and 'nature'.

Just as with Homer and the Tragedians love within the distinction was a metaphysical love which was in no way erotic in the sexual sense, and in Plato eros (of the homosexual and then also the heterosexual kind) was also only an image of the metaphysical eros, in the same way amor in Virgil becomes light which discloses Being; boyishly tremulous in the Eclogues, of manly solidity in the Georgics, pan-historically open in the Aeneid—love here as the pure ek-sistence of man in his obedience to fate, but also as the guiding, gracious, accompanying destiny itself (Zeus, Venus as the voices of Being) in the face of an all-contradicting fate (Juno).

It is Augustine[4] who takes over the metaphysics of Being-Light and the metaphysical Knowledge-Love into Christianity and who determines it more profoundly than does Plotinus by the (evangelical) decision of man for or against the light in which absolute love prevails. The light in which our spirit sees and thinks is not directly God, but even less is it the natural light which the creature possesses; rather, it is truth which holds sway as the openness of God, in accordance with which it thinks in orientation towards God an, in turning from which, it loses God. And this turning towards or away is determined by the claims of love and by man's response to them. After Augustine, and without renouncing his direction, the metaphysics of Being is conditioned by the paradoxes of the Areopagite: God revealed in the world as He who is concealed. The light in the world (which is the distinction between the archai and the existent) is the light of the divine eros towards the human eros, but it points as a whole towards the mystery of the more than radiant darkness. This holds also for Gregory the Great. It is critically important that those philosophies which work with the model of the God-world relation of implication and explication (Erigena, Nicolas of Cusa) also fully adopt that paradox and thus escape idealist rationalism, for which the implication (God) will be comprehensible, or even in an evolutionary way constructable, on the basis of the explication. In this way, they preserve space for love and also for that all-grounding awe which characterises above all the love of the founders: Benedict, Francis and Ignatius. If the scheme of interpretation of metaphysical love is determined by the eros of the ancients to such an extent that the Victorines do not in essence distinguish it in structural terms from agape, then eros from Augustine on is seen as desiderium, i.e., as all that is contrary to a love which victoriously takes possession, rather a love which powerlessly and longingly yearns and which disposes itself for the reception of free grace. As such, it also permeates the first ontological attempts to construe Being and the existent itself as gift: this is what we find in Boethius and Cassiodorus, for whom all the beauty of the world is received in prayerful thanksgiving as love which flows from the Godhead, in John Erigena in his distinction between datio (the gift of Being and substance) and donatio (the gift of the participation of the existent in the wealth of Being), in Chartres and in Gilbert, and even more so in Alexander of Hales, for whom the existent is understood as pure ('material') indefiniteness for the progressive endowments of Being, as in the doctrine of the real distinction of Thomas, in the ontology of Eckhart and from this point on within the whole spiritual family which was summed up in the 'Metaphysics of the [4] Cf. Vol. II, pp. 95–143 (Eng. trans.).

---

Saints'. It is within this context that we must place the medieval metaphysics of light, which only rarely makes the mistake of understanding Being itself (divine or worldly) to be substantial light (Adam of Paris), but which either sees the highest analogy to God in the worldly light with its power of revelation (manifestabilitas), as do Grosseteste, Bonaventure and Albert, or alternatively interprets the stages of the world's Being from the point of view of God as the streaming superabundance of light: Areopagitically above all as the potency of a loving reception (contemplation) and a loving flowing-on (action). And so even in the brightest of these doctrines of love, the dimension of the Dionysian darkness is never absent, neither in the Franciscan line (where love still presses on into that darkness of God where reason can no longer follow), nor in the Dominican school (since in Thomas negative theology takes precedence throughout).

A kind of testing of metaphysical love came with the epochal darkening of the fourteenth century: here there is a parting of the ways. The philosophers strain and storm nominalistically and shatter the web of the world dialectically, while the lovers surrender themselves to the night and discover the existential form of detachment (Gelassenheit). This presupposes that man is disposed, as in the literary tragedies of antiquity and in part the Stoa, to see even the night as a light (unseen, but therefore only all the more profound). It has to be admitted that here in most places the distinctions that pertain within the ontological distinctions are effaced, not only when Being is straightforwardly equated with God, but already when Being (as the first archê from God: Dionysius) is interpreted according to the Platonic analogy of the sun as the pure 'flowing light of the Godhead' (Mechthild, but also early Augustinian scholasticism) and thus the non-subsistence of the actus essendi is dissolved to the point of nothingness, and again when subjectivity is construed as pure (mystical) openness in the sense of a receptivity without any spontaneous act of one's own. Thomas erected a first wall here with his clear distinction between God and Being, but also with his doctrine of the spontaneity of the spirit, precisely in order that this can become 'quodammodo omnia'; Ignatius again had to stress this spontaneity so that the fundamental human act of a loving preference for the elective will of God becomes possible. Thus we see that the express sighting of the third distinction (before the fourth one) in Thomas with his unlimited esse also highlights the positivity of essentia as limitatio and capacitas receptionis, supremely as the individual uniqueness of existence as spirit, underivable as form from esse alone and, like the latter, pointing back directly to the eternal ground. And thus also with Ignatius the individually unique decision-making freedom of the person is underivable from the 'freedom' of Being which is unattached to any entity or world; rather, it refers back to the eternally decisive freedom of the divine ground (Kant, Fichte, Schelling). It is in Thomas that the problem between Being and God first arises with this clarity, the problem between the active spontaneity of the human spirit (acting in wisdom) and the contemplative receptivity of the same spirit towards divine wisdom (perhaps mediated by the Church) which, even considered purely metaphysically, can lead to acts of folly. Folly no longer as mere acts of penance for the love of God and Christ, folly also no longer as the pure passivity of reason towards God (with the exclusion of all one's own thoughts), but folly as the conscious and loving preference for the unlimited and sovereign will of God, beyond all the spiritual harmony of the cosmos of the cardinal virtues.

These two distinctions conflict with the over-simplifications of the modern period, which must lead of necessity to the loss of the metaphysical act. The rediscovery of antiquity (Renaissance) meant two things: taking the world seriously in the face of a spiritualistic flight from the world, and taking the piety of the world seriously (natural religion) in the face of an over-positivisation of religion in biblical faith. But the pious metaphysical eros of Ficino founders as it becomes a primarily sexual one which already in Gottfried of Strassburg and later in Bruno usurps the place of the Christian and metaphysical eros, or goes no further than the universe (Goethe) or else is submerged within itself in an inauthentic melancholia (from Petrarchism to Leopardi and Pre-Raphaelism). But wherever love no longer seconds the encompassing metaphysical act, it collapses sceptically and agnostically within itself and limits itself to what is found within the world: the dimension of glory is lost within that of beauty. Heidegger represents an attempt to retrieve the classical and Christian form of metaphysical love, as detached readiness for the call of Being; but this attempt must fail, because he projects the fourth distinction into the second and thus turns the oscillation of Being and human existence, which should remain open and pointing beyond itself, into the fixed and indissoluble form of a sphinx, before which and for which man cannot live and love. Hermias (in Aristotle's hymn) dies for the sake of truth: but who would want to die for Being?

The other line, that of the philosophy of Spirit and later of transcendental philosophy, develops more catastrophically: here in a first phase (from Descartes to Leibniz and Malebranche) Being is left out of the picture in a pseudo-Augustinian aprioristic immediacy of relation between God and Spirit, and the metaphysical act is bound up with a somehow mystical love of God. This forgetfulness of Being takes its revenge as the loss of Being in Kant, in whom the pious immediacy of relation with God survives only in the moral and autonomous self-appropriation of the will, becoming then, inevitably, a Titanic immediacy of relation between God and the formal Self (the first philosophy of Fichte), which in its inner infinity appropriates the divine point of view for itself through the world. Thus not only does 'glory' collapse into the beauty of the world, but it becomes the prayerless self-glorification of the Spirit, which takes not only itself but also all that remains to it under its own control. With this, metaphysics comes to an end and, at the same time, all metaphysical love. There remain at best the substitute forms of a love within the world and a love among men. And because the former must be increasingly dissolved within the latter, as man himself takes control of the world, for which a transcendental and evolutionistic philosophy furnishes the justification to salve his conscience; because he himself has the world in and beneath himself, there remains for him—like the last of his emergency rations—only love among men.

From Feuerbach and Marx onwards, this interpersonal love has the choice either of understanding itself to be the Absolute within the world, as 'God', for which all else can be sacrificed and consumed as material, or, if that is to be debunked as a mystical utopia, to dissolve itself within the process (as in Hegel) in order itself to become material which has been sacrificed to the—no less utopian—future goal of the greatest 'happiness' of the greatest number of people. A highly problematical form of 'happiness' which can be evaluated even now, weighed in the scales and found to be wanting, and to which I am supposed to subordinate the whole of my being-permitted-to-be as a means to an end. If I am no more than a means, then so too is the Thou whom I love, and then we can give nothing to each other by way of grace, since neither of us is unique as an entity nor, as existents, have we really been permitted to be. This means that there is no gleam of glory surrounding personal love any more, or at most the deceptive illusion of one, which lovers are always supposed to see through in a melancholy or cynical way—for the glory of love can flourish only within the context of an at least intuited glory of Being. Where personal love has been debased and reduced to the status of being a machine-part in an either transcendental, biological and evolutionistic or materialistic process, then no other value can compensate for this loss, human existence itself lacks all radiance and meaning, and there is no longer any reason why it should be better that something exist rather than simply nothing at all. What kind of gift can the other person be for me? Within the transcendental system he is essentially no different from myself: one aspect of the absolute subject; what he is in 'empirical' and 'psychological' terms is provisional and accidental and certainly undeserving of any absolute commitment. Within the biological and evolutionistic system, he is a fertile (and fertilisable) cell within the whole organism, who can enjoy only a prospective intuition of an invisible evolutionary goal; all human life thus becomes animal life. Within the materialistic and economic process, both my consciousness and yours remain a material product which is in principle constructable by technical means and which can be transformed at will and made into something else, into something which is sub-, super- or near-human, so that there is nothing better for consciousness to do than to ready itself from the outset for its own self-elimination in every possible manageable direction. Every form of metaphysics, therefore, which withdraws the light of Being from man in order to locate the light in its entirety within his self ceases of itself to be metaphysics and becomes 'science' which takes control of (manifest) existence. At the same time, Being and love are extinguished, for the philosophical act lives from both.

2. THE CHRISTIAN CONTRIBUTION TO METAPHYSICS

A Christian has to conduct philosophical enquiry on account of his faith. Believing in the absolute love of God for the world, he is obliged to understand Being in its ontological difference as pointing to love, and to live in accordance with this indication. As suggested above, the mystery of the fact that anything exists at all becomes for him yet more profound and in the most comprehensive sense more worthy of enquiry than it does for any other kind of philosopher. For every philosopher searches Being for a particular—albeit uncomprehended—ground which is presupposed within it. Thus the question as to Why becomes one as to What—τί τὸ ὄν or τὸ εἶναι—and thus leads openly (Aristotle) or hiddenly (Heidegger) to an essentialisation of Being. The Christian must deny Being an ultimate necessity and thus allow it to hover in the unheard of oscillation of not-having-to-be if he is to avoid the perilous path of a Leibnizean philosophy of Spirit which would deduce it, even as something created, out of God (whose freedom is love and therefore wills to communicate itself and whose will, being rational, must create the best of all possible worlds, which is the world as it actually exists). In this case the world would acquire the same necessity as God; God would lose his absolute rule over it and human reason, having raised itself to the level of absolute calculation, would combine its own glory with that of God, thus dethroning the latter.

The Christian remains the guardian of that metaphysical wonderment which is the point of origin for philosophy and the continuation of which is the basis of its further existence. Wonderment is constantly on the point of turning into a marvelling at the beauty of existence as a whole, of that order and orderliness of what is already 'adorned' and 'equipped' (κόσμος), and which the individual sciences are only too keen to enquire into. Plato himself seems finally to have lost the sense of wonder (Verwunderung) and to have acquired instead a sense of admiration (Bewunderung), and thus the way was open that led from metaphysics to the cosmology of the platonic school and that of Aristotle. The sciences now soar proudly aloft in their joy of intellectual discovery, their admiration turning now to the already achieved stock of order within existence and now to the presumed stock of order which is as yet unascertained. But this elevated feeling is not love. Love loves Being in an a priori way, for it knows that no science will ever track down the ground of why something exists rather than nothing at all. It receives it as a free gift and replies with free gratitude. Here that light weaves which is the source of all authentic images and cyphers together with the 'sacred words of origin' and thus also of all art which remains close to the origin. Here that metaphysical glory prevails which is higher than and prior to the perception of worldly beauty. It is right to understand eros and beauty as ordered to each other; it is true that it is for the sake of union that Nature adorns herself and that it is eros which makes the eye perceive as attractive that which has been thus adorned. But this play is governed by intentions, and if love were nothing but that, then Nature could still be Goethe's 'ruminating monster', or Hegel's 'horror which consumes its own formations'. The metaphysical eros prevails at a higher and earlier level, and it is ordered not to beauty but to glory. This is surely what Angelus Silesius' Cherubic Wanderer means when he says:

> Beauty comes from love, and even the countenance of >   God
> Takes from her its beauty, or it would not shine.

Viewed from this elevated perspective, the aesthetic argument of theodicy, which we have encountered so often in the second volume (Augustine, Bonaventure) and in the present one (Plato, Boethius, Leibniz, Goethe, Hegel, etc.), and which has been understood in the main to belong to the 'lower' level of aesthetics, in accordance with its own formulation, acquires a deeper and more fitting significance: the beauty and the terror of this world complement each other like light and darkness in a perfect picture and on account of its total beauty God is justified even as the creator of such a world. But this idea becomes tasteless when it is the language of a contemplation which merely observes for its own satisfaction, in the face for instance of the suffering of this world. And when it is used by Christian thinkers in order to justify eternal damnation, it is wholly intolerable. And yet it has a shattering grandeur when it is the language of a lover who wishes to perceive the reflected glory of the first miracle in all Being's forms, even the most wretched and hideous, or even to believe it to be present. The Greeks, who found a place for Tragedy within their Weltbild, were of this mind, as was Virgil in his Georgics. But above all it is Christians who are required to adopt this perspective. And they are so on the basis of the special word of God in Jesus Christ, which lays down that the preferred place for the manifestation of God's love and thus for His emergent glory is precisely those areas of darkness which seem to fall out of every aesthetic contemplation. Areas of darkness which are otherwise excluded from any aesthetic view of the world (and thus prove the limitations of these views), or which lead the observer to look with stony gaze at Nature and Being, themselves hard as stone, and which now become precisely the critical touchstones of love and glory: both of the love of God which glorifies itself even and especially when it shows its light in the darkness, and also of the love of man, which then corresponds to this aesthetics of God's glory in so far as it recognises God's love there in its highest glory and worships it accordingly.

The Christians of today, living in a night which is deeper than that of the later Middle Ages, are given the task of performing the act of affirming Being, unperturbed by the darkness and the distortion, in a way that is vicarious and representative for all humanity: an act which is at first theological, but which contains within itself the whole dimension of the metaphysical act of the affirmation of Being. Those who are directed in this way to pray continually, to find God in all things and to glorify Him are able to do so on particular grounds (that is particular graces) which allow them to perform their 'creaturely duty' (as Ruysbroeck, Bérulle and Condren understood it). But in so far as they are to shine 'like the stars in the sky', they are also entrusted with the task of bringing light to those areas of Being which are in darkness so that its primal light may shine anew not only upon them but also upon the whole world; for it is only in this light that man can walk in accordance with what he is truly called to be.

The way for the Christian to perform this task successfully is clear from what is most deeply his own inheritance. If on account of their advancing blindness to the light of Being men and women have lost the treasure of love with the exception of those inalienable 'emergency rations' of interpersonal relations (as the last source of warmth in an area of cold), then the Christian is truest to his calling when he finds himself in the presence of this poorest and smallest area of love's manifestation. His duty is to experience the presence of absolute love, and himself to actualise it, and to make it visible, within his love for his neighbour; it is his task to effect the miracle of the multiplication of the loaves precisely out of this poverty ('What is that for so many?'). His faith teaches him to see within the most seemingly unimportant interpersonal relation the making present and the 'sacrament' of the eternal I-Thou relation which is the ground of the free Creation and again the reason why God the Father yields His Son to the death of darkness for the salvation of every Thou. The Christian love for our neighbour is therefore something quite distinct from a good and morally upright model for interpersonal conduct; it occurs always as the focal point, as the demonstration (Erweis) and realisation (Vorweis) of a love which itself wholly transcends man, and thus also as an indicator (Verweis) to that love which man cannot appropriate for himself as it has long since shown itself to him to be that which is ever greater than himself. A Christian encounters his fellow-man in grace and in each task of this love which is given both to him and to the brother who meets him, and under the pre-condition of its absolute radiance; it is not he who lifts his brother titanically out of the darkness by the strength of his own power of love; even in full-blown and active engagement (such as that of the Samaritan) he only testifies to the light, as Christ Himself, the Son of the Father to whom the light was given as His own, wanted in all His radiance only to testify to the Father. If the Christian therefore were to give definitively the love he has for his fellow men the character of a purely interpersonal (even if humanly perfect) love, then he would be acting counter to the command to allow his light to shine forth so that people may glorify God (Matt 5.16), and would rather be hiding his light under the bushel. The love which he concentrates like a light through a lens in his encounter with his brother comes from a place infinitely beyond the individual Christian and it reaches therefore infinitely beyond the limited reality of the present situation. He can only prove himself to be a friend of this light by showing that he is its servant. For it is not I who died for this brother, but he who is Lord of us both; and this representative death in love, which has already removed the resistance and the darkness of the brother, has long since been present for him, before I met him. 'Before Philip called you . . .'

What thus authenticates and points the way forward for the Christian is his faith. Whoever believes accepts a light of salvation which shines for him a priori from beyond the limits of pure reason and towards whose glory he is orientated receptively and attentively, seeing and hearing, which is to say 'contemplatively', in a primal break-through. It was not practical reason and its activity which existed in the beginning but the gift that comes from grace. This is the insight which Fichte, transcending Kant and his own titanism, struggled successfully to achieve. The 'destiny' (Bestimmung) of man really is his 'being-determined' (Be-stimmung), and it is precisely here that the mystery of freedom has its primal seat. And so the Christian faith unveils the metaphysical dimension—without being identified with it. But it is impossible that this determination as the act of the living God should not at the same time reveal the metaphysical dimension. It is the Christian mystery between 'contemplation' and 'action', or rather between being absolutely determined by God and the absolute appropriation of our own nature in freedom, which decisively illuminates the horizon of Being and of humanity who live within it. This fundamental metaphysical mystery can be perceived only within the Ontological Difference, because in the systems of identity the ('perfect') man necessarily coincides with the 'will of God'. Fichte glimpses the mystery for which he allows a place between primal life (Ur-Leben) and the Self. Heidegger sees it too in his own way, which approaches the philosophy of Zen. But for the Christian it is even more luminous, for in the 'Holy Spirit' he can through self-denial open up his own will to that of God. It was towards this passivity, which is the basis for all forms of active appropriation of our own destiny, that the entire 'metaphysics of the saints' was orientated; in their openness the great 'fools' were wiser than the teachers of wisdom, with their closed minds. Christianity casts a mercilessly clear and sober light upon this most inward point; it demands not only detachment from all that is (as did the Stoa), but also detachment from Being from which the primal words and the primal commands spring; and fresh forms of detachment are always needed since God remains free to alter, to develop, to apply and to deepen old commands anew in an unexpected, unhoped-for and unforeseen way. All the maturity of self-appropriation retains here its fertile womb. Whoever does not wish to root himself in detachment is already cut down and desiccated. This fundamental mystery of existence exposes the character of Christian existence. This is the meaning of Christ's command to leave all and to hate all. There is no 'world-task' of man, in particular of 'modern man', which has the right to uproot him from this ground or demand that he give it up. There is no form of worldly wealth which removes from him his poverty in Being. There is no kind of mastery over Nature which belongs to his destiny, that may or can tear him away from the glory in which alone he finds the measure of beauty without losing sight of himself in the context of the whole.

The encompassing glory gives the Christian a freedom with regard to the beauty of the world. In so far as the encounter with the brother (and with him with the whole surrounding world as it is) takes place in the light of eternal love, guilt and wrongfulness have a quite different appearance for him (that is as sin) than they have for someone who has a priori balanced all things out aesthetically in a rhythmic law of beauty. For the Christian, it is impossible to view sin in any way other than against the background of the eternal love which dies for it. This is sobering; it breaks the wings of the 'cosmogonic eros', but also those of the 'phenomenology of the Spirit' in which guilt is at most compensated for by fate but sin is never eliminated (aufheben). Since sin is visible only for the eye of love, it is only in the gaze of this eye that it can be drawn through the act of love into the glory of love which comprehends all things. Translating this greater glory into the terms of the laws of a beauty of this world can be a sign of blindness to value (and to its lack). In this way the καλόν is transposed by the Christian mystery—precisely because of its recognition of the metaphysical dimension—into the ultimate sphere which is its due; and is thereby fulfilled in so far as its true premisses are uncovered, and it is negated in so far as its finite aspects emerge, in which it expels from itself what is unlovely. But this, in the Christian approach, becomes precisely the place chosen for the manifestation of the all-encompassing glory of love. We shall return to this theme in our final volume.

It is from this point of view that the responsibility for developing a comprehensive and contemporary metaphysics falls to the Christian. This task seems to be made more difficult by the fact that the form of modern life is clearly influenced by the onesidedness of a metaphysics which has forgotten Being (with which the Christians too have collaborated, not without incurring blame). But it also appears to be made easier by virtue of the fact that this metaphysics has brought its hidden premisses out into the light of day during this, its final phase, and that the impoverishment of the times offers the responsibility and the opportunity to the Christians to yield to their own concept of poverty and thus authentically to develop the true glory from within it. Humanity today is struggling with the material world in order to master it. That is one part of their destiny, which by the ways of metaphysics is given an appearance of wholeness; through the logical materialisation of the concrete, through the removal of God from the classical vision of Being, through the titanic verticalisation of Spirit into the essence of world and also that of Being. Thus according to Hegel's logic, man himself becomes the slave of what he sought to master: matter and the machine. He frees himself from this antithesis and so finds his true destiny (as master of Nature) only by examining again the ground of this mastery, which certainly cannot be secured by unphilosophical theories of evolution (which want to encourage him to endure the present drudgery because things will improve at some later date), but only by a present act of elevation as ek-sistence within the Ontological Difference. In his consideration of the Difference, it becomes immediately clear to him that no possible evolution can surpass it nor even touch it, that no asymptotic approaches of the existent to Being are possible, and that thus no concept of human (individual or collective) wholeness can be constructed from the function of a mastery and domination of the world.[5] If this has been proven not to be the case by an authentic metaphysics, then at the same time the positive side also emerges, which is that of a greater horizon of freedom—in orientation to Being as a whole—and also that distance to his work is given to man without which it cannot ever become masterful. And it is only a distorted, that is partial, metaphysical perspective which prevents him from seeing this, in that it makes him believe that the classical contemplative vision of the θεῖον within the order of the universe was only possible because it was an ontic rather than a transcendental orientation to existence; and for the latter precisely the subhuman is nothing other than a component element within man himself who thereby, in knowing Nature and controlling it, in essence only knows and controls himself. But if man who exists is not Being itself (or indeed God), then it remains no less worthy of wonder for him than it was for the Greeks that this whole reality of Nature was given to him as a prior basis (for he was not himself there, as God tells Job), and so there is no reason why the harmonious laws of Nature into which he has gained a much more profound insight should not make existence as a whole yet more theophanous for him. It is therefore a superficial reasoning which seeks to make the transition from a natural culture (of farmers and shepherds) to a technical one responsible for the fundamental loss of piety. The former possessed a horizon of Being which was restricted to the surrounding world of Nature, which today has to be broadened to its true—and in man infinitely widened—dimensions.

---

[5] Cf. my Das Ganze im Fragment (1963).

And so what we are truly concerned with here is a new integration in which Christians must lead the way, an integration of the service of the world into the all-embracing openness of man to Being. 'Service' would mean the responsibility for a destiny whose dimensions lie with Being, which disposes and determines. 'You cannot serve two masters', and so one of them, the service of the world, must take its measure from the other, which itself has no measure (being 'indifferent'). For a man can give himself fully only once. But his gift of self is a response, to the one who is the ground of his being-permitted-to-be; to him who ultimately wants from man not things and objects but his very self. Fili, praebe mihi cor tuum. However perfect things may be, man will never improve his heart through them; the world will only be filled with love by making ultimate decisions for love, and never through the ameliorations of technology. Only within the Ontological Difference does the irreducible mystery of fullness and nothingness emerge, as we have seen, and thus an uneliminable use-lessness (Vergeblichkeit) of all (human) existence, which can experience the gratuité of absolute Being only when it has made this vanité of its own. It is use-less (vergeblich), and so it can be forgiven (so kann es ihm vergeben werden), and so forgiveness is possible (es kann vergeben werden). And only then can it too speak with the absolute word: 'As we forgive those . . .'

All this will, of course, prove a hard test for Christians; if they want to be the teachers of our times, then they must learn to read the signs of our times. This age cannot be purified by fire if Christians are not ready to allow themselves to be tested in the same fire to see whether they are made of gold or of potash, whether their hearts and their work are of 'gold, silver and precious stones' or of 'wood, hay and straw' (1 Cor 3, 13). This is the ultimate truth: that Christians, as guardians of a metaphysics of the whole person in an age which has forgotten both Being and God, are entrusted with the weighty responsibility of leading this metaphysics of wholeness through that same fire. But metaphysics is not a ware which can be bought and sold ready-made: we must ourselves think. And if the Christian is brought by Christ to a place of ultimate and profound decision ('Whoever is not for me, is against me'), then as a serious thinker he is brought to the same point of decision, for there is no 'neutral' metaphysics. Either one sees the mystery of the ultimate oscillation or one does not, and becomes blind. It is in no way a question of facilitating or sparing oneself thought on the basis of a theology that one already knows, and then of juggling with systems ab extra. This has often been the view of Christians, who have donned and stripped off metaphysics like a form of outer clothing; and this has been the cause of part of the historical tragedy. But Christians cannot divide their decision any more than they can their gift of self: as Christians they are always human beings and thus entities who are determined by the metaphysical act. They can only adequately answer God's universal engagement with the world in the love of Jesus Christ for them by lending their own love, in the concretissimum of the encounter with their brother, that universal breadth of Being which—consciously or not, explicitly or not—the metaphysical act possesses and is. If they are called to be the guardians of thought, then they will note the extent to which pre-Christian thought in all its complexity preserved an advent-like openness of the coming of something greater than itself by which it could be determined, and how much post-Christian thought, whether it will or not, has been determined by that which is greater than itself. The Christian sees this but does not become arrogant. As a man among men, he is involved with the destiny of all. It would give rise to a false idea which would be difficult to dispel if we were to say that the metaphysician can only 'ask questions' of Being whereas the Christian brings ready-made answers from revelation, which surpass the act of thinking and destroy it from within. For neither did Aristotle mean that philosophical thought is merely a form of questioning—thought is certainly a form of knowledge, even if it is one which is 'above science'—nor does the Bible primarily exist in order to toss ready answers down to ascending thought. But the way in which Jesus Christ lives in openness towards the Father and in this openness shows both the supreme exposure of the love of God and the supreme decision of man for God, can cause the metaphysician to ask himself whether he already thinks and enquires sufficiently openly, or whether perhaps he has come too quickly to an end. It is in this sense that the Christian is called to be the guardian of metaphysics in our time.

INDEX

Abelard 9
Abel, J. F. 515
Abrabanel, Yitshaq 256
Abraham 134
Adam of Paris 641
Aeschylus 280, 281, 284, 297, 308
Alan of Lille 260
Albergati 240
Albert 217, 623, 641
Albert of Saxony 21
Alberti, Leon Battista 258, 375, 601
Alexander of Hales 99, 640
Alfieri 153
Al Hallaj 139
Allemann, Beda 322
Allwohn, Adolf 567
Alvarez, Baltazar 113, 132
Ambrose 142, 211
Amelote 125
Andrew the Fool 145
Andreas-Salomé, Lou 417
Angela of Foligno 82–85, 99, 144, 147
Angela Merici 106
Angelus, Silesius 31, 441, 472, 477, 647
Angioleri, Cecco 148
Anouilh 411
Anselm 19, 83, 107, 212, 235, 237, 244, 416, 459, 474, 495, 558, 585
Araoz 113
Archilochos 12, 147
Ariosto 271, 274, 283, 346
Aristotle 9, 10, 17, 20, 23, 48, 49, 150, 215, 225, 249, 259, 287, 294, 369, 375, 376, 381, 410, 435, 445, 448, 469, 481, 500, 534, 547, 614, 623, 632, 638, 643, 646
Aesop 287
Auer, Albert 12
Augustine 10, 15, 20, 21, 22, 23, 26, 30, 49, 70, 109, 126, 191, 206, 208, 211, 212, 219, 225, 231, 243, 245, 255, 260, 266, 268, 287, 291, 401, 409, 451, 452, 460, 461, 478, 479, 481, 486, 548, 553, 556, 609, 639, 640, 641, 643
Averroes 10
Avicenna 10, 17, 48, 91, 560

Baader, Franz von 126, 188, 208, 480, 563
Bachem, Rolf 251
Bacon, Francis 286, 288
Balic 17
Balthasar, H. U. von 15, 52, 88, 120, 123, 142, 225, 248, 285, 298, 414, 444, 551, 622, 639, 653
Balzac 410
Bañez 15, 25
Barth, Karl 15, 130, 466, 474
Basil 210
Bassenge, Friedrich 510
Baudelaire 202
Baumgarten 483, 587
Baur, L. 209
Beckmann, Max 202
Beißner 300, 334
Bellarmin 110
Bellori, G. P. 376, 380
Benedict 21, 22, 23, 102, 142, 640
Benz, Ernst 145
Bergson 257, 414, 415, 425

Berkeley 19, 453
Berlioz 411
Bernanos 123, 201
Bernhard of Clairvaux 23, 88, 157, 167, 267, 268, 298, 405
Bernhard von Waging 223
Bernières 127
Bernini 111
Bérulle, Pierre 119–124, 127, 462, 479, 481, 649
Biser, Eugen 416
Bloemardine 67
Blondel, Maurice 211
Blosius 67
Bly, Léon 201, 205
Boccaccio 251, 252, 376
Böckmann, Paul 316
Blodin, Jean 287
Boethius 11, 30, 48, 150, 151, 191, 206, 348, 614, 623, 640, 647
Boethius of Dacia 11
Böhm, Wilhelm 299
Bohnenstädt, E. 244, 246
Bölsche, Wilhelm 414
Bonaventura 23, 70, 191, 298, 348, 641, 647
Ps.-Bonaventura 103
Bossuet 114, 127, 132
Bourgoing 119, 127
Bramante 258
Brant, Sebastian 143, 164, 166
Braunfels, Ludwig 169
Bremond, Henri 51, 114, 118, 124, 125, 133
Bridget 81, 106
Bruni, Leonardo 269
Bruno, Giordano 191, 253, 256, 257, 260–264, 266, 269, 274–277, 296, 298, 310, 339, 340, 348, 350, 378, 380, 406, 409, 412, 449, 487, 515, 517, 563, 570, 578, 614, 642
Bürger, G. A. 538
Buridan, John 21
Burke, Edmund 510, 511, 512
Butler, Joseph 290
Byron 266, 279, 411

Calderon 107
Calvin 15
Camoēs 273
Campanella 286
Camus 114
Canfeld, Benedict 114, 127
Carrière, M. 597
Carus, C. G. 27, 413
Casel, O. 121
Cassiodor 640
Cassirer, E. 290, 541
Castellio 61, 287
Castiglione 269
Catherine of Genoa, 99–102
Catherine of Siena 12, 85, 86, 91–99, 103, 104, 127
Caussade 133–140
Cavalcanti, Guido 269
Cavalieri, Tommaso 270
Cervantes 155, 169–180, 192, 606
Chantal, Jane Frances de 114
Charles IV 152
Charles V 112
Chartres (School of) 9, 13, 99, 211, 269, 614, 640
Chastel, André 382
Chesterton, G. K. 143, 153
Chrétien de Troyes 152
Christiane of Pisa 269
Christine von Stommeln 144
Cicero 185
Cisneros, García de 103
Claudel, Paul 159, 173, 268, 278, 282–284, 609
Clement of Alexandria 128
Cognet, Louis 115, 127
Cohen, Hermann 208, 257
Colomer, Eusebio 241
Colonna, Vittoria 185, 270
Columbini, Giovanni 147
Condren, Charles de 119, 124–126, 444, 481, 649
Constantine 142

Copernicus 21, 285
Corssen, Meta 322
Creuzer, F. 409
Croce, Benedetto 597, 604
Cudworth, Ralph 290, 291
Curtius, Ernst R. 81, 250

Dante 27, 146, 148, 152, 154, 161, 162, 207, 250, 251, 255, 256, 263, 265, 266, 270, 273, 274, 282, 284, 361, 420, 477, 564
Daumier 202
David 165
David of Dinant 223
Dermenghem, Emile 88
Democritus 21, 469
Denys see Dionysius
Descartes 25, 28, 239, 281, 290, 292, 369, 409, 431, 452, 453, 455–463, 469, 471, 473, 478, 479, 480, 482, 489, 492, 514, 549, 550, 564, 596, 602, 621, 623, 643
Dickens 410
Dilthey, Wilhelm 289, 296
Dionysius Areopagita 9, 12, 13, 23, 26, 49, 51, 54, 77, 79, 88, 108, 111, 157, 186, 211, 223, 228, 243, 255, 348, 420, 444, 446, 553, 574, 631, 640, 641
Dominic 106
Dostoievsky 143, 188–201, 203, 410, 603, 607
Dudon, R. P. 128
Duns Scotus 12, 13, 16–21, 23, 27, 48, 91, 472, 560
Dürer 601

Eckart 12, 13, 14, 23, 29–47, 48, 50, 51, 52, 53, 55, 58, 59, 61, 65, 67, 70, 76, 99, 102, 104, 105, 106, 107, 122, 123, 125, 127, 132, 140, 146, 164, 205, 207, 208, 210, 214, 227, 228, 232, 235, 241, 243, 439, 441, 442, 445, 447, 451, 453, 477, 496, 497, 554, 559, 640
Ehrismann, Gustav 161
Elisabeth de la Trinité 88
Ennius 252
Epicurus 264
Erasmus 14, 164–168, 205, 286, 607
Erigena, John (Scotus), 9, 13, 26, 30, 76, 99, 191, 206, 210, 212, 214, 223, 224, 229, 242, 260, 342, 444, 447, 465, 515, 547, 548, 574, 614, 621, 623, 640
Erwin von Steinbach 297
Eudes, John 124
Euripides 252, 332
Evagrius Ponticus 30, 49, 52, 577

Farrer, Austin 290
Fascher, E. 604
Fechner, G. Th. 27, 413, 597, 601
Fénelon 51, 65, 102, 104, 105, 127–132, 139, 205, 462, 466, 481, 497, 559, 560
Feuerbach, Ludwig 209, 248, 406, 479, 591, 644
Ficino, Marsilio 100, 229, 252–260, 261, 264, 266, 269, 272, 281, 299, 375, 412, 444, 574, 603, 623, 642
Fichte 28, 30, 70, 208, 264, 297, 314, 315, 317, 318, 322, 324, 328, 329, 330, 331, 340, 370, 409, 432, 453, 482, 492, 496, 531, 538, 544, 546–557, 559, 561, 564, 569, 573, 575, 586, 587, 592, 603, 606, 642, 643, 650
Flaubert 140
Fontane, Theodor 410
Franck, Sebastian 15, 61, 287
Frankfurter, Der (Theologia Deutsch) 61–67, 103
Francis of Assisi 20, 21, 80, 82, 102, 106, 110, 146, 418, 640
Francis de Sales 51, 65, 67, 114–119, 131, 462
Francis Xavier 106
Freud, S. 411, 564

Freytag, Gustav 410
Frischeisen-Köhler, Max 296
Fuseli, Henry 281

Galileo 21, 285
Galsworthy 410
Garve 509
Garzoni 185
Gebirol, Ibn 257
Gebhardt, Carl 256, 259
Geiger, Moritz 607
Gerbert, Abt 26
Gerson 26, 269
Gertrude 81
Gibieuf 127
Gilbert, de la Porrée 13, 30,640
Giles of Viterbo 26
Gilson, Etienne 10, 17, 18, 19
Giraudoux 411
Goldoni 153
Golter, Wolfgang 152
Gontard Susette 315, 325
Gorè, Jeanne-Lydie 128
Görres, Joseph 144, 409, 411
Goethe 27, 147, 153, 180, 188, 206, 247, 258, 260, 263, 276, 278, 280, 281, 284, 291, 294, 297, 298, 310, 339–413, 415, 416, 417, 421, 426, 434, 438, 443, 487, 514, 517, 523, 526, 530, 531, 537, 538, 541, 551, 565, 574, 578, 596, 603, 604, 605, 614, 623, 642, 647
Gottfried of Strassburg 163, 189, 267–269, 279, 642
Goya 143
Greco, El 111
Greene, Graham 201
Gregory the Great, 26, 225, 260, 640
Gregor of Nazianzen 444
Gregory of Nyssa 211, 225, 240, 471
Gregor of Rimini 20
Grillparzer 279
Grimmelshausen 153, 180–188, 607
Groote, Gert 67
Grosseteste, Robert 99, 623
Gruenter, R. 156
Grundmann, H. 157
Guevaro 185
Guibert, J. de 104
Guillaume de Lorris, 268
Gutzwiller, Paul 185
Guzman, de Alfarache 182
Guyon, Madame 127, 128
Gysi, Lydia 290

Haas, Alois 157, 163
Häberlin, Paul 597, 605
Haller, Albrecht 368
Hamann 444, 563, 604, 607
Hamon, A. 80
Hamsun, Knut 410
Hanslick, Eduard 601
Hartmann, E. von 411, 564, 597, 598
Hartmann, Nicolai 597, 607
Häussermann, Ulrich 322
Hebbel 141, 279–281
Hebel 153
Heer, Friedrich 206
Hegel 13, 14, 17, 25, 29, 30, 64, 130, 189, 191, 206, 208, 222, 226, 238, 241, 244, 247, 248, 258, 264, 297, 299, 310, 330, 334, 340, 357, 409, 410, 430, 431, 432, 453, 454, 461, 467, 468, 471, 474, 479, 482, 492, 510, 515, 539, 547, 554, 566, 567, 569, 571, 572–590, 591, 593, 595, 596, 597, 599, 606, 619, 620, 623, 625, 629, 644, 647, 653
Heidegger 248, 295, 299, 408, 409, 413, 427, 429–450, 454, 481, 541, 554, 571, 598, 614, 617, 619, 621, 624, 625, 628, 629, 643, 646, 651
Heinroth 369
Heraclius 142, 271

Heraclitus 214, 261, 264, 294, 297, 300, 301, 320, 348, 350, 410, 433, 614, 638
Herbart, Joh. Fr 601
Herbert of Cherbury 290
Herder 27, 260, 281, 287, 294, 310, 327, 339, 357, 378, 509, 574, 603
Hermes, Trismegistos 239, 250
Hermias 643
Herp, Hendrik van 67
Hesiod 255, 260
Hilpisch, Stephan 145
Hirsch, Emanuel 291, 560
Hobbes 287, 288–290, 291, 467, 550
Hoffmeister, Johannes 299, 573
Hofmann, E. T. A. 188
Hofmannsthal, Hugo v. 143, 153, 284, 411
Hohler, August E. 305
Hölderlin 27, 66, 191, 195, 248, 268, 284, 294, 295, 297, 298–338, 340, 364, 380, 388, 407, 408, 412, 423, 424, 430, 434, 437, 438, 444, 449, 519, 555, 563, 566, 569, 573, 578, 579, 582, 620, 622, 629
Holkot, Robert 20
Homer 207, 213, 252, 265, 272, 281, 307, 320, 340, 342, 390, 398, 411, 623, 630, 637, 639
Horace 511
Hügel, Fr von 99
Hugh of St Victor 68, 223
Huizinga, J. 11, 152
Humboldt, W. von 310
Hume 19, 482, 489
Husserl 461, 560
Hutcheson 490
Hyma, Albert 167

Iamblichus 265, 348
Ignatius von Loyola, 14, 21, 22, 23, 51, 53, 98, 102–110, 111, 112, 114, 115, 124, 127, 132, 139, 144, 174, 205, 439, 497, 554, 560, 640, 641, 642
Ipsen 339
Irenaeus 155
Iserloh, E. 104
Isidor of Seville 250
Ives de Paris 114

Jacobi, F. H. 298, 315, 558
Jacopone da Todi 146–147, 164, 205
Jansen 15
Jaspers, Karl 212, 245, 412, 495
Jean, de Meung 269
Jean, Paul 153, 188, 264, 281, 294, 310, 322, 338, 370, 514, 606–607
Joan of Arc 81, 93, 106
Jerome 211
John Apostle 190, 331, 402, 548, 556, 573, 575, 584
John of Dambach 12
John of God 147
John of the Cross 78, 80, 89, 101, 126, 133, 136
Johannes, von Tepl (Böhmischer Ackermann) 150–152, 164
Julian of Norwich 85–88
Jung-Stilling 298

Kant 13, 25, 27, 28, 30, 247, 264, 281, 287, 294, 299, 310, 314, 315, 320, 340, 357, 369, 370, 409, 431, 432, 453, 461, 462, 481–513, 514, 517, 522, 526, 530, 531, 534, 539, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 551, 553, 556, 560, 566, 587, 588, 591, 595, 599, 601, 602, 603, 620, 633, 642, 643, 650
Kayser, Hans 602
Keats 27
Keller, Gottfried 153
Kelletat, A. 180
Kepler 27, 602
Kierkegaard 134, 136, 205, 267, 410, 605

Klages, Ludwig 411
Kleist 277–281, 423
Klopstock 296, 305, 307, 336, 357, 514, 519
Knittermeyer, Heinrich 316
Köhler E. 154
Körner 521
Kosch 180
Kreisler 143
Kristeller, P. O. 252, 257

Lactantius 250
Lallemant, Louis 113, 114, 132, 462
Lambert 484
Landino 269
Laplace 484
Lasaulx 409
Lasson, G. 572
Lautréamont 410
Lavater 298, 357
Lazarillo de Tormes 182
Leclercq, Jean 81, 157
Leeuwenhoek A. van 471
Lefèvre d'Etaples 209
Lehmann, P. 157
Leibniz 25, 28, 238, 247, 260, 264, 299, 356, 414, 421, 453, 454, 461, 463, 466, 468–478, 480, 481, 482, 484, 486, 488, 489, 494, 514, 515, 540, 550, 602, 615, 643, 646, 647
Leonardo, da Vinci 258, 286, 375
Leone Ebreo 252, 256–260, 261, 294, 394, 464
Leopardi 642
Lessing 186, 287, 482, 509, 575, 596
Lifschitz, M. 590
Linus 250
Lipps, Theodor 607
Livy 288
Locke 19, 291
Lomazzo 376
Lorrain, Claude 203, 266, 376
Lotze, Hermann 597
Löwith, Karl 432, 433, 440, 447
Lubac, Henri de 52
Lucretius 264, 276, 511
Ludolph of Saxony 103
Lukacs, Georg 590, 600
Luther 14, 30, 61, 65, 99, 102, 107, 110, 152, 170, 212, 405, 452, 494

Machiavelli 288
Maimon, Salomon 208
Maimonides 257
Malebranche 409, 478–481, 514, 550, 589, 643
Mande, Hendrik 67
Mani 369
Mann, Thomas 410, 411, 598
Mantegna 382
Marc, A. 462
Maréchal, J. 462, 548, 551, 572
Marie de l'Incarnation 114, 115
Marie des Vallées 88
Marino 271
Marius, Victorinus 223
Martial 12
Martz, Louis L. 290
Marx, Karl 14, 189, 479, 590–596, 600, 606, 608, 644
Mascall 290
Mason, E. C. 323, 349, 426, 427
Maurer, F. 12
Maximos Confessor 142, 223, 444
Mayronnes, François 17
Mechthild, von Magdeburg 98, 632, 641
Mendelssohn 509
Menendez y Pelayo, 170, 258
Merswin, Rulman 67
Michel, Ernst 412
Michelangelo 248, 269–271, 281, 365, 395
Milton 27, 272, 281, 286, 519
Mirecourt, Jean de 20
Mohler, Ludwig 245
Molien 124
Molière 153, 182

Molina 25, 28
Mombert 412
Montaigne 287, 288
More, Thomas 246, 286
Mörike 441
Moritz K. Ph. 378–381, 604, 607, 614
Mozart 153, 202, 411
Muirhead, J. H. 290
Murray, Sara 145
Murner, Thomas 165
Musaeus 250
Musch, Walter 252
Mussato, Albertino 250

Nelson, John C. 256, 269
Neri, Philip 147, 405
Nerval, G. de 201
Nestroy 153
Newman 51
Newton 27, 285, 363, 371, 482
Nicolus of Autrecourt 21
Nicolus of Cusa 14, 15, 26, 30, 157, 205–246, 247, 252, 258, 260, 262, 274, 286, 290, 296, 340, 348, 412, 444, 446, 447, 451, 453, 476, 515, 548, 553, 558, 561, 562, 574, 584, 604, 614, 623, 626, 640
Nicolas of Oresme 21
Nietzsche 409, 411, 415, 416, 417, 430, 431, 467, 487, 530, 537, 582, 598, 603
Nigg, Walter 145, 189
Nizolius 469
Nohl, Hermann 572
Novalis 208, 310, 508

Ockham 14, 16, 19–21, 29, 102, 107, 164, 494
Ohly, Fr 157
Oken 413
Olier 127
Origen 15, 30, 126, 206, 237, 241, 287, 298, 439, 577
Orpheus 250
Otto, Walter F. 299

Palamas 49
Panofsky, Erwin 270, 376
Papmehl-Rüttenauer, Isabella 305
Paracelsus 286
Parmenides 23, 260, 264, 299, 320, 331, 410, 513, 614, 638
Pascal 114, 115, 120, 401, 444, 460
Patrizzi 623
Paul 56, 123, 144, 167, 168, 213, 233, 301, 334, 369, 409, 475, 499, 548
Péguy, Charles 92, 155, 317, 414
Petrarch 27, 207, 250, 255, 266, 269, 270, 376
Peter of Blois 12
Pheidias 381
Philipp II 522
Philo 126, 257, 394
Picard, Max 249
Picasso 202
Pico della Mirandola 252, 256, 259, 286
Pindar 281, 284, 307, 316, 443, 553, 608, 623, 630, 638
Pius II 212
Plato 10, 49, 52, 65, 69, 81, 111, 150, 191, 207, 215, 223, 229, 235, 238, 245, 246, 250, 252, 253, 254, 257, 259, 263, 264, 265, 267, 282, 286, 290, 292, 294, 297, 299, 315, 320, 323, 324, 347, 348, 353, 364, 369, 375, 376, 381, 407, 410, 416, 430, 431, 432, 460, 467, 474, 479, 486, 497, 500, 530, 553, 567, 570, 595, 599, 602, 603, 605, 608, 614, 616, 623, 626, 629, 632, 638, 639, 641, 647
Plautus 252
Pleiade, La 269
Plethon, Gemistos 250
Plotinus 13, 65, 76, 86, 99, 109, 207, 209, 210, 211, 213, 217, 229, 230, 231, 232, 234, 235, 237, 241, 246, 254, 255, 257,

258, 259, 260, 286, 296, 310, 340, 342, 348, 350, 356, 368, 369, 370, 377, 378, 380, 399, 406, 409, 414, 416, 435, 442, 444, 446, 460, 497, 507, 515, 547, 548, 552, 553, 556, 567, 570, 574, 599, 603, 620, 623, 626, 631, 639
Plutarch 288
Podach, Erich F. 416
Poiret 14
Polybius 288
Pomponazzi 281
Pongs, Hermann 322
Ponte, L. de 113
Porphyry 265, 266, 348
Poussin 266, 284, 376
Powicke, F. J. 290
Pozzo 111
Procluos 210, 214, 223, 227, 228, 250, 265, 618
Protagoras 239, 286
Przywara, Erich 108
Pushkin 192, 410
Pythagoras 250, 369, 601, 602, 638

Quevedo 143

Rabelais 287
Racine 153, 279
Raffael 365, 376
Rahner, H. 114
Rahner, K. 123, 462, 511
Raimund, Ferd. 153
Ramière, P. 132
Ramon, Llull 15, 106, 241
Rand, B. 291
Raymond, Marcel 252, 269
Rehm, Walter 321, 322
Renty 127
Reuter 153
Richard of St Viktor 68
Richeome 114
Richtstätter, K. 80
Riedlinger, H. 79
Riemer 390
Rilke, Clara 417
Rilke, R. M. 202, 295, 411, 416–429, 433, 607
Rimbaud 410
Ripa 376
Robert of Lincoln 223
Robertson, John M. 291
Roch 384, 385, 393
Rodriguez 113
Ronsard 269
Roothaan 102
Rosenkranz 600
Rosmini 409, 619
Rothe, R. 208
Rouault, G. 143, 201–204
Rousseau 287, 298, 497
Rousselot, Pierre 129
Rubens 111, 376
Ruisbroeck 67–78, 101, 105, 118, 123, 205, 649
Ruskin, John 597
Rutebeuf 148
Rüther, Theodor 128

Saint-Samson, Jean de 114
Salis, J. R. von 426
Salutati 251
Sappho 274, 623
Sartre 284, 598
Scaliger, Julius Caesar 296
Scanelli 376
Schadewaldt, W. 323
Schasler 597
Scheler, M. 247, 411, 564, 598
Schelling 30, 64, 188, 206, 208, 247, 260, 297, 299, 320, 330, 334, 370, 409, 410, 443, 453, 480, 482, 496, 528, 537, 547, 553, 557–572, 573, 578, 587, 588, 589, 603, 605, 620, 642
Scherillo, Michele 272
Schiller 206, 208, 278, 280, 294, 299, 310, 315, 320, 323, 340, 357, 368, 442, 482, 500, 508, 512, 513–546, 551, 566, 569, 578, 579, 586, 600, 601, 603, 605

Schleiermacher 15, 298, 474, 548
Schlesinger 578
Schmittlein, R. 132
Schmitz, K. 290
Schneider, Reinhold 142
Schopenhauer 189, 370, 411, 415, 557, 564, 598
Schulz, Walter 570
Schwietering, Jul. 163, 268
Scott, W. 410
Seneca 150
Sertorius, L. 99
Shaftesbury 285, 287, 291–295, 296, 298, 299, 301, 309, 310, 339, 340, 378, 406, 490, 504, 515, 556, 603
Shakespeare 14, 143, 153, 182, 269, 271, 281, 282, 297, 352, 395, 410, 519
Siewerth, Gustav 17, 25, 28, 234, 449
Siger of Brabant 11
Simeon d.n. Theologe 49
Simmel, Georg 414, 564
Simrock 159
Socrates 12, 237, 255, 266, 638
Solger, Karl W. F. 597, 600, 609
Soloviev, W. 255, 620
Sophocles 213, 281, 299
Spagnotti, Pio 272
Spee, Fr von 66
Speiser, A. 370
Spenser 271
Spinoza 25, 28, 30, 130, 208, 247, 253, 257, 258, 260, 294, 315, 339, 369, 393, 398, 401, 414, 452, 463–468, 469, 473, 480, 482, 547, 553, 559, 574, 589, 602
Spitteler, Carl 411, 604, 605
Spitzer, L. 152
Staiger, E. 305, 353
Stammler, Wolfgang 152, 377
Stein, Charlotte von 343, 347
Stendhal 410
Stierli, Joseph 110
Strauss, Richard 411
Strindberg 281
Stumpf, Karl 601
Suarez, F. 14, 21–29, 91, 112, 461, 560
Surin 132
Surius 52
Suso 29, 58–61, 105
Swedenborg 488
Symeon the fool 145

Tasso, Torquato 269, 271–274, 346
Tauler 14, 29, 52–58, 61, 67, 77, 133, 205, 439, 444, 497
Taurisano, I. 92
Tchernischevsky 189
Teilhard de Chardin 27, 255, 450
Tennyson 281
Teresa of Avila 81, 106, 115, 174
Tersteegen 14, 66
Thackeray 410
Theodosius 142
Theophrastus 287
Thérèse of Lisieux 106
Thimus, A. von 602
Thomas, Aquinus 9, 10, 12, 14, 21, 29, 30, 48, 49, 76, 129, 130, 234, 235, 237, 246, 250, 260, 272, 363, 420, 425, 434, 446, 448, 462, 472, 474, 476, 481, 492, 572, 598, 619, 624, 640, 641
Thomas, Gallus 223
Thomasius, Jak. 469
Thukydides 288
Tiepolo 111
Timmermans 153
Tindal 291
Tintoretto 111, 271
Titian 267
Tocco, Felice 264
Toland 291, 296
Tolstoy 410
Tonelli, L. 256

Tönnies, Ferd. 289
Trakl 433

Ulrich, Ferdinand 625, 632
Ulrich, of Strassburg 623
Unamuno, M. de 143, 170

Varillon 132
Varro 401
Vasari 376
Vietor, Karl 541, 566
Victorines 9, 88, 157, 220, 640
Villon, François 142, 148–152, 164, 166, 205
Vincent de Paul 114
Virgil 22, 178, 204, 213, 252, 265, 272, 284, 630, 639, 648
Vischer, F. Th. 597, 600
Volkmann-Schluck, K.-H. 239
Vossler, Karl 250
Vuillard, Paul 266
Vyvyan 270

Wackerzapp, Herb 227, 230
Wagner, Richard 141, 189, 267, 280, 411, 415, 598
Walzel, Oskar 296
Watteau 202, 284
Weigel 472
Weisbach, W. 382
Weiser, Ch. F. 291
Weisse, Chr. H. 597, 603
Wenck von Herrenberg, Joh. 223
Wieland 281
Wiese-Pèscopo 271
Wilhelm of Alnwick 19
Wilhelm of St Thierry 157
Wille, Bruno 414
Winckelmann 206, 375, 377–378, 780, 781
Wittenweiler, Heinrich 164
Wolff, Christian 482
Wolfram von Eschenbach 152–164, 167, 180, 607
Wolke, Die ('The Cloud') 88–91
Wollersheim, Theod. 144

Zimmermann, H. 202
Zimmermann, Robert 597, 601
Zinzendorf 66
Zola, E. 410
Zoroaster 250
Zuccari 376
Zurbaran 111

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN
3 9015 02080 0549

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN · LIBRARIES ·

THE GLORY OF THE LORD

Hans Urs von Balthasar

THE GLORY OF THE LORD:
A THEOLOGICAL AESTHETICS

By Hans Urs von Balthasar

VOLUMES OF THE COMPLETE WORK

Edited by Joseph Fessio, S.J., and John Riches

1. SEEING THE FORM
2. STUDIES IN THEOLOGICAL STYLE: CLERICAL STYLES
3. STUDIES IN THEOLOGICAL STYLE: LAY STYLES
4. THE REALM OF METAPHYSICS IN ANTIQUITY
5. THE REALM OF METAPHYSICS IN THE MODERN AGE
6. THEOLOGY: THE OLD COVENANT
7. THEOLOGY: THE NEW COVENANT

The publishers gratefully acknowledge the support of the Pro Helvetia Foundation in the preparation of the English translation.

THE GLORY OF THE LORD

A THEOLOGICAL AESTHETICS

BY

HANS URS VON BALTHASAR

VOLUME VI: THEOLOGY: THE OLD COVENANT

Translated by Brian McNeil C.R.V. and Erasmo Leiva-Merikakis
Edited by John Riches

T&T CLARK, 59 GEORGE STREET, EDINBURGH

GRAD
BT
78
.B193
1982
v.6

Copyright © T&T Clark, 1991
T&T Clark, 59 George Street, Edinburgh EH2 2LQ, Scotland
T&T Clark is an imprint of HarperCollins*Publishers*

Authorised English Translation of
Herrlichkeit: Eine theologische Ästhetik, Band III, 2:
Theologie, Teil I: Alter Bund
Copyright © Johannes Verlag, Einsiedeln, 1967

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the prior permission of T&T Clark

First Published 1991

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
Balthasar, Hans Urs von, 1905
The glory of the Lord: a theological aesthetics
Vol. 6: Theology: the old Covenant.
1. Christian theology
I. Title II. Riches, John 1939—
230

ISBN 0 567 09577 0

Typeset by Barbers Highlands Ltd, Fort William
Printed and bound in Great Britain by Billing & Sons Ltd, Worcester

GL
175-015X
CRELI
5-2-91
[illegible]

CONTENTS

VOLUME VI
THEOLOGY: THE OLD COVENANT

INTRODUCTION ... 9

I. GOD'S GLORY AND MAN

A. GLORY ... 31
1. Dialectic of Sensory Manifestation ... 31
   - a. Appearance, kabod ... 31
   - b. Knowing and not knowing ... 37
   - c. Seeing and not seeing ... 38
   - d. Form and non-form ... 39
   - e. Dazzling darkness ... 41
   - f. Abode and event ... 44
   - g. Dialectic of fire ... 47
2. The Divine 'I' ... 51
   - a. Integration ... 51
   - b. Power ... 55
   - c. Word ... 57
   - d. Holiness and name ... 61
   - e. Face ... 66
3. Cosmic Liturgy ... 74

B. THE IMAGE ... 87
1. The Image as the Creature's State of Suspension ... 87
   - a. The figure of God's hands ... 87
   - b. Crowned with glory ... 93
   - c. The suspension of the image ... 97
2. The Image: To be a World Before God ... 104
   - a. A sketch book ... 104
   - b. The great theatre of the world ... 109
   - c. The splendour of power ... 114
   - d. Wisdom of Life ... 123

e. Eros and worldly beauty 130
f. The world's final dance 137

C. GRACE AND COVENANT 144
1. Concrete Glory 144
2. God Allows His People Space 149
a. Berith: Covenant 149
b. Chesed, chen, rachamin: kindness, favour, mercy 159
c. Sedek, sedaka: right conduct in faithfulness 162
d. Mishpat: right which comes into effect as salvation 169
e. Emeth, emuna: proved excellence 173
f. Shalom: pacified realm of salvation 175
3. Existence Outside Oneself 178
a. A dwelling-place in God's life 178
b. Contemporaneity 184
c. Reaching backwards and forwards 192
d. Integration of glorification 204

II. THE STAIRWAY OF OBEDIENCE

A. THE BROKEN COVENANT 215
1. Sin and Malediction 215
2. Sheol and God's Mobility 220

B. THE OBEDIENCE OF THE PROPHETS 225
1. Abraham, Moses, Saul 225
2. Early Prophecy 231
3. Amos and Hosea 237
4. Isaiah 246
5. Jeremiah 256
6. Ezekiel 264
7. Liturgies of Lament 277
8. Job 281
9 Deutero-Isaiah 291

III. THE LONG TWILIGHT

A. THEOLOGIA GLORIAE 301
1. Glory Ahead 305
  a. The glorious image of Jerusalem 305
  b. Messianic hope 311
  c. Poor before God 316
2. Glory Above 321
  a. Daniel 321
  b. At the throne of glory 325
  c. Emphasis on man 330
  d. The barrier of judgment 339

3. Glory Anticipated 344
  a. Success and danger of the wisdom literature 344
  b. Ben Sirach 347
  c. The Book of Wisdom 358

B. THE PRESENT DAY WITHOUT GLORY 365
1. The Empty Time 365
2. The Speech Event 375
3. The Blood Event 388

C. ARGUMENTIA EX PROPHETIA 402
CONCLUSION 415
Index of Names 417
Index of Biblical References 420

INTRODUCTION

1. Transition to the Concluding Theme

With this concluding volume, in three parts, we arrive at the place towards which the whole work has been tending: to the theology of the glory of the living God, who 'in many and various ways spoke of old to our fathers by the prophets' and 'in these last days speaks to us by the Son, . . . the splendour of his glory and the very stamp of his nature' (Heb 1.1ff.). The present volume, therefore, looks back directly to the first volume which, by way of introduction, outlined a theological aesthetics as an aisthēsis—a 'beholding' of the glory that reveals itself. From the outset we insisted on the preliminary character of that first volume, because the theological act is shaped by its content, to which it attains only in an act of transcendence. This transcending occurs not only in the general philosophical sense that applies to every form of knowing, but in the specifically theological sense according to which every act of 'beholding' the living God presupposes a 'transport' of the creature beyond itself and its natural cognitive faculties. For the creature such transport bears the name of 'grace', which enables the creature to withstand the splendour of the Lord's glory as he reveals himself to it.

If, in place of 'the Lord's glory' we were to say 'God's divinity', then it would be evident that nothing can be the formal object of the believer's perception of revelation except God, in so far as he is God and not, for instance, in so far as he is the horizon of the world's origin and goal, since in this respect God is the object of philosophy or 'natural theology'.[1] It becomes evident, therefore, that in spite of the fact that even though God uses creaturely guises to speak and act throughout Holy Scripture, what is essentially at stake is solely men and women's encounter with the divinity or glory of God. In this respect we can agree with Oetinger when he says: 'God's glory constitutes not only the chief content, but also the formal foundational character of Scripture.'[2] This glory (Herrlichkeit) of God's—his sublimeness (Hehrsein) and lordliness (Herrsein), which are sovereignly active both in himself and in his self-disclosure—is (on the basis of all the analogies of being that doubtless exist between God and his creatures, and also on the basis of the many ways in which grace trains the creature to be capable of confronting this glory at all) precisely what constitutes the distinctive property of God, that which for all eternity distinguishes him from all that is not God; this is his 'wholly-otherness', which he can communicate only in such a way that, even as it is communicated, it remains his and only his: ἀμεθέκτως μετέχεται.[3] In a biblical sense this means that, the deeper a creature is allowed to encounter God's glory, the more this creature will long to extol this glory as being exalted over itself and over all creation. Such is Mary in her Magnificat. The deeper a creature is allowed to penetrate into God's opened realm, the more it will understand grace to be grace. And the more deeply it attains to a real, cognizant understanding of God's divineness, the more clearly does it realise that God's love transcends all comprehension: γνῶναι τὴν ὑπερβάλλουσαν τῆς γνώσεως ἀγάπην—'to know the love which surpasses knowledge' (Eph 3.19). Succumbat ergo humana infirmitas gloriae Dei et in explicandis operibus misericordiae ejus imparem se semper inveniat.[4] [1] 'Ecclesia tenet et docet, Deum, rerum omnium principium et finem, naturae humanae rationis lumine e rebus creatis certo cognosci posse.' Vatic. I, ss III, c. 2 (DS 3004).

---

There is no dodging this paradox, which begins with the self-communication of the Wholly Other and ends with the thanksgiving of the creature that has been overtaken. If, under pretext that God's paradox is too steep for him and also too unfruitful because insoluble, a Christian were to turn away from it and seek his alleged salvation by turning exclusively to his fellow creatures (Christ's mission has, after all, directed him towards creatures!), such a Christian would, for himself, have already stepped outside the proper sphere of revelation. A Christian encounters his neighbour in a Christian sense only when he has experienced in the 'fear of God' something of the wholly-other measure of the love of the Lord God and then attempts to love his neighbour with all humility according to this unattainable measure. Relations among human beings are as such already established upon the 'dialogical' level, since men and women commune with each other in virtue of their common nature.

---

[2] Theosophie, ed. C. A. Auberlen (1847), p. 333. Obviously this does not commit us to Oetinger's particular understanding of God's glory. Cf. also Robert Minder, 'Herrlichkeit' chez Hegel et le monde des Pères souabes (Etudes Germaniques 6, 1951), pp. 275–290.

[3] Proclus, Stoicheiōsis Theologikē, 23f.

[4] Leo, Sermo 11 de passione Domini, c. 1 (PL 54, 549C–550A).

God's relationship to the world, however, can presuppose no such prior communion, for even the created world, in its non-necessariness, points back to an abyss of free and sovereign lordliness. Any philosophy which would not, or would no longer, press on to this experience would rightly fall victim to the criticism of Karl Barth. If God speaks his word to created men and women, surely it is because he has given them an understanding which, with God's grace, can achieve the act of hearing and comprehending. But if it is really God's word and self-communication that they are to hear and understand, then this can surely not occur on the basis of a neutral foreknowledge about what 'words' mean or what 'truth' is. Such encounter with God cannot take place on a dialogical plane which has been opened in advance; it can occur only by virtue of a primary sense of being overawed by the undialogical presupposition of the dialogue that has started, namely, the divinity or glory of God. If this shock did not take place then the whole conversation would rest on a foundation of untruth. In so far as God sends forth his word in omnipotence, this word has the power to take to itself and keep the person whom it has struck: his creatureliness quakes to its foundation and, so threatened, he would like to flee from the spot with closed eyes. But the word has the power to bring him to give the answer required by obedience. However, the first impact of divinity can never be spared him, a shock which will then penetrate and affect all succeeding speeches and replies. One may become God's familiar, but one can never get used to him. 'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom', but also: 'to fear the Lord is wisdom's full measure' and its 'crown' (Sir 1.14, 16, 18). This is why it will not do to delimit the object of theology with the concept of 'mysteries', as if formally it consisted of 'truths' that lie beyond the ken of the human mind and must therefore be believed, in order then to be understood in some measure as 'a magnificent order, a higher heavenly world . . ., a masterpiece of God's many-splendoured wisdom.'[5] What is at stake here is not primarily truths, but the living God in his glory; he himself is all truth, and he suffices.

It is significant that at decisive places in Scripture God's 'glory' (kabod) manifests itself before God's word is heard. This is the case with the great epiphany on Sinai, the vision in the burning bush, the visions through which Isaiah and Ezekiel received their vocations, the visions on Tabor and at Damascus, and finally the apparition of the Son of Man at the beginning of the Apocalypse. The fact that God's glory at first appears without any words makes clear whence it is that it comes and the consequent paths that God's word will have to take. Such glory without words is, in effect, the apparition of him who, in his utter differentness, must be perceived in his reality and truth before his address can be heard. Concerning the word, man always thinks he has a certain foreknowledge of it deriving from the dialogical sphere. But, when confronted by the appearance of God's glory, 'Moses falls to his knees and bows his face toward the earth' (Ex 34.8), Elijah veils his face (1 Kg 19.13), Isaiah considers himself lost (Is 6.5), Ezekiel falls with his face to the ground (Ez 1.28), Daniel is oppressed in spirit (7.15) and sinks in a swoon with his face to the earth (10.9), the Apostles on Tabor are 'beside themselves' (Mk 9.6), 'drowsy' (Lk 9.32), in great fear (Mt 17.6) at the sight of it; Paul is thrown to the ground and blinded (Acts 9.4, 9), and John falls as if dead at the feet of the appearing Lord (Rev 1.17). The creature experiences its limit and in its finitude undergoes a death; hence the saying that traverses Scripture: a man cannot see

---

[5] Scheeben, Dogmatik, I (1873), p. 25. Cf. volume I, pp. 98–110.

God and remain alive (Ex 19.21; 33.20; Lev 16.2; Num 4.20; Jg 6.22; Is 6.5). But when it does occur, the event is greeted with almost unbelieving amazement (Gen 32.31; Dt 5.24) as a unique grace (Ex 24.10f.; Num 12.7f.; Dt 34.10). From his death man is put back on his feet by the spirit of God himself (Ez 2.2); man encounters God's word not in his own power but through the power of God's grace. The biblical scenes we have enumerated show only by way of example what applies to every hearer of God's word: he perceives God by being transported outside of himself; he hears and grasps God in God and through God. Whatever happens in the sphere of the revelation of the living God takes place in an arena which has been opened by God and has been made accessible to man beyond any claims of his mere 'nature.' Only where God wills to take up his habitation with the chosen people—only in a place that belongs to God, therefore—does a covenant relationship become possible, an existence according to God's instructions (torah), a holiness within the space of God's own holiness. And, in the great exemplary lives, the investiture with a mission follows in each case immediately on the vision of God's glory: Moses, Elijah, the biblical Prophets and Paul are men that have been expropriated as a result of their visions; they are men who have been conscripted for total obedience, instruments of God's word and action. In a secondary sense, as we shall see, even the whole liturgical and sacral institutions of the priestly writings can be traced back to the epiphany of the glory on Horeb; but, precisely by virtue of this institution, which perennially represents the reality of the Covenant, Israel can live as the people that has been chosen by God from among all other peoples and been led beyond itself and introduced into the sphere of God.

Even before man is addressed, however, or before any grace, promise or demand is granted him, the appearance of the absolute Subject is never abstract or without a relationship to the human party or parties involved. The glory of the God who disclosed himself always reveals his holiness as well (however we may wish to define it), and thus it also discloses the full unholiness of the person beholding the glory: 'Woe is me! For I am lost; for I am a man of unclean lips' (Is 6.5). 'When Simon Peter saw that, he fell down at Jesus' knees, saying, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord"' (Lk 5.8). For Paul the voice comes out immediately from the blinding light: 'Why do you persecute me? It hurts you to kick against the goads' (Acts 26.14). Ezekiel sees the glory already in the colours of judgment, and Daniel likewise (Dan 7.9f.), and the glorified Son of Man seen by John also has the figure of a judge (Rev 1.13–16). It is not possible to enjoy a reposeful aesthetic contemplation of the divine glory, a contemplation that would consider God 'in himself' and thus could dispense with the opposition between God's holiness and the unholiness of the world, of which the contemplator is the mathematical exponent, as it were. Glory is the intruding lordliness of him who comes to confront the world, both judging it and gracing it. It is this that distinguishes the biblical reality from the epiphanies of gods outside the Bible.

2. The Themes of Biblical Aesthetics

If our thinking is to be obedient to biblical revelation, we will in no way attempt to detach the theme of glory from the context of revelation for the sake of which we are studying the theme in the first place; and, in any event, this is a context which, in all its phases and aspects, is coloured by the emerging glory of the Lord. Other themes that suggest themselves simultaneously with and subsequently to the theme of glory (and we will have to discuss these also) can in no way be isolated from this glory, to be dealt with elsewhere. This applies even to themes that occupy a relatively autonomous sphere. No theme of revelation can be isolated from the field of theological aesthetics. And if other Old Testament themes at first appear to enjoy a certain independence alongside the theme of glory (for instance, the theme of creation, life in the world, man, and, further, the theme of the erecting of a valid order between God and creature, starting on God's initiative), even then these sets of themes can never, for the biblical thinker, become distanced from the realm of God's lordship (Herrschaft) or, thus, from God's glory (Herrlichkeit). Indeed, the historical development of revelation shows all these themes to be more and more tightly intertwined, to the point of becoming inextricable.

A second theme of theological aesthetics would, therefore, be the theme of God's creaturely partner, who from the first pages of Scripture is referred to as his 'image and likeness'. Now, the theme of 'image' is obviously something new, different from the theme of 'glory'; nevertheless, the relationship between them is from the outset unmistakable. In the first place, it belongs to God's lordliness for him to be able to set an image of himself over against himself. In the second place, if this image is indeed to resemble its archetype, certain traits of glory must intrinsically be proper to it (Ps 8). And finally, the whole movement of revelation has it as its goal to make image and glory coincide in Jesus Christ. Thus, to the primal tension between 'splendour' and 'form'[6] proper to an inner-worldly aesthetics there corresponds at the highest biblical level a tension between the 'formless' (Dt 4.12) glory and its well-formed image. This latter image in the end so greatly becomes the vessel of divinity that it can have 'the whole fullness' of the God who is above all forms dwell 'corporeally' in itself, all the while expressing it (Col 2.9). The fundamental question of aesthetics—that concerning measure and measureless—will have to be clarified here in an archetypal manner.

A third group of themes concerns the work that God has willed to set up between himself and his image: this is the whole realm delimited by concepts such as grace, covenant and justification. From the glory on Sinai there immediately issue the 'Ten Words' (Dt 4.13; 5.22) that as such are a most exalted grace. For these words are the proclamation of the charter that makes it possible for the people to dwell in God's realm and for God to dwell in the people's realm. They are an instruction of how human life must be shaped to be considered 'righteous' and 'godly' in God's sense and to be found acceptable and permissible by God—and this beyond the abyss that divides divine standards and claims from inner-worldly and even sinful ones. But there is a final mystery of biblical revelation which will also have to be the final question of a theological aesthetics: this is the question of how it is possible that the transitory and constantly failing order of mortal existence is able to perdure in the face of the absolute and unmovable order, the question of what course things must take so that God's apparently necessary and extreme indulgence and condescension—whereby what is crooked in man is actually considered straight and a righteousness valid before God is imputed to the unrighteous man—will coincide with real ontological righteousness. Only the New Covenant will be able to shed full light on precisely this group of questions, since it is in the New Testament that God's Image becomes one with God's Word and that, therefore, God's Image itself becomes the subsisting Covenant (Heb 9.14f.) and thus also subsisting grace (2 Cor 8.9) and divine justice (1 Cor 1.30). But the question emerges in God's design from the outset, and receives a profound development already in the history of the Old Covenant.

---

[6] Cf. volume I, p. 18; III/1, p. 276ff., 706ff.

These three themes and their elaboration, however, still do not bring the decisive factor into full view. To stop here would perhaps mean to have not finally gone beyond the realm of mythical analogies to the glory of God in the Bible. When together with God's glory there appears his holiness and sinful man falls to the ground, only then does the contradiction between light and darkness, holiness and sin, come into full view, and the drama is begun which—beyond all mythical parallels of deities wrestling with the forces of the abyss—is to lead to the reconciliation and redemption of the world. The outward defeat of God's enemies, which for a very long time ancient Israel also counted on, was seen to accomplish nothing where the most interior spiritual oppositions are concerned. No glory of the gods has as its opposite what is called 'sin' in the biblical sense; and only the glory of the living God, which lacks all analogies, can, by its 'wildly strange and astounding works' (Is 28.21), put an end to that darkness which at first appeared to set a limit to the extent of the lordship of God's glory. And it is above all in the time of classical prophecy and in the melting pot of the Exile, that Israel will, through its experience of suffering, become aware of this interior and hidden drama, so deeply aware of it, in fact, that it already reaches the threshold of the New Covenant with regard to the content of its faith.

To develop all of this with equal thoroughness would mean constructing a complete theology of the Old and New Testaments, something impossible within the limits of this work. The concept of glory will remain to the fore, therefore, and the other two areas will be considered and presented from this perspective. Even in this, however, no critical study concerning the meaning and development of the concept of kabod is intended, but rather a look at the reality to which this word points in the Old Testament, and this reality is not limited to the actual occurrence of the word (and certainly not to its sense in the priestly writings). The same thing is intensely discussed already by J and E, and much later, when the Septuagint translates kabod as δόξα, it will retain the much richer content of its meaning. The New Testament will further multiply the forms of expression for 'glory'. But already the Old Testament transformations of kabod and δόξα are so rich and problematic that by studying them we will be able to discern the great articulations of the history of revelation.

3. Glory as Constant Biblical Theme

The transformation in the idea of divine glory, which runs from the Pentateuch right through to the Johannine writings, is remarkably great, and yet the intermediate steps are so interconnected and they so clearly point to one another that in their very variety these phases constitute a whole, the parts of which support and substantiate one another. If one were to take the epiphany on Sinai only in itself, in the face of the various versions one would be tempted to regard the whole phenomenon as a contradictory composition which it would be best to dissect into heterogeneous images of mythical theophanies; by themselves, however, these images would scarcely allow us to glimpse what really occurred on the Mountain of God—and this is even supposing that something did in the first place occur which can be experienced as a theophany. But then we do have the return of Elijah to Horeb and the mysterious theophany which presents itself to us both as an opposition and a continuance of that first happening and to which we cannot deny an historical core. Both events, in turn, are presupposed as the background of that occurrence which the Apostles report as being Christ's transfiguration on Tabor, and they report it in a way that we can hardly dismiss as a mere theological arrangement: the luminous splendour and the cloud are seen again (as they will be also at the Ascension), and the voice that resounds from the cloud is also heard. Moses and Elijah are speaking with the Lord about his final mission and about the sealing of the covenant with his Passion. And precisely at the climax of the Passion the sun is darkened and the earth quakes, and we are confronted anew with the divine darkness that had been experienced when the covenant had been entered into on God's mountain in the desert. The prophets' visions of glory somehow begin without a previous tradition; this is true of Micah ben Imla and especially of Isaiah. Already in Ezekiel, however, and even more so in Habakkuk, there are unmistakable retrospective references not only to the experience of Isaiah, but also to the theophanies of the Pentateuch and, strange to tell, even to the divine glory which was supposed to have manifested itself at the construction of Solomon's temple (corresponding precisely to the portrayal of the Exodus in P) and which so many would like to dismiss as being no more than literary ornamentation. New ground is again broken in the seventh chapter of Daniel, which doubtless has an authentic vision as its basis; from here direct paths lead both the visions of Stephen and of Paul, at Damascus, and to the apparitions in the Apocalypse. Before the Sanhedrin, moreover, Jesus himself refers to the glory seen by Daniel and lays claim to it himself. Another line, which presupposes both the Exodus and the vision of Isaiah, leads, partly already in Ezekiel and more markedly in Deutero-Isaiah and post-exilic prophecy, to the eschatological expectation of God's glory, and this is likewise taken up by Jesus and understood in the writings of the Apostles as being the hope of the Church. The reposing of God's glory over the tent, and apparently also over the temple at the feast of its consecration, becomes an occasion for the Psalms to speak of the fact that this glory can be seen starting from Zion and then spreading out over the whole earth (this is also stressed in Isaiah's vision), and indeed over the entire cosmos (Ps 19.1). The Psalms and the Prophets, moreover, develop a whole hymnic world of theophanic images which stands at the disposal of all prayer glorifying God; this hymnic world enriches the received facts and quite spontaneously considers God to be manifest both to man's spirit and to his senses. The wisdom literature, to say nothing of the apocryphal apocalypses, affirms this manifestness of God's glory both in nature and in history, and Paul attests to it both in his letters (Rom 1.18–21) and his discourses (Acts 17). Then, too, Paul refers directly in 2 Cor 3 to the resplendent countenance of Moses, which reflected the splendour of God's glory (Ex 34.29f.), and he uses this reference to explain the proximity and distance between the two Testaments and the nature of Christian existence. When Stephen, as he lay dying, saw 'the glory of God and Jesus at God's right hand' (Acts 7.55), he did not in his discourse refrain from transposing the appearance of the 'God of glory' all the way back to the stories of the Patriarchs, so that even Abraham experienced it (Acts 7.2). In the Apocalypse, finally, nearly all utterances concerning glory in both the Old and the New Testament come together and, in this confluence, they exhibit the interior unity of their variety.

If, out of this confusingly variegated panorama, we were to isolate the one thing at which all else aims, then surely we would turn to the prologue of John's Gospel. What the Old Testament experienced and described as God's glory in an endless series of forays and always both in a spiritual and a sensory way—that reality attained its definitive form in the Incarnation of the Word: 'We have beheld his glory, glory as of the only Son from the Father, full of grace and truth' (Jn 1.14). John understands this glory as entailing the fulfilled 'truth' of the 'image' and the fulfilled 'grace' of the 'covenant', and in the end he is able to behold God's glory in the unity of the cross and the resurrection. The depth of this vision thus makes John's theology to be the last word of the Bible, and in John's vision the tension between the present contemplation of God's glory and the eschatological hope of it even emerges as the Christian's penultimate experience.

4. Conclusion [III/2, Part 3]

The biblical themes will constitute the first two parts of the concluding volume. But biblical theology naturally develops into ecclesial theology, which at the present moment in history must be taken and presented in all its ecumenical breadth, comprising the Orthodox Churches, the Roman Catholic Church, and the Evangelical Churches. Many aspects of this ecclesial theology have already been sketched by anticipation in the earlier volumes; the results must now be brought together in the concluding synthesis.

This summary takes shape almost of itself. The first volume especially makes a direct and natural transition to the present volume, particularly since in the section concerning the 'objective evidence' that first volume already had to deal with issues which will now be developed. The fact that God's glory is beheld could not be established without an advance glance at what it is. Volume II then took up the theological and historical demonstration of the full import borne by the aesthetic viewpoint in Christian theology; this it did by examining in the course of history twelve systems of thought which are particularly well-contoured in a theological sense and which have mostly been very decisive in theological history. But that second volume had promised to demonstrate later on how it is that these very different systems may be interpreted and justified from one common centre. Only biblical theology can and must necessarily become the standard by which to judge the whole range of the historical developments in question, and by using this standard we can see that not all these systems have remained in equal proximity to the source, and that not all of them have portrayed the innermost concerns of biblical theology with equal success. We will carefully have to keep, however, from regarding the theology which is contained in revelation as a (super-)system, following which we could construct other (infra-)systems according to rational methods. The glory of God's love in Jesus Christ remains the omnidimensional reality, and its utter transcendence of everything that can be known or systematised can itself be known only very dimly (Eph 3.18f.). For as Anselm says, rationabiliter comprehendit incomprehensibile esse (Monol 64). It is only the Holy Spirit who can expound, for the consciousness of the Church throughout all ages of history, the breadth and height, length and depth of the glory of God's love in Jesus Christ. It is quite possible that many forms of the theological interpretation of God's glory (think here of those of Denys or of Dante) spoke more directly to one age than to another; or it could be that theologies which were long thought to be defunct (such as Irenaeus') suddenly come to life again, while others (such as Augustine's, Anselm's, and Pascal's) provide a leaven for all ages.

---

This part was abandoned by the author and so never appeared (Ed's note).

Volume III/1 attempted to survey the mythical, philosophical and poetic experience and portrayal of 'glory' in the West both before and after the time of Christ. Here the connecting points to theology are numerous. This is so because, on the one hand, biblical revelation took root in the concrete historical terrain of human thought, feelings, and imagination, always using all these forms for its own expression. On the other hand, and according to this same revelation, from the outset there has existed a supernatural relationship between God and both the created world and man's spirit. Divine grace, predestined in Christ to be given to the whole world, is secretly at work in the whole sphere of history, and thus all myths, philosophies, and poetic creations are innately capable of housing within themselves an intimation of divine glory.

In three particular places in the Bible we see quite expressly how biblical revelation takes up or assumes pre-existent religious forms. We first of all see how in primitive biblical history (the religion of the Patriarchs) mythical forms of the encounter with God and of cultic worship are integrated into the history of revelation and are slowly penetrated and transformed by the Jewish understanding of revelation. This process continued until the Exile, since Israel's ever-recurring capitulation to the mythical world of Canaan and of the great surrounding cultures must be counteracted, and it is precisely this struggle with the myths that will permit new and genuine insights to emerge from the heart of revelation. Something analogous occurs, in the second place, with the 'Solomonic humanism' of the time of the kings. This humanism, reflected in Proverbs and other biblical books related to or dependent on it, borrows and grafts onto the Bible in scarcely modified form and with astounding nonchalance a 'wisdom of life' which had been spreading internationally between Egypt and Mesopotamia. In the third place we finally have the broad Hellenistic current of Greek thought which, already before Christ (in the Septuagint's late historical and sapiential books), had effected a fusion of Hebraic and Greek thought in various proportions. This fusion will then be everywhere detectible in the New Testament: we have only to think of the Letter to the Hebrews and its literary dependency on Philo[7] and Platonic forms of thought.[8] Such an appropriation of historical forms of expression on the part of revelation is quite natural; if it had not taken place then revelation would have to become suspect either of not having become historical at all or, in case it had, of having been but one form of the historical utterance of human experience among others. The characteristic of revelation in all its phases, however, is that the 'mythical' (and, analogously, the 'philosophical' and 'religious') forms of its ever more restrictive and definitive content are utterly denuded, and that it is only after going through such a 'death' that these forms become a suitable expressive means for the revelation of the living God. As an example of this we could take the story of Abraham in its great theological articulations. In other cases the Yahweh-religion launches from its midst, by way of a directly challenging counterstroke against myth, a theological principle that not only totally demolishes the myth but which—almost as a byproduct—overtakes it and incorporates it. Such is the case when Hosea outstrips the mythical sexuality of Canaan's 'marriages of the gods' with the revelation of a totally non-sexual and yet wholly incarnate relationship between Yahweh as husband and Israel as bride; such is also the case when Ezekiel uses images from Babylonian myths in his great hymns of indictment concerning Tyre and Egypt. This will in due time open the way for the Christian 'application' (χρῆσις) of the mythical world of the Greeks by the Church Fathers and by later Christian humanism. The provisionality of myth must allow itself to be judged by the finality of the Gospel, so that in this finality the world of myth may attain to its rightful rank and expressive value. Possible cross-connections between Greek epic and tragedy or Vergil with the Old Testament will be judged correspondingly, and in this the Old Testament itself will ever anew receive the final rank that belongs to it. Something similar holds for philosophy which, in its pre-cursoriness to revelation, must allow itself to be irradiated so as to exhibit the degree of its readiness to be penetrated by the ultimate mystery of the epiphany of glory. Thus, the tragedians, Plato, and Plotinus were questioned concerning their transparency. When later on the 'sphere of metaphysics' becomes Christian, the problem of the 'discernment of spirits' continually emerges—of discernment between the penultimate ('philosophical' or 'poetic') standard of judgment and the definitive biblical criterion, which comes to the fore only in this concluding volume. To us it seems that the real tragedy of intellectual history, from the Middle Ages to modern times, has lain in the secret struggle over this ultimate criterion ('Metaphysics of the Saints', 'Holy Fools and Glory', and the two paths of the 'Ancient Mediation' and the 'Metaphysics of the Spirit'). Finally, if it has been demanded of Christians that they should be the 'guardians of glory', this becomes possible only by a constantly renewed descent to the very heart of what in the Bible constitutes the glory of the incarnate God, who ever anew bestows the gift of the Holy Spirit.

[7] C. Spicq, L'Epître aux Hébreux, I (1952).

[8] F. J. Schierse, Verheissung und Vollendung: Zur theologischen Grundfrage des Hebräerbriefes (1955).

And this must suffice by way of summary of the earlier volumes.

Biblical theology concludes by opening out into an ecclesial (ecumenical) theology. But as theoretical theology it has a foreground—the liturgy—and also a postlude—(Christian) art.

a. Liturgy grows directly out of the innermost substance of scriptural revelation, in so far as God's demonstration of his glory is always necessarily answered by the glorification (doxology) of God. Indeed in the Bible it is impossible to distinguish adequately between the two spheres of God's word and man's answer. This applies not only to the 'praise of the lips' in psalm and hymn but also to the whole area of sacrificial liturgy, which P expressly derives from divine revelation and as such is regarded as the word of God enacted by men. In the liturgy of the New Testament—the Eucharist—God's gift to man and man's return of the gift to God become even more inseparable. Around this Eucharist the churches develop an extended liturgy of psalms and hymns, and into it are absorbed the sacrifices of the Old Testament. Glory in the biblical sense is perfected in the reciprocity of God's giving of himself to man and believing man's praising acceptance of this gift.

For this reason no Christian church can regard its cultic liturgy in isolation from the liturgy of an existence in faith which, as it actualises what it understands itself to be, knows that it is an existence established, first, upon the mystery of the Father's hidden will-to-salvation. Second, the Christian's existence in faith is established upon the 'dimension of God's grace and love for everything which is to come about', a dimension already contained in the mystery of the Father's will and which is opened up by the presence of his incarnate Son on the Cross. And, third, that believing existence is established upon the Christian's admission through baptism into this realm of God's grace, even as he recognises the Christian truth that may now become a living reality in his grace-filled existence. Paul can thus define this existence as order εἰς ἔπαινον δόξης, that is, an existence 'unto the glorification of his glory' (Eph 1.14): 'Admitted into this mystery [of God's will] by the very definition of what we are, we experience the mystery in the forgiveness of sins even as it becomes luminous to us in gnosis. Thus, it is from what we are and from what we experience that we bear the splendour of God's mystery in ourselves, and praise God by means of what his benediction has made us to be' (H. Schlier).[9] Exemplary sanctity in the Church has always been understood in the light of this definition of a liturgy of life, not in the sense that sanctity has been subjectively understood to be the extended splendour of the kabod-Yahweh in the saints (only Paul once came close to this as he discussed the existence of the Church as such in 2 Cor 3), but in the sense that all of the Christian's existence now lives away from itself and thinks exclusively in terms of an obedient recognition of God's glory alone. 'To do everything with a mind to God means to have eyes only for God, to be always looking at God. The lover beholds the beloved uninterruptedly, thinks only of him and is wholly turned towards him. All his thinking, speaking, and acting occur only in connection with him . . . O my God, I offer Thee all the moments of my life for Thy greater glorification, as a sacrifice to Thine honour, in order to be obedient to Thy will for the redemption of many . . .' (Charles de Foucauld).[10] Ecclesial liturgy, therefore, always connotes and includes the living liturgy of the individual Christian's existence: it presupposes it and effects it ever anew because in the innermost mystery of the Church as bride of Christ both spheres coincide and have as their exclusive meaning the 'glorification of God's glory'.

b. Ecclesial theology will always find its centre here again after all other particular considerations. But for this it does not suffice that the principle of Soli Deo Gloria be formally commemorated at the beginning and at the end as in most standard theologies, to be wholly forgotten in the interim. Such theology does indeed conventionally affirm that God could create the world only for his own glorification; but this statement can be understood without scandal only if, in the course of the total theological development of God's saving action, one is enlightened as to what this glorification actually consists of.[11] This same theology likewise promises us an eschatological kingdom of glory, with the 'contemplation of God's glory' in heaven and a participation in it through the 'transfiguration' even of the material world at the resurrection of the body. No objection can be made to this either, as long as it becomes clear that this final irruption of God's glory is but the conclusion of his self-glorification throughout the whole course of salvation-history; and only from the perspective of salvation-history can eschatological glory be understood—but then really understood—as the manifestation of the fact that God's glory is its own origin and its own reason-for-being. This is already made clear by the whole span of the Old Testament, and even more so by its transcendence in Jesus Christ.

---

[9] Der Brief an die Epheser (1957), p. 74.

[10] Schriften (Benziger, 1961), pp. 191, 229.

Instead of elaborating a systematic dogmatics with its various propositions under the heading of 'glory', it seemed to us more fruitful to show the central position held by the concept of glory by developing an ecumenical dogmatics: this presumes, however, that the dogmatics of the Orthodox, Evangelical, and Catholic churches in each case has its centre in the concept of the Gloria Dei and that, consequently, a fruitful dialogue among these churches can be conducted only starting from this common centre. In this dialogue the total ecumenical understanding of the Gloria Dei will be able both to uncover the one-sided emphases and limitations of a particular dogmatics and to lead to a reciprocally beneficial interpenetration of viewpoints. The fact that Catholic dogmatics exhibits a sort of 'projection' over the other two dogmatics will have to be pondered precisely in the light of our theme: this projection can be accounted for by the fact that it conveys to us a decisive and final deepening of faith's understanding of God's glory.

---

[11] The distinctions with which scholastic theology analyses the concept of glory are as follows. On the one hand, we have the gloria fundamentalis or objectiva (the object itself, that is, the worth of the being that is praised) and formalis (the glory itself). On the other hand, we have the gloria intrinseca (which the praiseworthy being ascribes to itself in its knowledge of its own worth) and extrinseca (the glory given it by others). From this we see that Scholasticism quite carelessly interprets the biblical kabod with the pagan philosophical concept of gloria in the sense of honour, praise, fame, renown. Augustine borrows the definition from Cicero, who in the De inventione (II, 55) defines gloria as frequens de aliquo fama cum laude (see Augustine, Contra Maximinum II, 13; PL 42, 770; In Jo. ev. 100, 1; 105, 2; PL 35, 1891, 1905, etc.). In essence Thomas adopts Augustine's definition: clara notitia cum laude (Ia IIae 2, 3; Contra Gen. 3, 29, etc.). But all of this, for one thing, reduces the biblical kabod to the element of 'honour' or 'fame', and secondly the concept of 'glory' becomes univocally applicable to both God and creature, so that the theological principal nowhere emerges.

c. As a kind of postlude and somewhat by way of an appendix we will finally ask the question concerning the relationship between the theologically beautiful (glory/image/charis) and inner-worldly beauty as a question having particularly to do with Christian art. In so doing it will be wise once again to look back to the Bible, since it is there that the forms and branches of the artistic domain are in various ways made serviceable to revelation. According to P, artists were hired and especially endowed with the charism of the divine Spirit (Ex 35.31) so that they could produce the liturgical buildings and accoutrements; and the theme of the true temple traverses all eras of the Bible down to the Apocalypse. All available forms of poetry are taken up by the Prophets in order to proclaim God's word effectively, and music and the dance are not disdained. All of this will have to be kept in mind when the question is seriously posed and when we seek to give it a thorough answer—always, of course, maintaining critical distance and caution. One thing is certain, however, and this is that wherever God's free revelation intervenes in a human context, this context cannot be reduced to theoretical laws or practical rules in the manner of human science or technique.

For this reason, too, our whole attempt to restore to theology the third dimension of glory—alongside the dimensions of the true and the good—must itself remain a fragment, and at best it can serve as a stimulus to do new homage to the incomprehensible mystery of divine love.

I. GOD'S GLORY AND MAN

A. GLORY

1. DIALECTIC OF SENSORY MANIFESTATION

a. Appearance, kabod

How can revelation take place? How can the abyss and Ocean of all reality make itself knowable and perceivable to the 'drop in the bucket' and the 'speck of dust' (Is 40.15) that is man? How can the 'grass that withers' and the 'flower that fades' be touched by the 'word of our God, that will stand for ever' (Is 40.8)? To have an inkling of the divine, to adore it from afar, to learn to be silent before it and to allow it to hold sway: this may be granted to creatures at their very limits. Such an intimation appears to creatures to be revelation enough: on the shore of their finitude they discover the Wholly Other, and buffeted all about by the surge of its breakers creatures learn something like piety—a sense of awe before the undecipherable Meaning that pervades and directs even the apparent meaninglessness of their existence. They can also invent gods for themselves, cosmic or supra-cosmic beings that exhibit themselves majestic and free at a level where men stand in the grip of fate. They can elaborate for their gods qualities which they themselves would like to have, or qualities that they do have but would like to understand better. They put words in the mouths of their gods which correspond to their own dreams and longings; they ascribe to them deeds and powers that surpass their own, and they manifest their idea of the absolute in concrete gestures, prayers, and sacrifices by means of which they put themselves under the protection of their gods and participate in their praeternatural might.

But suppose that these pious attempts of humanity to penetrate into the region of the inscrutable are all pushed aside by a contrary movement whereby the Abyss and Ocean of all reality, on its own initiative, presses in upon humanity in order to disclose itself, in order to reveal itself as 'what' it 'is': if this could happen, how would it have to happen? Does not man immediately give to everything that approaches him as an infinite or absolute reality a limited form and a relativity which fixes it as the 'other pole' of a finite relationship, which is the only thing of which he is capable? Or can the Infinite—which, as Abyss and Ocean of all reality, must also be the fullness of omnipotence—bring about what is unthinkable for man and make itself known, in spite of everything, as what it 'is'?

Beings in the world possess the never wholly comprehensible power of appearing before one another and manifesting themselves, not only in their naked existence, but also in their potency, which casts a spell around itself, either to keep others away from the sphere of its own life or to keep them in its power. This is the richly ramifying biological substratum for related anthropological occurrences, which rise to the level of the spirit only by bringing along all their native biological potentiality. If it is true that each human being possesses a personal, free, and secret sphere, it is also true that this sphere is exhibited externally to various degrees, and defended. The expression 'prestige' (Latin praestigiae, actually meaning 'tricks' or 'illusions') is significant: there exists something like a magic or a legerdemain of the personality which attracts or holds at a distance, which is more vitalistic or more spiritualistic, a mysterious centre of forces in the person whose existence and effects cannot be denied and which, even before words and gestures come into play, shapes and orders the space around itself in a jointly biological and spiritual fashion. Both things about it must be affirmed at the same time—the aspect that pertains to life and that which pertains to the spirit. In order to have graphically before us this primal phenomenon of potency—which opposes every attempt to dissect it into a physical-sensory and a spiritual component—we have only to think of the forcefulness possible in a given look, which even someone turned away can feel on his back repeatedly, or the look with which a teacher can hold his class in check or a speaker can spellbind his audience.

Here we find access to what the Bible calls the kabod of God.[1] In the human realm kabod means the 'resplendent and thus appearing "weightiness" or might of a being'.[2] The root kbd initially connotes what is physically heavy or weighty, but then it can refer to everything which gives any living being, especially man, an external force or impetus (gravitas) that makes it appear imposing:[3] this can be exterior wealth such as Abraham possesses (Gen 13.2) and Jacob inherits from Laban (Gen 31.1), or the 'burden' of precious objects (Nah 2.9), but also the renown, fame, or honour that an individual (Job 19.9), an official (Gen 45.13), a king (Ps 21.6), or a people enjoys among others (Is 16.14; 21.16). Finally, it is not only the mysterious external radiance that is designated as kabôd, but also the 'radiant centre' of the person himself, his 'I' or 'self' in its stateliness for himself and for others (Gen 49.6), especially in prayers in which this 'self' is recommended to God for salvation (Ps 7.6; 16.9; 30.13; 57.9; 108.2).[4]

---

[1] Bibliography for the kabod-Yhwh (on the relationship of kabod and doxa see below p. 52, note 3): A. von Gall, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes (1900). W. Caspari, Studien zur Lehre von der Herrlichkeit Gottes (Habilitationsschrift Erlangen, 1907). W. Caspari, Die Bedeutung der Wortsippe KBD in Hebräischen (1908). W. Lotz, 'Die Herrlichkeit Jahwes und das Gewitter', NKZ 19 (1908), pp. 854–871. J. Morgenstern, 'Biblical Theophanies', Z. f. Assyr. 25 (1911), pp. 139–193; 28 (1913/14), pp. 15–60. I. Abrahams, The Glory of God: Three Lectures (Oxford, 1925). R. Kraemer, 'Bausteine zum Begriff "Die Herrlichkeit Gottes"', in: Festgabe für K. Müller (Erlangen, 1933), pp. 7–38. H. Kittel, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes: Studien zu Geschichte und Wesen eines neutestamentlichen Begriffes (1934). G. von Rad, 'Kabôd im Alten Testament', in: ThWNT II (1935), pp. 240–245. G. R. Berry, 'The Glory of Jahve and the Temple', JBL 56 (1937), pp. 115–117. K. Neuhaus, Der Kebod Jahweh als Offenbarung (Diss., Erlangen, 1936). B. Stein, Der Begriff Kebod Jahweh und seine Bedeutung für die alttestamentliche Gotteserkenntnis (1939). Jürg Jeremias, Theophanie: Die Geschichte einer alttestamentlichen Gattung (Wiss. Monogr. ANT 10, 1965, Lit). Cf. RGG^{2}, art. 'Herrlichkeit' (Hertzberg); RGG^{3}, art. 'Herrlichkeit Gottes' (Hesse, Fascher); Bijblesch Woordenboek (1934), art. 'Heerlijkeit' (P. van Imschoot); LThK^{2}, art. 'Doxa' (Schnackenburg); W. Eichrodt, ThAT II (1950^{3}), pp. 9–12; L. Koehler, ThAT (1936), pp. 110–112; Karl Barth, Kirchliche Dogmatik II/1 (1940), pp. 685–764, esp. 725f.

---

[2] M. Buber, Königtum Gottes (1936^{2}), p. 234, note 17.

[3] Cf. Pindar, Nemean Odes 3, 40: 'Because of his innate glory (συγγενεῖ εὐδοξίᾳ) he is greatly imposing (μέγα βρίθει).' In later Greek we find the substantive βάρος in the sense of gravity or dignity.

[4] In these passages a change from kabod to kabed ('liver', that is, the 'interior' or 'soul' of man) can 'hardly be justified' (von Rad).

Can we then also speak analogously of a kabod on God's part, in so far as he, too, in an incomparable and yet comparable manner, manifests and engages his 'I' over against man, along with its own 'weightiness' and spell-binding preponderance? If this is the case, then the mightiness of this 'I', which is the Absolute, would at once assume the character of majesty, and its spellbinding power (which holds others simultaneously at a distance from and in close proximity to itself) would assume the character of lordliness and—to the extent that God's absoluteness is here made present—also the character of sublime glory. But let us consider that, even though a certain potency that is inseparably biological and spiritual-personal belongs to the human kabod, nevertheless God can in no way become submerged in the biological sphere (even if he does undertake an engagement of self in the sphere of the world that is analogous to man's potency among his fellows) in such a way that the biological sphere becomes for him the horizon for a natural utterance. With this we have described exactly the problematic situation that is posited by the kabod-Yahweh in the Old Testament. The theophanies, of which the most important takes place on Sinai, are intended to be understood as overwhelming events in which the living God becomes present. On the one hand, they occur in such a way that the sensory sphere that belongs essentially to man is brought into play: an experience takes place whereby God is externally 'seen' and 'heard'. On the other hand, however, the person involved clearly understands that the sensory manifestation is the indication, as it were a signal or a symbol, for the fact that the absolute, spiritual, and invisible Mightiness is here present, comparable to the way a person catches his interlocutor's attention before he begins to speak with him.

Whatever else we will say later about the sensory forms of God's appearing to man, and much will be sharply critical, we must from the outset say this: in the sphere of biblical revelation there are no such things as 'purely spiritual' revelations on God's part. This is so because man as man is never 'purely spiritual', and because God, as the creator of the material world, takes this world as it is when he introduces into it a new relationship based on his self-revelation. On the other hand, the appearing form as such is never the mightiness (kabod) of God itself but only its indication, which however calls the person addressed to 'attention' before the absolute Subject that is making itself present to him. Thus, the sensory forms of apparition in the Bible are very closely related to the various ways in which the divine Subject expresses its interior in freedom. God's kabod is inseparable from his particular 'holiness', from the 'might' of his spiritual actions, from the manifestation of his 'name', from the turning of his 'countenance' to man; and yet, in spite of its inseparability from these aspects, kabod does not fully coincide with any one of them. Nor, conversely, can it be restricted to the merely 'sensory sphere', since the 'weighty force' that imposes itself is that of the subject and, thus, of the very divinity of God. What will remain the decisive foundation for the whole course of our investigation—namely, that all aspects must be seen in their mutual complementation and interpenetration—is shown to be the essential principle of interpretation already here in our preliminary discussion.[5]

---

[5] It is therefore incorrect to restrict the kabod-Yhwh one-sidedly to the 'visible aspects' of revelation, that is, to those variable elements that convey the 'impression of weighty force' (thus Neuhaus, pp. 82–86), who later adds quite correctly: 'The natural eye does not see the kabod. In order to perceive it, in the natural eye there must emerge the supernatural glance', p. 92, so that between the natural phenomenon and God's apparition there reigns 'not identity but transparency', p. 94). The kabod-Yhwh can be rightly equated only with one natural phenomenon: the tempest (thus von Gall, at least for the pre-Exilic era) or a certain shimmer of light within the cloud (Morgenstern). Conversely, the kabod ought not to be understood one-sidedly in terms of a purely spiritual ethics, as Caspari tends to do (the God who is worthy to be adored appears behind and above the storm), even more so Abrahams (who sees in the storm an internal attribute of God, related to his justice), and most emphatically Kraemer, according to whom kabod expresses 'God's total will-to-salvation, which in holy love powerfully presses on toward revelation . . . until it completes its transforming effects in the history of mankind' (p. 7). He rightly stresses the fact that the kabod 'is never identical with its constantly changing form of appearance. It is essentially an action that imposes itself, an expressive power, an ability to represent' (p. 12). But he presses his case too far when he says: 'To see anything natural in the kabod-Yahweh means to externalise what is most interior, to naturalise the historical and the moral, to exchange the essence

Although in what follows the aspects of 'appearance' and of 'subject' will be treated in succession, their intimate connection must not be lost from sight. Because precisely this particular subject is involved, Scripture speaks of its appearance in this particular (broken) way. Appearance must always be spoken of in a broken way, especially when what appears is a free subject. It does indeed present itself by appearing, but it does not thereby abandon its freedom to be able to appear also in some other way. The Second Book of Esdras has found a splendid image for this: 'Thy glory passed through the four gates of fire and earthquake and wind and ice, to give the Law to the descendants of Jacob, and thy commandment to the posterity of Israel' (2 Esd 3.19): not the 'gates' are the kabod, but rather the kabod passes through them with the power proper to it. We have already seen that this freedom of appearance is an essential element of the beautiful.[6] How much more will this be true of the appearances of the eternally free God, who cannot be naturally contained by any worldly form.

The point of departure of God's coming into presence—even if it conveys the strongest feeling of a tremendous presence—can only be abstract for human perception, in the sense in which Hegel calls sensory perception abstract, since the content of the being becoming manifest has in no way been integrated in such perception. We will therefore have to reject the usual terminology that speaks of a 'concrete kabod' when the sensory dimension of the phenomenal manifestation is meant and of an 'abstract kabod' when what is involved is 'only' God's essential dignity—his honour, which is visible to the world and acknowledged by it. The decisive indication for the fact that the redactors of the Pentateuch were very much aware of this abstractness of the sensory signals is their concern to harmonise the different traditions before them for the form of the appearance' (p. 18). If we want to do justice to the texts, we will have to stress both sides at the same time. B. Stein correctly remarks that the kabod cannot be considered as a detached phenomenon, but rather that it is 'God himself or at least divine attributes in their manifestation' (p. 306), and indeed this applies already to the oldest texts.

[6] See volume I, p. 20, and volume III/1, pp. 271f., 865f.

only in a relatively superficial manner, that is to say, only in such a way that their interior incompatibility is still clearly retained. And in the present case our focus is precisely on this final form of the redaction: although one may attempt to trace the individual strains of each tradition back even to the mythical realm, still no theological gain can be hoped for from the enterprise. The Pentateuch is rich with theophanic phenomena; but these receive the name 'glory of God' (kabod-Yahweh) only in P, which also unifies the phenomena for their own (mostly cultic) purposes but also allows older versions to stand. For us what is essential is the theological dialectic that unfolds through the contradictions that the various narratives leave open.

b. Knowing and not knowing

